"This explanation I had much desired to give you, I now have freely to confess. But there are reasons connected with a woman's feelings, and the world's circumstances, which may not themselves be easily explained; for we see not clearly what is required of us, and good and evil seem at times almost to change places.

"For all this, if I am not wrong in my calculation concerning you, you will come hither to see and speak to me. Come then to Carloghie, and that speedily, for all is past that we once dreamt of, and we may now converse as old friends, whose former acquaintance is forgotten by the world.

"Yours in kindness and esteem,

"MARION LOGAN."

Never did fate send a lonely man, in the nick of time, a more welcome epistle, to skin over the sores of his past.

lately arrived Irish upon the Madawaska river, these were the first British settlers we had seen since leaving the veteran's house upon Temiscouta lake, and from this specimen we were almost justified in forming but a mean opinion of the New Brunswickers' hospitality.

Twenty miles farther brought us to the Great falls, where we again landed, the portage commencing at the rather dangerous vicinity of about one hundred and fifty yards above them, the influence of the cataract being very evident upon canoes which must cross the river to gain the entrance of the portage, situated in a small circular bay. The surface of the river is perfectly smooth and unbroken until it gains the very edge of the rock, when it is precipitated seventy feet in a sheet of amber-coloured foam into a narrow and rocky channel, not exceeding thirty-five in breadth, down which it boils and bubbles for the space of half a mile, and then expands into its original width of about one hundred and fifty yards. There is a tradition, though seemingly not a very probable one, that several canoes of Mohawk Indians, who had attacked a tribe near the source of the river, and massacred all, excepting two old squaws, were (accompanied by their prisoners) floating down with the current at night, and were to a man dashed to pieces over the falls, of whose existence they had not even the most remote idea. The squaws aware of the circumstance perished with them, not wishing to survive the destruction of their tribe. Sitting upon the rough crags on the margin of the cataract, we made a late dinner upon the last remains of our shoulder of mutton, sacrificing the well-picked bone to the shades of the old squaws and the Grand falls.

The river banks, formed of a hard rock, with light covering of soil, exceed one hundred feet in height above the falls, and more than two hundred half a mile below them. The man who conveys the boats across the portage* earns a good livelihood by his two-fold occupation of farmer and boat-carrier. Our canoe, with the baggage in it, was drawn along a winding road on a sledge by two oxen, and launched again into the water half a mile below for a quarter of a dollar. Timber was formerly drawn up on the level of the bank, and then launched again into the water down an inclined plane, but this system was soon abandoned as too expensive, and it is now allowed to shoot the falls, which in the freshets but little injures it.

For seven or eight miles the current carried us on with great velocity over the "White Rapids," the "Black Rapids," and a series of others, all sufficiently dangerous to encounter without a skilful pilot, and we landed at dusk near a small log hut, the first we saw after leaving the portage. The banks had continued a hundred feet in height, and covered with a dense pine forest, but we frequently passed groups of woodmen bivouacking by their fires at the water's edge after their day's labour had ceased. Throwing part of the baggage over my shoulder, I walked up to the hut, through whose small window the bright light of the wood fire could be seen blazing cheerfully, and knocking at the door walked in, and found a family of seven, who welcomed me most hospitably. My companions following me, we joined the circle, and, after enjoying a bowl of excellent milk, asked the settler's history. He had been a comrade of the veteran upon the lake, and had been settled there at the same time, when his nearest neighbour lived at twenty miles' distance. He had now one within six miles, but considered it no advantage, and would rather that people did not settle so near to him, as he should then have no fear of quarrelling. Part of his house had been washed away by the freshets during the spring of the previous year, and, although it was twenty feet above the level of the river, the water had stood five feet five inches in his kitchen, which was the only room he had remaining. This summer, too, the bears had destroyed thirteen sheep and four hogs of his stock, but he had yet twenty-three sheep remaining, and two cows. The only neighbours, however, he did not appear, in any manner, to approve, were the Americans, whose boundary was within five miles. He said that he had been over amongst some of them lately, and told them that they had better be silent upon the subject of the boundary question now, for that New Brunswick had a governor who had just been most satisfactorily arranging the same kind of a dispute in the East Indies.

As the night was advanced, wishing to obtain a few hours' sleep, I threw my wet great coat upon the floor before the blazing hearth, as the most comfortable berth I could select; but the settler's wife would so positively insist upon Mr. Reid and myself taking possession of the only bed in the room, upon which, she asserted, "she had just placed new blankets for our express comfort," that I was compelled most reluctantly to relinquish it, while the settler and his son went out and sought a night's rest amongst the straw in the stable. I had heard from the boatman on the Madawaska river that the house was not celebrated for its cleanliness, and a sight of the bed convinced me that there must be very substantial reasons for its fame having spread through hundred miles of nearly uninhabited country; so I walked out of the house with the intention of sleeping in the open air, and thus avoid giving any affront to our hostess, but the mist rose so thick and cold from the water, and remembering the story of the bears, I thought it more prudent to undergo a night's tortures within doors. On returning into the house, I found my friend already between the far-famed blankets: the boatman had taken up my comfortable position on the hearth: the children were lying upon a bed at the foot of ours, and the settler's wife sat in a chair watching the fast dying embers. I was somewhat puzzled to discover how Mr. Reid had contrived to turn in; for I had no idea of risking myself otherwise than in my clothes, and, after considerable manoeuvring, took an opportunity, when the settler's wife turned her head, to spring in, and strongly entrenched myself up to the chin between the coverlid and upper blanket. My friend had taken up a similar strong position, and was almost choked with attempting to smother his laughter. We were not such old soldiers, however, as to outmanoeuvre the enemy in this manner; for swarms of light infantry poured down upon us in every direction; and most stoically did we bear their attacks for the short time we were awake, but the fatigues of the day soon caused us to be unconscious of every thing that was passing. Towards morning I was awakened by some heavy weight upon my feet, and, at first, took it for a visit of the night-mare; but arousing my senses a little, and feeling it move, I was convinced it must be one of the children; so out of gratitude for our accommodation I could not remove it, but endured the evil, until rising to depart upon our voyage I discovered that it was a large black dog which had favoured us with his company.

Two hours brought us to the mouth of the Aroostook river, and Stobec, a small Indian village on the opposite bank. Landing where we saw a bark canoe drawn up on the beach, we fortunately met a staff officer, who had been up the Aroostook to check some aggressions of the American lumberers in the forests on the disputed territory, and was now on his return to Fredericton. We proceeded in company through a fertile and from this time well-inhabited country, with fine bold scenery at every turn of the stream, and at night arrived at Woodstock, about sixty miles below the falls and half a mile from the river, where we found a comfortable little inn, kept by an American. The division of the counties, which had only lately taken place, had not been publicly stated more than three or four days, and Woodstock, which had formerly been in the county of York, was now the capital of the new formed county of Carleton. At present, it is but a small village, though doubtless, ere many years have passed, it will be one of the most considerable towns in the province, being situated in the most fertile part, and already possessing a large agricultural population. Persons anxious for posts under government, and to establish themselves with the earliest foundation of the town, were flocking in from all directions; no fewer than three surgeons and four attorneys had already arrived, though there was neither fee nor food for one of them. The small and formerly quiet village had already divided opinions and clashing interests, and numerous little jealousies and bickerings had arisen. It is a straggling place, settled partly upon a creek near the river, and partly upon the high ground where the inn was; so each party wished to establish their own spot as the site of the capital, and derive the advantage of having the public buildings there.

The evening gun, from the American garrison of Houlton, only five miles distant, can be distinctly heard at Woodstock; and as we were descending the river on the 11th of September, we caught a glimpse of Mar's Hill, upon which the boundary monument has been erected. Large as the St. John's river is, it is rendered utterly un-navigable by the numerous rapids, where, in many places, the depth does not exceed three feet. The beach every where was strewed with fine timber, which had been left by the falling of the spring freshets, and which could not now arrive at the port of exportation before the ensuing year, and flat-bottomed provision-boats can with difficulty reach Woodstock on the third day from Fredericton. The scenery throughout the St. John's is of a superior order to the generality of that in America, and becomes bolder and more beautiful as the river nears the ocean; but the land decreases in fertility in an equal ratio every succeeding mile below Woodstock. The falls of the Pook at its junction with the St. John's, seen through a wooded and rocky chasm, and an Indian village with some fine drooping elms upon a bold undulating country a few miles lower down, are exceedingly picturesque objects.

With the exception of Woodstock, it cannot be said that there is any settlement which can come under the denomination of a village between the Green river and Fredericton, a distance not short of two hundred and twenty miles. In many parts, as at Madawaska, a narrow riband of farms extends along the banks of the St. John, and stretches back from a quarter to a mile inland. Three or four tribes also of Indians have their strange-looking collection of bark-built wig-wams huddled together upon the headlands formed by the junction of the Tobique and other tributary streams: the chief's house is usually distinguished from the rest by having a flag-staff alongside of it, or the roof being rather more elevated. The costume of the females struck me as much gayer than that of the tribes I had previously seen in the Canadas. Their dress here was generally of brilliant and gaudy colours, with their black hats encircled by a broad silver band. The men, who appeared to subsist chiefly upon fishing in the summer season, had the same heavy and forbidding countenances I had observed amongst the Seneca and Iroquois tribes. I was informed, however, by officers of the army, and agents who had superintended the annual distribution of presents from the British government to the tribes upon the borders of Lake Huron, that fine athletic warriors of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, with noble features, used to attend upon those occasions with one side of their face painted sky blue, and the other chequered with vermilion and bright yellow; but all whom I saw fell very far short of the natives of Bengal and Pegu both in stature and countenance.

At ten o'clock on the night of the ninth day from our leaving Quebec, we arrived at Fredericton, three hundred and fifty miles distant, rejoiced beyond measure that our fatiguing expedition was at an end. The cramping attitude of sitting crouched at the bottom of the canoe for sixteen hours, during four successive days, without being able to change that position, lest the heavily laden and frail vessel should capsize, was irksome and overpowering in the extreme. But when our troubles and vexations were over, as usual we laughed heartily at all our adventures; and, taking it all in all, I may fairly say that I enjoyed this journey more than any other portion of my travels on the continent of America. Our provisions had been rather short, and the bread on the fourth or fifth day became so excessively sour, from alternate wet and exposure to the sun, that it was unwholesome as well as unpalatable, and began to affect us seriously. Nor had our night's rest been sought upon couches of the softest and most fleecy down; but, in the enjoyment of good health, other matters were of trifling moment, and soon consigned to oblivion.

CHAPTER XXII.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE—SPIRIT OF EQUALITY—DISPUTED BOUNDARY.

After the separation of New Brunswick from Nova Scotia, in 1785, Colonel Carleton was appointed governor of the new province, and selected a spot on the right bank of the river, where Fredericton now stands, as the site of the capital. The situation is good, being the head of the tide-water and the sloop navigation. Though ships of large burden can ascend to the mouth of the Oromocto, from twelve to fifteen miles below, yet merchandise is usually forwarded from the sea-port ninety miles distant by small craft, the Falls of St. John, two miles from the harbour, preventing the passage of large vessels except at high water. The town consists of two principal streets, running parallel with the river, and contains about 1200 inhabitants, but as yet has no regular market nor fair. The point of land upon which it is built is flat and low, being but a few feet above the level of the freshets. A low range of rocky hills, however, rises half a mile in

*Owing to the numerous rapids on the river St. John, these portages or carrying-places are frequent. The eastern provinces, more especially New Brunswick, are so intersected with streams, whose sources are in the immediate vicinity of each other, that the whole country may be traversed by means of them with very little difficulty: and, in short, the rivers are the highways of the province. The Grand Temiscouta portage is of an extraordinary length, being thirty-six miles over a mountainous country, and very little used, except by casual travellers, but some of the navigable streams are within two miles of each other, yet flowing in opposite directions.

have been the melancholy witness, and feelings which I shall not easily portray."

While we were thus speaking, the bell in the western turret rang for dinner, with as much formality as if the whole family had been at home; and after a simple repast, which I enjoyed much in the society of my valued friend, Marion thus began her tale of the family.

CHAPTER III.

THE STORY.

"One of the earliest things that I can remember," began my narrator, "was the marriage day of the earl, when he brought home to Carloghie Castle the high and haughty Lady Mary Bochlyvie. I was then but a child at my mother's foot; and my memory only retains a dim confusion of carriages and horses prancing towards the castle; and white ribands, and gay dresses; and firing of guns that almost frightened me out of my wits; and shouting of the men, and amazement of the women, at all the grandeur and the bravery. Never, from that day to this, was there such a show in the Fairly Holms; for it was then the fashion for weddings and funerals at great houses to be celebrated with much eating, drinking, crowds, and rejoicing. And so Lady Bochlyvie, being a great lady, to be brought home; and my lord being a proud man, and used to all manner of magnificence, ever since the king helped to ruin his grandfather; there was nothing but colours flying on the towers of Carloghie, and wine flowing in the great hall below; and all the gentry far and near were gathered to the celebration, to drink happiness and joy to my lord and my lady.

"I remember the confusion of my little head at seeing all that I saw, and hearing all that I heard that day; and at the guns cracking at my ears, and the shouting and huzzing; for the farmers and people were perfectly mad with joy at seeing the great folks come back to our own holms, and talked all manner of extravagance in their drink. And then, at night, such bonfires gleamed on every hill for miles round, in my young eyes—I think I see them still, blazing through the dimness of forty years!

"But my father was a thoughtful man, and had experience of the world; and when he saw all this obstreperous rejoicing, he shook his head with a stern countenance, and a rebuke in his look; and I heard him say to my mother, that, although it was not pleasant to prophesy sorrow in the midst of mirth, yet that the whitest stone threw the blackest shadow,—that this over boasting of present joy and anticipated happiness was perilous to the peace of high or low, and carried to him an ominous prediction for the uncertain future. The day passed over, however, as the happiest day must; and months ran away after that; and the rejoicing was almost as great, when a son and heir came to be surely anticipated, to inherit the great earldom of Carloghie. That my lady's bairn to come was to be a son, there could be no doubt; for my lord was a man who had always been used to have his own way, and to be crossed in a particular so important to his house was an event which of course was not to be thought of.

"But when the time ripened, and the doctors were agog, and all the country were astir on so great an occasion, the earl received a damper in the page's news, which was almost too much for his spirit to bear. The expected son, who was destined to be christened in the names of all his ancestors, turned out to be only a daughter! for which no name whatever had been made or provided.

"Here was a business for an earl of the land! It was perfectly cruel and distressing!

"The worst of disappointments, however, time will soften down; and a son and heir was again promised to the house of Carloghie. That promise was at length brought to maturity, and in the fulness of the period, ended also in a new disappointment, more trying—I may say more intolerable—even than the former. To be thus contradicted in his wishes a second time, was more than could be expected to be borne, by a man of my lord's disposition, with any thing like patience. My lady took ill health from trouble of mind, and my lord went abroad, and became misanthropical to the world.

"Both might have become reconciled to these repeated misfortunes, had the little ladies Frances and Mary been cherubs of beauty, as great people's children, no doubt, ought to be. But though the earl and his lady were passable to look at, the little girls were plain to a degree, and the nursery maids said they were perfect imps. The hopes of the parents again revived, however, for it was evident the earl was going to have a large family. But the next child my lady had was also a daughter! so all the calculations of the relatives, on both sides of the house, were entirely defeated, and the earl was reduced to black despair.

"It was certainly a fault for my lord to be so pertacious; but, from the old Lady Carloghie and others, he had always, from a child, had whatever he wished that money could purchase; and as money had hitherto procured him every thing he desired, and he had never been so balked and thwarted before, it was no wonder he was a sad and disconsolate man. Other affairs of his household and his tenantry were at this time added to vex and worry my lord's mind; and, as I have heard tell, he began, in the midst of his fret, to look around him with astonishment, and ask himself if he were really a born earl, and a patrician of the realm, that he should thus be subjected to crosses and troubles, as if he had been nothing but a poor man.

"The expectation of children was now only a vexation to him, as the event he had set his heart on never took place; although my lady was now in good health, and they all lived dull and domestic here at the old castle. Accordingly, the fourth time, my lord set off from this irksome neighbourhood, just to be out of the way of another disappointment. He was gone about London, or somewhere else, seeking consolation, as usual, in the spending of money, when, what was his surprise, one careless morning, to receive a letter through the common post-office, as if it were only a report of his factor, announcing to him nothing less than the actual birth of a son and heir!

"So sudden a dispelling of the clouds of misfortune was almost too much for his lordship's nerves. He took post immediately to return to his home; and the rejoicings that took place at Carloghie Castle, on his arrival, were so great and long continued as almost to cause the death of the child whose birth had been the occasion of so sudden a change. Thus began the several bright years that, notwithstanding my father's ominous forebodings, continued for a considerable time to cheer the hearts of the earl and his lady, and to enliven the whole neighbourhood of old Carloghie.

"And so thus ends, I may say, the first epoch of this particular branch of our family history."

CHAPTER IV.

"When Lord William grew up—for this was the first of the names by which the male heir of the family had been christened—unlike, in particular, his two eldest sisters, the youth evinced a fine mind and a handsome face, with a constitution so fragile and delicate, that to his doting parents his health became a subject of constant solicitude. As for the girls,—particularly Lady Frances and Lady Mary—they were really, to speak the honest truth, as plain in all respects of the outward woman, as ever you would suppose it possible for a noble earl's daughters to be. The eldest was scraggy to a degree, and had an ungainly figure, and features such as you will seldom see in a common farmer's lassie. The second had high cheek bones, which my lady her mother said were far too Scotch; a skin freckled like a leopard, although the sun had seldom been suffered to shine upon it; and she had also sandy red eye-lashes, which gave her face a very peculiar and far from agreeable expression. The third and youngest, Lady Barbara, though bluff and brown when a child, grew up a comely and attractive girl. This young lady, indeed, took very much the look of her brother, Lord William—having at least his dark penetrating eye, with the lofty and haughty bearing of her mother's side of the house. Consequently Lady Barbara was flattered much from contrast with her less favoured sisters, and by them she was regarded with a natural, almost a justifiable, envy.

"But the great attention of the family was, from his earliest years, lavished upon the young heir, who began to discover qualities, both mental and external, which well might excite the admiration of my lord and my lady. With a thin yet animated longish visage, an eye like a hawk, and a look expressive of that wilful sort of intellectuality which belongs to the finest scions of the aristocracy, Lord William was a youth of whom any lord in the land might well have been proud. I remember him when a boy—a pretty boy! riding like Jehu down the Fairly Holms, and calling upon the farmer lads to follow him in his gallop, as if he had been leading an army to battle. And yet, at that time, battling and warriorship seemed not to be in the youth's thoughts; but rather something that was not usual for a lord, namely, learning and scholarship, and pretty arts, as if he was to be nothing but a silly man to write books for dull people to abuse, or a learned clerk to teach homilies of philosophy; and then, to crown all, what should serve his wilful spirit after that, but he must take up the ambition to paint pictures, like a painter.

"When my little lord got this fancy into his head, he filled the castle with a litter of linnens' gear, paints and paint-brushes, and filthy oils, that smelled the rooms, dabbled the floors, and vexed the house-maids exceedingly. My lady his mother did not approve of these fancies; but he being delicate, besides being very clever, she had not the heart to cross him. And then he would leave his tutors and his hard words, and wander the woods with a crayon and a book, and sit himself down on a cold stone or the root of a tree, drawing old walls and ruined turrets; or he would go down about the holms by the water's edge, and take effigies of common and plebeian things, such as cobble-boats, and ragged boys, and cart horses, and swine; which he would come and show at the castle, as if they had been high matters to be admired! Then he would make free to look at the farmer lads, and to be seen with his crayons and his paper, as if he had not been the son of my lord, and nothing but a common student, drawing trees and stumps for his living.

"In these peculiar fancies, certainly, my lord was not aided or abetted by any at the castle; for his father frowned and spoke angry austerity; his lady mother beseeched and argued with him like a college professor; his eldest sisters looked stiff and scorned upon him and his drawings, and sometimes broke out and scolded him like perfect kail-women. All this, however, only roused in him a spirit of resistance, which, partly kindled on the consciousness of his rank, partly on his happy disposition, and partly on the opinions which he was a process of imbibing, did not develop itself in the turning of argument, but in setting them all by his conduct at open defiance.

"In this sort of wilfulness, which was after all, probably harmless, except on the score of letting down his dignity, Lord William at first stood alone in the house; but anon his youngest sister, whom he most resembled by degrees began to join him in what he pled for, and his talents, and defended his conduct; and at length broke loose herself, and followed him without in his eccentric ramblings. In the opinion of his mother and her rest, Lady Barbara now began to comport herself as becoming her father's daughter, as the young lord, unlike an earl's son. Parental or tutorial authority was now of little avail against the wild spirit of the brother and sister; and the domestic dignity of my lord's family government became divided against itself in the immoderation of faction.

"To give you the philosophy of the matter," continued Marion—"for there must be philosophy in my tale, although I tell it, or truly it is nothing—there was a reason for the disobedient spirit of the two younger children, arising out of the sure workings of human nature. In common with very many in their high station, my lord and my lady made the chief virtue required of them and their children to consist of the proper support of their dignity, especially in the view of their obvious inferiority. Accordingly, from the first dawn of reason in their children, they never failed to take every opportunity of impressing upon their young minds, in the strongest language, the fact of their hereditary greatness, and of the infinite distance that there was by nature between them and all those by whom they were usually surrounded. As they grew in years, maxims of "dignity and aim of state were taught and impressed upon the children of Lord Carloghie with incessant diligence and fastidious care, and became in truth the staple of that family education, which has of all other the greatest influence on the formation of character.

"But the anxiety of parents upon a favourite point is extremely apt to defeat itself; by overdoing something with artificial means, which seems to them at the moment to be all in all. Thus, as is often done in the case of religion, by constantly worrying youth with one theme, they excite that feeling of irksomeness and disgust at the whole of a subject, which years only strengthen, by the law of association. Upon the elder ladies of Carloghie Castle, however, the watchfulness and jealousy of their parents, upon this incessant subject, and upon the constant study of an artificial manner before masters, had not this effect; no more than would, probably, forced religion have had upon the same species of mankind which, being of the mediocre, or rather beneath the mediocre species, all narrow opinions, flattering to self, were extremely suitable to them, and became littered by as fast as imbibed.

"The nobler and freer intellects of Lord William and his youngest sister, however, spurned these opinions, in proportion as they were carried beyond the common sense apprehensions of simple minds; and as they were urged upon them on occasions unseasonable to the warm and generous feelings of youth, their untractable disregard to the reserves becoming their station,—having been formed by a system of restraints too early enforced,—was aggravated by constant and bigoted exhortation; and kindled, by the pressing of overstrained sentiments, often into silent yet resolute opposition.

“Had the Earl of Carloghie’s been a mushroom house, this jealous spirit might in some sort have been excused—at least it might be deemed only natural, according to the usual procedure of the world. But its existence in his case only shows that a contracted mind, feeding on pride, fastens, in all circumstances, on those mean aims and objects, which are suited to its own ignorant spirit and its narrow ideas. Thus, looking upon all beneath them in rank—at least if not redeemed by surpassing wealth—as beings of a different species from themselves, the noble parents taught this creed in every form to their children; and those of the latter, who could not receive it to the same extent as themselves, were opposed and scorned, or at least lamented over as low-lived renegades from their noble house. Thus also, while parental indulgence, and the delicate state of his own health, preserved Lord William late from being sent to college, the foundation was laid for those artist ramblings and eccentric opinions, both on the part of himself and sister, which, as unfortunately their minds were quite different from those of my lord and my lady, ultimately ended, at least on the part of one of them, in the uncommon events of her history.

“With Lord William, indeed, this spirit of unsuitable liberality, contrary to the will of my lord, would have doubtless been mellowed down by more extended observation, had time been allowed him to mix further with the world. But, alas for his haughty yet doting parents! when just about sending him at last to the university, his health grew worse, and getting drenched in the woods one day in changeable weather—while in terror of his father he sat in the evening in his wet clothes—a fever was the consequence, which at once threw the family into the most dreadful alarm. Their worst fears for him soon became too well verified; and though doctors were sent for, wherever money could procure the highest medical skill; and though his favourite sister never left him, nursing by his bedside day and night, the efforts of man were of no avail; the prospect of a coronet could not save him; and in ten days after he was taken ill, handsome Lord William, the hope of his house, and the pride and boast of the Fairly Holms, lay a dead corpse in the Gothic room, among the old standards and escutcheons here in Carloghie Castle.

“Oh, what a voice of lamentation and weeping arose within the hoary walls of this dreary mansion! Oh, what a despair of heavy grief drowned in sorrow my lord and my lady! and oh, what a day was that, when his youthful body was taken to be buried in the great family vault in the old chapel! When the black hearse with the white plumes, and the yellow skulls that grinned on the dark panels, came down the long avenue from Carloghie Castle; and when the long cavalcade of mourning procession traversed his old haunts by the Ruar Water, as I stood and watched it again on the hill by my father’s side, I saw the tears hop down the old man’s cheek; and I heard him murmur to himself these solemn words: ‘Now is my prophecy o’er truly rede. This, I fear, is but the first act of the black tragedy, that, for the warning prostration of human presumption, is to follow the immoderate rejoicings that made the air ring again, and filled these haughs with boastful bravery, so shortly since, upon my good lord’s wedding day.’”

CHAPTER V.

“Change of place, and change of scene, and the sight of foreign parts and strange company, help to dissipate great folks’ grief; and so my lord and my lady, and all their retinue, at length returned again to old Carloghie. There came with them, or arrived soon after, a crowd of carriages, and various-sized wheeled vehicles, containing dukes, and earls, and other lords, and foreign counts with long names, and great ladies of old families and small means, and, in short, a well selected gathering of miscellaneous gentry.

“All this driving of coaches, and company-keeping at the castle, was, of course, to marry off my lord’s three daughters, who began to hang heavy on their parents’ hands, and made them exceedingly anxious for the time to come. In this laudable and most parental purpose, my lord and my lady were baulked, however, in a manner that looked as if they had been born to be unfortunate. In truth, with reference to the great number of high born suitors, the looks of the two eldest girls were exceedingly against them.

“Yet, in painstaking expense upon this important business, my lord and lady were certainly in nothing to blame. They had dress-makers from London, and stay-makers from Paris, and milliners from all civilised foreign parts; and artists of the person to no end; and my lord, poor man, was like to be ruined and driven to the continent, with nothing but the trouble and the cost thereof. Then there were paints and patches, got from all quarters, bearing all manner of foreign names; and French rouge, to make the ladies bloom like the rose; and scents and perfumes, to make them smell like Arabia; and pastes and poultices, to whiten their skins; and oils and dye-drugs, to recolour their hair—and the whole castle was like a warehouse with a litter of cosmetics.

“But all would not do; and my lord’s grand dinners were eaten for nought; for the high gentry dropped off one by one, without ever asking an interesting question; and so, like the daughter of Jephthah in the holy book, the ladies were left where they were, to stay at home in the castle, or wander about the hills in solitariness. With the two eldest ladies, this was particularly the case; and as for the youngest, though much better favoured, and every way more attractive, she was of a reckless and wild spirit, which seemed absolutely to frighten the men from any wavering purpose towards her. She was now, however, become a buxom and heroic-looking girl, with large black eyes and a towering head; and as her sisters, saving for some inferior match, were evidently laid upon the shelf, upon Lady Barbara were fixed the hopes of the family.

“In all civilised communities of old aristocracy, it has ever been the practice for parents to look out matches for their daughters; it being well understood, that it is a matter with which the girls themselves have nothing to do. Yet however orthodox this doctrine was in the mind of the earl, it quite disagreed with Lady Barbara’s philosophy. She conceived, like all foolish young people, that likings and dislikings, in the case of matrimonial coupling, had something to do with the happiness of life—that these were in some cases to be thought of, as considerations even to be set against interest and ambition. In short, she had become an abettor of the dangerous doctrine, that greatness itself is not to be considered as entirely paramount to the romance-book feelings of plebeian nature.

“These opinions might, as I said before, have been softened down into reason, by meeting them half way for argument’s sake, or, on Barbara’s part, by a further and more judicious view of the world. But the worthy earl was a straight-forward man, and had no idea of that strange something, which argumentative people call human nature. Never having, therefore, been crossed in his whole life, unless it might be by Providence above, which makes little exception in favour of high lineage, he was not to be disputed with at this time of day, especially by his own begotten children. Accordingly, the wilful spirit of Lady Barbara was met, in all things, by the most determined opposition; until, by the self-confidence of youth, and the fancy of persecution, this wilful spirit settled down, since her brother’s death, into a distrust of the judgment, and a suspicion of the motives, of her own parents.

“When, therefore, my lord had, with parental care, and much anxiety of mind, arranged satisfactorily for her the business of a husband, in the person of a nobleman of much wealth and undoubted family, Lady Barbara received the tidings with perfect astonishment; as if her will ought to have been adverted to, before the matter had gone so far. But my lord had mistaken the temper of his daughter, even if he was correct in his ideas of the precise state of obligation between parent and child. Independent, therefore, of her opinion of the noble person who had received permission to address her, she was strongly, if not insuperably, prejudiced against him, from the manner in which she conceived him to be forced upon her. Never, therefore, did obstinate girl more effectually turn the back of her hand to an unwelcome lover, than Lady Barbara did to the bowing and beseeching Marquis of Brechin. She absolutely turned herself on her heel, and ran from him; and, taking to the stables down in the hollow, and saddling her pony, almost with her own hands, she set off to the woods like a hunter Diana.

“You will allow, Mr. Balgownie,” continued Marion; “that this was most dreadful conduct. Had Lady Barbara been nothing but a simple gentleman’s daughter, she might have been excused for this distaste at a disagreeable-looking man; for, to say the truth, the marquis, notwithstanding his lands, was a wornout lord, and had seen much service in this vile world in more ways, as I have heard, than it is necessary to express. Besides this, his lordship the marquis was but a thin whipping-post of a nobleman, with gray whiskers and lean legs, and, more like a French mounseer dried to a mummy, than a husband for Lady Barbara. All these, I say, might have been good reasons for the lady’s conduct, had she been nothing but the child of a man of low degree. But for an earl’s daughter to think of getting the man that she should like, or of refusing a marquis for any fault whatsoever, was a thing that was beyond the power of understanding.”

“But what might be his lordship’s age;” interrupted I, tired of sitting so long a mere listener; “for much, with young women, depends upon that.”

“As to his age,” replied Marion, “it was not out of the way, as gentlemen go. He could not be more than forty years, which, you know, Mr. Balgownie, makes but a young man.”

“Why, as to that, Mrs. Marion,” said I, stroking my chin considerably, “youth itself is a matter of opinion, like other things; and I would be loth to predicate, on my own responsibility, upon so kittle a question, especially in reference to such a free-thinking young woman as this Lady Barbara is described to be. But was there nothing else at the root of young madam’s dislike; for I have always understood that, in spite of romantic notions, with most ladies, after all, a marquis is a marquis.”

“So he is,” answered Marion; “and a high man too was the Marquis of Brechin; and you may call him young or not; but although his whiskers were gray, and his teeth were bad, either Lady Frances or Lady Mary would have had him at a moment. However, as you enquire, there was something else at the root of Barbara’s dislike, which, in fact, became the cause of unexpected events in her fortune, and may therefore require a few words of retrospective explanation.”

Here Marion paused, and took a sip at her cordial; while I, refreshing my own attention with a hearty pinch of Edinburgh snuff, and settling myself on my chair, got her to proceed in her story, as in the next chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

“In the hollow beyond the house where my father dwelt, but nearly a mile farther from the castle, there lived, near to the water’s edge, a thriving family of farming people, but no tenants of my lord’s; and the name of the old man was Robert Johnston.

“This farmer was a plain person, and shrewd and sagacious, like most of his compeers; but his wife, who had been the widow of a poor minister of the kirk, was bold and ambitious, and continually stirred up the old man to efforts of gentility, which his good sense taught him as constantly to resist. Accordingly, in spite of the angry murmurings of this dame, he beld his daughters determinodly to country work, instead of aiming to make them ladies, as his wife would have had him, and then married two of them to neighbouring farmers, where they were exceedingly comfortably settled in the world. Besides these two daughters, Robin Johnston had a third unmarried, and also two sons; and it is with the junior of these young men with which my tale comes particularly to have to do.

“The farmer’s daughters were all sonay lasses; gay, and ruddy, and healthy, and hearty, and nothing more; but her two sons, particularly Jamie, were celebrated for their exterior in the whole country; and certainly a pair of handsomer lads never could be seen riding of a market-day to Fairly fair, or walking on Sabbath to Fairly kirk. Ye may be sure all the lasses from the brig of Douce to the Lochar brass, were setting their caps for the Johnstons of Fairly, and their mother at home was a proud woman, when she heard of the fame of her gallant sons. Some said they were to be married to this lass, and some said they were courting at that; but after many flirting and fleechings, and dancing at kirks, and spreeing at fairs, the eldest ran off with the tocherless daughter of a small laird, and their mother said their youngest should take nought else but a born lady.

able in that; for James, the handsomest of the two, was worth the ambition of the best bred girl, whose heart was to be taken by a good looking youth, just made to please a woman's eye: and yet the lad was modest and discreet in all he did, and though his name was known, far and near, as 'bonny Jamie Johnston of the Fairly Holms,' he was no more conceited than his gray-headed father. Besides this, there was a judiciousness in his character, young as he was, which saved him from much of the nonsense of youth; and, though not averse to the mirth and sport of his time of life, a thoughtful contentment beamed from his eye, or shone, like mild sunshine, in his fair downy cheek, reminding every one of the steady solidity of his respected father.

"That this family should have been known to the inmates of Carloghie Castle, was neither unlikely nor remarkable, among the dull gossipings of a country place. But that Jamie Johnston should have become at any time the talk of the high ladies above stairs, or ever come in contact with actual nobility, was an event beyond the compass of ordinary occurrences. Thus however, it was, and thus social impossibilities become reconciled with nature.

"It was during the ramblings of Lord William in the Fairly Holms, when that noble youth was yet in life, and following the fancies of an imaginative artist, that, struck with the beauty of the young peasant, he drew his face and figure, as he watched him whistling across the fields, or plying his boat in the Ruar water. Yet Lord William was too manly and really noble a character, thus to make free with the person of a fellow, without showing his brother youth the produce of his pencil, and offering him with frankness an occasional condescension. Seeing that the modest peasant had too much good sense to presume upon this freedom, Lord William went farther, talked with him, bathed with him in deep pools of the stream by themselves, and sketched his figure in every attitude that he fancied, as one of the finest specimens of rustic nature. Sometimes my lord would have accompanied his young friend up towards the old farmer's house; but this generous freedom Johnston always waived, or resisted, with a grace that only raised him higher in Lord William's esteem.

"Time, however, as I said before, brought new changes, at least as respected the fragile constitution of the heir of Carloghie; for the spring weather had been cold and watery, and the summer that followed brought not summer's genial warmth; so his state of health began to confine him much to home, and thus painting became again his only solace and amusement. From some romantic fancy, caught up from porusing some far-away poem—I believe it was called 'the Orlando Furioso,'—he had projected a design which represented certain knights combating in a forest, for which scene Carloghie woods were to furnish the local original, and Jamie Johnston was to stand for the principal figure. For this purpose, the young farmer was sent for to the Castle; where, many times dressed up like a belted knight, or stripped over the shoulders like a Roman centurion, he was made to stand in character before the young lord.

"This was a sort of exhibition of himself that was not, however, always to Johnston's taste, though, clad as he was in knightly panoply, he laughed at times at the grand figure he made. Yet, if at any time he became restive, and showed his reluctance to sit or stand, one entreating look of the pale yet animated countenance of the young lord would at once reconcile him to any constraint that might contribute to the gratification of the noble youth. There was also at first some demur made to these practices by my lord and my lady; but so desponding had they become, concerning the health of their heir, that they resolved to cross him in nothing, but to indulge his humour without hindrance or question.

"Of course, the ladies, his sisters, were much interested in the artist labours of their sickly brother; and Johnston the farmer's son was thus frequently seen by them all; but Lady Barbara, in particular, as Lord William's favourite, was more frequently than any of them admitted into the scene of these sittings; and thus had an opportunity of seeing and conversing with the young peasant, in a way which brought after it most important consequences. As long as Lord William had strength remaining, he continued to labour at the pursuit that he loved; but nature at last gave way; no medical aid could save him, and death put an end to all his projects, and involved the whole neighbourhood in sorrow and gloom.

"But when every thing was over, and the long absence of the family was ended, and Barbara had again returned with the rest to Carloghie, affectionate thoughts of her late brother renewed her grief, as she revisited his haunts, and contemplated his labours; and involuntarily, as it were, the idea of Jamie Johnston became associated with him, and with her most interesting recollections. Unfortunately, also, she had at this time nothing in the shape of variety to divert her mind from these wanderings; and thus the stately monotony of her life in the Castle, with the occasional peevishness of my lord and my lady, brought on by their own heavy disappointment, often sent her for relief to those pleasant holms, where she had, in former years, so frequently strayed with her free-minded and intellectual brother.

"I know not exactly how it happened," continued Marion, "but it must have been in the course of these ramblings that Lady Barbara again had speech of Jamie Johnston; and indeed, that she should have thought of him with interest, after what had passed at the Castle, and stopped to talk to him of the lamented youth, was far from surprising in her present state of mind. And yet, it was surely a very forward thing of her, if it was so—for Jamie Johnston was always considered as a judicious lad, that knew how to keep his distance from high gentry. But still, I really—"

Marion here seemed to pause for my observation, as if she found her philosophy fail her, in accounting for Barbara's extraordinary conduct.

"Ye need not trouble yourself to use fine words of dictionary explanation about it," said I; "for whether he spoke first, or she stood to talk to him, after he had given her a hat as he passed, as it was nothing but his place to do, makes little matter to the story. Nature will be nature. I can give you Latin for it. But if ye must have it from me in the shape of philosophy, sorrow and disappointment are of a levelling effect, being found as well under the earl's coronet as under the beggar's hood; and the human heart is never so open to the renewal of joy, as just after the depression of some serious grief."

"So, sir, as I was saying," she went on, "the Castle of Carloghie was at this time but a dull and heartless place, and its stately forms and stiff observances must have been exceedingly irksome to a free-spirited girl. Then, her eldest sisters were as cold and formal in their manners as they were bigoted in their talk and plain in their looks; and they were so full of the high supererogations of propriety and dignity, and so domineered in this way over their younger sister, that there was positively no standing them. Besides, there had got into the service of the family, a while before this, a most disagreeable personage, in the shape of a governess to Lady Barbara—that was some time before I came into the Castle. This old person was a perfect poker for stiffness, and serjeant-major for state, that worried the poor young lady to death with her airs and her restraint.

"It was for these very qualities, no doubt, that Miss Pinchbeck was as great a favourite with the elder ladies, as she was detested by Lady Barbara, who laughed at her formality, mimicked her airs, and sometimes even set her authority at naught. So there was nothing but complaints made, and sides taken, and pouting and dispeace within the Castle; and my lady herself, who was constantly appealed to, was oftener the enemy than the friend of her thoughtless daughter. Thus the poor girl's mind was always sent back to lamenting thoughts of her late brother, who used to take her part in the family disputes, and then, whenever she got out, she would ride down to the holms, and talk of him, if she could, perhaps to bonnie Jamie Johnston.

"In the middle of all this, who should come in, further to unsettle the lassie's mind, but my lord's favourite fop, and proposed son-in-law, the great Marquis of Brechin. So nothing would do my lord but Lady Barbara must have him; not that the earl was otherwise very particularly set upon the match, but because his daughter presumed to resist, and he was a man that was determined not to be crossed. For the same reason it was, I have no doubt, that my lady joined with the earl, although she had no great opinion of the marquis; and the elder ladies joined in the angry cry, just to show their authority over their sister Barbara.

"Why don't you marry him yourself, Lady Frances, since ye like him so well?" Lady Bobby was wont to say to her eldest sister. "I am sure he would suit you better than me, wi' his thin chaffs, and his buck teeth; besides, he's noarer your ain age, and dienna ken your ill temper. Or, Lady Mary, ye may take him, and praise him up when ye get him, and then ye'll be a marchioness, and who but you? But take him who likes, I'll marry none of your spindle-shanked lords."

And so she would snap her thumbs at the whole o' them. Did ye ever hear such frightful heresy!

"But it was much worse than this, with my lord and my lady, who insisted upon her in a way that was really terrible; and so, the house being now only a misery to her, whenever any storm was raised, she took some opportunity of slipping out, and down she would go towards the holms of Fairly. There she would wander in romantic discontent; and in these moods, the hearty and joyous laugh of the country maidens, as they went to milk their cows at even, or heaped their hay-cocks in the meadows beside the stream, filled her heart with strange yearnings, and made her almost envy the happy freedom of plebeian life.

"All this that was going on in Lady Barbara's mind had by no means escaped the observation of Mrs. Johnston of the Holm, the ambitious mother of young James Johnston. With the shrewd eye of experience, the farmer's wife watched the motions and inferred the feelings of the wayward girl. In the course of her rambles Barbara was in time induced to alight from her pony, and to rest, as she passed, in the farm-house. The old woman was kind and insinuating. She saw that something oppressed the mind of her noble guest; spoke to her feelings; and, Barbara's heart being full, she gave Mrs. Johnston sufficient of her confidence to let her see all that the dame desired, to complete her own observation. Here, to the distracted lassie, was a new reverse from the persecution of home and her dread of the marquis; and here, in the farmer's comfortable parlour, the cool bowl of rich milk, and the wholesome niceties of the barn-door or the dairy, pressed upon her with country good-will, tasted sweeter by far, in the mood she was, than all the luxuries of her father's castle.

"Jamie," said the farmer's wife to her, one day as they were left at home together—"there's promising prospects before thee, my man, or I'm mistaken—if thou but kens how to catch the sunny shower when it's bly; Jamie, hast thou any spirit in thee? What would thou think o' Carloghie Lady Bobby?"

"What is your meaning, mother?" answered the youth, "and what is it you say? What has spirit to do with me and an earl's daughter?"

"It has much to do with a clever man's fortune, James; if you had only the spunk of your auld father," said the dame, "who, though she be only a farmer's wife now, was once a gude minister's lady; and would outcap yet, gray as she is, if she were a wainter, at the laird in all the land, if he had only flung half the wealth her, that bonnie Lady Barbara has done to thee."

"Has done to me, mother!"

"Ay, just at thee! Jamie Johnston. Dost thou think I'm blind? And if thou dienna ken how to ride the tide when it's flowing to thee, or to follow the plough when it whistles at thy ear, truly thou'll maybe rue it yet, and that perhaps o'er an empty trencher."

"And would you really, mother, advise a country lad like me, that has been bred to nothing but the plough tail, to forget so egregiously his place, as to make a fool of himself by etdling after a lord's lady? No, no, mother! I hope I know my own countenance better than that."

"Weel, weel, James, my man, thou's not like me, auld as I am; and if thou hast not the heart to bid a bode for the silk gown, little matter that thou never get the sleeve o't. But I tell thee, that Lady Barbara, high born as she is, has a maiden's notion o' thee, I can tell that."

"And ne'er mean her! though I say it;—continued the dame, while her son mused—"for though she wer'n a mine, there's no a lad, frae Fairly Bly to Brechin Braes, has a face like thine, or a better figure to please a lady's ee. Na, thou needna frown at thy auld mother, Jamie Johnston. Would thou throw thyself away upon a common Jenny o' the loaming, who would keep thy nose to the grinding-stone all thy life, while thou might get for the seeking a lord's lady?"

"Pluck up a spirit, Jamie, lad!" added the cunning old woman, clapping her son on the shoulder as he meditated on her words—"and never be late to look at high mark; and if thou just take thy mother's advice, and play thy cards wi' a bold hand, who knows—but where thou sits, but thou may yet lead Lady Barbara to the auld kirk, wi' resettled servants crowded behind thee!—Ay! thou may yet drink the red wine in Carloghie Castle! wi' flunkies standing behind thy chair, and a lord's title above thy name!"

"Jamie Johnston! dienna spit sae spiteful on the floor, and sneer sae loud at my words, for great ladies take strange fancies, and must have their will; and thou to say against it! Did not the Laird of Rowallan's widow marry the page that ran her messages? and did not Lord Dalgowdie's daughter run off with her own footman? I tell thee, lad, there's a horseshoe in thy road, at this precious moment, and thy mother's bitter ban upon thee, if thou'st no at the pains to pick it up!"

"But how did these unequal marriages turn out, mother?" said James, with serious elevation of tone and manner; "you have not told me that! nor what was the real upshot of these ladies' whims. No, no, mother! you need not tell me, that the eagle on the eury and the simple hen at the barn door will ever pair happily together. And false and foul would that heart be, that would take advantage of the momentary discontent of a high-born lady, to wile her into a lowly nest like mine; where soon, like the noble bird upon the mountain, she would begin to flap her wings for her own rocks, and leave her humble mate, to couple again with her own kind. But, more than that, the earl would disown her, and make two beings miserable in place of one, besides the sorrow and humiliation it would bring on a most noble house. Mother, I'll none on't! Never urge this flattery on me."

"That's just the way; that faint heart speaks, that never won fair lady"—said the mother tauntingly. "But fathers are not made of stone more than daughters; and after a blast and a breeze of lordly wrath, the earl would just do like other auld men, and dower his bonnie daughter, and bless his grandchildren, and slip to his grave when his time came; and then, my lad! thou would be a great man, and a lord!—Think on't, Jamie! think on't!"

"While the young man's mind was thus wrought upon by his mother at the farm-house, affairs were fast drawing to a crisis at Carloghie Castle, partly by the injudicious obstinacy of the earl, and partly by the romantic self-delusion of the young lady. She still continued her visits to the farm, but now in a more clandestine and stolen manner; and in proportion as young Johnston seemed to avoid her, her passion for him increased, until she worked herself into the conclusion, so common to lovers, that, come what might, it was impossible for her to live without him.

"The old woman now found means to bring Lady Barbara and her son frequently together; and when the lady's fondness for him was more fully observed, and more artfully fanned by his mother—when it was broadly urged upon himself, and his generosity was appealed to; this was taking him on his weak side indeed, and speaking to considerations which few men could resist. Besides, a real regard for the noble girl, though resisted at first, had now established a seat in his own breast; and when he witnessed her tears, and perceived her love—"come what might!"—as is the language of lovers, he determined to join his fate with hers. A minister was not long in being persuaded to unite them, by the craft and influence of the old woman; and, advantage being taken of a long absence by Lady Barbara from the castle—for she had fled to the farm-house after a quarrel about the marquis—and also of the temporary absence from his home of the old farmer, who never would listen to a word of the match, young Johnston and Barbara were privately married.

"Though the family at the castle had been used to her freaks of late, all in it became alarmed at her long absence, when they found she did not return. The earl repented of carrying his severity too far, blamed the envious old maids, her sisters, for working on his mind, and went in person to the farmer's, where he heard she had taken refuge, to enquire kindly for his runaway daughter. Sympathy is indeed a wonderful thing, and sincere kindness is the golden key that opens at once the door of the generous heart. When Barbara saw the earl, her father, stopping before the farmer's door, and heard him again address her as he had done when she was a child, her feelings relented with returning tenderness, and a pang shot into her innermost conscience, which told her she had done him a grievous wrong. He kissed her kindly, as if he had found a lost child again; spoke to her apologetically of what he had said to her at home, until her eyes streamed with tears to hear his condescension. He even sought to make it up with her, by voluntarily promising to be less austere in future, and then taking her into the carriage with him, brought her in love and kindness home to Carloghie Castle.

"A fortnight or more passed away after this, and what Barbara's thoughts were may partly be guessed, for there were gay company came to the castle; and there was now much feasting and riding about, and great attention was paid by all the gentles to her, as the bonniest lass and the favourite of the family, but the name of the marquis was never mentioned. All this time she had not courage to tell her father what she had done; and although she wished at times to see her farmer husband, she found no opportunity, and, in fact, for the present found herself happier than ever in her own father's house. At length a young lord, one of the earl's high visitors, of great family, and every way like herself, began to pay marked addresses to her, and, soon after, formally demanded of her father the honour of her hand.

"This she had no possible pretence to refuse—her new suitor being handsome, accomplished, high born, and rich; and every one in the family envied her good fortune. All seemed now to be going on well, and Barbara became again almost the idol, as well as the hope of the house. A grand invitation was also given by the father of the young lord, her new suitor, for all at Carloghie to spend some weeks at his lordship's seat; and great preparations began to be made to set out on the jaunt. Merchants and milliners were again in high employ; and the painter who helped to teach my young lord that died, was sent for to take my Lady Barbara's picture. She sat for it, and the gentleman has often told me since, how uneasily and impatiently she seemed to sit, with her velvet robe wrapped round her like a queen, and the tiara of pearls which my lord had devised set in the midst of her glossy curls. You saw the picture in the room above. Alas! that I should now have to tell such a tale."

CHAPTER VII.

"It was just at this time," continued Marion, "when the failure of the banker brought on my father's ruin, that prim Miss Pinchbeck was turned off, and I found an asylum with this noble family. I was chiefly, however, about the person of the countess herself, and knew little of the mind of the youngest of the ladies. But Barbara again began to absent herself, and steal down towards the Holms; and Jamie Johnston had often been seen, hovering about the woods, with a pale face and an anxious look. Then strange whisperings took place among the servants, an unusual mystery was observable in their faces, and Lady Barbara, while I read her changing countenance, seemed evidently distracted by some inward trouble.

"At this time I was requested to stay in her chamber, and I heard her sometimes even cry out in her sleep, as if she laboured under some terrible apprehension. My lady became alarmed, and commanded me to watch her narrowly; so I, suspecting nothing but a little waywardness, talked to her of all things to gain her confidence; and asked her, how she liked the young lord to whom she was soon to be married. Heavens! how fearful was the result of this! I remember well how she broke out in a hysterical laugh after my question, and, throwing her arms round my neck, asked me if I had never seen Bonnie Jamie Johnston?

"O fie! Lady Barbara," said I to this extraordinary speech, "O fie, and for shame!—How can the like of you give your mouth to talk such words?" So the matter passed away; and, simpleton as I was, I saw nothing in this but her usual free and thoughtless way of speaking. For this innocent judgment I cannot find fault with myself; for Jamie Johnston was the admiration of all the women for miles round; but indeed it was the great distance between her rank and his condition that during the whole of this period blinded us all.

"One evening, near the supper bell, the young ladies and myself were all seated, dull and silent round the fire in the drawing-room, Ladies Frances and Mary occupied with their new dresses. But Barbara, in spite of the constant bantering of her sisters, seemed quite insensible to the grandeur that had been provided for her, and sat gazing into the fire, having got into one of her late fits of unfathomable abstraction. My lord and my lady were both in some other apartment. The house was then without company, and a strange and ominous silence seemed to reign, with a speaking prognostication through the castle. Presently the door opened, and the countess walked in, in her stiff and stately way; but when I looked up in her ladyship's face, never have I seen so terrible an expression. She was as pale as a sheet, her mouth was half open, as if obeying the impulse of some sudden horror, and a ring of darkness appeared round her eyes, as if some inward suffering had forced them to assume their present unnatural position. She stalked up towards the fire, and, fixing her wild gaze on Lady Barbara, seemed for a moment to strive in vain for utterance.

"Barbara!" said she, at last, "Barbara! what—what is this I hear! Answer me one question—tell me truly what I shall ask, and save or kill your distracted mother! Has there any thing improper taken place between you and young Johnston, the farmer? Are you, or are you not, his—his wife?"

"The two ladies, Frances and Mary, rose simultaneously, and stood up like statues on hearing these words. My lady herself seemed ready to faint; but, holding by a chair, and then gathering up all her dignity, she awaited in terror the reply of the unfortunate girl.

"Lady Barbara sat dumb, as if too suddenly taken. I thought I saw her begin to tremble, as she drooped her head for a moment on her breast, and, raising it again, the dim gleam of the fire-light gave a hue to her features that I never before saw upon a living countenance, as the dread-struck girl now gazed up in terror in her mother's face. After a few moments of this dreadful silence, the unhappy lassie threw herself on her knees at my lady's feet.

"I want no tears! I will have no prayers!" exclaimed Lady Carloghie, in a voice that appalled us all to the earth. "Is it the case, I say, or is it not?"

"Oh, my lady," said I, interposing, having barely recovered my own speech—"it is not the case! Such a vile report cannot be true. Lady Barbara is only frightened at the very idea. Give her a moment's time, and she will fully contradict it. Lady Barbara, my dear, why don't you speak?"

"She is unable! quite unable!" cried the distracted lady. "She is guilty! guilty of bringing ruin on herself and disgrace upon her family. I see it! I see it all!"

"No, my lady! no," said I again, "it cannot be. Oh, Lady Barbara, speak up, and say, it is not true."

"Speak!" cried her sisters, crowding round. "Speak, Barbara! You cannot! you cannot, indeed, have done so dreadful a thing!"

"Lady Barbara merely covered her eyes with both hands as she kneeled, and burst out into tears.

"I looked on with horror! I thought I should have swooned. The elder ladies started from her with a scream, and ran to support their mother. Never did I witness so dreadful a scene!

"A short interval of silent consternation was sufficient to bring us back to our recollection, and then my lady began to speak. Approaching her daughter, who lay on the floor, she said, 'Rise, young woman, and depart this instant! You are now no longer a daughter of mine, or a member of this ancient family. Take with you your plainest wearing apparel, such as becomes the station you have chosen for yourself—but not a robe nor a jewel that you hold as my child, or a single trinket that shall serve as a memorial that you ever belonged to this noble house. I wish you well, but from this day you are disowned for ever, I shall never hold converse with you more!'

"I shuddered as I stood by, hearing the poor young creature's doom; and, wringing my hands as I looked down upon her, I joined my tears to those of her distracted sisters, while the whole apartment sounded with the voice of lamentation.

"Mother," gasped Barbara, laying hold of my lady's robe, "you know not how I have been led into this. Will you cast me off entirely? Is every one to be happy and fortunate around me, and no word of kindness or forgiveness ever to be spoken to me?"

"Wretch! dare you speak of such a thing?" creaked my lady, in a tone that seemed to cut through my nerves, "how can you name the word forgiveness, after what you have done? And as for the villain who has insinuated himself into your mind, and taken advantage of your folly, to the bringing of this irreparable disgrace upon my family—the curse of a distracted and disappointed mother shall follow him—follow him, over the world, to his obscure and plebeian grave!"—and the howl of her curse ended in a terrible burst of screaming grief.

"Oh, mother! my lady mother!" exclaimed Barbara, holding up her hands in awful agony, "upon me shower your bitterest, your deepest reproach; but curse not an unoffending young man, who used no arts with me, took no advantage of my weakness, but rather, almost with reluctance, consented to a measure, which seemed at the time necessary for my peace and happiness. But had my lord not so urged the marquis upon me; had he treated me with the smallest degree of that kindness that he did after my rashness had for ever committed me with another, I should not now be a disowned outcast from my father's house, and a weeping suppliant at your feet."

"And I spurn you from me, wretched girl," exclaimed the weeping lady, starting back. "How dare you! to me, the daughter of a race of earls, and in the presence of your noble and virtuous sisters, avow your unaccountable conduct, and incredible forwardness towards a common farmer? Imagine you that the earl, my husband, was to consult the whims of your wilfulness, when he urged upon you a match suitable to the honour of his family?"

Had you even had patience, and not opposed him as you did, my lord never would have been cruel to his own child, to her to whom he once looked as the hope of his house. Oh, miserable, unhappy parents that we are!—Young woman, think! ah, think this moment what you have done. Have we not had a heavy enough trial in the early death of the heir of our house, and in the total disappointment of all those hopes, that were buried with Lord William in an untimely grave; but you must sever from us all that remained, and put the last hand to the breaking of your father's heart?

"Now," she continued, after a long pause of weeping, "I could have seen you this moment stretched in death at my feet. Now I could have borne that you should have been cut off from your family, by an honourable death, and your noble father could have followed your corpse, as he did that of your beautiful and high-minded brother, to the vault where he lies with an hundred ancestors. But to know you bring upon us this disgrace; to live to see any of the noble families of Bochlvyie and Carloghie the labouring wife of a common hind! I would rather a thousand times see you carried to your tomb, and your escutcheon nailed upon the great tower of this castle. Go away!—tears or prayers are of no avail. You are lost to me and my house for ever!

"And you, ungrateful woman," she added, turning to me in her passion—you, that have sat at my table, and eaten my bread, where were you all this while, that you could not see aught that was going on, until it came to this; and this ruin was brought upon my family? But 'tis too late to reflect now! I cannot hear any of you. Take her away from my presence, and see that my orders regarding her apparel are strictly fulfilled."

"My lady stood like the angel of terror, pointing towards the door, while I, ashamed and reproached, led the unhappy Barbara out of the room, without a sigh of sympathy being allowed her with any, or a last word exchanged with her astonished sisters. Scarcely able to support herself on her limbs, I almost carried her into her own chamber.

"When we got to her apartment, I did not say a word for some time, but allowed her to ease her heart by a long flood of tears. At length she looked up in my face, and said, 'Marion, this is worse than I thought. I know I have done a foolish thing; but do you think that the earl has cast me off entirely, and will do nothing for James Johnston for my sake?'

"Oh, Lady Barbara," said I, distressed more than I can tell for her, 'how could you have done such a thing as this? to ruin yourself, and bring us all into this trouble; or how can you expect the earl or my lady ever to notice you more, or do any thing else than let you take a little bite of the hard bridle that you have deceitfully thrust into your own mouth? You little knew, when you did this act, how dear to a noble house like yours is the honour of the family, and that high dignity they have inherited from a long line of ancestors. Lady Barbara, you are now a disowned child, and can do nothing else but lay down your mind to your lot.'

"Then got me my cloak, Miss Marion," she said, rising, 'and put me up two or three things in a bundle, and let me be gone. What do you wring your hands for? Do you think I am afraid to leave my father's house, and be an honest wife to the man I love?'

"I rose and bustled about to hide my own tears, and put up a few things for her in a bundle. I gave it to her, and wrapped her cloak round her shoulders.

"How dreadfully still the castle is!" said she, with a slight shudder, as she stood as if reluctant to go.

"What of that?" said I, 'do not notice such a thing as that at an hour like this.'

"But I must notice it," said she; 'this stillness will kill me! 'Tis worse than when my poor brother was lying a corpse. Oh, if I could but hear my father's voice, though I dare not see his face. Oh, if he would but scold me, and storm at me, as he did about the marquis, I should almost be happy. But this dead silence, this dumb grief about me when I am put out of his door, will break my heart!'

"She took two or three paces about the room. 'I will go with you,' said I, 'towards the Holm. You cannot go alone at this hour.'—and I went to get my cloak.

"You shall not, Marion," said she, proudly, as she stopped in her walk. 'I have done this deed of my own will, and on my own feet shall I go, without friend or favour. But though I am turned out of my father's house, and lords and ladies are my bitter foes, there is one still who will take my part, and in his arms I shall find refuge this night for the anxieties I have suffered as an earl's daughter.'

"But," she continued, after a few hard sobs, 'there's my hand, Marion—there's my hand—give me, if you think fit, the only blessing that I am to receive in parting for ever from my father's house.'

"Scarcely was I able for weeping to pronounce the blessing which she begged; when, rushing from me, she hastened down the back stairs; and the castle was so still all round, that I heard her steps on the gravel without, as they receded to a distance, until their sound died away on the listening ear, that watched her melancholy flight from her home at Carloghie.

"But as I stood without, a sound now rose from the passages beneath, that almost took away my senses, as I listened to it, coming from the chamber of my lord himself. I had heard him sorrow for my young lord's death; I had heard his deep and choking murmur, when Lord William's corpse was carried through the hall to the waiting hearse; but such a sound as this I never heard, coming up through the sobbings of an old man's throat. Its stifled groan spoke of fatherly love, family pride, and future hope, all cut off for ever by one heavy stroke—all mingling to make one bitter draught.

"My lady's sobs now also rose low and broken, to add to those of her distressed lord; and their joint moan of parental agony was dreadful! I thought I should have fainted where I stood.—Oh, dear! I cannot tell any more."

CHAPTER VIII.

Being rather a soft-hearted man, and liable to be melted by female sympathies, I confess I was so affected by this part of the story, that I did not choose further to disturb myself with any more of it that night, and deferred its continuation till the following day.

No doubt this effect upon me was enhanced by what I witnessed of Marion, who, in telling the latter part of her womanly tale, was so melted by her own recollections, that her tears fell like a perfect water-spout, and her voice became so desperately pathetic, that positively I was unable to stand it—so we both sat crying opposite to each other, like two silly old fools, as we no doubt were, and blowing our noses and wiping our eyes, as a boarding-school miss might do, over a witless novel. Worse than this, when I went to bed that night, I did nothing but dream of Lady Barbara and her mother; and as I lay in my lonely room in the great empty old castle, I thought the stillness within and without at this dead hour of midnight was just like that which must have occurred when the young creature was sent adrift from her father's mansion.

In the morning when I rose, and we had discussed our comfortable and neatly-served breakfast, I insisted with Marion upon mounting again up to the room above, and refreshing my recollection by another look at that enticing portrait which she had at first shown me; for the fancy, said I, is a deceitful vagrant, and is greatly helped towards truth by the witnessing of the senses. Besides, when I considered the whole matter, I was almost disposed to think, that Johnston, of whom I had once a good opinion, must have been after all a filthy fellow, to trepan, in spite of his natural good sense, a lady who was so far above his condition! But when I came to look again, at that seductive face, and to contemplate the expression of that large darkling eye, and to fancy the power of that sweet feminine mouth, as she might have smiled upon, and talked to the inexperienced farmer lad, I thought of my own weakness in regard to the women, and of the fiery trials of poor human nature. So I dared not blame the foolish youth; for, what with the beauty, and what with the flattery of the rank, the temptation was more than mortal flesh could withstand.

Marion smiled when she saw what I thought, and, "since you are interested with their tale," said she, "come hither, and I will show you something more. This," she continued, opening the door of a cabinet, "is the picture I spoke of, which was painted by the dear Lord William that's gone, and there is the knight, with the silken scarf and the bended knee, with the unfinished lady standing over him; and whose face and figure make a true effigy of bonnie Jamie Johnston."

"Is that he?" said I, contemplating the manly, youthful countenance and shape on the picture shown me; "truly a pretty youth for a lady's eye; and if men were made knights for their personal looks, Jamie Johnston deserved spur and glaive, better, I dare say, than ere a lord that has trod for many years the holms of Fairly. Little wonder that Lady Barbara's heart was taken; but come down stairs," I added, taking Marion's arm, "and let me hear the rest of the tale."

"I told you," continued Marion, when we were again seated, "that I was so dumbfounded by the suddenness of Barbara's setting off, that for some minutes I had not the power of thought left me, but stood outside her chamber door, like one of the stone effigies on the great staircase, listening to the sad sound that I spoke of: affecting me so much, after her steps were lost under the soft carpet of the planting. Awakening from my trance of concern, however, I determined to get my bonnet, and follow the poor thing at a distance, to watch what should happen to her, and to see, if I could, how she would be received at the Holms of Fairly. I was soon on the lawn, and, my smother! but she tried my legs and my wind too; as, almost out of breath from the exertion I was put to, she glided before me over the lawn and through the planting, like a thoughtful ghaist that touched not the earth, until she came out upon the open fields, and then I was able, by taking a nearer cut, to gain a little upon her. There was hardly as much moon as served to light us down the paths and across the ditches that lay in our way. Nevertheless we got quickly over the ground, at no great distance from each other, for the solitary lassie seemed so wrapped in thought that she never looked behind her; and I observed, that as she neared Johnston's farm-house she walked slower, as if she felt a reluctance, after all, to enter in this forlorn condition.

"When she got to the door, I saw the poor thing step and hesitate, and survey the little bundle she carried in her hand, and then her present humble apparel, and lift her hand to knock, and withdraw it without being able; and then she went aside, and peeped distantly in at the window. A bright fire burnt cheerfully in the large kitchen, where the family were, as usual, assembled; and by going round to another window, and placing myself where my curiosity could be conveniently satisfied, I was able to give a tolerable account of all that passed.

"The old farmer appeared to have just arrived from a long journey; for as he sat by the fire opposite to me, James, and disencumbered his legs of his long grahamine, he gave various details regarding his sojourn in the south, with whom I found he had been living while this whole affair was going on between his son and Lady Barbara. To his discourse, however, which was plain and caustic, after the manner of his class, James replied only in brief and cold monosyllables; the youth's mind being in fact taken up with other thoughts, and in meditating how he should break to the old man the news of his marriage, which, high as it was, he had good reason to dread that his father would by no means approve.

"What is the matter with thee, James?" said the old man, "that thou lookest so serious and dull when I am just come home. Hast thou nothing to say to all I have told thee, man? No country news to give me in return? And why, James, did you not go to John Wernock's kirk? (harvest home.) The lasses were asking for thee kindly, and very ill pleased that thou wast not there. A pleasanter spree there has not been this twelvemonth within twenty miles of Fairly. Hast thou nothing to say to that either? I tell thee what, James, thou oughtest to turn the side of thy head to John Wernock's daughters. There's better than thee would be proud of a pleasant word frae any o' them, either Peggy or Jenny."

"And what would you think, gudeman," said he, with a now striking in, 'if there should be better than any farmer's daughter in the country side would be glad of a kind word from our Jamie? Na, ye needna wonder at me, gudeman. Ye'll may be see it come true yet.'

"What does the woman mean?" frownedly said the old man. 'Surely ye've not been urging on the lad when I was frae hame, to make a fool o' himself as at that senseless tale ye told me about Lady Barbara o' the Castle?'

"Troth I didna need to set him on," said he, shaking her head confidently. 'The lady had her cast the tail o' her ce at Jamie, or I'm mistaken. And what for no? Was not I, his mother, a minister's wife, and as well born and bred, though I say it myself, as any lady?'

"Hold your tongue, woman," said the angry farmer, "that I should be obliged to ban at your senseless tale the first hour I come back to my own house! Is it not enough that you would have spoiled my daughters, by bringing them up to be piano-playing ladies, headstrong and handless, and nothing but dressed up bundles of wants and wishes; but ye must also do your best to bring the head of my son, to land him in vexation and misery. Never," added the old man, with a threatening earnestness, 'let me hear you or be moot or mince such words to me again, or I'll tell you more of my mind on't!'

"The mother and son were struck mute; and the latter, rising up from his seat, began to pace busily about the kitchen. He then seated himself moodily on a settle at the farther side. The old man looked suspiciously and began to muse, while the unnatural and unpleasant silence was unexpectedly broken by a low and timid knock at the door.

"What stranger can that be, at this time o' night?" said the old man. "Who is there?" he called out, going mechanically towards the outer door.

"For heaven's sake let me in," said the lady without, in a faint voice.

"Gude-sake, it's a woman!" exclaimed the old man to himself. "What can this mean? Who are ye, and what's your name, before I draw the bolt?"

"Oh! open the door, and don't keep me here. I am Barbara from the castle."

"From the castle!" repeated the farmer astonished; and while he spoke, James from within, hearing the words, started past him, and, drawing the bolt, the lady, drooping and exhausted, fell forward into his arms.

"After a moment of mutual agitation, the young farmer brought her forward, and, supporting her to a chair, he set her down opposite the kitchen fire, while his father and mother looked on in silence.

"It's not possible that this is Lady Barbara of Carloghie?" said the farmer, surveying the humble apparel and dejected countenance of the reviving lady.

"It's just me, Mr. Johnston,—plain Barbara now," she said, rousing herself to ready determination. "The castle ha' is no home for me this night, or henceforth either, though it gives free shelter to the birds of the air, who pair where they will throughout Carloghie woods, and build many a warm nest under its ancient turrets; so I am come to take up my abode in your farm-house with them that have the best right to me, since I have chosen to myself this humble lot."

"If ye seek a shelter for the night, or a temporary refuge from any calamity, Lady Barbara, whatever be the reason, most welcome I make you to my poor dwelling," said the farmer; "but if you have disobeyed father or mother, and done aught unbecoming your high station, ye'll excuse my plainness, but I will never countenance the child against the parent. James! what freedom is that you use with the lady? Gudewife, I ask you what is the meaning of all this?"

"It's a plain meaning, godeman, and a braw fortune for our son," said the woman, triumphantly. "What would ye think if youthfu' love and heart's wishes had ta'en the place of world's greatness, and our Jamie and Lady Barbara were man and wife afore the minister, just by her ain choice and condescension! Dear me, gudeman, what needs ye look so wild and wud at me? Though the lady's come hame rather bare and disjasked even now, there'll be red gold and green rigs coming wi' her yet, for a good tocher to our Jamie, as soon as the auld yerl, her father, gets his passion out."

"And dare you, woman, to tell me this tale! and to have encouraged, when my back was turned, this miserable folly!" exclaimed the old man, his honest indignation giving him a look that was almost terrific, as he strode up to and stood over the cowering dame. "Confound your senseless—your cursed ambition! that would have ruined my daughters, who, by my care and guidance have been suitably and happily married, and now have ruined my son, and destroyed the peace and prospects of a noble family—a family to whom I am under many obligations! Think you the earl will ever forgive such an act as this? Think you I shall ever be able to look over my own door, from the suspicion of having been accessory to such upsetting treachery!—to the destruction of my own character, and of the peace and respectability even of my own family! Me to be allied to the oldest nobility of the land! You, and your peasant connections and mine, to claim kindred with the noble house of Carloghie! Woman, I know not what to say to you! this misfortune will drive me mad!"—and, unable to proceed, he strode three or four times across the kitchen.

"It's a great misfortune, indeed, and a sore misbanter, nae doubt," said the dame meekly, and recovering her impudent toss of the head, "for an honest man's son to get a gentle wife,—and me, that was the widow of a reverend minister, to be blamed for—"

"Hold your peace, senseless wretch!" interrupted the farmer passionately; "you know not what you have done! You know not the effects of your own folly, even as it respects these thoughtless young people, whom your advice ought to have saved from such an egregious imprudence. Condescension, indeed! it is my son that has condescended to place himself in a position where he must be looked down upon by those among whom he has thrust himself in presumptuous connection! while there is not a family of his own degree, between this and the brig of Berwick, but would have been blithe and happy to have counted him and his among their kindred,—to have made him a respected man in his station, and his wife a companion for his own sisters. But now, he is not only despised by the noble family, who would have otherwise respected him, but has divorced himself from the society of his own relations; for what fellowship can there be with my daughters and a daughter of the Earl of Carloghie? Young man! young man!" he added, turning to his son, "you have shown less sense in this matter than I had given you credit for."

"Whatever may have been our imprudence, father," said James, in an agitated tone, "you might consider in whose presence you are saying all this."

"It is very true, James," said the old man, approaching Lady Barbara, "it's very true; but little did I think ever to have had such things to say. This is a sad folly, young lady! a sad and sair folly in your father's child. And so you have been sent frae the castle at this time of night, and came here without a friend or attendant, carrying a bit bundle in your hand like one of my hireling shearers. Lord help us! this is a purr way even for my son's wife; to come hame to his house without bridal, or brieve, or minister's presence; as if we were ashamed of our ain doings. What will our very neighbours say the morn, Lady Barbara?—and what must my lord, your father, think of a wedding-day like this for his favourite daughter?"

"I am not my lord's daughter now, Mr. Johnston," said the young lady, breaking into tears at the thoughts of her father, and at the picture thus drawn of her wedding day; "but if my lord had had more consideration for my feelings, and instead of insisting, as he did, on my marriage with one I hated, had reasoned with me as you are now doing, I would never have disobeyed him as I did, for all the love I bore to your warm-hearted son, that's my husband this night, and the sufferer for my sake. But I have now chosen another station, and if you will be my friend for James's sake, and be to me in the place of my parents, who have indeed cast me off and disowned me, I will make to him an affectionate wife, and be to you an humble daughter."

"God forbid that I should refuse to be a father to thee, poor young thing! even though my own son is in some measure the sacrifice," said the old man, melted at the manner in which she had thrown herself upon him. "Yet I fear thou knowest little of what is actually before thee."

"There's no fear o' nothing," struck in the farmer's wife, "when Lady Barbara's trunks, and tranklums, and grand dresses come the morn frae the castle—that'll be a pleasant ploy. Odd, I'll wait upon the flunky lads myself."

"There'll be no trunks coming to me, good dame," said Barbara, with a bitter sigh: "my father's word is a hard word, and all I bring is on my person, or contained in this little bundle."

"Ye'll no mean what ye say, Lady Barbara!" cried the farmer's wife, in consternation. "They'll certainly send you your jewels, and your brooches, and your head pinners, and your gold watch; forbye your silk damascenes and your mantel, and your velvet robe, and your calash, as ye're entitled, never speaking o' preen money, and pocket money, and marriage presents, to the boot, o' a gude mailing for our Jamie, even if ye were disown'd twenty times o'er. The bundle? my troth!" added she, taking it up, and looking at it with the utmost scorn, "if ye bring my Jamie nae mair than that, it'll turn out a bonnie bargain for us, after a' 's done."

"And is this the way ye speak already, Mrs. Johnston?" said the young lady in simple astonishment; and, adding no more, she sat looking at her new mother in law, as if beginning to awaken out of a fondly indulged dream.

"Woman!" said the old man to his dame, coming up between her and the humbled lady, "if it were not that you are my wife, and the mother of the lad that sinks with shame at what you say, never would you stay another night under my roof, for the degradation you are putting upon my family. Out, I say! out of my sight! till I discuss in calmness what remains to be said to this deluded young couple!" Having said this with a determined stamp of his foot, the disappointed dame, in high wrath, was forced to withdraw into another apartment.

"I see too well how it has been, my lady," said the farmer, kindly and respectfully, when the dame had disappeared; "but dinna mind my foolish wife,—more foolish, I fear, than either of yourselves; for since this thing is done that cannot be undone, I will be your friend while you remain in my house, and while you lay down your mind to your lot as my son's wife. And, James," he added, addressing his son, "do not give way to this feeling of shame: I know well your generous nature, and what is in your thought; but behave yourself as a man; look for nothing from the earl, and you shall not want for the little substance that I have to give; or for my blessing, that will do you no harm, and the blessing of God, that addeth no sorrow!"

"This was too much for the feelings of the young man; I heard the sob that rose up in his throat, and saw the tears steal down his handsome countenance, as he looked in his father's forgiving face, and grasped in silence his offered hand. The farmer next respectfully offered the same salutation to Lady Barbara, who was for some time too much affected to speak.

"Oh! sir," she said, "though I may have acted foolishly to my family, your son is the choice of my heart, and the election of my fancy; and if you will only be our friend until we have fairly begun the world, you will tie us to you for ever by the gratitude of children, and I will do my duty to my dear husband here, through every scene that belongs to our humble station. Nay, do not look so incredulous, sir. For his sake whom I have taken by the hand, I will lay aside all the notions of my former rank, and early and late I will, by labour or superintendence, strive to make him a useful and a suitable wife."

"You speak delightfully and intend nobly, my dear young lady," said the old man, much moved by her earnest enthusiasm; "but do not deceive yourself with the glowing promises of your own fancy. Believe me, this pretty hand was never made for the labours of the dairy or the kitchen; nor are these sentiments of love-formed romance suited to the homely occupations of a farmer's wife. I do not wish to prophesy evil, but God grant that you may be in no other state of mind, when a twelve-month or two have passed over our heads, and given you that time's experience of the difference between your former and present condition. But good night now; and may God bless you again, and make you, in your own love, abundantly happy!"

He shook hands with both once more, and looked at them kindly and with fatherly affection; yet he parted from them upon the whole with a countenance of meaning melancholy, and shook his head mournfully as he left them together. The moment he shut the door behind him, I saw Barbara burst again into tears, and, with a wild ardour of womanly abandonment, throw herself passionately into her husband's arms.

"I was ashamed to watch any more, and, turning from the little window, where I had been standing, I ran down the holm, crossed by the moonlight the Fairly Burn, and, occupied with various feelings, I soon reached Carloghie planting, and got back to my own solitary apartment in the castle."

CHAPTER IX.

"Weel, really it's very extraordinary, Miss Marion," said I, when she had proceeded thus far, "how ye got all these particulars of your uncommon story. And so, it is by peeping in at windows, and hearkening at chinks and openings while folks are talking, that ye study human nature, and get such intimate acquaintance with family affairs. Really, this lets in a gleam of light into my mind, that's quite instructive; for I never could before make out how those sweet and edifying tales are made up, which are so pleasant to the reading of idle young ladies, and of old fools like myself, who have nothing else to do. Positively, Marion, if I had taken to the standing at the backs of doors, and looking in at key-holes myself, what a wonderful stock of stories might I not by this time have collected!"

"Is that all the thanks I get for sitting here entertaining you, at your own request, until my very tongue is fatigued in my mouth, and as dry as a stick with long speaking," said Marion, contradicting herself on the instant, however, by a good sip of the ratafia before us. "Truly, Mr. Balgownie, if you examine me so particularly as to how I get at the necessary circumstantialities of my tale, you may as well put a padlock on my mouth at once. Na, na, sir, if you go thus to tie up story tellers that dive into the depths of family history, and other benefactors of mankind—the world will sink back into utter ignorance and darkness, and we will know no more of sensible affairs than the savages of Norawaw."

"Conscience me! Marion," said I, "you need not be so brisk and fluff, and hop off in an instant all the way to Norway, for my civil joke. I know what it is to help out a story as well as my neighbours, and there's no doing without it, either for amusement or edification, as long as the world requires to know particularly the internals of things."

"That may be, sir, in the way of your dictionary philosophy," replied Marion, "but there's no deception about my tale, which is as true, every word o' it, as that ye've drank two glasses of ratafia for my one, which is no doubt a man's prerogative, like other matters of injustice. But as my story does not end with a marriage, as most o' the silly tales do, that are without a word of reasonable truth, and as the best o' 't is yet to come, I advise you to let me tell it my own way, and not to interrupt me again wi' any o' your ifs and o's, or I'll turn as dumb and dour as one of the black effigies of the foolish virgins, that stands holding up her empty lamp, on the great staircase o' the castle."

"It would certainly be a dreadful calamity for you to turn dumb now," said I, "after you have talked for so many years; and especially at this time, when I am so anxious to hear to how Lady Barbara came on as the farmer's wife. But do not take a pet at my harmless satires, or let us argue as if we were in earnest, and you shall have it all your own way, as the women should; so just proceed."

"When the news of what was done began to be whispered down the holm," continued Marion, "and Lady Barbara was seen actually staying at the mailing, never had there, in the memory of man, been such a sigh of clatter and astonishment sent up the Fairly water, as went about this extraordinary affair round all the country side. The talk went different ways, and few could tell the right o' 't. Some said they were not married at all, for they would not believe in a rank impossibility. Others said they were, for that Mrs. Johnston had told it with her own mouth; but a third party said that it was only a scheme of Lady Barbara's to throw the auld earl, her father, about the marquis; adding, that, whatever might have happened between her and Jamie Johnston, there would be black news heard o' 't some other day."

"As to our state at home at the castle, it was really distressing. My lady kept her bed for three whole days, and fretted and distracted herself into a burning fever. Lady Mary went about wringing her hands, weeping constantly, and talking to herself about the degradation of her family, until she threw herself into heavy fits of the hysterics; and Lady Frances, after first seeming half pleased at her sister's terrible downfall, began to join in the general lamentation, and then to throw on me the blame of the whole misfortune."

"But the most pathetic consequence of this affair was the distressed state of my lord the earl. For a whole week he never left his room, but sat mourning and sorrowing by himself, as if there had been a burial in the house; and then, when he came out at last, and began to take his walks about the grounds, as he was wont, his appearance was careless and demented, as if he hardly knew what he was about: he looked ten years older, and I assure you, his hair, instead of a mottled gray, that indicated vigour of years, had become white at the haffets from pure affliction. No doubt his lordship was vexed at himself, and sorely repented of his own strictness and sternness with poor Lady Barbara; but oh! to lose in this manner his beloved daughter, and to have the last hopes of his family so mortifyingly blasted, was almost too much for his strength to bear. I remember him speaking to me one day in the garden, and asking me some questions about her, who now was constantly in his mind, and I declare his very voice seemed to be small and broken; and, proud as was his nature, and high his dignity, he was hardly able, in talking of her, to refrain from tears."

"As for Barbara, it was some time before I could make out how she was coming on at the mailing. But the neighbours soon began to give credit to the marriage, for there were various things happened, and symptoms appeared, which were not usually seen in these days about a farm-house. First, the cart came home, one day, with several lady-like matters from the nearest town, such as working tables, from the cabinet-maker's, and garniture from the upholsterer's, and various other gentilities for the spence and the parlour, which made wonderful transformations in the dwelling. Then there were workmen employed to paper up the rooms and filigree the doors; besides a gardener to beautify the garden behind my lady's chamber; and, before the alterations were all finished, there was a curtain fixed up round the parlour windows, that the like was not any where but at the castle itself."

"All this aspiring might have been borne by the neighbours, if Mrs. Johnston had chosen to conduct herself with any sort of consideration. But it was evident that she was getting perfectly mad with pride and upsetting; talked of nothing but her son, Mr. Johnston, Lady Barbara of the castle, her daughter-in-law, and the great alliance with the Earl of Carloghie, who was soon to be quite reconciled to the match, and to make her and hers nothing but ladies and gentlemen. Even this might have been suffered; for, as the neighbours said, words were but wind, and the auld wife was but a vaunting braggadocio; but when she took them into the newly furnished apartments, and showed them the carpets to walk on, and the window screens to dim the light, and the bedstead that her son now slept on, grander, as they said, than any bailie's of the land, they were smitten to the heart with anger and envy; and though they praised them, no doubt, and held up their hands, they said within their minds that this would come to a prostration."

"To add to all this, James Johnston himself began to aspire to a cleanliness above his station,—to shave three times in the week like a gentleman; and he next got a coat home from James Taylor, the tailor, the like of which was not to be seen in Fairly kirk. Some said he had also grown proud and uppish, and that even the old man, his father, held a higher head in the town on a market day than formerly. But this I never could myself see, nor would I give it with any certification; and as for the minding of his work, and his general cideency, no man could be more diligent in the field and over the servants, night and morning, than the young man was."

"As for Barbara, it was not known for a time to the neighbours how she did in her new situation; and the servants, when spoken to, just gave a chuckle, and said they could not say, but they never would wish a better mistress. Then she began to be wonderfully industrious, and would be attending to every thing, though still dressed up in her own flowing and genty dress. Next she would bustle out towards the fields, upon some lady-like errand of fancied usefulness; or might be seen of a morning feeding the poultry behind the house, with long kid gloves on her arms. Also she would, as was currently said, be often observed with silk stockings and high-heeled shoes, picking her steps among the puddles about the barn-door, and asking such questions at the servant lasses and the men, as gave the loons an extraordinary degree of giggling diversion. And then the hens and ducks began to know her, and ran cackling after her whenever she appeared without the door; and it was quite a fun to see them and the geese 'quacking' after her, when her ladyship went out in her dimity wrapper, to gather the eggs of a morning."

"But neither her husband nor his father seemed at all to encourage this extraordinary industry, but only suffered it for a time, merely to humour her harmless anxiety; for the old man, in particular, set the example of treating her with nothing but the greatest respect; and, indeed, she conducted herself so amiably, and seemed so desirous to accommodate herself to her new situation, that, never speaking of the love of her husband, who really doted upon her, she entirely won the hearts of all around."

"But it was in the conduct of the dairy that her talents for her new employments were most conspicuous. From the milking-pail to the cheese-press she attended to every thing; buckled up her sleeves, and helped to separate the whey from the curds; tried the butter in the churn with her own finger; and judged herself of the cleanness of the tubs. This did all very well for a time, when the thing was new, and when the old woman treated her indulgently, rather as a lady amateur than a pupil. But when she began to be entrusted with the actual cares and responsibilities of the farm, and had, as was said, spoiled some churning of milk, and caused the failure of several makings of butter; and, when the old woman began to speak cross to her, and things to go wrong, she took the pet at the others, and at those low-lived plagues, and, retiring into her own chamber, began to think that farming was a very nasty employment for a lady."

"Then she would survey herself in the little toilette glass in her chamber, that stood plaited all round with muslin, under the curtain which she had caused to be crooked, and be horrified at the freckles that had come upon her face, and at the coarseness of her hands with this country work; and vague recollections would come into her head, about matters which it was now only a discontent to think of."

"But there were other little annoyances belonging to her new station, which, were it not that young people never think of any thing in the shape of consequences when they marry, Barbara should have been prepared for when she became Johnston's wife. As yet she had seen only himself and his parents; but there had never come in her way any other of his relations. When she began to appear dull, therefore, about this time, James, in the innocence of his heart, and with a view to arouse her, sent an invitation to his two sisters, and their husbands, to his brother and spouse, and to some half dozen aunts and cousins, to come to the Fairly Holm to a drinking of tea; being, as he meant it, a little social doing, or skink, in honour of his marriage. When all this was arranged in his own mind, and the invitations sent, he came in to her on the eve of the appointed day, to give her a pleasant surprise, by announcing what he had done."

"Bless me, James," she said, speaking first when she saw him, 'what is all this baking of oaten-bread, and scouring of pewter, and cleaning and preparing for! Your mother won't tell me; but it looks as if some great business was in progress.'

"It's no great business, Barbara," he said, 'though it is you that is principally concerned; and don't tell her, with a smile of satisfaction, what he and his mother had been doing, and named all the people who were to make up this pleasant jollification.'

"And do you really, James," she said, 'expect me to figure among all this company?'

"Certainly, my love—it is on your account they are bid; and they are all dying to see you. Besides, it is necessary that we should look like married folk; and I have often heard you say you would be delighted with the simple pleasures of the farmer's fireside. And then, my dear, you will be the queen of the evening, and I will be proud of you; so you must condescend to be happy with my relatives, and make the tea, and do all the honours."

"Do the honours! Me make tea to such a gathering! I can't make tea. I was never used to do it at home; was the housekeeper made tea. I shall never get through it would be better for me not to appear."

"Barbara! could I have thought this!" he said aloud. 'Would you really affront me before my friends? Come, come,' he added, coaxingly, 'do not be so shy of us; and my mother will help you, and we will all serve you, if you will only countenance our doing. So get yourself ready, my lady love, and put on your flowered gown that makes you look so handsome, and pin up your hair in the way that sets you so well, and you will enjoy yourself even in the farmer's ha', depend upon it.'

"She made several other remarks that Johnston did not like, but at last gave a sort of parting consent; and James left her, to see after the remaining preparations. The ploy itself, however, when it came, did not turn out exactly what Barbara's curiosity had wished, or her fancy imagined, as I shall have occasion to set forth. But really this long talking," continued Marion, "is making me quite breathless; and I must wet my mouth with a sip of plum, and recruit my breath with a taste of the ratafia, before I go on to tell you what happened at the dinner."

CHAPTER VIII.

"The habits of Lady Barbara were not, of course, so far overborne, as yet, as to induce her to be up in person with the farmer people; so on the morning of the papered daylight had fully spread over the Fairly Holm, the whole inmates but herself were already in activity, and soon after, such a noise and bustle began to be set up in the house, as speedily roused her from her slumbers. At first, she could not understand the meaning of all this, but the din became of such a nature as to give her a slight note of intimation of what was going forward. The old woman had been first astir, and, setting to work with the assistance of two stout country women, who neither restrained tongue nor talons on the occasion, the whole drove about the furniture and rattled the timber vessels at such a rate—screaming into laughter frequently at their own fun—that to have enjoyed any sleep under the same roof with them, was boyoned the power of nature, even if Morpheus had laid a double weight upon Barbara's eyelids.

"Accordingly she rose botimes—not without previously contrasting, involuntarily, this vulgar noise at her ear with the aristocratic silence of her former chamber in the castle; and, issuing forth from her little room, stared with surprise at the change that had already been effected. The large kitchen was stripped of its chief furniture, for what purpose she could not then make out; the parlour, and its elegances of her own ordering, had been turned topsy-turvy, and the little apence, with all its corner cupboards, and quaint-looking wardrobes, was transformed into a store-room of abundant confusion. Bings of bread, both oaten and wheaten, and mountains of other eatables, already clad the tables, and occupied the great trenchers of solid pewter, that, round as the shield of Ajax, and scoured as bright as sand and whiting could make them, stood in a substantial phalanx athwart the apartment. Stone jars filled with Scotland's liquor, with big-bellied bottles, heavy with the red produce of the French plains, or the savoury strong waters of Holland, occupied every nook between the ample rations; while a motley confusion of punch-bowls, long-shanked glasses, pewter stoups, tin scones for the walls, and great long-wicked tallow candles, absolutely alarmed Lady Barbara with the extent of the preparation. Instead of the ordinary inference from what she saw, of the full and plenty of the substantial farm-house, and the capacious appetites of its healthy visitors, there seemed heaped up before her provision sufficient to feed a garrison or an army, rather than for the civil entertainment for a few farmers and their wives, invited to a drinking of tea.

"She would have asked some questions as to this; but her mother-in-law was so full of bustle that morning, and so big with orders to the red-armed lasses who scoured and scrubbed before her, that she evidently had not time to answer a word. Barbara, therefore, willing to make herself useful on the occasion, set about doing something herself, and even put her own hand to several things that stood near her, to show her activity. The old dame smiled at this good-natured condescension; but, winking to the servant lasses to observe, with her, the gloved hands of delicate kid with which her high-born daughter-in-law was invested, and the touching, tripping manner in which she went about every thing, she at length put an end to it by saying, in no very respectful tone,—'Noo, that's very nice, and very snoddy done, Lady Barbara; but ye see it's no just in our way. Ye'll excuse my plainness; but ye ken the old proverb, that 'inuffled cats make pair hunters;' and so, nae disparagement to your intent, ye had better just slip back to your ain chaumer, and let the lasses and me work; for, to tell you the plain truth, ye are only in our road. Na, lady, ye needna' take ill what I say; for it's no for your white hands to try to meddle wi' country work.'

"This was a style of language to which Lady Barbara was by no means accustomed, however true it might be in substance, and characteristic of her who spoke it. She therefore retired to her room, pettish and affronted, and far from being in the best humour to brood over her new circumstances, and the bad success of her attempts at humbling herself to the industry of her situation. Affection for her husband, however, and even respect for the old farmer, induced her to conceal, with some care, her thoughts; and thus the day wore over, while, with more curiosity than good spirits, she looked forward with impatience to the events of the ploy.

"It was yet hardly the hour when the great bell at the castle was usually rung for dinner, when the rumble of a vehicle in the lane that led to the house, and a loud crackling noise at the door, indicated that some of the company had arrived. Female curiosity is confined to no rank; and Barbara, on hearing the sound, mounted up to a little bed-room in the attic, and planted herself at a window, well shaded by black thatch, gracefully fringed by the verdure which finds nourishment on the roofs of farm-houses, to take a reconnoitring survey of the company. The first cargo, consisting chiefly of women and children, under the protection of two spruce farmers, and brought in a market cart, from the jolting of which its inmates were protected by a most comfortable bedding of clean straw, had scarcely begun to jump from their vehicle, when a hallooing of voices was heard in the distance, and a whole troop of heavy horsemen next appeared in the lane, who, galloping forward, soon surrounded the cart and the door.

"This, however, was but the beginning of the cavalcade, consisting only of brisk young fellows, who, full of spirits, and willing to show their horsemanship before the women, as well as the stragglers, who began to assemble by the sides of the fields, rode a sort of brevée, in coming up to the farm-house, as is customary to do at the weddings in Scotland. Next after these came on, at a jogging trot, several older farmers and their wives. Scarcely had these last begun to alight, when to Barbara's further astonishment, a large old fashioned vehicle—a mongrel between a coach and a phaeton—came rumbling down the lane, containing somewhere about nine or a dozen persons, mostly women, absolutely heaped above one another.

"By the time all this company had mustered round the door, Barbara stood contemplating the sight, in absolute consternation at the numbers; the whole lane, as far as she could see, appeared crowded like a fair, with beasts and people; the babble of tongues and buzz of country congratulation was most diverting. To increase the clat, the villagers and farm servants for miles round, hearing of the ploy, came in crowds to see the company; and, having heard much of Lady Barbara and the late wedding, many of them had brought guns and pistols to the ground, and, agreeably to the custom at country rejoicings, begun now to startle the horses and frighten the women, by firing them at their ears, over the hedges; while loud huzzas and cheering accompanied the arrival of each fresh cavalcade.

"'For mercy's sake,' said Lady Barbara to herself, as she stood at the window, 'are the whole people of the country coming here to-night to make a show of me in this barbarous manner? Tea-drinking call they it? this is worse than a London riot, or a Scotch meal-mob. No wonder I was alarmed. But let me listen to what they say.'

"After many characteristic salutations, the parties enjoyed in anticipation, the dance, the fun and frolic of the evening. 'I'll hae a bab at the boustee too, ere a's done, as sure as the deil's a gentleman,' said Willie Waste of the Gap, 'if there's a fiddle or a string o' cat's thairm to be had between this and the brig o' Blawder.'

"What this last speech meant, Lady Barbara, happily for herself, did not then understand; although she comprehended enough of it, from several coarse allusions of country wit which she was just able to catch at her half open window, to determine her as to her own line of conduct for the evening; as the dresses of the women determined her also as to the style of her own appearance. The sight of these dresses, indeed, and various characteristic occurrences among the company at the door, afforded her—as she was becoming critical, from the parties being now almost her own equals—a high treat of diversion. Scarlet petticoats of glazed durant, or of red flannel, prevailed most for that part of the dress; over which white aprons of flowered lawn, or lappets of the same material, hung from the head; flowing gowns of showy chintz, tucked up at the pocket holes to look genteel; and long streamers of yellow ribands, from bonnets just then admitted into fashion, by a most upsetting innovation in favour of this class, was the most general costume of the farmer's daughters. All had dressed with extraordinary pains for so great an occasion; while their mothers appeared in short cloaks of blue or scarlet cloth, their head-dresses consisting only of close pinnars of white linc or lawn, tied up with a snood of silverised riband; a bonnet being a piece of grandeur that they were not disposed as yet to pretend to. As to the sisters-in-law of Lady Barbara, and others of the more substantial farmers' wives, they sported stiff gowns of lustrous silk, with ruffled cuffs above the elbows, and grand stomachers of shining steel and green glass, which, like reflectors on a lighthouse, mightily dazzled the eyes of the beholders. "Whatever was the criticism of Lady Barbara on these matters, it was evident that the walters themselves were exceedingly well satisfied with their respective appearances, and granted more hearty admiration to each others' manky gowns and steel stomachers, than is usually awarded reciprocally to the robes and diamonds in a London drawing-room.

"She was just forming several aristocratic resolutions in her own mind, when the door opened, and Johnston, her husband, stood at her elbow.

"'For heaven's sake, James,' she said, 'what means this crowd! Are all these people your country cousins?'

"'This must be my mother's doings!' he said, evidently affronted at seeing so vast a congregation; 'but come down, my lady; we are wanted. Here is my mother herself, clambering up stairs to seek us.'

"James Johnston and Lady Babby, cried the dame out of breath, 'is this a time to be courting and cooling up here, and the whole company at the door? I'm not able to divide myself into twenty parts, and receive every body.'

"'Every body,' indeed!' said her son. 'Why, mother, you have asked the whole parish, and the next county.'

"'And a gude right,' replied the dame, with a toss of her head. 'What's the use o' your grand marriage, James Johnston, if my noble daughter-in-law is to be kept like a nun and a curiosity out o' the sight of our friends and blood relations? Na, na, Maister Jamie, it was a hiddlings wedding wi' you and Lady Babby; the whilk couldna be helped at the time, nae doubt, but there ne'er was a Johnston yet married out o' the Fairly Holm, without the country round hearing o' 't wi' a reasonable sound, and a ding and a decency to bring friends together; and a wedding dinner, forbye a wedding supper, and a screed o' music; an' a loup on the floor: and here there's nought but a bit drinking o' tea, and a mouthful o' mutton-lam for the men, and a lick o' jelly for the lasses. My troth! what would ye hae? There ne'er shall a son o' mine get leave to smuggle hame a wife to my firsaid, as if the minister hadna said a blessing on the bargain, and without friend or fraem to wish the young folks weel, or a drap o' drink drunken on the head o' 't, or the scrape o' a fiddle, or the shaking of a foot, nae mair than if it were the buckling o' a town's Jenny and a Tarbowton weaver. Na, na, Jamie Johnston, I'm neither ashamed o' kith nor kin: I'll hae nae sic doings in my family, never speaking o' our new connection wi' high nobility, and the great Earl o' Carloghie nae less.'

"'I wish you would not speak so foolish, mother,' said her son, withdrawing his eyes hastily from Barbara's flushed countenance—'but tell me who you have really bid, besides my own sisters and brothers, for I hardly know the half of these people?'

"'Do you think there was nane to bid but them?' she said. 'Is n't there Robin Johnston o' the Clayslap, and William Johnston o' the Longriggs, and Gavin Johnston o' the Burnfoot, wi' their wives and dochters; the men gude gush farmers, and your father's cousins, whom we couldna but hae. And is n't there Thomas Dobbie o' the Barnyards, and Allan Dobbie o' the Wetholms, and Saunders Whaup o' the Todeshole, and his twa dochters, my ain relations every one?'

"'Lordsake, mother, have done,' said her son, affronted before Barbara, yet almost laughing out at this formidable roll-call; 'but I think ye might at least have consulted me before you brought lither such a million.'

"'Hoot! it's just as cheap to hae a big doing as a little doing, when we're at it. But, bless me, Lady Barbara,' exclaimed the dame suddenly, 'I declare ye'er no dressed! and here are the folk already in the house. Rin down, my sweet lady, and put on your damascene gown, and your high cap, and make yourself up in your best. Jamie! how dare you keep the lady parleyvoing here, and the company waiting for you baith, and wandering the house like a wheen shepherdless sheep?'

"With this the dame descended, accompanied by her son, to aid the old man in receiving the company; while, in no very good humour or spirits, Lady Barbara slipped round to her chamber.

"The shaking of hands below stairs, and the congratulations and enquiries of the farmers and their wives and families, were so loud, and often so free and boisterous, that the young man, and even his mother, were somewhat annoyed at it. 'But where's the lady? Why is Mrs. Johnston not here? What has become o' your wife?' were the exclamations echoed from so many mouths, and put in so many forms, that James himself was obliged to put a stop to them.

"'Dear me,' said Mrs. Clashter, 'but she's long o' coming out. Its her I came to see, more than ought else, and here we are looking at ane another like fools at a fair. A gude-sake, what it is to be a lord's dochter!'

"'Ay,' said Miss Mally Dowart, 'if ye claimed sib to as many lords and ladies as Lady Johnston does, Mrs. Clashter, ye would make yourself as scarce as ony body. But I'm thinking the lady disna like her company overly weel, or she would have been here among us before this time.'

"'Was n't it a wonderful lift for thae Johnstons,' said Mrs. Whaup in a whisper to the former, 'to get their son married into such a connection? It's enough to turn the callant's head. I can hardly believe it yet.'

"'It's nae sic advantage as yo may think,' replied Mrs. Clashter; 'for the earl has disowned the pair lassie out and out; neither stick nor stool will she e'er get frae him, as I am credibly told; and what then has the callant gotten, but a gentle doll to dandle, and no a plack wi' her as muckle as would buy paint for her cheeks. It's an ill bargain, Mrs. Whaup, take my word for 't, for a' Mrs. Johnston's braggadocio; and Jamie Johnston would hae been muckle better wi' my niece, or any other decent farmer's dochter, wha's tocher was gude; weel would he has got it, too, for troth he's a bonnie lad, and there's no a lass frae this to the Blae-hills but would hae jumped at him: but whiat! here she comes herself," whispered the gossip, as the spence door opened, and James Johnston was seen now leading forward his high-born lady, to receive the salutations of the company.

"Is that a' your Lady Barbara?" exclaimed Mrs. Whaup, as she appeared. "Is that her? a dewdy-looking thing, for as high as she hands her head; and how naughtily she's dressed, wi' naething but a smood on her head, and a plain boddies like a waiting-maid; pooh! for your grand lady, whilk there's been sic a talk about! My dochter Dotty is a perfect queen to her."

"These were the sort of exclamations with which Lady Barbara was received (in whispers to each other) by the generality of the women present. In truth, there was some cause for it, over and above the usual prevalence of certain well-known propensities; for Barbara, high-born as she was, had her female feelings as well as the meanest of them; and the sight, from the window, of the flaunting dresses and glaring colours of her plebeian associates, had made her resolve to doff even the common lutestring which she wore every day, and support the distinction to which she still felt herself entitled, by assuming, in the proper spirit of aristocratical contradiction, the plainest dress that her scanty wardrobe afforded.

"The first view of her high daughter-in-law, coming thus forward without damascene gown or any thing,—a perfect contrast, in appearance, to the commonest farmer's daughter present, almost took the sight from the eyes of the ambitious old woman. She held up her hands in chop-fallen consternation, and expressed her mortification in audible terms, that gave small promise, on her part, for the harmony of the evening. Even James, her husband, partial as he was, seemed annoyed at the contradictory spirit of this excessive plainness; and still more, afterwards, when she was set among the party, by the evident uneasiness displayed in her manner, the critical glances she threw round her among the company, and the determined hauteur which she observed towards his mother and several of the elder women, their guests, as if she in vain tried to conquer a spirit that was inimical to any thing like amalgamation with her present circumstances."

CHAPTER XI.

"Well, Miss Marion," I said, interrupting my narrator at this part of her story, "that last sentence of yours was flourishingly spoken, no doubt; and very like a composition in a fine printed book. But I'd rather ye would not lift your style so high, and deal in such rhetorical generalities, but tell me plain particulars of the why and the wherefore; for I'm exceedingly curious to know how so high-bred a young lady got on as hailfellow with farmer folk, at a country doing. I really never met wi' the like o't in any novel that ever I read."

"Weel, sir," continued Marion, "if ye will have the plain vulgarity of the play, as it must have appeared to one like Lady Barbara, lay aside your own gentility for a moment, while I show you how an earl's daughter must have viewed the coarse scenes of country life. In the first place, her ladyship was just a terror and a restraint to the whole company, from the moment she set her head in amongst this gathering; for ne'er a bit could she let down her dignity;—although I confess, she often tried it wi' a smile and a word to the farmer lasses.

"As for the folk, they all put on the gentility to imitate her; and the men were afraid to speak; and the women were ashamed to laugh, for fear of being vulgar; and so they sat stiff and anxious, just like poor relations at a will reading; and, whenever Georgie Gowdie passed a joke, or Jamie Jaup pulled a face, as country folks will do at a gathering, to make fun for the lasses, or Willie Wastle set up a laugh, and showed his long tusks, then Lady Barbara would look grave, or grow red in the face; and so this would throw a damper of gentility o'er the company, like a wet blanket to chill the heat of honest mirth; for the wives would touch one another's elbows before they spoke, and the very auld men held their tongues in awe of her.

"But the funniest thing at the beginning of the night was about the tea-urn; for Jamie Johnston, to please Lady Bobby, behaved to send all the way to Edinburgh for a brass urn, to keep the water scalding hot for the making of the tea. And so, as Lady Barbara had affronted the old woman, by dressing 'like a methodie,' to the disrespect of her company, the dame determined that her proud daughter-in-law should not have the place of honour at the handselling of the urn; and that she would be the leader of the feast, and make the tea herself.

"So you never saw any thing so grand and proud as the old woman was in her cockley-coe cap wi' the pink ribbands, seated as she were my lady behind the tea-urn, that buzzed and fuffed before her like a steam-engine. Such an invention for scalding water, and gentility, had never been seen in the country-side before; so it was no wonder that the young folks marvelled with amazement, and the old lady sat down with some trepidation to play a tea-drinking tune upon such a new-fangled instrument. Well, the new china was also set out, and planted in rows upon a mahogany server; and there were borrowed cups forbye, above a score; and such a confusion and a jingling of crockery and pewter spoons, ye never heard; not to speak of the bings of short-bread and cakes, and the plates of mutton-ham that had been birsled for the occasion; and the mugs of jam, and jelly, and marmalade; and the trenchers of caraway seeds and sweeties—a perfect feast! It was dreadful how the old woman got through it: for the red-elbowed lassies that served were so awkward, and the house was so crowded, that the men said it was like nought but the kitchen of a kirk ale-house at a test sacrament.

"But about the urn, you see: the cock that lets out the water was rather stiff and ill to turn; and Mrs. Johnston, being awkward at managing such an engine, scalded her fingers till the tears came into her eyes, which made her try a new plan o' 't, rather than she would demean herself to make a complaint before the company. Well, getting Miss Mally Dowart to help her, she shifted the tea-pots beneath the cock, and every one had a hand, and the cups went round with a sort of hobble; for the farmer lads, not being acquainted with high gentility, such as it was fit to enact before my lady, handed the eatables and drinkables with a scuffle of awkwardness, which made them dunt against one another and the table, and smash a cup or two of the new china. This untoward accident provoked Mrs. Johnston to lift her head and speak up; and so in the confusion she forgot the tea-urn and the turning of the cock, until the whole tea-board was in a swim wi' scalding water; so that the steam broke out at the handle, and ran into Mrs. Clasher's durant petticoat. The wife gave a squeal so loud that ye might have heard her at Carloghie Castle; and the lads ran to stop the flood, and Georgie Gowdie turned over a plate of mutton-ham and sauce on Mrs. Whaup's silk gown, and a whole mug of bramble-berry jelly was spilt into Mally Dowart's lap; and as Saunders Whaup started up to assist his wife, he trampled on the dog's tail, and the beast yowled out wi' a howl that might have startled the very dead, and snapped at Thomas Dobbie with a dreadful bite. At this the whole women got up in a consternation; ye never saw such a confusion; and Mr. Dobbie, whose leg was bitten, jump up on a chair wi' the fright, and tumbled over; and Jamie Jaup started up to kick the dog, and swore and cursed wi' a brazen oath, that this trix was the devil's fracaw, and worse to quell than an Irish riot.

"But what do you think was the conduct of Lady Bobby in the midst of this stramash? I declare it was quite unconscionable. Instead of mourning for the mishanter, or helping to lay the din, she recovered her good humour in the moment of misfortune; and while some danced wi' the scalding water, and others shook their clothes from the eatables and the grease, and the lasses screamed louder than the howling of the dog, she took to herself such an enormous fit of laughter, that the very tears streamed down her cheeks, as if the whole had been nothing but a sport and a comedy.

"And so it did seem a sport to the heedless of the company; for, as soon as the young fellows saw Lady Barbara so overcome, they set up a guffaw that was like the neighing of a dozen horses. This again provoked the auld wife to such a degree, that what wi' the pain o' her scalded fingers, and what wi' the affront o' the tea-urn, she lost her temper altogether, and fuffed up into a pet of flying and ill manners, most indecorous and unladylike in a minister's widow. This only made Lady Bobby laugh louder than before, until poor Jamie Johnston grew red in the face, and the whole party were put into a farce and a discomposure that was really most ridiculous.

"At length James and the old man took up the rule of the handling; and so some order was restored. The evil-doing dog was kicked out of the house with many opprobrious names. Thomas Dobbie's leg was inspected, and bandaged up wi' a diaculum plaster, the gravy was wiped off the silk gowns of the women, and all again were set down to drink their tea. But something was yet wrong in the harmony of the company; for the prouder of the females did not like being laughed at, either by Lady Barbara or by one another; and so, wishing to behave themselves in her presence as befitting ladies, an unnatural gravity came o'er them all; and, instead of carrying on the jollity of a country handling, they sat stiff and starched, nodding and bowing to each other like people at a funeral—high gentility being, as I said before, a thing they were not at all used to.

"This conduct turned out a perfect embargo on the honours of the eatables; for, watching Lady Barbara, and seeing her put her spoon in her tea-cup at the end of the first dish of tea, the most high-flown of the ladies put in their spoons also: this was imitated by the next in gentility, and so the whole ladies, with one accord, gave in their resignation at the end of the first act, notwithstanding the earnest entreaties of Mrs. Johnston, to the manifest affronting of the grand tea-urn, and the discomfiture of the whole business. As for the men, some said they had got quite enough of scalding water; but in truth they had a want of confidence in the urn, and a dread of the new china, not knowing in reality what might happen; so they also broke out into an unanimous revolt; and although some took a spoonful of the marmalade and caraway-seed, and a few picked like a bird at the mutton-ham, the spirit of gentility had so shut up their mouths and stomachs, that no pressing had any effect upon them to speak of; which made the high bings of bread, and mountains of cheese and butter stand as it were in undiminished astonishment behind the urn, as if unable, any more than the discomfited woman, to account for this change of the time.

"The farmer himself, however, began to mend the thing, and, determining to stand it no longer, called for the big-bellied bottles and graybeards of Cognac, which, he had a shrewd guess, would soon break the awe and overset the gentility. No sooner, then, than the cogniac been set upon the table, and the glasses begun to jingle, and the flavour of the hollandais reached the noses of the women, than their eyes began to glaze, and the farmer lads to utter jokes, as if no earl's daughter had been there to hear them. Then came the drinking of healths, and the complimentarys, and the wishing of happiness to the new-married couple; but though to the guests this might be a pleasant part of the play, to the parties most concerned it turned out nothing but a humiliation and an embarrassment. Some said, 'Lady Barbara, your health;' and others for the higher gentility, said, 'Lady Johnston, your health; and I wish you much joy o' your comely marriage, and I'm happy to sit at your footy fire.'

"The elder men, however, said little,—only called her phain Mrs. Johnston, and wished her a lead heart to her young goodman, and a married woman's joy in her new condition. This she might have borne, for so genuine good feeling, although it nevertheless went sorely against her ingrained aristocracy; but, when some began openly to class her with her disliked middle-class, saying, 'Young Mrs. Johnston, your health; and, old Mrs. Johnston, mickle success to you and your new connection;' and some coarse proverbial insinuations, as if her ladyship had been nothing but a common woman, Barbara's pride could stand it no longer; but first flushing red, and then turning white like an asparagus cake, and next darting a scornful light with her eyes, and curling up her nostrils, she rose from her seat like the Queen of Sheba, and, never waiting for her husband's arm, turned her back upon the company, and sailed off to her own chamber.

"Here was a second and severe mishanter, it happened in one night at this unfortunate drinking of tea. James Johnston got up, vexed and affronted, and off to his room, to take the pet out of his lady. But Barbara was too far gone for this, being already in tears of anger and humiliation; and, having bolted the door on the inside to shew her spirit, she was deaf to his entreaty, and would let none of them in. This, of course, next roused his spirit, according to the usual process between man and wife—as her conduct now had also roused the taste, if not resentment, of the well-meaning farmers; so that, by the time he returned to the company, and observed the side looks and whisperings with which he was received, he was by no means in the best humour with Barbara, or with the figure he himself set at this marriage handling.

"Dear me, Mr. Johnston, what's the matter, that ye look sae blae," was William Wastle's talk, whispering through his teeth, as James resumed his seat. "Ye come back to us as if your nose had been bleeding. Has the dame given you the affront, and you no two months married yet? Hoot man! dinna let your chaffs be about it. If you had been as lang tother'd as I have, ye would ne'er fash your thumb about the pouting and he petting o' a young wife. She'll come round again, as the bairn did that sickened at its parritch. It's the nature o' the women to take a bit tirrives now and then, just to be petted, and made mickle o'.

"There was a gude deal o' idle talk among the company about the lady's tantrums which old Johnston put an end to by saying: 'The lady's but young, and will get sense, nae doubt, lang before she's your age. Come, lads! gi'e us another bock o' the bottle to keep us going. We have something else to do the night, than claverin here about family matters; and so he filled up bumpers round to his guests.

"That's right, gudeman," said the old woman, starting up, and now recovering her good humour. "Odsake, lads and lasses, what are ye about? sitting there as mim as brides at a kirking. What did I bring you here for? and what did I clear this kitchen for, but to eat out the barn, where ye'll ha'e room for a reel? Whisht! dinna ye hear the fiddler already drawing the hair o'er the thairm. Come, lads! up and take the lasses out. Here James lead ye aff Miss Mally Dowart, till Lady Babby comes out o' her strants. Come, Jamie Jaup, take ye a cloak of Miss Jenny Tupe. Ye'll make a braw couple on a floorhead, if ye dinna fa' wi' the capering. There now, lads and lasses! to the barn wi' ye. Do ye think a son o' mine shall ever take a wife without a foot being shaken. The like was never heard o' in my family."

"Bravo, gudewife!" cried Saunders Johnston, beginning to shuffle a step to the distant scrape of the fiddle. "Do'il a bit, but this Lady Babby has been nothing but a chain and a constraint on us! Here, Thomas Dobbie, take ye Peggy Whaup by the arm.

"Joking and jeering in this pleasant manner, the whole company proceeded in pairs towards the barn; and, as they entered, and proceeded in a grand promenade down the floor, the fiddler gave a flourish of music, the like of which had never been heard in the Fairly Holmes; and which so tickled the hearts of the country lasses, that they scarcely could refrain from starting the Highland fling, without waiting for the ceremonies of the squaring and the partnerships. Scarcely had the fiddlers, then, given their pins another jerk, when, striking up 'Off she goes!' the company set off indeed, at such a rate that the very clay floor of the barn seemed to bob like a springboard under the feet of the dancers.

"Up wi' 't, lads!" cried the old woman, snapping her thumbs to the time of the music, as she saw how the country lasses reeled, and wheeled, and set, and frisked; and so they did. "Up wi' 't!" and the young fellows capered like perfect mad; and Geordie Gowdie shuffled with his new pumps till the very pebbles flew out of the floor like shot, and Jamie Jaup cut a high St. George, taught him by the dancing-master of Tarbolton, and threw up his leg till it damaged the elbow of blind Tam Tryst the fiddler, and almost stopped the music.

"Even James Johnston himself, married as he was, began now to be courted by the women, because of his good looks, and so he led off Miss Mally Dowart down a country dance, wi' an air and a style that was like a perfect opera; and now finding himself free from the restraint of Lady Babby, and the drop of brandy getting into his head, he began to take to the fun, as jovially as ever he had done at Gilgowie fair, until he was the merriest child in the whole company.

"Meantime Barbara's pride began to cool, as she grew tired of the solitude of her own chamber. The cheering scream of the distant fiddle came over her ear with an unconscious exhilaration; the hearty shout of delighted laughter sounded home to her heart like the echo of a reproof; and, a slight twinge of jealousy now assisting the rising envy, she began to wish to see what her husband James and the company were doing. Accordingly, in the very height and hotness of the hilarity, while the mirth and fun grew fast and furious, she stole out of the house, and slipped in, by herself, at the far end of the barn.

"The sight that now met her observation by no means tended ultimately to restore her good humour, however much it might gratify her curiosity. Indeed, the coup d'œil of the whole—you understand English French—was in Lady Barbara's mind truly a contrast to all she had ever in her former life seen of high festivity; and Allan the painter, or the lad Davie Wilkie, might have done some gude for themselves, had they been there to limn out the scene. A barn is but a bald building for a set ballet; and its unplastered walls and black rafters overhead will scarcely remind one of the gilded panels and carved cornices of an earl's banqueting-hall. Neither could the half-score of long-wicked tallow candles, that, in goggling sconces of shining tin, were planted around, and, obedient to every waft of the intruding wind, swilled their grease plentifully below on the coat-necks of the men and the gowns of the women, be fitly compared with the crystal chandeliers and wax luminati of a London ball-room. As little, if I may go on with circumstantialia, could blind Thomas Tryst the fiddler, and his trusty secundum, with his staff hung from his button-hole, who laboured on the catgut from their high stance on a table at the far end of the barn, be exactly likened to Signior Crotchicatchi's band, which condescends to perform its high allegros at the scientific cotillions of the nobility. Nevertheless, the whole was a most amusing sight to Lady Babby, at least for its novelty; and though on the tables round the barn, the motley hobbleshow of pewter platters with their eatable remains, the towering stoups and black bottles filled with divers liquors,—the brass and iron candelabra dispensers of grease and light,—the cheeses like the moon, and the punch-bowls equal to the ocean, the latter surrounded by a phalanx of long-shanked glasses, green and white, which, like tall grenadiers, stood, as it were, watching the volumes of steam of the 'roeking water,' which rose from the bowls—though, I say, the effect, at a distance, of all this, might not be quite the same as that of the gold and silver idols of the table, and the high temples of classical confectionary, that, from a dazzling ground of white drapery, confuse the eye of taste at an aristocratic banquet; yet the hearty enjoyment which the crowd of noisy guests seemed to derive from their entertainment, was enough to provoke the envy as well as the astonishment of any truly patrician spirit.

"Is that really my husband?" she said to herself, casting an eye of critical sobriety over the hilarious scene; "can that actually be James Johnston, for whom I have condescended until I hardly know myself—dancing like a wild satyr—in this rude and uproarious manner; and making such lover-like freedom with the country lasses?" It was indeed he, and she could hardly believe her senses; but she found she must dissemble her thoughts, for now she began to be noticed by the company.

"Come awa', Lady Barbara—Ye're welcome back!" cried several voices. "Weel, I am glad to see you, and thought ye would just come to again, if ye were let alane," said the old woman slyly. "Come ben lady; better late than never!" shouted Willie Wastle. "Hoogh! ye dinna ken the fun ye hae miss'd. 'Odsake my lady, maybe ye'll take a rest wi' us yet."

"The stately gravity with which Barbara received, in spite of her efforts, this boisterous kindness, somewhat chilled the gay freedom of the company; and the pleasure of the warmth with which James Johnston took her hand, was greatly damped, on her part, by observing, from the shape of his eye, that, like the rest, he was, as the gentlefolks call it, a little flushed, or rather, as we might plainly say, fuddled, with the evening's liquor. Some ladies have great forbearance for their husbands, when they see them in this state; especially when it makes them extraordinary loving and good-humoured, as Mr. Johnston now was. But whether it is that the sins of a lord are more bearable by nature than those of a farmer, or that the love of a plebeian husband is less valuable than that of a high gentleman, both of which are probably true, Barbara was by no means in a humour to forgive either this peccadillo, or the numerous other little peccadilloes, of which it was likely in the course of the evening to become the occasion.

"Ye're just come in time, Lady Babby," cried Robin Johnston, of the Clayslap. "We're going to have a song. Here's Miss Peggy Tupe, can sing the 'Ewe bughts, Marion,' a beautiful chant about the wearing o' the sheep; or Thomas Dobbie there; he can give us 'Gregor's Ghost,' from end to end—it's very frightful and interesting. But maybe ye would like better the 'Kebuckston Wedding,' as more appropriate. Thomas Whaup, up ye wi' the 'Kebuckston Wedding;' it's a pleasant song made by Robin Tannahill, the Paisley weaver. Lady Babby will be quite delighted wi' 't."

"The whole company, I may say seconded the motion, except James Johnston himself, and perhaps Mrs. Clashter the midwife, who, having been in her time housekeeper to the laird of Thunkail, had most correct notions of high gentility, and did not altogether approve of the weaver's song. Lady Barbara, however, I must say, was rather inclined to laugh; especially as Thomas Whaup's voice was of the proper corncrack order; but when he came to the verse, so mellifluously descriptive of the good cheer at the wedding,—

'Wee Patie Brydie's to say the grace,
The body's aye ready at drodgies an' weddings,
An' Flunkey M'Fie, o' the Skiverton Place,
Is chosen to scuttle the pies an' the puddings;
For there'll be plenty,
O' ilka thing dainty,
Baeth lang-kail, an' haggis, an' every thing fitting,
Wi' luggies o' beer
Our weezons to clear,
So de'il fill his kyte, that gaes clung frae the meeting;'

which he really screamed and shouted wi' a throat like a peacock; she answered her husband's loud laugh at the fellow's vulgarity, with a black look that was like a could iron put down your back to stop the bleeding o' your nose; and it did stop poor Johnston's laugh as soon and as effectually.

"However, to make a long story short, it was evident Lady Barbara did by no means enjoy herself, either then or during the rest of the evening, when the dancing again came on. For still she looked high and grave at the robustious fun of the farmer chields; and sometimes she knit her brows, and spoke to her husband in a way that, some said, was extremely provoking. However, by the time they began to dance 'Bab at the boustier,' that desirable mixture of bobbing and kissing, several of the lads, having the drop in their heads, swore they would either make her descend from her dignity, and step through the reel to countenance them, like a decent farmer's wife, or faith they would offer her a freedom that would maybe affront her.

"Ye know the pleasant auld trip of 'Bab at the boustier' where the lass or lad, as they dance round the ring, wi' the soft pillow in their hand to kneel upon withal, sings,—

'Wha learned you to dance?
Bab at the boustier, Bab at the boustier—
Wha learned you to dance?
Bab at the boustier brawly;'

as merry a canticle as ever gave a blyth lass a fair opportunity of a country salute. When the bolster came to Miss Mally Dowart, she danced round wi' a pleasant smirk, and at last laid it down at James Johnston's feet, wi' as mickle modesty as ye may suppose. What Lady Babby thought at that instant is not for me to say; but Mr. Johnston, as behoved him to do, put his arms round Miss Mally's neck, and gave her a smack upon the willing lips, that for grace and unction, and from such as him, might well be the envy of every woman in the room. This of course called him up next, when he danced round the ring like a Scottish Adonis, and many a sheep's eye was thrown under the lasses' curls, to see which o' them was likely to get the favour of his next salute. Who he took up I do not recollect; but in the course of the dance, when the bolster came round to Jamie Jaup, of the Plash, there was a wicked devil seen looking out at the tail of his eye, that, together with the measure of drink that he had taken, seemed to promise to the company some fun or mischief.

"Jamie shuffled wi' his right leg round the ring, and down he bobs the hassock at Lady Barbara's feet. The whole room was in a consternation; but Jamie Jaup, none afraid, planted himself on his knees on the pillow before the lady, and awaited the salute with gallant confidence. Lady Barbara drew back at the sight of this audacity, as if poor James Jaup had been a frightful wild orang, come from the woods to swallow her up; but Jamie, nothing daunted, threw his arms round her ladyship's neck, and nill ye, will ye, gave her a smack of such voluptuous effect, that it echoed even to the rafters of the auld barn.

* A common custom in Scotland.

† A dance which, in former times, often was the finale of a country wedding in Scotland. The groomsmen, or one deputed by him, takes a pillow, or a cushion, and dancing round the room, the company all seated, he places the cushion at a lady's feet, kneels upon it, and salutes her. He then continues his round, the lady taking up the cushion, and following him. She in turn throws it at the feet of some favoured youth, who performs the same ceremony—and so it is continued until all the company are on the floor. They generally dispersed immediately afterwards.

"This audacity brought to a crisis and a climax the whole concatenation of this eventful night. No sooner had the salute been thus rapaciously put upon my lady, than up she got with the air of an affronted Lucretia, and, merely throwing upon the company and her husband a look of patrician anger, away she walked in high dignity from the rich festivities of the barn.

"Here, as you may suppose, was an end to 'Bab at the buster!' The company now crowded round James Johnston and his mother; and what with this second affront put upon the company by the lady, and what with the injudicious impudence of Jamie Jaup, and what with the natural candour and confidence of strong liquor, young Mr. Johnston was by no means considered a well-used man.

"In short, it was unanimously concluded, that Lady Johnston had not behaved at all as she ought; and if any body could have collected the wise sayings and sensible advices that were uttered upon the occasion, these would, no doubt, be found of great and lasting value to the married world. But, amidst all this wisdom and shrewd argument, it was quite evident that the night was now at an end, that this long-expected doing was quite over. So with many kind good nights and hearty good wishes, among the farmer people, the barn was soon after cleared, and a finale was put to this remarkable drinking of tea.

CHAPTER XII.

"The morning after the doing was by no means a pleasant one at the Fairly Holm; for, besides the lassitude of spirits, and racked appearance of every thing, that immediately follows a festivity among high or low, there had feelings been developed on the previous night, and inferences began to be drawn as to the future, which would not bear thinking of, and which filled all parties with doubt, if not alarm.

"The spence, which had been used as a store-room for the provender of the ploy, and the parlour, which had lately been fitted up with yellow chintz curtains, not being yet in order, after the removals of the barn, the old woman had ventured to have the breakfast laid in the kitchen, according to the use and wont of the family before Lady Babby came into it. Her ladyship, however, did not make her appearance; and when, upon Mrs. Johnston's going to fetch her, she came forth, and saw the old man and woman seated thus undignifiedly in the great kitchen, in view of the bare-legged servant maids, and partaking with their fingers a good dish of salt herrings and oaten bread, as a relish to their tea, her tender feelings were so shocked and affronted that she seemed almost ready to faint at the sight. To some words of apologetic consolation whispered by her husband, she only replied by a look of lofty astonishment, while a curl of conscious nobility rose upon her lip, and a flush of aristocratic shame mantled up to her eyes. 'Do you mean me to sit here among the common servants?' she said, with some haughtiness; 'I will breakfast only in my own bed-room.'

"The old man sat back in his great arm-chair when he heard this, and fixed, for a moment his keen gray eye on her. 'Sit down, Lady Barbara,' he said, after a little; 'sit down here by me—I have somewhat to say to you.'

"Her proud glance lowered before the firm look of the old man. She turned round towards her husband; but, with all James's love, she saw his brow knit into a manly sternness, before which a woman must always quail. Taking up a wooden-seated chair, and making it ring angrily upon the stone floor, as he set it for her, he waved his hand authoritatively, and motioned her to be seated.

"'Young lady,' said the old man firmly, when the servants were gone, 'what I have observed of you last night, and this morning, convinces me that all I feared concerning you is likely to come too true. You have brought yourself, lady, into a most trying predicament; most trying to one of your temper, and of your high upbringing, as well as to the family you have come amongst. But remember, the act was your own; and, if you cannot lay down your mind better to the circumstances you have chosen, and to the habits and company of a decent farmer's wife, as you now are; and expect nothing in service or occupation but what belongs to that plain station, you will find that you have sown a seed of sorrow that will bear bitter fruit to yourself, and bring endless trouble to me and mine.'

"'Trouble!' exclaimed the old woman, striking in with her scornful toss of the head, 'Hech, it'll bring nae trouble to me! let it trouble wha likes. Before daughter-in-law, or son-in-law, shall bring scaith or scorn on my house, I'll ken what it's for. And, if Jamie there likes to mak' himself a snivel and a snool afore his friends, to a washy-faced lady, be wha she likes, and darena' speak to her aboon his breath, at a decent handling, troth it's ne'er be me! or I'll ken better what I do it for, as I said afore."

"'Whisht! whisht! mother! That is fast speaking,' said James, colouring for his mother's freedom.

"'Hold your tongue, gudewife,' said the farmer himself, with a voice of authority; 'you never know how to speak in reason.'

"'Reason! Troth, ye'se no stap my mouth wi' your reason!' cried the undaunted dame. 'As if I didna' ken common 'havens? There's my lady daughter-in-law, wi' her high crockets, sitting looking so cross at me, and hasna' brought hame to her young gudoman as mickle tocher as a pair of lint sheets for her ain bed—and me to be sneered at and jeered at, that was a minister's wife, and nae runawa' ill-doer without plack or penny, but high airs and toom gentility! Na! I will speak up,' she cried out, recollecting on the instant a smothered difference of some days before: 'afore my daughter-in-law snorts and sniffers at me and mine, she ought to bring something at least frae her father's castle.'

"The large dark eyes of Lady Barbara seemed to swell in her head, as she fixed them with a look of astonishment on the old woman; but she seemed paralysed at the moment by scorn or surprise, and could at first not utter a word. The old man was about to interpose, and James had seized Barbara by the waist as she rose, intending to drag her from his enraged mother, when the young wife, mustering all her spirit of scorn and pride, exclaimed with energy,—

"'Now, good woman, my eyes are fully opened to what I could not have believed was in human nature. Now I understand your true motives for all the arts that you used, when my mind was unhappy, to entrap me into circumstances, for which, I own, I feel myself very unfitted. James! husband! Take me away out of this house. With you I will bear poverty and the labour of my condition, but do not you reproach me with my father's anger, and my own disowned destitution. Father-in-law, James, my dear James, spare, oh! spare this burning pride of birth that I feel—I feel—chokes the feelings of my bosom.'

"The scene for a few moments was now dreadful. 'Wife!' exclaimed the old man, 'sinful, mistaken woman, Lady Barbara is right, and you have let out sentiments at this moment that bring a disgrace upon humanity and upon us all. But I will protect this unhappy young lady; I and my son will see her treated with respect; and, if you ever utter towards her a word of reproach, on this subject, I will put upon you a punishment that you little dream of.'

"Barbara was now sobbing out bitter tears, and, before the whole scene was ended, it was agreed that another farm should instantly be taken, that James and she might live entirely by themselves. For the means to do this in an effectual manner, Lady Barbara offered to forego her pride of nature, and to go to the castle and humble herself at her father's feet.

"To this proposal, however, neither James nor his father would for a moment listen, and, after much negotiation and many delays, and several months' further disagreement with her disappointed mother-in-law, Lady Barbara, now in weakly health, and near her time of humble childbirth, set off one blowy morning in autumn, seated beside her husband in a decent market vehicle, to take possession of their new farm of Green Braes.

"I have shortened much this latter part of my story, in order to hasten to a new epoch in Lady Barbara's history."

CHAPTER XIII.

"Alas! and is this what I have to call my own house at last?" said Lady Barbara, as she surveyed the white-washed walls and low roofs inside the plain farm-house that was now to be her dwelling: "and is this the mean chamber where I am to sleep? and this the nursery for my humble offspring? Alas! I find now that I have less strength than I once imagined."

"Green Braes was in truth a bare and bald place; and a cold blast from the east came up from the haughs of Ruar Water; and the whole plenishing that Johnston's father enabled him to put into it, with all the little deceptions of would-be gentility, could not make it to show much for either pride or comfort: and, as to prosperity, a new farm makes a hard battle, and an empty house is ill to fill out of a light purse; and, though James was most industrious, and worked with his own hands like a very slave, yet Barbara, being unused to Scottish economy, as well as to country work, was neither to be called happy in her altered condition, nor was she at all to be deemed a thrifty or a purpose-like farmer's wife. Those things went on rather heavily, and the poor lady and Johnston sat down at noon to their coarsely-cooked meal, and often looked things in each other's faces that would not well bear expression in words.

"But the worst thing to Lady Babby was the expected 'downlying,' and the little anxieties of the baby-clothes, and the comforts, and the sending for the howdie, and the gossip of the gossips, and the spying of the nurses about a poor man's house, and the annoyances of the congratulations when all was over, and the mortifying et ceteras of a farming 'accouchement.' As she lay long and solitary in her inlying bed, her weak heart yearning for many of the comforts which the pampered servants enjoyed at her father's castle, and recollected old days and youthful hopes; and considered that here she lay, a poor man's wife, without even a poor woman's consolation,—for no mother came to see her with a mother's affection, and no helping sister sat by her bedside to give her a drink when her mouth was parched, or to do a kind turn for her or her baby,—the weakness of nature sank her proud spirit, and the regrets of repentance melted her heart, until solitary tears, bitter and hopeless, gave a temporary relief to her inward despondency.

"Months and seasons passed away after this, and no notice was ever taken of James and his family by the haughty inmates of the castle. The earl, however, once met his father in the fields, and, with some strange remarks and half reproaches, such as great men will make upon poor men's affairs, made offer, as a condescending boon, of a farm to James Johnston in another part of the country.

"When the old man heard the earl's speech, and considered the interior drift of the proposal, his country manliness rose within him, and he rejected the offer with a proud spirit. He said, that if the earl chose to down his own child, because her nature would not break it once into the ways of the great; as she had thrown herself in her passion upon his family, it should never be said that the Johnstons of Fairly thought of lands and mailings, tochers or titles, in doing a righteousness when the heart spoke its will; but as lang,' he added, 'as they had a rig of land, or a plack of silver, Lady Babby should be held independent as a poor man's wife.'

"When my lord heard this, he was cut to the heart; for it is not agreeable to the great gentry to be outdone in virtue by a peasant man, and so a sore struggle took place between the father's affection and the earl's pride; and the two old men wrangled with each other, and talked touching and bitter things; and spoke of each other's failings and each other's feelings, and what had been wrong done, and what could not be undone, until they wept like bairns, although the one was a lord, and the other mutual regrets of disappointed parents.

"But the auld earl found he had the worst of it; and, his heart melting deeply at the thoughts of his daughter, and in admiration of the disinterestedness of the farmer and his son, he at last took out his pocket-book, and offered a bunch of bank notes to the astonished old man.

"'What am I to do with these, my lord?' said he, 'suppose I should take them. Do you mean the offer as a father's present in returning kindness, to his daughter and her baby?'

"No, Robert Johnston, no!" said the earl, with a voice of much emotion; for he remembered the proud revenues of his own lady: 'I can have no communication with my ruined daughter; but I give it to your son, to purchase the mailing of Cauldknows, on condition that he and his wife instantly remove thither.'

"As a bribe to get your disowned bairn out of the way of affronting your lordship's pride? No, my lord,' said the farmer, firmly, 'I am a father as well as you; and while you continue thus to resist the calls of nature, my son has incurred a greater misfortune in connecting himself with your family, than even your daughter has in coming into mine. But it is truly a sad business this, after all!' he continued, 'since your lordship will not relent of your unnatural cruelty: I am broken-hearted myself about this unfortunate marriage; but the difference is, that you have power of the remedy, and I have not; and permit me to tell your lordship, that if your common sense doesna get the better of your family pride, to take a lesson from the changing wheel of the fortune of life, and place my son, for your daughter's sake, in a place and position where they both may be happy; we'll take no favour to buy up our independence; and my son and his unfortunate wife will drive the worst that their own folly and the world's hard-heartedness has put upon them.

"The two old men parted with a cooled and doubtful cordiality; yet, the earl having many yearnings towards his child, a great consultation was soon after held on the business, in the most private apartment of Carloghie Castle. But, to make a philosophy of the matter,—where the reasoning is weakly, and the narrow mind apt to be swayed by mean considerations of small vanity, pride and its subsidiaries prove an overmatch for the dearest feelings of nature that have been planted in our hearts to help out the circumscribed sum of human happiness.

"And so, a new prospect having lately opened out for the earl's next daughter, all the ladies cried out with one accord against their father's 'weak' proposition in favour of their erring sister; and when the old lord talked, with emotion, of poor Babby's humble condition, and the probable ultimatum of some premature decline, and of the breaking of hearts, perhaps to a lowly grave, the countess replied, in a tone like the iron tongue of a metal bell, that it were better hearts break than families be degraded; and that such a consummation was but the natural and inevitable course of things.

"Meantime, affairs did not go on with much exhilaration, at the lonely and comfortless farm of Green Braes. There is a principle in human nature, especially during youth, that is neither virtue nor vice, but merely undefined passion, which is extremely apt to turn into either, according as circumstances shall happen to sway it, or call it forth. This principle applied well, at this time, and after, both to James Johnston and his wife; and the struggle of their circumstances, and the peculiarity of their disappointments, at times quite soured their tempers, or corroded their feelings. They now occasionally (as married people will do in moments of irritation) dropped expressions to each other, and allowed looks to pass between them, which, though consisting well enough, as we know, with a solid under-stratum of wedded affection, were liable to be treasured up in the rankling mind, as indelible evidences of a begun alienation. At all events, they may talk of love as they please, but it requires stronger affections than the world generally witnesses, to stand out long against the carking cares and heart-eating privations of obscure poverty; particularly to the proud spirit and luxurious habits of such as Lady Barbara; and it required more self-command than Johnston was master of, to resist the tendencies to discontent at his peculiar situation, labouring hopelessly and ineffectually to supply one tenth of the wants and gratify the pressing desires of a born lady.

"Accordingly, if, on a market day, on meeting his farmer acquaintances, he made up for the reserved seclusion of his country home, by stealing a moment's enjoyment of town sociality, it was nothing more than was to be expected; and if Lady Babby, at times, looking from out her dull window at Green Braes, sighed sadly at the equipages that she saw passing on the distant road, it was only what belonged to her time of life, and to the painful circumstantialities of her unnatural condition. Then, every day, when she rose, the first object that she could not avoid seeing was the wide-waving woods and noble parks of old Carloghie; while the peaked turrets of her father's castle interrupted, with picturesque effect and stately feudality, the warm and gleaming rays of the cheerful morning.

"'Whilk is the nearest way to the auld castle ayont, gudewife?' said a travelling man one day, who came knocking at Lady Barbara's door, with country familiarity. 'Thae gentle places hae sae many turnings and twinings, that I've gaen round it and round it these twa hours, an' the de'il a bit I ever get the nearer to't.'

"Lady Barbara came to the door with her infant in her arms, and humbly pointed the way to the man. 'But what is that, friend, you have got in your cart?' she said, making an enquiry in her turn, surprised at what she saw.

"'Oo! what should it be,' said the carter, 'but some grandeur that'll be wanted at the great wedding!'

"'What wedding, honest man?'

"'Gude keep us! are ye a neighbour woman in this loaning, and hasna heard o' the grand wedding that's soon to be at my lord's castle. Isna Lady Mary, the sister of the poor misguided creature that ran off with the farmer, and was disowned to be sure, to be married in a week to the Marquis o' Brechin. The whole country is ringing wi' the news, and sic a preparation never was seen. New coaches, as big as a kirk, and new dresses to a score of flunkies, wi' gold and silver lace and red scarlet, an' stripes an' strapples like the king's beef-eaters in Linnon, forbye cocked hats as braid and blown-up as the auld cruisy o' the Marquis o' Granby on Jamie Tap-ple's sign, and white wigs to the raacals, like as many English bishops, an' a cavalry o' horses to draw the coaches, as many as would furnish out a regiment o' dragoons, an' rivers o' red wine for the lords to drink, and oceans o' beer, and strong swats, an' fiddlers to play up in the banqueting ha', an' bonfires to be brunt on a' the heights around!—sic a preparation and sic a fizzle has never been seen in the holms of Fairly.

"'And many nobility to attend, honest friend?' said Barbara humbly, glad to interrupt the tedious garrulity of the speaker.

"'Nobility! mistress,' said the man, astonished at her question; 'what should the like o' you or I ken about nobility? The whole house of lords, as I hear tell, will be there!—dukes and earls, and great squires, and foreign counts wi' lang names—and a band o' music that canna' speak English—an' flags flying frae every tower on the castle; and trumpets sounding, and guns firing, an' sic a blowing and blasting, o' breath an' cannon, it's worth a red guinea for the like o' you to hear and see it at a mile distance!'

"'That's great news, indeed!' said poor Barbara with a sigh; 'and here am I that learns nothing: but hear you aught, friend, of the dresses of the ladies?'

"'Hear I?' said the talkative man, 'if I didna, I would be as deaf as John Stob's lead offy. My wife'll no let me sleep at night for deaving me wi' 't. Flanners lace, and Holland lawn, Smyrna silk, an' Pampadoo satin, Indian pearls, and Golconda diamonds, bleezing on their breasts, or skinkling in their hair—it's no for me to talk o' what's aboon my comprehension, for the grandeur and the bravery is perfectly unspeakable. But gude-day, honest woman; it'll be a high favour for a pair body like you to get a moment's glimpse o' such a gallant company.'

"'Isis of no use of talking high didactics,' continued my narrator of this tale; 'for it is not in human nature to look on and witness, from the lowly stool of obscurity, the acclamations of triumph bestowed upon one's splendid neighbour, without a painful twinge of the bitterness of humiliation. Her plain-looking sister to enjoy all this! while Barbara, the handsomest of the family, was lingering away her life among carking cares and constant labour, in the dirt and dulness of despised and avoided poverty! The more she meditated upon it, the worse she grew in her mind, until the thought almost turned her distracted.'

"But even the thought, that was so intolerable, was hardly so bad as the thing itself when it came; particularly from the unexpected torment of remark with which it was accompanied. Men delight to exalt the exalted, and to depress the lowly; and even draw upon their fancies, to add to the natural exaggerations of triumph or of misery. While the marriage and its festivities were in full écart, officious neighbours dropped in to Green Braes to talk of it, and spying gossips offered their impertinent condolences, until Barbara was almost driven from her poor dwelling; and, annoyed by her evident vexation, and harassed by his own thoughts, James Johnston fled to the nearest town, and came home to his sighing wife late at night, his gloomy feelings deepened and exasperated by the dangerous excitement of dissipation.

CHAPTER XIV.

"The marriage of Lady Mary of Carloghie, from the number of gentles it brought to attend it, was followed by consequences to her disowned sister, Barbara, that never could have been foreseen by any party. For, amidst all the festivities of the high bridal, there crept about, among the lordly guests, a suppressed whisper of the extraordinary tale, that the youngest and handsomest daughter of the Earl of Carloghie, disowned by her family for an unequal match, was living within a few miles of her father's castle, the laborious wife of a common farmer. Such a piece of real romance, actually transacted and existing so near them, possessed more interest for the high gentles that attended the wedding, than all the formal festivities of my lord's castle.

"To such as they, indeed, all the show and the feasting had little novelty, and afforded but a trite and commonplace pleasure; while the condition of a spirited and fine-looking lady, known, in fact, to many of them, living thus under the ban of her own family, and conducting herself virtuously in circumstances so uncongenial, became the theme of frequent and interesting conversation, and the subject of eager and mysterious enquiry.

"Out of this circumstance, and the curiosity it eventually excited concerning her, among all who travelled to this part of the country, grew a species of annoyance to Barbara and her husband: and a series of incidents, that aggravated all that was brewing in their minds, and brought to a crisis the several events of their fate. Since the marriage of her sister, whenever Lady Barbara came out from her door, to feed her poultry, or look after her cows, she encountered the gaze of some lurking loungers, who, attracted by the babbling gossip of the neighbourhood, watched eagerly to get a look of the noble and disowned farmer's wife. The numbers thus attracted to the mailing of Green Braes were remarkable for so secluded a part of the country. Horses, with fine trappings, were seen in waiting within a few fields of the house, while their owners lingered, and watched, to gratify their curiosity; and even carriages stopped at the foot of the lane, and fine dressed madams, talking many giggling remarks, strolled round the farm to get a sight of the lady. Next, the officers of a regiment quartered in the nearest town made stolen parties, and got up secret adventures, to get a view or speech of her; and it was even said that their colonel had sworn a loud oath one night, amidst the drunken dissipations of the mess room, that if money, or art, or love could accomplish it, he would try his powers, and gain some écart by an affair with this high-born farmer's wife.

"Even her own family began to partake of the prevailing curiosity; and though her mother, the countess, would not hear of visiting her, I persuaded her sister, Lady Frances, to accompany me one day to the farm of Green Braes. We left the carriage about a mile from the spot; and, though determined not to enter under her roof, away we set off, to try if we could see her unobserved.

"It was harvest time, and the fields were gay with reapers, and rich with shocks of new cut corn. We drew near to the house, and watched about. Presently a young woman issued from the back-door, followed by a little girl carrying a large wooden picher. 'Can that be,' said I, 'the walk of a common peasant lass? for, whoever she is, she steps out with the grace and ease of a queen;' and yet the female's apron was up, appearing filled with something bulky, and in her left hand she bore also a small vessel. We observed further, and looked on with astonishment: it was Lady Barbara herself, carrying to the field the reaper's dinner."

"Though freckled with the sun, and having a careworn look, she was healthy, and handsomer than ever I had seen her; and, though engaged in this humble and almost menial service, she still carried the high crest of an earl's daughter. There was no affectation of finery about her. Her rich dark hair was parted on her forehead, and knotted high behind, with a velvet snood, like the common maidens of her country. A plain lawn kerchief, covering her shoulders, was crossed modestly on her bosom, instead of the velvet and pearls that had once blazoned from it, with costly magnificence; and her person, now setting into a married woman's fullness, was clad in plain gingham, like a decent farmer's wife.

"We watched behind the hedge with beating brows; for the recollections of childhood and the yearnings of nature began to come over the heart even of her hard and artificial sister; and as for me, sympathy and interest for the young lady almost filled my eyes with tears, to see her thus strangely situated.

"The reapers gathered round her when she came to the end of the rigs—not a rabble of ragged Irish, as in latter days have come a vermin over our Scottish plains; but blithe and brawny lads and lasses of our ain kind, with light hearts and industrious hands, with whom it was no degradation to sit and eat upon a harvest field. Bless the recollection! It was a perfect picture, to see them all seated beside the shocks of corn, and Lady Barbara, like a modest queen, distributing round to them their simple food—most gratefully and respectfully received from hands like hers.

"She sat down beside her husband on some sheaves of corn; and when he took off his hat, to ask a blessing on the repast, his thick black hair clustering round his sunburnt temples, and wiped with his sleeve the healthy perspiration from his brow; and looked fondly and gratefully in his Barbara's face, as he took the bread and milk from her hands; I thought I never saw a handsomer rustic pair. They ate their meal with a pleasant countenance, and did not discourage the joke and jeer of rustic fun, that went round among the reapers; and as the latter rose to return to their work, I saw a tear steal down Barbara's cheek, as, with some strange emotion, she gazed upon her husband; while, when the reapers had gone, he placed his arm kindly round her waist, as if to acknowledge, in love and kindness, that this was a moment of real happiness.

* This incident, at least, we are permitted to advert to, as true of the earl's daughter on whose history our tale is founded.

"But human things are full of mystery; and the happiness that I talk of steals over us occasionally, in brief snatches, when we seek it not, and often is the ominous precursor of coming sorrow. When I saw this interesting scene in the field, I little knew what was soon after to take place.

"Months after this again passed on, and some strange reports rose in the country, how that the whole Johnstons of Fairly and Green Braes were in some unknown and unspoken-of trouble. Then, unwonted men, along with the ordinary gay enquirers, were seen lurking and hiding about the latter farm, and loud and reproachful words next were heard by the servants passing between James and his lady wife. Some affirmed that apprehended ruin was mixed in the cup, and that James was becoming a desperate man; and others said, that a tiff of jealousy had lighted the blaze. How it was exactly none could tell, but the old woman again came backwards and forwards, and took upon her authority, which none would allow; and this only thickened the dark pool of trouble, and made matters between them much worse. Neither was it known how Colonel Delap, of the Netherhaugh, managed to get acquainted with Lady Babby. But acquainted he was, although at first she banned him from the door; and this, like most matters of love and sexuality, became the bitter bottoming of many sorrows.

"The colonel, indeed, was a noble fellow, and, never speaking of the irresistible colour of his coat, had that smoothened tongue and forcible impudence which is a well known part of the soldier's calling, and was far beyond the country virtue of poor Jamie Johnston. Not but that Lady Barbara loved virtue like other people, yea, and had practised it vigorously until this very time; but, alas and alack for human nature! which is strong towards passion, and weak towards reason, and seldom can see the two ends of its own happiness!

"A wicked scoundrel, no doubt, was Colonel Delap, to take advantage of the misery that at times sore pressed on Barbara's heart, especially since the boasts and triumphs of her sister's wedding, and, by aggravating the natural discontent of her condition, in order to render the present relief and joy, with which he had baited his hook, more tempting, to plunge her, by its means, into deeper misery. But scoundrels are not scarce in this wicked world, to steal away, by their vile arts, the best part of the little happiness and virtue that is left in it.

"One evening, at the twilight, when James Johnston was away at the town, and Lady Barbara was sitting crying to herself, over a complication of vexations which now seemed to crowd round her, a light tap was heard at the farm door, and the gay Colonel Delap humbly entered. He was dressed in coloured clothes, carried a small riding whip in his hand, and appeared startled and distressed at the situation in which he found her. Her mother in law had just left her; and from something that had passed, in which they had mutually aggravated each other, her mind was left in a dreadful state of proud and resentful irritation.

"At first she was inclined to look upon the colonel with suspicion, as come to spy into her sorrows, or take advantage of her weakness. But it is the property of that strange negation to which we give this vague name of weakness, not to know its own qualities, or the side on which it is most sure to mislead itself; and so the colonel, by touching the proper string, and speaking to the lady's proudest feelings, contrived to gain her confidence, and then to work upon her in the usual manner of practised seducers.

"It is of no use your attempting to hear this longer," he said; "you have tried it and you have failed; for the nature of things is against it, and the bare effort is ruining your health, and shortening your days. You talk of virtue, and of your husband's love: every one talks of virtue, and of love, too; but ask you where they are, and the echo will answer, Where?—not, at least, among those who talk much of either.

"Hark ye, Lady Barbara," he went on; "would not the good uneducated peasant, whom a strange fate has made your husband, have as much love, and more, for the commonest wench that scours your milk-pails, than he can pretend to you, the daughter of a half-score earls? and if he loved you with a sentiment you can understand, could he have spoken to you as you say he did, this very morning? Lady, the real question is, whether you will choose to die an obscure and lingering death, by persisting in attempting a life that to you is an impossibility, or, by doing what is done every day, from less excusable causes and lighter temptations, live but ten—but one year! enjoying that world to which, in reality, you are now worse than dead."

"He paused, and continued gazing in her eyes with all a soldier's impudence, and all a seducer's meaning. She saw the nature of his proposal, and started at it at first, like one contemplating an alarming possibility. He urged his suit in words more eloquent than I can repeat, with ardour trembling in his voice, and passion burning in his eye. But the possibility itself had been no stranger, after all, to Barbara's secret thoughts, amidst the contentions with her mother in law, and in spite of her wavering love for James Johnston, when meditating, with roused passions, upon the mean vexations and dark prospects of her lowly condition. And when the colonel talked eagerly of divorce, and of marriage, after the first fama of the step had passed away, and, swearing at her feet the usual oaths, promised to devote his life and fortune to make her happy, and that amidst the pleasures and honours of her original condition, her eyes began to sparkle at the fascinating picture which he drew of a seducing world: the idea of yet coping with her proud sister, in circles where she knew she was entitled to triumph, was too much for the natural passions of the woman; and the ardent colonel soon saw that here the struggle was ended. The only condition she asked, after the fearful consent, was leave to go on her way and kiss her baby, then at nurse about a mile from the house.

"The colonel promised every thing in the heat of his eloquence; but when he had got her outside the door, and they were mounted on the horses he had in waiting, pretending alarm, he hurried her on by another road, which led direct to the Scottish metropolis.

"Next day a distracted man, namely, James Johnston, was seen hastening, like one beside himself, between his deserted house at Green Braes and the Fairly Holm; for now the hue and cry had got up in the neighbourhood, that Lady Barbara of Carloghie had stolen from her house, in the dead of the night, and run off to London with the gay and blackguard Colonel Delap.

CHAPTER XV.

"With few does the stream of life run in an even course. With most—metaphor aside—it is a confused succession of alternating sensations; sometimes dark and dull of hue, like the clouds of winter; at other times breaking out into the glowing splendour and bright illusions of a happy dream, in which life, for the moment, hurries on with feverish celerity, and time gallops like a race horse, impelled by the ardour of present enjoyment.

"But all dreams have their hour of awakening, and sometimes merge into strange turnings, which make that which was begun in bounding delight terminate in the gasping convulsions of horror and apprehension. What would you have me to tell of Lady Barbara? The history is stale, and the incidents common-place; because life is a repetition of follies and deceptions, and man will not profit by repeated example. The usual dream was dreamt by Lady Barbara, while the colonel was believed; and the usual disappointments suffered, when she found he had deceived her. At length, after many bickerings amidst fictitious gaiety, and many turns of fortune, with their corresponding feelings, and much surprise on the simple lady's part, that she found herself disappointed in so many ways, and that none whom she desired would now associate with her, the usual event took place between her and the colonel; and having still some virtue left, to preserve her from the horrors to which he would have consigned her; and harassed with thoughts of her husband and her child, down she plunged, all at once, into the deepest abyss of shame and despair.

"Meantime, strange and sad changes had taken place at the Fairly Holms. The old man had died of a broken heart, after being turned out of his farm for going too far in helping of his unfortunate son; and the old woman, living now, occasionally, in the deserted and neglected farm-house of Green Braes, was considered to be at times not quite right in her mind. As for James," continued Marion with a sigh, "it is a pain and a distress to me even now to speak of him. He went about the cauld rigs of the moping, a perfect object of broken down manhood, suffering, and despondency. The only consolation he appeared to take in life was in the nursing and tending of his little daughter. But Providence, in its mystery, seemed to have set its mark upon him; for even this last tie to the world was threatened next to be torn out of his shattered heart.

"The winter time had set in cauld and grim, and a lonely blackness seemed to brood over the neighbourhood of leafless Carloghie, when one dark night, towards the middle watches, a solitary figure of a woman came stealing towards the farm-house of Green Braes. She was dressed richly for a pedestrian; yet there was in her appearance and manner an air of wild and reckless dissipation. She sought the window where she saw a light burning. I need not say this was the once handsome and proud Lady Barbara of Carloghie.

"With hesitating steps and rising emotion, she drew near to the little window. There was no screen, and she looked in as well as her blinded eyes would allow her. She saw her child lying on the bed, and James gazing in its flushed face; sometimes murmuring out a sob of sorrow, and then wetting with a feather the child's parched lips. He rose, and walked about the room, wringing his hands in silence. Suddenly he muttered something, with his eyes turned upwards, as if in ejaculation for the soul of his daughter; and then, his voice rising as his feelings became impassioned, he broke out into a loud and heart-cutting lamentation.

"Oh! if your misguided mother but saw you now, Mary Johnston," he said, "this sight might perhaps melt her cruel heart. But she is far away, with them that never loved her as I have done; and now thou art her last saddest remembrancer, and cold death's creeping up to thy young heart—and I am a bereft and broken hearted man."

"He stopped suddenly, choked by his sorrow, and thought he heard a noise without. It was Barbara groping agitatedly for the latch of the door. The sounds were low, but became sharp and abrupt, and the door moved as if the walking spirit of death sought hasty admission. In another instant the figure of a female was derer stood before him, and the pale and haggard countenance of his own Barbara appeared, by the dim light of the small lamp, more like a deadly ghost than a living being.

"It is indeed Barbara herself," she said, after going long and sadly in his altered countenance, come to lay her head beneath your feet, James Johnston, if you will let me acknowledge I've been your ruin, and kiss my bonnie bairn before she dies."

"The Lord prepare me for this trial," he said, staggering back to a seat; "Babby, is it you come to me at the dread hour, when I called upon your spirit. Ye've wronged me sair, Lady Barbara; but I can refuse ye nothing. There, in that bed, is your dying bairn."

"It would have melted a heart of the rock adamant to hear the sobbing screams of bitter grief with which the broken-hearted mother and unfortunate lady bent over the face of her expiring child. 'James Johnston,' she said, turning to her groaning husband, 'ye'll no put me out at this door, till my puir bairn wins to her last rest!'

"Till the breath's out of Mary's body," said James, ye may sit there and greet by her side; but ye've done us bitter wrong, Lady Babby, as ye truly say; and another night ye shall never bide under my roof."

"The two parents sat and watched the dying child, and, at times, between their sobs of sorrow, stole a nameless look at each other's faces. At length, in the darkest hour that comes before the break of the morning, the pretty bairn gasped its last, and was relieved from the troubles of an uncertain world.

"Nothing was said—nothing could be spoken, as the women that waited without came in to compose the limbs of the child. 'It's over now, and my deed's done,' said Lady Barbara, rising. 'It is not fit that I should sit longer in an honest man's house.'

"With a steady step she walked towards the door; and, ere the light of morning had opened out fairly upon the breaking sky, her figure had vanished beyond the fields of the farm, and no one enquired whither she went.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Pride and propriety make strange resolves, working upon the dim perceptions of supposed expediency; as if any line of conduct could effectually bar out intruding evil, or that man could know what was really good for him in the present life.

"The funeral of the child passed quietly over, and men hardly knew what was in James Johnston's mind. It was not even correctly ascertained that Lady Barbara was, for certain, in that part of the country. Some said they had seen her, and others affirmed that there was a mistake of the person; and many wondered what poor Johnston, in his present demented and stupid state of mind, would attempt to do.

"The Fairly kirkyard, where Mary Johnston was buried, is pleasantly situated a little above the Ruar Water, where the bridge crosses off towards Carloghie Castle.

On the night after the funeral, James Johnston was a restless man; and when his friends looked in his pale face and wandering eye, they shook their heads, and said it would be well if nothing fearful should happen. When the darkness came on, however, he found himself unable to stay in his house, and made his way towards the kirkyard, to try to get relief by indulging his sorrow o'er his daughter's grave.

It was dark as pitch by the time he entered the little stile; and groping among the tombstones, he could not readily find the spot where his bairn lay. He had just found the green mould and the loose sods, when, seating himself down upon a broad stone, he saw something move between himself and the starless sky—but quite near, on the other side of the grave. 'Who is there?' he called out, with some terror. 'Is there any one watching in this dreary kirkyard that can have griefs to bear equal to mine?'

"Deeper—deeper, and sadder far, James Johnston!" said a faint woman's voice: for the grief of guilt, and the bitterness of shame, are a heavier load on the crushed heart than aught that can come of fair misfortune. But keep up your mind; you suffer not at least the pangs of remorse for having brought the virtuous into calamity."

"Barbara," he said, affected into mildness by her penitent speech, 'I wish you had not come here, from wherever you came, to interrupt my communion with the harmless dead. My wounds are o'er green, and my mind o'er distraught, for meeting you so soon after what has happened.'

"She sobbed bitterly as he spoke, but replied not, and both sat over the grave weeping in silence.

"Will you not go, Lady Barbara?" he said impatiently. "You deserted me for those you loved better, when our bairn was in health, and my blood was warm towards you. Now the one lies cold at our feet, and the other is frozen to hope and the world; and you come here to embitter and disturb my most painful thoughts."

"She still did not seem able to make a reply, and the dead silence of the solitary churchyard was only broken at intervals by her continued sobs.

"Woman," he said, 'know you what you have done to me and mine? Know you what ruin you have brought upon a whole family? I will not call you adulteress, though well I might. Hence, unnatural mother, from this sacred spot! Your stains are too black, your conduct too foul, to be recounted here among sinless mortality!'

"Reproach and upbraid on, for I well deserve it," she said: 'I have wronged you, I know—irreparably wronged you, and ruined my own soul: but we have met here alone, o'er a common sorrow. I troubled not your house when my child was confined; I stood behind backs like a stranger when her dear corpse passed me by; I watched behind the wall when she was laid in the clay. May I not be suffered, here, in darkness and solitude, to weep tears of remorse on her innocent grave?'

"The plaintive tones of her well-known voice seemed to pierce him through; he gave a slight shudder as he looked across to her by the dim starlight, and set his feet firmly against the infant's grave.

"I do not bid you go," he said, in a changed tone; you may weep with me, if you will, o'er the cold remains of the last tie that I had to this earth."

"And these ties I have been the means of breaking?" she almost screamed. "Oh James! if I should never speak to you more, let me now give words to my deep repentance, not for the misery I have brought upon myself, but for the woe and shame I have wrought to you, in requital for all your generous love; nay, do not interrupt me, but hear what I have to say; for, for this, and to bless my dying child, I have travelled, in shame and grief, from the farthest end of the kingdom; for this moment of penitent humility, before you, who have loved me in the only happy days I ever knew, ere I fell into the snare of a villain and my own proud heart, I have encountered degradation and poverty to the utmost point, and am now a spectacle and an outcast from all that were dear to me. Oh, James Johnston!" she went on, meeting in agony on her child's grave, if ever you loved me before I made you wretched—if ever you thought towards me a kindly thought—if ever I was in better days your wedded wife, and lay by your side in peace and innocence,—receive now the assurance of my everlasting penitence, for all the wrong I have done to you and yours, and for the pain I have inflicted on your generous heart. I ask not you to forgive me; I ask ever to speak to you in kindness more; but I ask you, believe, whatever may happen, that your poor Barbara, whatever she has done, never in reality loved any but you,—never knew what true misery was until that fatal hour she deserted you and her child.'

"As she stood now up near him, she thought his look had suddenly assumed a strange wildness, and he murmured to himself a few words which she could not make out.

"This is worst of all," he at length said,—'worst of all that has happened to me. Had you gone on in your career and hardened your heart in iniquity, I might in time have forgotten you; but to come back to me thus, and kneel at my feet, never to put the least of the blame on me, for all my harshness the morning before you left me—my weakness is not able to stand this, after all I have suffered. I see the end of it—it is just as I thought. The dead rest quietly when the breath is out. There is a time in this world when we neither can get back towards the past, nor go forward to encounter the future,—and my time is come.'

"James, what is that you say? whither do you mean to go?" and, as he answered her not, she involuntarily laid hold of him while he made towards the edge of the burying-ground.

"His look became now unsettled, and his manner restless; and, as she held him by the arm, she thought he felt cold, and trembled violently at her touch. She now followed him onwards among the tombstones, until they got outside the little churchyard. All this time he did not speak, and his manner still more began to fill her with alarm. 'James she said at length, for mercy's sake, where are you going down towards that dark water?'

"Does not the bridge lead to Carloghie Castle?" he said sharply. "I must go there, and see what the earl says, now as you are come home again. Barbara," he added, his voice sinking into softness, do you remember the time when you and I used to wander by the water's lip, in the sweet summer nights, near Bonnie Carloghie, when the hayfield smelt so fresh, and the stream ran so clear past us, and the blackbird sang so melodiously in the woods, and you used to tell me all your tale, and look so lovingly in my face; and then at times, when we came behind the clumps of whitened hawthorn, I used to turn towards your sweet face, and clasp you thus,—and as he spoke he threw his arms lovingly round her neck. 'Ah Colonel Delap!' he exclaimed wildly, he has held you thus!—out adulteress!" and he thrust her from him,—hence! from me, mocking hyena!—destroyer of your innocent bairn!—you are not Bonnie Lady Barbara of Carloghie—you are not my love of the Fairly Holms—you are a wretched creature come to haunt me at my bairn's grave!"—and, pausing, as his recollection seemed to return, his agonish shudder again shook him all over. 'Oh, merciful Heaven! I wish I may be kept in my right senses!'

"This is the consummation of all," she said; 'my poor husband's reason is affected. Where are you going, James?' she screamed out, holding him again; 'Oh, is there no living soul here, to help me in this extremity?'

"I know where I am going, and where I ought to go," he said, low and hoarsely. 'Hark! they whisper me to come, where my daughter dwells. Whist, Barbara! what do you wring your hands for? Wasn't I a kind husband to you? but dinna sob thus; I know you loved me once, and I loved you too, and love you—Christ forgive me even yet. I'm not ashamed to tell it, although you have driven me to this. But I forgive you, lady, I forgive you before God! and, as he spoke, his voice rose with emotion to a sort of howl, while he stood gazing on her for a space with a melancholy wildness. 'Oh Barbara, if you knew what is in my heart at this bitter moment!' he murmured. 'But come to my arms as you did langsyne, since I have forgiven you; and I will kiss your lips once more, as if none else had ever dwelt on them, and bid you farewell—a long farewell. Oh mercy! grant me mercy, Heaven!'

"He clasped her with a hasty and convulsive grasp. He hung upon her cheek and lips with a sort of ferocity of parting passion. He broke from her suddenly, and, spreading forth his arms towards the sky, as if in ejaculation, and then dashing in among the bushes that straggled towards the stream, was in an instant out of her sight.

"She stood petrified for a moment, looking after him, then flew down the bank; but he was gone. She would have made towards the bridge; but sudden terror deprived her of strength, and, stupified by her feelings, she sank down on the face of the hill. Unable to move, she tried to listen; but the short quick step had died away, and she could distinguish nothing but the still murmur of the stream that rolled slow and black beneath her. She strained her eyes in every direction, and thought she could distinguish a single figure moving on the bridge;

but a black cloud seemed to come before her sight, and blinded her to the rest. Suddenly a murmuring sound was whisperingly borne on the night wind, as if it had been the last prayer of some dying man, and a heavy plunge into the dark waters echoed from the rocky banks down the stream, with an effect of unspeakable horror.

"Mustering the strength of despair, Barbara rose, and rushed quickly forward. But she neither knew what she saw nor what she did; for, as she looked over the low edge of the bridge into the bosom of the black Ruar, its waters seemed agitated by widening circles, from a deep pool, nearly beneath her, which whirled slowly towards the bank, and left the surface smooth as before, unreflecting as a star.

"That fearful night, just as the darkness began to break into morning, a loud knocking was heard at the castle gate, and Lady Barbara was brought to Carloghie hall a raving maniac."

When Marion had got to this point of her story, she wiped away a few tears of recollection, and then hurried me away down long stairs, and through several passages to a little room below, which formerly, when at the door, she had declined entering. It was a little square chamber, with a small recess for a bed. This bedstead, and two old chairs, were all its furniture, saving that on the wall, opposite a loop-hole window, was a large black-framed picture. On that speaking canvass I read, with painful contemplation, the remainder of the tale.

A female figure—the altered shadow of the noble portrait that I had seen above—with sunken cheek and glazed eye, sat on one of the old chairs, gazing vacantly on the ground, and holding the folds of her lawn apron in her thin wasted fingers. One foot was extended a little out, and beside her lay a lock of auburn hair, tied with a worn piece of blue riband. After contemplating, for a little, on the wan countenance of that interesting figure, an expression of despair that shall never fade from my recollection, I turned to Marion, and begged her to amplify, for my satisfaction, this melancholy sequel.

"This was the room, sir," she answered, "in which the demented Lady Barbara was confined for more than ten dreary and frightful years. All that time I waited upon her—for death bides long from those who are anxious to die—while the tale of the lady confined in a darkened room of the lower tower of the castle caused a dread curiosity, and a breathless mystery of whispering concern, throughout the whole country.

"Oh! but he's long a coming, long a coming for his bairn and me," she would sadly say, or rather silyly sing, as she plaited constantly, from end to end, in her fingers, the worn folds of her gown or apron, and beat time to her plaintive murmur with her extended foot. Then she would take up the lock of hair that was cut off James Johnston's head, when he was taken out of the pool of Ruar Water, and the scrap of blue riband that belonged to her baby, and twine them round her long fingers, as she would vary into wild verse, and croon, with resigned sadness, her melancholy carol, wherein she still called upon death to take her from her weary sorrow.

"At length the dark night did end, and the bitter sorrow was choked in death; and, calling upon the spirit of her unfortunate husband and her cherub daughter, Lady Barbara one evening expired in my arms. The great vault of Carloghie did not receive her wasted corpse. By her own desire she was buried, like a plebeian, in Fairly kirkyard, beside the remains of James Johnston and her bairn.

"Now, just let me take a greet to poor Lady Barbara's memory," said Marion, covering her face with her kerchief; "I'm glad my tale is ended."

* For the reasons already hinted at in the preface, there can be no notes, referring to any particular family, appended to illustrate Lady Barbara's melancholy story. Not a few occurrences, more or less similar to those here represented, are said to have happened in the course of the history of several old families, and may be within the knowledge of some who read these remarks. But, acting on the rule, to which we mean to adhere, of violating no confidence, and giving, if possible, no occasion of offence, we can only say, that whatever foundation there is in fact for our story, farther than we have mentioned in a former note, every name used, and every locality alluded to in the course of it, are entirely imaginary. Our aim, in developing the causes and results of a family misfortune of this kind, is too grave and serious to admit of the suspicion of administering to any thing like prying curiosity; and if we have not succeeded in impressing an important and solemn moral by our story, we have done less than we intended.

THE PRIORS OF LAWFORD.

A STORY OF THE DOMINIE.

CHAPTER I.

One long summer's day I had been travelling on, in my usual pedestrian manner, through a series of sweeping yet solitary valleys, such as may be found, as he goes, by any by-road topographer, towards the eastern and southern extremities of Scotland. The country was sufficiently romantic to interest the fancy of a wanderer like myself; but as the sun declined towards evening, I had plodded on for several miles without seeing a human face, and I began to long exceedingly to meet with some habitation, where I might enjoy a little comfort and rest. In this part of the world I was a perfect stranger, and now began to get uneasy; for I was spent and weary, and even the song of the blackbird, which still echoed through the woods, failed to bring its usual refreshment to my spirit.

Much farther I had not proceeded, when, buried "cosily" among the upland woods, and partly straggling down a green slope, a sweet romantic village came unexpectedly into my view, and delighted my fancy with pleasing ideas of what I might find within it. As I drew near, the small dwellings seemed so quaintly built, and huddled together with a look of such simple sociality,—the place seemed altogether such "a rest and be thankful" station, for those who, like myself, chose to wander to and fro in the world, to see what it might contain, as well as to chase away sad thoughts, that the contemplation brought me involuntary comfort, from the impressive conviction, that, bad as the world is, there is still to be found in it much peace, purity, and happiness.

As I came on towards the village, the hour of eight struck sonorously from the bell of the tower, and presently it began to toll an evening chime, which broke pleasantly the surrounding stillness, and sounded away among the valleys, with a musical and murmuring tinkle. This was a gracious sound to my reviving spirit, as I musingly entered within the long street, and observed the youngsters come out from the doors up and down, to enjoy the outside sociality of the summer's night; for, in truth, every thing had a happy and contented look; and I thought that even the jolly red face of the Marquis of Granby, that was painted on the sign-board of the decent inn, seemed to grin upon me a hearty and inviting welcome.

I was soon within the old-fashioned hostelry, and, seating myself in a large arm-chair of a comely parlour, I drew a long breath, and looked upwards, giving thanks for the mercies thus pleasantly and conveniently thrown in my way. At the same instant I was attended by a clean-looking woman, namely the landlady herself, who came to offer me her best refreshment. A single glance showed me what sort of person the landlady was; and, in five minutes after, my mind was made up to pass a whole day in her house, perhaps more, to get acquainted with this interesting village of Hillington.

"Who are the principal people about this neighbourhood, mistress?" I enquired of the curtsying landlady.

"The principal family hereabout, sir," she answered, kindly, "live down the water in Lawford Holm; but it would be a long tale to tell you all about them," added the woman, mysteriously.

"And who preaches in that fine old church of yours, mistress?"

"That's just what I wish to tell you, sir," said the woman: "Mr. Kinloch, the old minister, seems to have but a short time to live; but his successor is so much beloved, that his name is in every one's mouth here. Maybe, sir, as you are a stranger, you are come to the placing."

"What placing, mistress? I have not heard of it."

"Mr. Bannatyne, the new minister, is to be placed on Wednesday, and this will be a great doing in Hillington."

"No doubt. But who lives in that ill-made square house among the trees, that I observed on the left hand, as I came into the village?"

"The Laird of Glaunderston, sir,—and his daughter is —"

"The laird," said I surprised, "is an old acquaintance of mine: I was not aware that he lived here. But what were you going to tell of his daughter?"

"She is spoken of as the wife to be of the handsome young minister that's about to be placed in Hillington kirk—but, indeed —"

"Indeed—what, mistress?"

"Oh, sir, she is a coarse creature."

"Nothing remarkable in that, mistress," I said: "coarse and fine are often spun together, in this world, for wiser reasons than I can make out. Marriages, they say, were once made in heaven, but that must have been long before my time."

"You are an observable man, sir," said the woman: "I wish you could stay to see the placing."

"Why to see that, mistress?"

"I cannot tell you, sir: but there is a lady——"

"Very likely. There is always a lady in every thing that is interesting. And what lady is it?"

"The lady of the Holm, sir. It's not for me to talk to a stranger about her; but, perhaps, you may hear something concerning this lady from the Laird of Glaunderston. An observable man like you should not leave this country side without knowing something about the Priors of Lawford."

"Prior? that will be the name of a family. An English name, I think it is."

"Yes, sir. A strange, and yet an admirable old family it is, and ever has been, long before the remembrance of living man; although I cannot tell you about it what I would, at this present talking; and then, sir, there is the young minister. I'll tell you what it is, if that young gentleman ever couples himself with Glaunderston's coarse daughter—but ye'll excuse me, there's a bell ringing in the wee parlour, and I'll be wanted;—and with this, tripping out of the room, after a slight curtsy, the tantalising woman left me to ruminate over this imperfect information.

All the addition to her hint that I could afterwards obtain was, that Mr. Bannatyne, the said minister, was expected at Glaunderston House on the following day; and thither I determined to walk, shortly after breakfast next morning; for my mind was awakened about something, I knew not what.

Upon going to the laird's house, he was exceedingly pleased to see me, and introduced me to the old minister of the parish, whom he had hospitably invited to meet Mr. Bannatyne. The latter did arrive, just as the old gentleman and I were talking. Of the latter, however, to wit, the Rev. Mr. Kinloch, who had been minister of the parish for nearly forty years, I must first say a few words.

Contrary to what experience had taught me to expect in a common country clergyman, I found the senior to be a man of general information and a gentlemanly spirit; one whose comparative want of knowledge of the world, of which he was himself sensible, was well made up by the quality of his reading, and great natural shrewdness and sagacity of mind. I was just rejoicing inwardly over the value to his parish of such a man, in the character of its pastor, as well as to the inexperience of him who was to be his successor, when a coach stopped at the door, and Mr. Bannatyne, of whom we had been talking, accompanied by another clergyman, alighted, and joined our company.

The first glance I had of this remarked person, even his walking across the room, showed me that he had one advantage, of value both to himself and his charge, to wit, the birth and rearing of a gentleman; and his conversation soon indicated that his mind set him above the usual peculiarities of his calling. But he was not a mere youth: his age might be four and twenty; and his looks were certainly all that the talkative landlady of the inn had described. Involuntarily he interested me, and I soon saw that here, as well as in the village, he was the idol of the general women, and the grand object, in particular, of the Laird of Glaunderston's red-haired daughter. This discovery I grudged at exceedingly, knowing that the unequal yoking together of the coarse and the fine in the world is none the better for its being often done, and becomes a root of bitterness from which grows up many bad shootings.

Though far from being troubled with itching ears, to make me a runner after popular preachers, yet, the obviously superior character of Mr. Bannatyne gave an interest to the ceremony of his being inducted, or "placed," which determined me to attend it on the following day. I had also a curiosity to see the assembled people of this romantic neighbourhood, and to observe in what manner a youth who had interested me so much would take upon himself so important a charge. In the morning, accordingly, I made ready in time; but before the ringing out of the second bell, remembering the hints and half-sentences of the talkative landlady, my curiosity was awakened to know something further, if possible, regarding the particular family of whom she spoke. When I called upon the good woman, however, I found, to my surprise, that her mouth had been completely closed to my enquiries, from some sudden consideration of publican prudence, in consequence, no doubt, of my taking up my abode with the Laird of Glaunderston.

"I'm in a public way, sir," she said, "and it's by the public I live: so it is not for me to keep a wagging tongue in my head, about the worthy gentles of this canny neighbourhood, among whom I earn my bit and my sup; but as you are an observable man, sir, and about to go to the placing, when you set yourself down in the laird's seat, just observe you a young lady in the green pew forment you, wi' the broad scutcheon of arms on the pillar above her head."

"I'll mind what you say, mistress," replied I; "but tell me now, whose are the arms that you speak of, and what is the reason of all this mystery?"

"There is the kirk bell begun to ring, sir," she said, "and I must be going, although ye be a man of interrogation. But if ye would know what I wish you of the remarkable family, look at the lady that sits beneath the scutcheon. Ye'll ken her, sir, by her pretty fair face, and her skin as white as milk, an' her dark swelling eye that's never off the minister."

"Go on, mistress," said I, peremptorily, "speak out, if you be a woman."

"Then, sir, just do you watch the lady's face at the placing, and see how she looks at the trying questioning, and the denunciation, and the laying on of the hands, and the apostolic benediction, and the confirming prayer,—just observe the countenance of Rebecca Prior, and if you have an eye for a woman's thoughts, and can read the changes of a bonnie face, when the soul within kindles up under the cheek, and the heart beats because it dares not speak, ye'll think of what I say."

The word of my reply was not ready at my tongue's end, when I looked up, and, behold, the woman was gone.

The church bell now sounded, as I wandered forth, with romantic effect over the neighbouring hills, and echoed away through the valleys below the town; and I joined the sober crowd that issued from the houses, and soon entering by the kirk stile, and passing the monuments of the ancient graveyard, I placed myself respectably in the Laird of Glaunderston's pew, anxious to witness the ceremony of the placing.

As the church filled with people, there entered by the door opposite to me, a tall, dark, remarkable-looking gentleman, accompanying a lady aged about twenty; and as she came forward in the passage, even before she had entered the seat under the escutcheoned pillar, I saw that she was the one whom I was given to watch.

There never was a female more worthy of observation, or one more likely to excite that sort of interest which belongs to the finer species of sexual character, and what is "above and beyond" mere personal beauty. I do not mean to describe, so well known a ceremony as the "placing" or consecration of a Scottish minister, the austere forms of the Genevan presbytery. I meant only to speak briefly of what I observed regarding the peculiar lady, and in the demeanour of him who was the subject of the ceremony, on whom, at least, in the character of her spiritual instructor, and with all the minister's modesty, were the eyes of the female intently riveted.

Her features, I could see at a glance, might be said to be perfect; and, what is more, they indicated that mixture of the lofty and the sentimental, which is always so interesting, and sometimes so awful, in the female character. Her skin was beautifully delicate; there was but little colour in her cheek; and though her hair tended to fair, her eyes were deeply dark and sparkling, their large pupils contrasting strikingly with the somewhat pallid, yet healthy, hue of her skin. But I had not yet seen her as I did before the ceremony was finished, nor was I able for a considerable time, fully to understand the meaning even of what I saw.

Mr. Bannatyne demeaned himself during the whole of the ceremony with that modest good sense which, from previous observation, I certainly expected. But he did not go through this day's trial like one of the timber pillars that supported his pulpit. He did not hear and answer to the affecting charge of St. Paul to the elders of Ephesus, without being moved, and that deeply, with the serious nature of the duties which he was now taking upon him. But it was the lady—the pale, poetical-looking lady, that riveted my attention more and more. As I watched her during the exercises of this morning, I could have sworn that there was love for the man burning at the heart, which mixed with, and received elevation from, her admiration of the pastor. Whenever, therefore, his speaking eye indicated that he was moved by the words that were addressed to him, or that his own keener uttered, she, who gazed in his countenance through, as only a woman can look into the soul of the man whom she admires, seemed ready to burst out into sobs of a noble emotion; but, pressing her lips hard together, to refine her feelings within her own breast, she only suffered the large drops to stream down her pale cheeks, or her stand like crystals glazing over the dark pupils of her eyes.

It was not to be supposed that, on a day like this, the look of the young minister should indicate any thing of reciprocity with the evident emotions of the lady. By the time, however, that the ceremony was finished, and that I had seen and heard all, my curiosity and interest were wound up to the highest pitch, to know something more of the two individuals, both of whom, in their supposed relations to each other and the world, had already made a deep impression on my mind. All was soon ended, and I went forth with the crowd, convinced, as well from what I observed, as from the hints of the landlady, that there was something to be known of no common nature regarding persons who severally so much interested me, but of whose character and the peculiarity of their circumstances I was yet ignorant.

It was during my further sojourn in this secluded neighbourhood, and my subsequent journeyings to these parts, that I was enabled to pick up the particulars I have to tell regarding the old family of Lawford.

CHAPTER II.

On the side of a rising ground, which slopes down into a pleasant hollow, or rather holm, as such a spot is named in Scotland, only a short mile from the village of Hillington, stood at this period an old-fashioned picturesque building, which, overlooking from the midst of the wood with which the slope was covered, the small streamlet or burn that meandered down in the hollow, was known from time immemorial by the name of the mansion of Lawford. The streamlet was also called by the same name, which, as its etymology intimates, eventually served to designate the whole neighbouring estate; and this ancient property has been, for more generations than could easily be traced, in the possession of a family who originally came from England, but who had long been familiarly known in the country by the general designation of the Priors of Lawford.

Of this ancient family, once pretty numerous, only two persons at this time remained to claim direct and near connection with it; and these two were somewhat strangely and, with respect to the world, solitarily situated. The one was a maiden, the only daughter now living of the last married male of the family. The other was the only brother of that person, who had died about a year ago, and of course the uncle of the maiden, still, also, unmarried; and these two persons lived together, in much seclusion, in the stately old mansion by Lawford burn. Neither the young lady nor the elderly gentleman were common characters, as was well known to such of the people in the neighbourhood as had sufficient perception to observe this; and it need not be added, that it was the niece of the tall dark-visaged gentleman who had so strongly interested me on the day of the placing.

There was not, probably, another person in the parish who had had the sagacity to observe what the landlady of the inn had observed and pointed out to me, in regard to some supposed sentiment of Rebecca Prior towards Mr. Bannatyne, the minister. As for the young clergyman, he was perfectly a stranger to the existence of any thing of the kind, and very much so to the lady herself; for, though he had before this period once sat in her company, she had scarcely exchanged a word with him; and her behaviour had been so silent, and timid, and peculiar, both on that occasion and when he had noticed her among others in her pew at church, that she seemed to him more like a vowed and pledged nun, who had renounced the world and its pleasures, than "any mortal mixture of earth's mould," who lived and dwelt amongst us.

It was not from any romantic exaggeration of her beauty—which, in truth, needed no exaggeration—that Mr. Bannatyne took up this notion. It was simply an impression of character, regarding a lady of whom every one spoke in terms of the deepest respect, and with whom he had few expectations of making any acquaintance. At times, indeed, he felt a strong wish to have some intimacy with her and her uncle; for when he came to be settled in the parish, the society he found, male or female, was extremely limited; and curiosity itself, with something like awe of the nun-like female, gradually heightened that sentiment. She seemed, however, to have taken, as he thought, something like dislike to himself; for, in subsequently meeting her at Lawford House, in consequence of her uncle's hospitality, her reserve became almost more marked than good breeding would warrant, until he began to fancy that she even tried to avoid him. Yet, at other times, afterwards, when she did enter into some distant conversation with him, her observations were so judicious and so tasteful—her very language indicated so much mental accomplishment, such unassuming refinement; and he thought her words were at times so penetrating in their meaning—even her voice seemed so musical—that he became interested concerning her to absolute absorption, and was momentarily flattered into an idea that she almost took a pleasure in his society.

Mr. Prior himself had taken an evident partiality for the minister; and in the subsequent visits of the latter at Lawford House, as he involuntarily watched the countenance of Rebecca, she would again, at times, become unaccountably silent, as if she was careful to eschew further direct communication with him. But anon, as he talked to her uncle, her large eye would sparkle while watching his words; then she would gradually offer some remark, and join them, as if giving way to her feelings; when afterwards, suddenly checking herself, so soon as the conversation became serious or interesting, she would, upon some slight excuse, rise and leave the room.

This conduct, so unusual for one of her age, very much astonished Mr. Bannatyne. "What could her meaning be?" he often enquired of himself: for this was repeated several times, and under modifications of manner and circumstances so various, that he knew not what to think. Sometimes it deeply provoked his pride; and at others it excited feelings of a very different kind: for more than once the transient look that she cast on him—her full expressive eyes, as she rose to leave his company, had a meaning in their glance so despairingly sad, that it almost affected him to tears; and on these occasions, if eyes could speak, he thought hers seemed eloquently to beg of him to excuse her manner, to forgive her, and to take no offence at her behaviour. But at such times, after Mr. Bannatyne was left alone with her uncle, the conversation of the worthy old gentleman appeared to him so tedious, and he himself became so abstracted, that both gentlemen would sit and observe each other for a time with a look of indefinite but subdued mystery.

Still the minister could not stay from the house, and the same scene was acted over and over again. The same dread of something unexpressed, seemed to be over all; and yet they could not live separate. Expressions occasionally dropped from the old gentleman also, and looks were exchanged between him and Rebecca, which filled the minister with a feeling so painful, that it was almost terrifying to himself; and yet he knew not what was its exact meaning, or to what it tended. Sometimes now, as he sat and looked at them both, a sort of vague dread would come gradually over him, which he could not define, and which was associated with some notion or suspicion, for which there seemed to be no expression. Even the solitary and antiquated mansion of Lawford seemed now to his fancy to have something mysterious, if not terrific, about it; and as he went down thither in the winter evenings, the stream in the holm, as he crossed it, appeared to meander dark and dreary down the hollow, and the wind to moan sadly through the woods, as if warning him of some dismal tale that he dared not be told. At length, some slight incident occurred between him and Rebecca, which alarmed his pride, while it affected his feelings; and as he crossed the stream that night, on his return home, he determined, whatever it might cost him, to absent himself henceforth from this strange though fascinating family.

But now again, as he sat at home over his books after this, in his dull lodging in Hillington, he found that by staying away entirely from his secluded friends, he was punishing himself much more than, in the moment of alarmed pride, he could have suspected; and began, like all candid minds, to think that there might be something in himself, or in the position of the lady, or in the nature of the case altogether, more than he knew of, which might form a good reason for that manner to him, of which he complained. But even the society of Mr. Prior was of itself so desirable in this dull neighbourhood, that it was too much for him to deny himself the pleasure and advantage he might derive from it, on account of any unexplained fancy regarding a female living in his house, whose manner to himself might be perplexing, but of which there was no reason that he should take any particular notice. Besides, with Mr. Prior himself he felt that he was not yet half acquainted; and, as for the lady, though she did no more than pass out and in as they talked, her simple smile at her uncle's joke, and the penetrating gaze of her large dark eye (should she never deign even to speak to him,) were as he thought, a positive delight, compared to the obtrusive chatter and freedom of the coarse daughter of M'Gilvray of Glauderston.

"And more than all this," he added, to himself, as he paced the floor of his solitary study, "young men, as my venerable predecessor says, are disposed to be rash in their judgments, and dictatorial in their decisions, before they have time to know what is hidden under the external surface of things. Doubtless, I am to blame, in presuming to set up my own inexperienced pride, against the invaluable advantages, at my age, even of the instructive evils that may arise out of intercourse with wise and accomplished people. It becomes me, as a teacher of others," continued he, "to feel, that I also am liable to misapprehension, to error, and folly. I will, this very evening, arise, and, in the repentant spirit which manly candour has often to exercise in life, seek one other interview, at least, with the venerable proprietor of Lawford."

Pursuing the train of the minister's reflections, it must here be added, that there are few things more puzzling to sensitive persons in early life, than the occasional manner towards them of those whose good opinion they are anxious to deserve. This Mr. Bannatyne strongly felt on his new visit of the same evening at Lawford, particularly with reference to Rebecca Prior; for, though he had persuaded himself that it was her uncle only he had gone to converse with, and that her behaviour, or notice of him, was of no manner of consequence; he found, to his uneasiness, that whether it was curiosity, or whether it was pride, not only the words she addressed to him, but her minutest look, were now matters of increasing solicitude. Yet he would not seem to regard her, he thought; for in fact, her presence was of no importance to him; and this ridiculous watching of the countenance, and pondering on the motives of a strange girl, would wear off as his curiosity came to be gratified; for, as to any more serious sentiment, that, of course, was out of the question.

The character of both these persons, as they appeared at this time to the anxious young pastor, require, perhaps, a word of explanation. That of Mr. Prior, in particular, appeared to the young man odd and unaccountable in several respects. With a sportiveness of fancy, which seemed evidently to fit him for social enjoyments, and which occasionally showed itself through his habitual seriousness and taciturnity, he yet seemed systematically to seclude himself from the world, and to look with jealousy upon any intrusion into his habits, although what he called an intrusion was yet evidently felt to be a real relief. On some occasions, in the society of Mr. Bannatyne, Mr. Prior's conversation became, to our youth's surprise, even humorous and caustic; and when he contrasted this lightness with the general strain of profound and didactic thought in which he usually indulged, and the instructive, though gloomy, speculations upon the condition of humanity, which made the staple of his earnestly delivered aphorisms, he was convinced that there was something hidden under all this, which it would require more than ordinary penetration to find out or appreciate.

As to Rebecca, however, the minister observed, that whatever was peculiar regarding her, beyond her habitual expression of simple and resigned melancholy, consisted entirely in her behaviour to himself; for her conversation with her uncle was easy and sensible, besides maintaining a tone of graceful humility that was extremely seductive; and every movement of hers, and every arrangement of the household under her charge, indicated the most perfect taste and propriety.

Had the minister had less dignity of character, and used more freedom with others in the neighbourhood, the prying tattle of a country parish would soon have furnished him with certain particulars regarding the Priors of Lawford, which might have served as a clue to the explanation of all this. But, as it was, he could only trust to his own observations, and as these became more acute, and had more to feed upon, they became still more absorbing to his faculties, and their subjects more interesting to his feelings. He saw an elderly gentleman without wife, child, brother, or sister, living in almost total seclusion, with no companion or society, but that of a thoughtful maiden of nineteen, the daughter of his deceased brother; who, in the very spring-time and beauty of youth and health, seemed also generally to abstract herself from all society but that of a gloomy and eccentric uncle, and to shrink from coming in contact with a world which would have hailed her presence with joy, and fed upon her smiles with rapturous admiration.

"What can be the meaning of all this?" he still enquired: "it is not natural for age to refuse honour, or beauty and youth to eschew admiration. There must be some fearful cause that compels the old to avoid society, that solace of life, and the young to choose pensiveness rather than joy, at the very period when the heart beats quick, when the blood is warm, and the romantic fancy travels over bright regions of imagined and anticipated felicity."

It was in vain for him to strive against the increasing anxiety of his curiosity, or whatever else the feeling might be called, which induced him to watch over Rebecca's manner in the way he was constrained to do. He saw, also, that she was aware of his constant and sensitive observation of her; and this seemed still more to increase his embarrassment; for whenever she caught herself joining the discursive conversation between her uncle and him, until she perhaps echoed some sentiment that Mr. Bannatyne had uttered, or joined her judgment to his with animated approbation, her countenance would again assume a strange expression of mental agony, as if she suddenly recollected some painful apprehension.

"There is some mystery of sorrow hanging over this family," he still murmured to himself as he walked solitarily home from Lawford House, one night, in a mood of unusual gloom, "which all my observation cannot penetrate. In this world of strange mysteries, of various and hidden sources of sorrow—this darkling pilgrimage, wherein we still grope in such uncertainty as to many deep enquiries concerning 'being's end and aim,' I know that it is too true, that, in spite of appearances, and of all the coveted appliances and means which fortune seems to collect around her greatest favourites, for the momentary elation of the youthful heart, and for the strengthening of the deceptions of tantalising hope, still there will be found, according to the sombre meaning of the Italian proverb, to be 'a skeleton in every house'—a concealed cause of regret or of dread in every habitation, or in every heart. What can be the nature, or what the history, of that remorseless phantom that lurks among the recesses of the mansion of Lawford, and which cruelly poisons the cup of life to these gentle hearts? What can the name be of the skeleton fiend whose bare bones ever and anon seem to rattle some sound of dread or of horror to check the risings towards enjoyment of the sorrowful spirits in this secluded house? or whose fleshless arm points to some fearful index in nature, of some reserved woe in the future destiny of the family? By heavens! this maiden shall draw aside to use the dark curtain that covers this terrific object, that I may be a sharer in her sorrow myself, or at least be enabled to bear some portion of her burden!"

About this period one or two trifling incidents took place between the minister and Rebecca, such as will happen in the course of an intercourse now becoming so constant, which had the effect of fairly drawing his attention to the state of his own feelings, and of opening his eyes to what he could no longer disguise from himself. It perhaps need hardly be added, that simple curiosity was now no longer the feeling of his mind regarding her. Admiration—increasing and deepening admiration—was, by this time, united to a more touching sentiment. Unsuppressable passion increased deep interest for its object, and rendered sympathy so intense as to be almost painful, until Rebecca Prior became the idol of his spirit, and the charm that awakened him to another existence. Still there was the secret, the apparent mystery, unopened, unsolved. Bannatyne had determined that she should remove the curtain, and disclose the skeleton that caused her melancholy, and his own. But he had not yet the courage to ask her to do so. He was happy in her society each evening, and yet he was most miserable. Such is love!

CHAPTER III.

By this time, there was not a man (at least there certainly was not a woman) in the whole parish of Hillington, but whose mind was perfectly made up as to the present intentions, immediate measures, and whole future history, of their beloved young pastor. That he was shortly to be married to the heiress of Lawford had long been clearly seen: that he had fairly disappointed the laird of Glauderston's daughter was matter of no regret; and that he was to get such and such lands and plenishings with the last remaining daughter of the house of Lawford, was all fully understood and settled.

All this, however, was much more than a matter of mere gossip to the honest laird of Glauderston, and the female part of his family. The laird was disappointed, he was almost indignant; the lady was wroth, and thought herself wronged; the daughter was in a pet, and would have complained, only that no one in Scotland ever prospers who dares to say ill of the minister.

But, in truth, had not the laird been a man whose expectations were formed more from his own wishes than the nature of things, he might have seen, from the first, what was seen by every body else around, that, though naturally anxious, like every well-meaning father, to obtain a comfortable settlement for his favourite daughter, yet the simple fact of Mr. Bannatyne's coming to be assistant minister in the neighbourhood, and accepting, for a time, the hospitality of his house, formed little ground for so extravagant an expectation as that he was shortly to have, in such near relationship, the fastidious and gentlemanly junior minister of Hillington. We can seldom, in this world, receive a gratification to ourselves, without, whether conscious of it or not, giving pain or offence to some other person; so the interesting visits of our clergyman to Lawford House were, without his suspecting it, carefully observed, and enviously felt, by the angry and disappointed family at Glauderston.

The idol gossip of his parishioners, however, had far outrun the truth, as to the prospects or the intentions of their pastor in the quarter where he visited; for, instead of the common place process of wooing and wedding, such as the ordinary world experience and expect, his mind, even amidst the pleasing excitement of passion, was, as before hinted, plunged into a sea of cares and fears, with which all who seek to enjoy the higher emotions of our nature seldom fail to be painfully tried. When he came to see fully into the state of his own mind, and to conclude, in candid self-examination, that, reason as he might, from this time forth earthly happiness and Rebecca Prior were with him inseparably connected, he, in the spirit of manly sincerity, resolved at once, that, in spite of all considerations arising out of their respective conditions in life, and in the face of that inexplicable manner which at times had given him so much uneasiness, he would declare to her the passion he no longer could control, and would learn from her own lips all that he so anxiously wished to know.

But, no sooner had he come to this ultimate determination, and sought to end his anxiety by carrying it into effect, than he found that Rebecca, had, with all a woman's tact, long penetrated his intention; for she avoided every thing in the shape of an opportunity for his meeting her out of the presence of her uncle, and, when accidentally left with him, she would look round her, for an instant, in apparent alarm; then, rising and excusing herself, would steal out of the room, as if some sudden dread had just come over her. And yet she did not scruple to converse with him as she had done at the more early period of their intercourse; indeed, so evidently pleased were her uncle and herself always to see him, and so warm were the constant invitations of each to favour them with his society, that he seemed to be now almost one of the family, and could converse with both upon every subject but the one that was nearest to his own heart.

Now, also, the reserve that Rebecca had at first shown to him had in a great measure died away, or had at least assumed a different character; but still the opportunity—the wished-for and yet dreaded opportunity of speaking to her that one word—of asking her that one question—was always denied him, so that the very pleasure which her society gave him was almost a torture in his present uncertainty. As he farther thought of the possible result of such a communication, after all these happy evenings, the idea at times tended to deepen his distraction of mind, and make his perplexity almost intolerable.

This state of mind at length could no longer be borne, and, going down to Lawford House, one afternoon, he determined that that night should not pass without his obtaining some determinate satisfaction.

The time seemed favourable in several respects, and Mr. Bannatyne hoped that the careless eccentricity of the old gentleman would, at some part of the evening, afford him the wished-for opportunity of saying a few impassioned words in private to Rebecca. As he sat with them both in the evening, conversing as usual, he even thought that Rebecca seemed in a mood more than commonly favourable to his purpose, while the uncle was, this night, peculiarly taciturn and abstracted. Thus, the two young persons being left very much to the obligation of direct conversation, the clergyman's delight was evident in his countenance, even in the midst of his fever of watchful anxiety.

Mr. Prior had a way of rising from his seat and walking about, during familiar conversation, talking as he walked; and it was not uncommon for him to open the door during a pause in their discourse, and to go out and down stairs; when, having taken a short turn in the open air, he would quietly come back, and, taking no notice of what might have been done or said in his absence, would proceed with the conversation, or discussion, resuming it precisely from the point at which he had left it.

This night he was, as I said, more than ordinarily absent and taciturn, until, the conversation between Mr. Bannatyne and his niece turning accidentally upon the subject of the remarkable facts furnished by the infinite diversity in human character, he seemed suddenly roused into eager attention. Lewis Bannatyne, observing this, pursued the subject warmly and eloquently, maintaining his favourite doctrine, that, viewing them philosophically, mankind were not so bad and wicked as they were often called, either by querulous misanthropists who did not sufficient consider the position in which the poor race of Adam were generally placed, or by gloomy expounders of divine revelation who refused to open their eyes to the whole of the subject.

"There is truth in what you say," said Mr. Prior: "man is not, after, all, a very bad sort of being; he is merely contemptible—contemptible even in his virtues, for they are either hardly worthy the name, or are over-stretched until they become the plague and the bane of virtue itself;—contemptible also in his vices, which, while they also often scarcely deserve the name, are yet the bane of his happiness, and the world's constant curse. And yet," he continued, "I have known some, and the world has preserved the history of many, who were as thoroughly and purely wicked as even fiction has pictured, or as hell itself could furnish."

"And I have met with several," said the clergyman, looking across to Rebecca, "who, as far as I can judge, are as purely virtuous, gentle, and good, as ever poet painted as belonging to humanity; and on whom heaven itself can only confer greater purity, or higher elevation of spirit, by divesting them of the clay that weighs them down to mortality!"

"I even agree with you also in that," said the minister, getting animated, "and I admire the man who can see this much in mankind, and who rejoices, as you seem to do, in the pleasing truth. But did you ever observe, Mr. Bannatyne, how much mankind seem to run, as to disposition and character, in distinct races, possessing and maintaining a specific series of family characteristics? This is the fact, not only with isolated tribes, as among the Indian nations, but even in our artificial and refined state of society; for single families have often, for ages, and generations, evinced a specific and characteristic individuality. I need not now refer you to the history of some of the chief families who figure in the annals of our country, for the distinct characteristics by which they were known in their own times, are known to us who live after them, as far as we can trace some degree of purity in the lineage; nor need I instance to you the Stuart family, which has passed away; nor most of the other prominent families which now fill the different thrones of Europe. A slight attention to their several histories will prove the truth of what I contend for, which is, perhaps, of more importance than is generally thought."

"The subject is somewhat curious, sir," said the minister, thoughtfully, "and no doubt important, as a general enquiry."

"It is important also as a particular enquiry, Mr. Bannatyne," said the other, with peculiar meaning.

"Perhaps it may, sir, but I have not as yet thought of turning my attention to it."

"It is the duty of every one to know character, that he may not blindly contribute to swell the black current of evil which deluges the world. It is the process of nature, that man forms connections in life, and thereby some particular race is continued. But what man would a wise man choose to continue? Shall we be, in this particular, less wise than the beasts that perish? Does not the gentlest dove mate with the most gentle of her kind? Does the blood courser unite his fiery nature with the sluggish breed of the Pays Bas? Are there not, among men, whole families which, like the birds of the boughs, belong to what may be called a good or an evil nest? and shall the reason of men be less useful for their own happiness than the common instinct of the beasts of the field?"

"What mean you, sir?"

"It is of the last importance, my dear sir," said Mr. Prior, emphatically, "for those who wish to form connections in life, to know those with whom they unite, both with reference to their own after-happiness, and that of the posterity that may be the result. And if you wish to know me, or any man or woman, in a deeper sense than can be obtained through the conventional ruckeries of social intercourse, enquire the history of the family from which I have sprung; ascertain the peculiarities of the nest to which the bird may belong with which you would offer to mate for life. Trust me, the qualities of the heart, the peculiarities of the blood, and the great considerations of the disposition and bias, are with much certainty transmitted through families, and are matter of inheritance from the male or female branches of a house."

Having risen and continued walking while he said this, the old gentleman, almost before Mr. Bannatyne was aware, had left the room; and the minister had become so absorbed in the sudden reflections caused by this conversation, that he did not notice Mr. Prior's absence, until he heard the echo of his footsteps as he passed through the hall below.

The moment was now come for which Lewis had so long watched: Rebecca and himself left were quite alone, and seated opposite to each other. She smiled faintly, and seemed about to continue the conversation; but, as she looked across to him, her tongue was arrested by observing the expression of anxiety depicted in his countenance. For a few moments he also attempted, in vain, to utter a word, while the silence seemed so intense and so painful, that the lovers thought they heard the beating of each other's hearts.

At length Lewis was able to get out the single word "Rebecca."

She started at the word; but, instantly recovering her breath, as if relieved by the sound of his voice, she smiled sadly, as usual, while he proceeded.

"Rebecca," he said, "I see you perceive my anxiety to say a few words to you. Do not, I pray you, think of moving, but hear me. I have long waited for such an opportunity as this. Nay, listen to me, Rebecca; for the state of my mind is now such, that—"

"Some other time, Mr. Bannatyne; do not speak now!" she exclaimed, interrupting him. "Do not, my esteemed friend!—I know what you would say—I have dreaded this. Do not say any thing to me, but what may be spoken in my uncle's presence—and, hark! there he is returning again."

"No, Rebecca," he answered, after listening a moment, "it is only your fancy that thus alarms you: but now, for the sake of Heaven," he added solemnly "grant me an interview for five minutes only, at some time and place where I may speak to you without witness or interruption: for I have that to say to you which is of the last importance to me, both as it regards my peace of mind, and even my future usefulness as a minister. Rebecca, what alarms you thus?"

"Oh, Mr. Bannatyne, do not—do not speak of such a thing!"

"What on earth can you mean, Rebecca?"

"I cannot tell you, Lewis—I cannot; why should you ask my meaning of me? I conjure you, as my friend, as my minister, whom I wish to hear weekly in public without distraction—whom I wish ever to honour and reverence! not to seek from me any further explanation regarding my family, or my own unhappy state; and, above all, that you will not offer to speak to me differently from what you have till now done."

"Rebecca!" he exclaimed, "I cannot bear this. This strange mystery, where my happiness is so deeply involved, will drive me distracted. I must be suffered to express what my own breast can no longer contain. I must be satisfied from your own lips, or—"

"Or we must never meet more," she said, calmly: "that Lewis, is the only alternative. I have foreseen all this for some time; but my own weakness, and the pleasure I have enjoyed in your society, as well as love for my uncle, who, I saw, was also refreshed by your conversation, has made me put off the evil day: but it has come at length, and too soon. Lewis, it will be better for us both that, from this day forward, we meet no more."

"And not one word of explanation of this mystery, Rebecca?"

"There is no mystery, Lewis,—none whatever; it is merely duty that compels me. Oh! do not look so. I cannot bear it!"

"And will you not meet me, to hear what is bursting in my bosom? Will you not speak to me one word for the satisfaction of my feelings?"

"Do not ask me, Lewis. I entreat of you do not ask me,—for I cannot." And, so saying, she hurried out of the apartment.

He threw himself back into his chair, in a state of stupefaction, from what had just passed. In a few minutes afterwards, however, he was aroused from his stupor, by the soft tread of footsteps, and, looking up, perceived the slender figure of Rebecca glide softly into the room; and coming forward, she again placed herself in the chair she had formerly occupied, quite near to him.

"Forgive me, Mr. Bannatyne," she said, after a moment, and breaking the painful silence. "I ask your forgiveness; for I already repent me of the determination which I have just expressed; and, though I know not well what further I shall have strength to say to you, yet I am aware there is something more than I have yet been able to speak due to your feelings. I have resolved, therefore,—resolved, in spite of the painful delicacy of a subject which is bitter to my thoughts, and in spite of all a maiden's pride, to give you, out of my own mouth, a most sad explanation. It is no romantic fancy that has caused this reluctance to meet you on a seeming mystery; but there are reasons for all this, which you will understand when you come to hear them. In one word, I will meet you this night, even before you sleep, in the little conservatory at the east angle of the mansion. Wait for me there, after you have parted from my uncle. And do not, Lewis, put any unkind interpretations on my conduct, either now or hitherto. I will meet you alone, as I would my brother," she added, passionately, clasping her hands together; "I will speak to you as my minister; I will unlock the secret of my sorrow to you, as my adviser, as my friend, perhaps for the last time we may ever dare to talk in private. But, hark! here comes my uncle."

It was a weary half hour that Lewis spent after this, when, at length, taking leave of Mr. Prior for the night, he sprang forth to the park without, to wait, at the angle of the mansion, for his interview with Rebecca.

CHAPTER IV.

"What a large portion of our time in this life is wasted in mere waiting!" exclaimed the minister to himself, as he paced anxiously up and down, within view of the place appointed; ten, fifteen, twenty minutes having already elapsed, and still the conservatory was dark and dull. "Waiting," he went on, "for something that seems necessary for our happiness, and the want of which prevents us from enjoying the present hour,—the hour that for the time we think so long, and which afterwards appears so short, and so barren of every thing but the torture of impatience—but there! at last I see a light."

As he hastened towards the conservatory, he saw, through the glass, the figure of Rebecca moving inside, and looking anxiously around her. Presently he was at the small door which opened into it, under a porch of creeping plants, which she unlocked, and he stood before her. She seemed to hesitate a moment as he gazed in her face, while she stood partly shaded by the plants of the conservatory, the habitual melancholy of her countenance amounting at this moment to an expression that was almost tragic; and yet, as her dark eye beamed on him, he thought he had never seen her appear so charming.

"I am most grateful for this condescension, Rebecca," he said, "more grateful than I can express."

"Alas! Lewis," she answered, mournfully, "you will not say so before we part. This stolen meeting between you and me looks romantic, but, assuredly, it will end in being only common-place, barren, and sad. I would not affect to be blind to the sentiment that burns in your eye, my friend, nor is this meeting, I confess, without feeling on the part of one even in my hopeless predicament. But we meet not, Lewis, on this painful occasion, as those meet who have words to say, that must never pass my lips, and emotions to indulge in, that I must never feel; or that I must smother within the struggling bosom where they rise. But do not reply here; it is fit that our communication should take place in that part of this ancient mansion where the very walls around us may tend to the illustration of what I have to say. Come, I will be your guide: follow me."

They trod lightly along several passages with which Lewis was quite unacquainted; then, mounting by a back stair until they came to the upper part of the building, she opened a door; and they entered with some hesitation a square lofty room with a carved and painted ceiling, like an old saloon, and the walls hung round with old family portraits.

"I do not bring you here, sir," she said, as she observed him fix his eyes upon the heavy carved ornaments of the chimney-piece, and seeming to feel almost uncomfortable, while he glanced around at the range of painted faces which appeared to gaze on him from within their frames,—"I do not bring you into this unfrequented apartment from the impulse of any romantic fancy, or that I myself have any pleasure in entering a place which can impress me with nothing but associations deeply humbling to my spirit; but simply for the reason I have already given, and that here, at least, we have little chance of being interrupted or overheard."

They seated themselves on two old carved chairs, covered with rich but faded damask; and she gazed for some moments, in melancholy silence, upon the row of portraits on the walls, until painful emotions seemed to be struggling in her bosom.

"Rebecca, you seem strangely moved," he said at length: "speak, I beseech you! what mystery is this that you still delay to disclose?"

"There is no mystery, Lewis; I tell you again there is nothing remarkable in what I have to speak of, although every one feels his own sorrows most deeply. Nay, do not look upon me thus, Lewis. It is no sin of mine or my father's that I have need to be ashamed of. It is simply that there is a judgment of Heaven upon our house. But doubtless it is better to fall into the hands of God than into the hands of men: and I submit. Alas! do not look so piteously upon me."

"Rebecca, I am distracted for you! and you will not put even sympathy towards you in my power, by at once disclosing what you have to tell me. And yet you have undertaken to—"

"Well, sir, I know I have promised. Alas! that this horrible statement should come from my own lips. Observe you these portraits around you, Mr. Bannatyne: some of these are grim and stern, like the men of their time; others, as you see, are mild and melancholy of look, particularly those of latter generations. But, to begin with my father,—my poor, sad, interesting father; that is he with the black robe and the pale countenance, so like my uncle whom you have just parted from. I wonder how I can bear to enter this room after what I know. It was here he chiefly lived of latter years; and see you that small door in the recess, under the large picture?"

"Yes, I see it: but what then?"

"That door opens into the small closet in which he died; and for two years before his death he never left that room, although generally in good health. Heard you never his history?"

"No, Rebecca, no: but why go into this unnecessary train of allusion to the history of your ancestors? Nothing that you can say shall prevent me declaring that I love—tenderly, passionately, love! Nay, it is to speak this one word that I have anxiously sought to meet you in private; and nothing that may have impressed your pure and delicate mind shall prevent me from suing for that hand, for that heart, without which I feel that I shall never know happiness. Why do you thus shrink from me, and look so fearfully. What can this mean?"

"Oh, Lewis, your passionate words distract me! why will you not listen to the tale that I am about to tell you?"

"I see what it all tends to, Rebecca: some of these grim carles have, in the person of your father, engaged you under some unpinous, some rash, some unnatural vow, which you ought not to keep. Every feeling of the heart, every consideration of life, love, hope, heaven itself, seem to conjure you to break it, and to preserve the peace and happiness of your ancient house. Will you do so, Rebecca, for my sake—for your own, will you break this accursed vow?"

"Your impatience misleads you, Lewis," she answered calmly: "there is no vow, no engagement; and why will you still speak to me of love? I must not answer your impassioned language. On that subject, as I told you at first, my lips must be sealed for ever, even to you."

"Then you are betrothed to another—I must not speak to you of the sentiment that absorbs my heart—that heart that I ought to devote to the service of the sanctuary, but which irresistible passion has made to swerve in favour of one who is icy cold, and cruel as cold, or you could not tantalise me thus."

"Oh! not cold, Lewis—not cruel; you wrong me sadly when you say so!" she exclaimed, clasping her hands together, while her voice quivered with rising emotion. "What would you have me to say? would you have me to speak as it becomes not a maiden to speak, to him whom she would love, does love, but dares not! Oh, Lewis, pity me! I am a wretched doomed girl. The hand of Heaven is upon me. The joys of a wife, the tenderness of a mother, I must never know: I must wear out my life in maiden seclusion, and go down to the grave, the last and saddest of my race, without a relative to weep over me when I am gone. Ah! Lewis, it is you that have made me feel my weakness"—and a burst of tears stopped her utterance.

"What can be the meaning of this dreadful distress?" he said, as he watched her while she sobbed beside him: "I will not again open my lips until you disclose to me the mystery, or whatever it is, that places you in this unhappy situation, and causes you this grief. Rebecca, have pity on me, and tell me in two words the cause of all this."

"I will, I will, when I am a little composed. Heaven will give me strength to speak of the sad misfortune of my family, even to you. But can you not save my feelings, by surmising what I mean? Have you never learned any thing remarkable about my ancestors? Have you never, Lewis,"—and she fixed her large eloquent eyes on him as she spoke,—"observed any thing peculiar about my uncle or me?"

"No, Rebecca; I have heard nothing; I have observed nothing."

"Alas! that I should have to undergo this additional trial," she added, mournfully: "then know, Lewis, that—bring your ear to my lips, while I speak the dreadful words—there is madness in my family!"

"Yes, now you must hear all! I am doomed by the blood that runs in my veins to be yet a raving maniac!—nay, start not, for it has been the fate of almost all those, my ancestors, whose pale faces now look sadly upon us by the dim light of this single taper, and several of whom passed years in that state, the most humbling that Heaven permits to afflict poor humanity, in that very closet within the recess, where also my poor father died in the melancholy insensibility of total derangement! Now, Lewis," she added, standing up, and looking down upon him with despairing energy, "what do you think of your poor Rebecca now? If ever, then, or whenever that heavy hour arrives, surely you will come and try to soothe me in my sorrow, without despising me; but yours I can never be in this world. Now, farewell! the bitter words are spoken, and I am relieved."

For a few moments, the minister sat and gazed upon her, unable to speak.

"This is a sad tale, Rebecca," he at length said; "but yet you may in some degree be deceiving yourself. No, it cannot be! your sensibility perverts your reason. Believe me," he said, starting up, "this is nothing but delusion, and you are yet to be mine."

"Lewis!" she exclaimed, "do not terrify me, by the mention of a supposition, the fulfilment of which might entail upon me and yourself incalculable sorrow and guilt. Listen! remember you the dreadful penalty of the Roman law for such an impious act as you now dare to hint at? Ah! well may you start at the thought. And, how could you bear to think of my doing as my grandmother did, many years ago? Observe! see you this portrait of that dark-eyed lady? how pale she looks, and yet how benign! What a sheeted effect that plain white drapery has, in contrast with these black glossy curls that wave over it! Alas! how can I look at her—my unfortunate ancestress! You are still incredulous. Come hither, and I will convince you," she added, opening the shutters of a long Gothic window which overlooked the woody height at the rear of the mansion: "see you that," she went on, pointing to a small sheet of water, spread out on the height, upon the bosom of which the moonbeams now shone brightly, and from the further end of which fell into a chasm below, the cascade that formed the source of Lawford streamlet.

"Is it not a beautiful spot, quiet and lovely? and yet it is never visited nor mentioned by any of us, from the sad associations connected with it! it is only seen well from this room and the closet within, and has always been called the Lady's Linn, from the time that that unfortunate lady threw herself into it one day, when the evil spirit of our house was upon her, and parted with her suffering maniac existence at the cold bottom of that ominous lake."

"You shudder with horror, Lewis," she went on, after a pause, "and well you may, though far less than I ought, at past misfortune and future doom. But this is not all, and you do not believe still, although I have my own father to instance. Ah! my poor, sad, unhappy father—I think I see him this moment, as he placed his cold hand on my head, in that very closet beyond the little door, and said that I was fated to be yet—hark! did you not hear some one within. Heavens! who is this coming upon us here? Look, Lewis, the door opens! Can this be my dear father again?" and she fell on her knees before the figure which now entered from the closet, wrapped in night clothes, bearing a light, and looking angrily upon them both, as they stood in astonished confusion.—"What means this?" said the intruder. "How are you in this room, Rebecca? and what do you here again, sir?" he added, addressing Mr. Bannatyne: while both, having recovered their momentary terror, now recognised the voice of Mr. Prior, who, having heard a noise, had followed it to this deserted apartment.

"It was from my earnest entreaty, sir," said the minister, stepping forward, "that Miss Prior consented to this meeting."

"And in this room, Rebecca? was there no place but this for your midnight assignation?"

"Mine is the fault only, sir; and be mine the punishment, if there is to be any," said Bannatyne, warmly.

"Do you interrupt me, sir?" said the aroused gentleman, with a very unusual expression. "Ha! I see how it is. It will be necessary for you, young man, to discontinue your visits at this house."

"That may be, sir," said Mr. Bannatyne, with dignity; "I must request, however, that you draw no unfavourable conclusion respecting your niece, at least, from what you now witness. Only be considerate towards her, sir, and I obey you from this moment;" and he ended by taking two or three strides across the apartment.

A change now came suddenly over the face of the old man, as he stood looking at both of the young persons,—the countenance of Rebecca wearing an expression of inward agony; and, stepping forward hastily, he caught the clergyman by the arm.

"Nay, Mr. Bannatyne," he said, much moved, "you will not go from my house in anger, if you are here for the last time. The wrath of Heaven, that has pursued my family until the tenth generation, is enough for me and my poor solitary niece to bear. Forgive me, my friend. I might have known that it would have come to this, and am myself to blame; but if we must lose even your society for ever, take a kind farewell of my poor Rebecca. There is my hand, too! We have spent many happy evenings together; but I see no happiness remains for our doomed house, on this side of our final resting-place. Heaven bless you, sir, and preserve to you the happiness that must never be ours!" and, laying his hand on the arm of Lewis, and looking sadly in his face as he pronounced this benediction, he then lifted up his taper, and turned to leave the room.

"Sir, this is evident delusion!" said Lewis, detaining the uncle in his turn, "a mutual, a fatal, deception of yourselves. It is but the melancholy fantasy of voluntary misery that is destroying the happiness of this worthy family, and is now tearing asunder warm hearts, that are already knit indissolubly. It is parting for ever this dear lady and me, not as even the grave parts friends and lovers, but making a separation which must be a living death. You shake your head at what I say—you still look round at these solemn faces on the canvass, and forth from the window on that cold moonlit lake. Great Heaven above! keep us all from the frightful delusions of insanity!"

Clasping their hands, as their young friend spoke these words, the old man and Rebecca threw a look upwards, as if they would have penetrated to heaven, and the ardent Amen! that rose from the bottom of their hearts, seemed to be echoed back like the whisper of the dead, from the pale figures that looked down from the walls around them. The old gentleman, now catching hold of the minister's hand, wrung it with a meaning look in solemn silence, then turning away, departed slowly through the small door of the adjoining closet.

We may not dwell upon the ultimate parting of Lewis and Rebecca—reason is great against the weakness of passion, and the virtuous heart suffereth many trials.

CHAPTER V.

It is not every day that one meets with any thing that interests them: for the world is a dull world, and the heart a barren thing; and it is seldom that even the pains of life are of sufficient dignity to excite a moral reflection.

But I was excited, and my heart was interested about the singular situation of the Priors and their visitor; for one pang or throb of deep-seated feeling—one genuine manifestation of the noble self-denials of resolute virtue, does more to reconcile us to our "low-thoughted" species, than the thousand varieties of selfishness and stupidity.

And so I kept the matter of those young persons much in my mind, and thought over all that they might have thought, and fancied in my sympathy what they might have felt; and, as soon as the summer came round again,

I determined to wander towards their part of the country. Away then I set in the early part of the year, and I thought to get to Hillington by the end of the week; in, although I am no great saint, (as the world had better know,) I hate your Sunday stragglers and busy idlers, who cannot enjoy the solace of religion and of rest. But the week's journey was long, and the weather was busy; and, being unusually fatigued on the road, by the time Saturday night came, I was fain to take up my quarters at a very indifferent inn, with a great flashy sign, about four miles from Hillington.

Having rested my weary limbs there for the night, I rose, refreshed in body and pious in spirit, on the dull Sunday morning, proposing to walk forward, and be in Hillington in time for the kirk service: but, whether it was carnal laziness, which is apt to come over me on that particular time of uprising, or whether it was the solacing sweetness of the road that made me muse and dawdle on the way, I know not; but it was long after the congregation had collected in the old building, and somewhat towards the latter end of the service, that I found myself within the precincts of the town, and pondering my way through the sweet and solemn old churchyard.

This morning was exceedingly different from the pleasant evening when I had first entered the town. It was drizzling rain, and heavily dull. The sun waded sulkily through the thick vapours; dark clouds of streaming mist lingered in the valleys as I came along; and by the time I got into the churchyard of Hillington, feeling ashamed of entering the kirk at this late hour, I sat down on a tombstone, languid and sad. The people who were singing a psalm; and the old melody, which came over my ear in the distance, was so quaintly plaintive, and was drawn out, as I thought, with such melting simplicity, that it seemed to me like a requiem for the obscure dead who lay in the graveyard around me. In that, in my present mood, it almost melted me into tears.

I rose, however, and entered the kirk, in order still to catch a remnant of the pious inspiration of the morning worship, and haply to make such observations as, in the long interval which had elapsed since my last visit, should now occur to me. After I had slipped myself stealthily into a back pew, as became a late intruder upon the sanctity of the service, the very first look I got of the face of the young minister showed me that something was wrong with him, and had taken effect upon his mind,—that something had happened in my absence, to damp the glow of his natural enthusiasm, and to cloud his spirit with serious melancholy. I was still more convinced of this, from the strain of the prayer which he was now offering up to Him "who seeth not a man seeth, and who trieth the hearts and the reins of the children of men." It was not yet two years since I had been at his placing,—and yet a change had evidently come over his character: for the very tones of his voice were quite altered. Even his congregation, as was natural from the affection they bore him, had been infected by his spirit, and, musing upon the deep reasonings and sad inferences which the state of his mind led him to draw from what he observed in the world, his people went and came, every seventh day, to their solemn old church, with a pervading and inexplicable gloom.

After some time, I had a glance also at the face of Miss Prior, to whom my attention had from the first been directed; but the look I obtained of her was with some difficulty; for, though there she sat, beside her grave and reflective uncle, in the family pew, under the moth-eaten scutcheon, as on my first seeing her; she did not now, as before, look once with admiration in the minister's face, but sat during the whole time in our position; her face shaded with her hand, and her large dark eyes, when I could get a sight of them, presenting the same striking expression which they had ever borne, but contrasting strongly with the paleness of her face, as if profoundly steeped in melancholy.

When the service was over, I was obliged to go home with the laird of Glauderston, who had noticed me in the church, considerably against my own inclination: for I would much rather have taken up my quarters with the blithe landlady of the inn, where I should undoubtedly have learned something regarding those whose history now interested me. Being at this time ignorant of what had taken place to Mr. Bannatyne, I tried to get something out of the laird and his family; but I might as well have consulted the clumsy poets which, under the name of pillars, upheld the dignity of the front entrance to his house: for the laird was one of the worthy people, of which three fourths of the world are composed, who can tell you readily where the most advantageous things are to be got to eat and to wear, and how this may made money, and the other man lost it, but never took the least notice of any thing of higher import, or which might be of interest to a wandering observer like myself. All I could learn from him was, that the new minister had considerably disappointed many good men in the parish; that he had not used him or his daughter altogether well, but had gone about a strange reserved family, who lived at a place called Lawford, until there had been some falling-out among them; for that now he seldom was seen to go there, and yet was still unmarried, and was, in short, a man that few could understand.

Next day, when about to walk down into the village, I learned, by mere accident, that the good and sensible senior pastor of the parish, Mr. Kinloch, was now confined to bed, and had for some time been thought to be dying. This news was impressive to me, from the opinion I had formed of his judgment and information, on my first meeting him in this very house; and, in short, I was greatly minded to step over to the manse, and see the old man; both from the respect I felt for him, and because I had a curiosity to know what he would say regarding the present state of mind and character of Mr. Bannatyne, his successor. The thought was no sooner a matter of musing in my mind, than the knock of a stranger was heard at the laird's door.

This circumstance giving me an excuse for leaving Glaenderston House, I immediately departed to visit, by his couch, the dying old minister. I mounted the creaking stairs to the chamber of the sick, and sat myself down by his bed side. "How sad a thing is death!" I thought; "how pathetic to look upon and talk to a living being, who is so soon to be 'for ever hid from our eyes!'"

"Your visit, my friend," said he, "is a refreshment to me. Sit down by me, and let us commune together. If I am not mistaken, you witnessed the placing of Mr. Bannatyne, my successor."

"I did," said I; "and great is my concern respecting him. To say the truth, many a weary foot I have travelled, and many a hill I have climbed, in this upland neighbourhood, until I was breathless, for little other earthly end but to hear, from time to time, how he lived, and what was his history, and that of the strange family of Lawford, in the hollow."

"I wish I could see him now," said the dying man, solemnly: "I feel that my time is not to be long; and I have much to say to him before I depart. I fear me that his mind is unsettled. Oh, that I could see him while I have strength!"

The old man had not the words well out of his mouth, when the servant announced that Mr. Bannatyne wished to be admitted.

I thought that this was a providential opportunity for me, and waited anxiously to hear and see what might pass on so serious an occasion. In another minute Mr. Bannatyne was bending over the bed of the dying man.

I was affected upon observing the evident change in his appearance. The thoughtfulness of five and forty was already on his brow, though twenty years had yet to run their course before he should have arrived at that age. I saw that a death-bed advice was going to be delivered to him; and my ears were open to its solemn import. After a few preliminary sentences, the dying man, settling himself up in bed, thus spoke:

"It has been matter of satisfaction and thankfulness to me, Mr. Bannatyne," he said, "that Providence has been pleased to appoint over my beloved people of this parish, to succeed me as their pastor, one possessing the mental qualities and endowments of which you are well entitled to boast. I confess it would have caused serious reflections at such a time as this, and might have deeply embittered my dying day, had I had to leave my simple yet intelligent people in the charge of any of those raw youths, who, springing up from among the lower orders, are yearly issuing from our cheap universities, and who, placed in the important position of religious and moral instructors, by the simple forms of our Genevan church,—under circumstances very frequently when they are below the level of the generality of the people, in all that constitutes valuable applicable acquirement,—serve so effectually to perpetuate prejudices, of which the age is justly ashamed, and cruelly to hinder the natural struggles towards improvement of a great portion of our intellectual countrymen.

"It is not for me, however, at a time of this kind, to expatiate upon so well known a disadvantage which attaches to our popular presbyterian ecclesias, and our pious nation; further than as a ground for congratulation to myself and my people, that I am leaving over them (you cannot suspect me of flattery at this hour) a man of capacity, who, with the education suitable for his office, is possessed of the general knowledge and intellectual advancement which form the characteristics of a gentleman; and who, while he builds up his people in their holy faith, will deal out to them, from time to time, rational principles to provoke and to assist their own thinking, upon subjects suitable for them; and who knows how, by making them wiser, to make them better men.

"Yet a few things I would take leave to say to you, Mr. Bannatyne, as I am about to be taken from you, which, whether, with your good sense, you may need them, or not, may not be thought impertinent from me, as the result of some experience, both as a minister of religion, and an observer of the world. Some of these things you may think somewhat common-place; in truth, I think them so myself: yet the daily disregard of them shows that they are either less understood than you and I would suppose, or that their importance is not admitted until after the usual disappointments of experience, and the incurring, and propagation, perhaps, of much real evil.

"The most common error of young men of some natural assurance and readiness of speech, and whose necessary isolation from the world, and set-up position, as religious teachers, is so apt to give them a false opinion of themselves, is the vulgar ambition to become popular preachers, and so to get the empty portion of the world, for a brief period, to run after and admire them. I need scarcely tell you that the low artifices and feverish strivings of this sort of ambition are far beneath a man of real talent or true worth; and that it holds with preachers of the gospel, as with other men who address the public, that the quiet approbation and hearty respect, as well as steady friendship, of one man of sound intelligence and worth, is to be prized above all the unstable shoutings of the giddy multitude. Besides, no man will ever gain extensive popularity, at least he will never retain it, upon so debateable a subject as religion, by sincerely speaking the truth. He must study the character and flatter the prejudices of the itching-eared portion of his people, exaggerate what they delight to hear exaggerated, cloak or suppress what is likely to offend, and, in short, become a pander to the eternal errors and hypocrisies of the vulgar.

"What is the usual end of all this? That, after the feverish excitements and ungodly triumph of his brief day shall have passed away, and the inflated fool has scared away from his acquaintance every wise man and estimable friend, he dwindles down and sinks into unwelcome isolation, harassed with vain endeavours to please the low-minded and the vacillating, whom he first condescended to flatter, but who now, tired of his bombast, begin to suspect his motives, and traduce his name; and it will be well if the whole does not terminate in the bitter inveighings of disappointed vanity, and the impotent complainings of merited neglect.

"With respect to the character of your instruction to a mixed people, I cannot suppose that any aberration into a weak enthusiasm for particular theological views, which are ever varying with the fashion of the age, or the narrow conceit of individuals; or any mistaken attempt to propitiate a clamorous party, will ever lead you into the common error of the more ignorant of our cloth, of worrying your people constantly with puzzling reasonings upon mere doctrine, and ringing constant changes upon such words as 'faith' and 'grace,' or at least upon what may be contained in one or two simple propositions. This wretched system, which frightens from our churches so many of the best informed and most valuable men in society, and which makes religion itself so often treated with sneering and contempt, is in general resorted to from mere paucity of intellect and information, by those who find it much easier to fill up their tasked hour with the unintelligible rubbish of cant and quotation, than with those applicable views of human life, scripture and duty, which require in the preacher some thinking and observation, and his failure in which shows too glaringly his real ignorance and incapacity.

"Believe me, sir, this is a most serious evil, both as respects religion and morality, and has the most extensive effects even upon our national character. Do you not observe, by comparing one place with another, and our own nation with others under a different system; that it is this priestcraft-jangling of words and names; this early and incessant bafflement of the intellect, with doctrinal mystification, while the practical self-denials of a truly religious spirit, the great subjects of justice and mercy, honour and honesty, between man and man, under the names of virtue and morality, are neglected, or even sneered at, as ethical and heathenish; and thus, by the habitual setting up of doctrine and dogma, above, or even in opposition to, what is tangible and practical in conduct systematically forms the character of our charged national hypocrisy?

"I need not further show you that all this arises from the great preponderance, in Scotland, of the lower order of mind, in that important matter, public instruction; for the very literature in our book-shops, and which is devoured in such quantity by the class that have public influence, would alone prove it. I sincerely rejoice, however, that you will be one among the few loftier intellects, who will fairly devote yourself to the noble task of restoring the natural union between a modest piety and that enlightened sense of obedience and of duty, that is at all times more apt to do, than to teach—to make men less ready to babble and to argue, than to show their faith by their works. Thus religion, instead of being an uneasiness and almost a horror, as it is frequently taught, you, by interweaving it with those practical views of social life, feeling, and experience, which its genuine operation makes so truly interesting, will show it as designed to be, not only the corrector of the vices and waywardness of the human heart, but the consolation and the staff demanded by the weakness of humanity. Consider, sir, in this respect, the deep importance of your office, and how much good you may do among your people, by giving them a key to the understanding of their own characters, by detecting and exposing to them the intricacies of unchristian selfishness, as well as the delusions of blinded self-love; so that, teaching them habitually to attend to their own motives, in connection with duty, some rational foundation may be laid for true Christian benevolence.

"One word more, I must say, with more particular reference to yourself. I learn, with regret, that your sermons have of late assumed more of a tone of melancholy than is strictly consistent either with your known good sense or your time of life. This I sincerely regret, because to me it is an evidence of some internal suffering on your part, with the cause of which it does not become me to intermeddle. But, permit me to say, that, although it is very natural for any public instructor to mix his own present feelings with what he delivers to others, any peculiarly gloomy view of human life is unphilosophical and injurious. It is unphilosophical, because, whatever may be the present sorrows of individuals, such a view of things does not agree with common opinion and experience; for I need not remind you that human life is neither a state of entire happiness, nor the contrary, but is as the mind happens to view it; and the views of the mind on this subject are with many in a state of much oscillation, although generally on the side of cheerfulness and comfort. What I allude to is often exceedingly injurious, especially in this end of the island,—for the Scots are a people predisposed to gloom; and the cruel and vulgar system of exaggerating the terrors of death and judgment, and even drawing terrifying pictures of future horrors, is never practised by men of sense, but by popularity-hunting fools, to catch the applause of the vulgar.

"Mr. Bannatyne," added the old minister, seriously, after a long breath, "I must say, further, that I could wish much to live still to see you married. A minister of the gospel should not be long without a companion in his home, that he may not be subject to the distractions of passion, or those wanderings of the heart, that belong to the solitude of the virtuous bachelor. But forgive my freedom; it is dictated only by anxiety for your usefulness and happiness.

"Finally, my friend," he continued, after another pause, "never let your aims, in any respect, descend, tempted either by the clamorous applause of the base, or scared by the vituperation of the ignorant, which few of the wise can at all times escape. Seek constantly the approbation of the highest and the best, along with the approval of your own mind, and a sense of divine favour.

"Forgive, and yet think of, this long advice. I feel myself growing weak, and see, in the filmy dimness of earthly organs, that death is drawing fast near. Give me your hands, my friends;—nay, look not so sad, for my hope is good, and I am well content.

"Heaven bless you! Heaven make you happy!"

Why should I dwell upon the death of the righteous? I saw and was conscious that the living had laid it to heart!

CHAPTER VI.

It was some time after this my second arrival in Hillington, and even after the Rev. Mr. Kinloch was laid in the grave, ere I was able to come to such authentic particulars regarding the young minister, and the much talked of Rebecca Prior, as satisfied the craving curiosity which has been raised in me concerning them.

I found that after the shock had somewhat passed off, which Mr. Bannatyne's mind had received by the disclosures at that painful scene, sketched two chapters back; and he was able to think calmly, and to endeavour at some degree of resignation, that he had again ventured down towards Lawford House; and though his announcement had a startling and almost terrifying effect upon the solitary Rebecca, both herself and her uncle felt a relief from his visit.

"I am come yet again to see you, sir," said Lewis, as the old gentleman kindly offered him his hand, "if you will receive me, at least once more, as a well-wishing friend and your minister; for, to say truth, I feel that I cannot all at once wean myself from society in which I have enjoyed so many happy hours."

"Mr. Bannatyne, you are welcome!" was all that Mr. Prior said; and he spoke the words emphatically, and with some emotion, as he shook the young clergyman by the hand. He then stood still, and gazed involuntarily as the latter turned to address Rebecca, as one does upon an experiment, of the result of which he is anxiously uncertain.

That meeting between the two was certainly sad and embarrassing; for, in spite of the trembling pleasure that was after all experienced by both, on finding themselves again in presence of each other, the sense of humiliation, and something like dread, on the part of Rebecca, was so acute during the whole time they were together, and stifled feelings so mingled with compassion in the breast of the minister, that a few guarded sentences was all that either would venture to utter. This proceeding had, however, by no means a deceiving effect; it was but like the rainy haze, that excluding from view the April sun, serves, instead of concealing, to add the charms of awakened fancy to the pure brightness and warmth which glows in the heavens; and which, though it cannot be seen through the streaming obscurity, is felt and known to be burning behind it. In this spirit Lewis sat with her for a brief space of time; and, after exchanging a few enquiries and observations, chiefly with her uncle, he rose to take his leave.

"It will be a happiness for us to see you at Lawford still, sometimes," said Mr. Prior, looking with solemn meaning in his face, "as you seem to understand the footing upon which even our minister must be received into this solitary mansion."

Mr. Bannatyne bowed respectfully, as he pressed the old gentleman's hand, but made no reply. He then turned to Rebecca, and took her trembling fingers, while the uncle walked to the window, that he might not seem to observe them.

"I could wish you to come again to us, Lewis," said Rebecca, in the half-whisper of suppressed feeling. "Come sometimes still—as my uncle's friend and mine. The pale tenants of the cloisters themselves in former ages, who, like me, had no hopes but towards another world, might, at times, as we read, be permitted a distant correspondence with those on whom their thoughts had once dared to dwell—those, at least, who ministered in the service of Heaven. But, may I beg—"

She withdrew her hand hastily, without finishing the sentence, as if the touch of his fingers, and her increasing emotion, had suddenly alarmed her; and, turning upon him a melancholy glance, as formerly, the two, without further speech, sadly separated.

These visits were repeated at intervals of some distance, and became again, to both, a sort of dubious and dull consolation; for it was long before they could get accustomed to each other's society; he obliged to view her in this new and melancholy light, and she with the consciousness that he, on whom her thoughts involuntarily dwelt, must think of her only in association with the most humiliating calamity that can afflict humanity. Yet did not mutual admiration at all abate, but seemed rather to increase, with increasing experience of each other's disinterested resignation. But then as the smothered flame of affection burned purer, and more intensely, a kind look, or a tender word, would often kindle feelings which were almost too trying for mere humanity.

A laborious attention to the duties of his ministry became now more than ever the consolation and the refuge of the unfortunate Bannatyne; and the solemn last words of his sage predecessor seemed yet to sound in his ears like the voice of inspiration. His people, and particularly his wealthier parishioners, while they held him in veneration, beyond what his years demanded, yet looked upon him almost with something like wonder. He now lived so secluded and companionless, a bachelor still, in the large empty manse, of which he had taken possession on the death of Mr. Kinloch; and his deportment was so serious, yet his address was so mild; he was so reserved, except upon matters of duty; and his comings and goings to and from the solitary hollow of Lawford seemed accompanied with such sadness, if not mystery, that, even while he was revered as the best of men, he was looked upon with a species of undefined sympathy.

Meantime, his acquaintance with Rebecca became more affectionately unreserved, as time and intercourse strengthened their own minds and increased their mutual confidence. Endeavouring to regard each other as brother and sister, their tenderness was unspeakable; and even the good and venerable Mr. Prior himself seemed to delight in witnessing their more than earthly affection. But though they were all in all to each other, even in this strange situation of consented celibacy, anxiety and dread regarding what might happen hereafter would often throw a damp over their warmest feelings, that still contended against the constant restraints of their watchfulness over themselves.

The peculiar predicament of these two interesting persons began now to be partly surmised by the people of the neighborhood, and the very rustics, who lived among the hills above, as well as the villagers of Hillington near, would watch them curiously as they were occasionally seen together; for the prying whisper of rustic interest, as well as of sympathetic feeling and respect, had prepared every one who passed them, for some understanding of their strange situation. It was thought melancholy to see two persons, so young and so formed for happiness and for each other, walking distantly together as the tenderest and the most constant of friends, yet relatively so placed;—as they went on heartlessly towards the village, on occasion, the grave uncle of Rebecca stepping on in solemn taciturnity by their side; or as they might sometimes be observed from the high road above the hollow, on any quiet lowering evening, "in the gloaming," with looks of disappointed yet resigned affection, taking their lingering stroll by themselves, on the low level sod by the black rippling streamlet of Lawford.

"Surely, Rebecca," he said to her, one evening, as they wandered together, "surely it is at least possible you may be deceiving yourself regarding this dread malady of your family, and that you may be thinking of it too seriously? Nay, pray do not stop me this once, for it is seldom we have such an opportunity of conversing unwittingly; and we are sufficiently intimate now, methinks, to reason this subject with calmness."

"Believe me, Lewis," she replied, earnestly, "you will find that it would be much safer for us both to avoid a subject of such painful delicacy: I could wish that you had not even now hinted at it. But think you I could have decided upon treating you as I did, from your first coming to Lawford—that I could afterwards have strung up my resolution to drive you from our house, by making a disclosure that was to be the means of separating us for ever? Think you that I could have determined upon degrading myself in your eyes, and giving up all that is dear to a woman's heart, and that I could have lived so long this sad life, to end but with the grave, having neither present joy nor future hope, without having passed many an hour of heavy reflection, upon all that I know of the past, and all that I dare not think of in the future; or without a sore struggle with the feelings of nature? It is better, my friend, much better, for us never again to speak upon this subject."

"And yet, Rebecca," he replied, in the subdued tone of sadness which was now become habitual to him, "as I walk for hours together in my solitary apartment in Hillington Manse, pondering on the sad circumstances of our peculiar fate, I sometimes think that we may be all this while deceiving ourselves by imaginary terrors, and that the time may come when we may conclude that we have been needlessly suffering under a scaring delusion. When I reflect, Rebecca, on the superiority of your mind, as daily evinced in the delightful conversations we have enjoyed together, I cannot think that such a heart and such an intellect should ever become wrecked under so awful a visitation. Pray allow me to go on: my thoughts are awakened by my own experience of you. No, Rebecca, I will not continue to believe that such a fate can ever be in reserve for so gifted a mind as I have found yours to be."

"My dear and valued friend," she said, her voice trembling from her feelings, "do not, by your persuasion, try to unsettle my thoughts. Would you have me to confess to you, with an unguarded tongue, what mine own heart feels when you are absent from me, and when the leaden spirit of solitude and seclusion comes with dead oppression over my sinking heart? Would you have me, Lewis, to speak of a woman's feelings, whose own bosom is unable to carry her bursting affections?"

"I pray you calm this emotion, Rebecca, and let us still discuss this matter, painful though it be. My mind misgives me upon the subject of your apprehensions, from every day's observation; and I may not lightly encourage you in a fancy so exceedingly serious, if it bean the slightest appearance of delusion."

"And think you, Lewis," she continued, "that, during the long progress of this sore trial, I have not meditated upon the melancholy cases of my ancestors, for ten generations bygone, and reasoned upon every view of the painful subject, until my heart became faint with the intensity of my own reflections; and yet I could see no way of escape from the sacrifice required of me; but by a weak reliance upon a bare possibility, or a wilful delusion from that principle, by which, in the strength of Heaven, I trust I shall always be guided. But I am the last, and I shall be the last, of an unhappy race! alas! unhappy, indeed!" she repeated, her voice sinking again into its former tone of reflective pathos; "for the amiable and the virtuous have become involved, through me, in the meshes of our private calamity. Forgive me, Lewis: I know that it has been my fate to be the destroyer even of your peace; I am aware that you will hereafter say, it had been happy for us had we never met. Had that been the case, I might have borne my private regrets with comparative resignation."

"Rebecca, you may be bearing griefs which Heaven has not laid upon you. I would, and will, bear with you myself—bear with you, and share with you whatever sorrows it may please Providence to cause you to feel, in reality and in truth—but this sad anticipation of this prospective grief, is, forgive me, Rebecca, it is making you to the grave."

"Oh, my friend, do not insist upon this fancy! you are wandering from the point about which I would speak to you. I know my own situation: I am resigned to my fate—a fate which, sooner or later, is as sure to be mine, as it has been of my ancestors—but you, your path of duty is different. It is now fit, Lewis, that you should, from henceforth, consider me as I am, and as I am to be; and seek for yourself another destiny."

"What strange language is this, Rebecca?"

"It is proper language, Lewis; these are the words of truth and soberness. Listen to me: why should we be miserable when the hand of Heaven is laid only upon one? Why will you voluntarily extend the afflictions of Providence farther than God himself has designed them to extend? Nay, patience, sir, and I will explain. Since you and I can never be united, oh, my friend! let your thoughts of tenderness be turned to some other object; consider your duty to yourself, to God whom you owe, to the people of whom you have taken the oversight. Lewis, do not look so, but think of this—think of it for my sake; and were you—were you once united to one who might be worthy of you, should the unhappy malady of my family at any time overtake me, and my weak reason give way under the decree of Heaven, I might receive from you, as my minister, the comfort and consolations of the gospel of peace. Will you not speak?"

"Rebecca! do I really hear aright? am I to remove this torture from you?"

"I beseech you, my friend, to think seriously of what I say. Do not suffer yourself to be thus unhappy in your youth, because I am unfortunate: I appeal to yourself, to your sense of duty, and your opportunities of usefulness—I appeal to the religion that you teach, and the God whom you have undertaken to serve. I charge you, in the name of the souls of which you have taken the charge, and for whom you must give an account at the day of judgment."

"Rebecca, for mercy's sake, do not speak thus. Can you expect the heart to tear itself asunder by its own act? Think you that even Heaven expects what is inconsistent with the weakness of human nature? Rebecca, my dear Rebecca! promise me not to speak of this subject again."

"I will, Lewis, I will speak of it!" she exclaimed, drying the tears that rained down her cheeks: "I am convinced it is the straight path of duty for us both; and obedience to duty always brings calm to the mind. Think—think of this."

This unexpected proposition—this noble disinterestedness—this sacrifice of self beyond human capability deeply affected his elevated mind.

A passionate reply was on the minister's tongue, when the approach of Mr. Prior put an end to this scene of agitated excitement.

CHAPTER VII.

Another long winter had about this time passed over, and again I crept out from my wearisome solitude of Balgownie Brae; for the weather was becoming soft and mild, the green herbage of the field was sprouting lively up from the holms of Clydesdale—the spring sun had entirely melted the snow which had so long rested on the bald summit of Benlomond, and now glistened pleasantly at e'en o'er the fells of Strathblane; for the last blasts of Yule were forgotten in the valleys, and the time of the singing of birds was come.

It was pleasant to me to hear the rejoicings of nature, as, with my leathern wallet again on my shoulder, and my staff in my hand, I once more "took the road," and, humming to myself some pleasant madrigal as I went along, or chanting, like the singing birds around me, some cheerful and commendable chant, I wandered forth to see my old friends here and there in the world, and to gather up the gleanings of my former adventures.

But not being particularly hurried for time, I, as was my besetting fashion, so lingered about this place and the other; and had, in truth, so many hands to shake, and healths to drink, to this body, and the next body, on my way; that, in spite of my original intention, it was far towards summer before I passed the high-road that overlooked the green hollow of Lawford, and the foliage beyond interrupted my view, so that I was almost within the streets of the town, before I had a peep of the romantic old steeple of Hillington.

"Ye're welcome, sir," said the sonsie landlady of the inn, curtsying long before I drew near her door; "I'm glad to see you in Hillington again, so just step in here to the garden parlour, for I ken you like to hear the birds, and to look out at the bonny blue hills of Dunroch. Now, sir, just sit ye down in your ain leather chair, while I get the supper ready, for I hae mickle news to tell you about the gentles of this country."

I had hardly swallowed my broiled chicken, and three fourths of a sweet fresh trout that was set before me; and was just nibbling at a bit of crumpy oaten cake to give a gout to my cheese and my dram of brandy, when in came the landlady again, and bustled about me in the kindest manner, expecting that I would give her the pleasure of telling me all the circumjacent gossip which she had been hoarding for me ever since I had formerly left the neighbourhood. It suited my humour, however, by assuming at first a grave taciturnity, to coquet for a time with her evident incontinence of womanly clishmaclaver; but my nature was not so made for cruelty as to continue this long, so at length I allowed her to open upon me all that she had to say.

The first great event which she had to inform me of was, that the Laird of Glaunderston's red-haired daughter had actually got a husband at last, and was now fairly married and off; which was a great relief not only to the old man and all the family in Glaunderston house, but even, in one sense, to the whole village itself; "for," said my landlady, "I have been maid, wife, and widow myself for many years, and I know what it is perfectly weel; but I never heard such a moan and a lamentation for the want of a husband in the course of my life, as was made about the weary disappointments of Miss Nelly McGilvray of Glaunderston. But, thank God, she's married now, and that's a blessing."

The other part of the landlady's news was, that there had lately come to live in the neighbourhood a very extraordinary and kentspeckle gentleman, whose presence was likely to have more than common influence in certain quarters in the parish, and who, in short, had somehow been known to Mr. Prior of the holm; but, at all events, he had already, more than any of their neighbours, their minister alone excepted, got a footing among the secluded family at Lawford.

My landlady gave me a very strange account of this gentleman, such as made it difficult for me, for a considerable time, to judge what his real character actually was, and what were likely to be the effects of his increasing intercourse with persons so reserved in their habits, and generally so retired as both the Priors and their friend Mr. Bannatyne were well known to be. But what the worthy woman said of him amounted to this—that he was a long-headed and a travelled man; "for he had been," she said, "far abroad, at Scringapatam, and the Cove of Cork, and such like remarkable places—had seen the burning hills all the way in Mesopotamia, and elephants carrying castles on their backs over the great mountains of Amsterdam!"

Whether this gentleman had once been a voyager with Captain Cook, or travelled with the great Baron Munchausen himself, was not clearly determined; but certainly he must have seen a deal of killing and slaying abroad, for he talked of the taking off of heads, and the destruction of whole cities, with extraordinary coolness and complacency; and hardly less so of the unfortunate inmates of the various prisons and magdalens on the continent, which it had been also his fortune to visit in his time.

This was a sort of information, however, that it had often been my fortune to be obliged to unravel; and thus much I, at least for the present, was able to conclude;—that this Mr. or Dr. Heywood (for that was the name of the new resident) was no common person, at least for his information and his opinions. I gathered further, from the whole tone of the landlady's remarks, that his presence had a decidedly favourable effect upon the spirits of those for whom I felt so much interest.

Dr. Heywood, as I afterwards found, had actually practised as a physician abroad; but having, on his return, made choice of this hilly and romantic parish for air, had now retired to live in it upon the fortune which he had acquired. The family of the Priors was too conspicuous and remarkable for him to remain long unacquainted with whatever was known regarding their character and history; and, having procured first an introduction to the minister, he was soon enabled, through him, to form some acquaintance with a family about whom his curiosity, from what he had learned, had been strongly excited.

Hearing that the secluded family at Lawford had at length added this gentleman to the narrow circle of its acquaintance, I took some pains to ascertain his character; especially as a manifest influence over all became the result of his visits. I thought him at first too much of a theorising philosopher, who made his information subservient to those fancies which the very benevolence of his disposition had led him to indulge. Upon getting into some intimacy with him, I found, however, that he had only accustomed himself to reason too generally; to view human beings too much in masses; and to draw grand conclusions from the comparisons of surfaces and the computation of numbers. He seemed to me to think too highly of what frail man could do in shaping the intricate course of his destiny, and in guiding the helm of his own happiness. His mind, occupied with the sum total of conclusions, rested little on individuality, and was impatient of detail; so, though his information was undoubtedly great, and his purposes noble, he had seen so much of mankind, that he could hardly be said to see clearly a man.

The singular situation of the minister and Rebecca, which was now no secret in the neighbourhood, had so impressed Dr. Heywood, that the excessive delicacy of the one subject, and the evident shrinking from it of all concerned, could not hinder him from gradually approaching it. Mr. Prior was at first almost offended with his freedom; but as the doctor began by referring to the common opinions regarding different races and tribes of men, and gradually slid into observations upon the peculiarities which have been observed to run in families, until they assumed very decided characteristics, the old gentleman became interested, and, to the alarm of Rebecca, seemed even to encourage the discussion. Subsequently the doctor ventured to throw out some remarks upon the cases of several former members of the Prior family, which astonished the old gentleman, both from the acquaintance which the former showed with its history, and the use he made of the facts adduced. One of these facts was, that not every one, but only a majority, of Mr. Prior's ancestors had been afflicted with the fearful malady of his house; and that it never, except in two cases, had appeared throughout the female line.

The effect which the mention of some of these things, and of the hints that followed them, had upon Rebecca one evening, when, in presence of Mr. Bannatyne, the doctor proceeded to urge them, was such as instantly to put a stop to the conversation at that time. Lewis, however, and even Mr. Prior himself, began to awake as from a dream; and, though Rebecca remonstrated strongly with her uncle, against again disturbing her tranquil melancholy, by the discussion of a subject upon which she dared not think with the least hope, the very night following was appointed for talking it over with the anxious physician.

CHAPTER VIII.

There never was before seen, in the fruitful month of September, so peculiar a day as that which followed the one on which was made to Rebecca the unexpected communication recorded in the last chapter; for who would expect the gusty blasts of March, or the shining showers of April, in the teeming season of autumn, or to see the clouds and storms of dreary winter sweeping athwart green meadows, and shaking the trees in the woods of Lawford, while the birds of summer yet sang in the boughs, and the foliage had not yet taken the painter's tint, which renders it more interesting while prognosticating its speedy decay?

It had been the habit of Mr. Prior, in watching over the mental health of his beloved niece, whenever he saw her in any unusual state of spirits, to drive off to some distance, exploring all the cross-roads and long valleys within twenty miles, and lingering only where nature was most attractive, but seldom visiting the great towns, or mixing with any offered society. On the morning of this day, he observed that the equilibrium of her spirits was evidently disturbed. She confessed that she had rested ill through the night; for hope, in spite of all the efforts of her reason, had begun to intrude with flattering perhappes into her fancy, and her inward dread was, of allowing her thoughts to be further troubled by wishes and reasonings which might only end in adding bitterness to a fate to which she had thought herself quite reconciled. But the variegated scenery of a favourite part of the country, through which her considerate uncle judiciously brought her, together with his own cheerful conversation by the way, tended materially to refresh and settle her mind; and even the strange changeableness of the autumnal day, and the picturesque drifting of the occasional storm along the speckled plain spread out beneath her, had that grateful effect upon her excited thoughts, which the everlasting language of pure nature has ever had upon minds of great sensibility.

They had proceeded a considerable way by a route that was rather new to them, and were returning towards home as the day advanced, when, as they proceeded slowly down a narrow entangled lane, into which Mr. Prior, who prided himself upon his knowledge of localities, had led them, their conversation was interrupted by the coachman stopping short to inform them that the road on which they were was no thoroughfare, and terminated, as he could see, in a private property in front of them; that, in fact, they had lost their way; and that he could not even turn the carriage conveniently, without proceeding forward, and getting within the gate of this unknown demesne.

"We cannot possibly take such a liberty," said Mr. Prior, with his habitual reserve and delicacy.

"I dare not attempt to turn here, sir," said the man, "Know you the name of the property before us?" said Mr. Prior, looking out.

"I think it must be Bicknel Hill, sir," said the man "owned by Mr. Dryburgh, that is, Dryburgh of Bicknel."

"Surely I have heard that name," said Mr. Prior, repeating it. "Rebecca, my dear," he added, turning to his niece, "is not that the name of the person whom we heard had some time ago married the daughter of our neighbour McGilvray of Glaunderston?"

"It was some such name," she said: "but, for Heaven's sake, sir, do not let us go within a mile of such people. That horrid woman will be sure to fasten herself upon us in some way, if we enter within the gate."

"Let not that trouble you, Rebecca," said Mr. Prior, good-humouredly; "the lady's father and I are old neighbours. Drive on, John;"—and in five minutes after they were stopped by a small lodge, out of which issued an old grumbling man, who, with some difficulty, admitted them through the rickety gate into the old avenue of Bicknel Hill.

When within the gate, they found the ill-kept road so narrow, and the elm trees of the straight avenue so close, that it was impossible for them, with either decency or safety, to turn and go back, without proceeding to the very door of the old mansion; and this, of course, required Mr. Prior, in spite of the dread of Rebecca, to send his compliments to Mr. Dryburgh, of whom he had a slight knowledge, to apologise for his intrusion, and to enquire his way.

As they proceeded forward, however, both found their attention arrested by many objects around them, which they could not possibly have expected to find in any civilised country-gentleman's property. Such a tampering, by abused art, with graceful nature, appeared in every thing they saw, that the assemblage of inanimate objects, when taken together, assumed a positive expression; and, in spite of Mr. Prior's grave disposition, he could hardly forbear laughing aloud at the tout ensemble of the laird of Bicknel's house and property. The scene into which they had thus accidentally been introduced was certainly an unlooked-for diversion to both: such an olla podrida of whatever was useful and ornamental, natural and artificial, graceful and ridiculous, all hidden among the leafy luxury of nature, or staring out in the pedantic elaboration of art, as appeared in the grounds of Mr. Dryburgh, never, perhaps, was before seen. The place was all wild, and yet it was all garden, and park, and plantation: still it was neither; but a confusion of clumps, hedges, gates, grottoes, whale's jaw-bones joined like Gothic arches, wooden lions grinning at the gates, with black painted eyes and red mouths, shooting Cupids, and brawny figures that ladies dared not look at, summer seats and bowers such as never was before seen or invented. How the man could have got together such a collection of absurdities, in this inland quarter of Scotland, as encumbered and made ridiculous his unfortunate grounds, was perfectly astonishing; but, from the figure-head-like objects that were stuck on the ends of an old wall that flanked the garden, as well as the mast-like flagstuffs, and ropes, and twirling vanes, that shot up among the foliage at the end of the stables, the proprietor might have been taken for a retired port-admiral, while the judgment was again disconcerted by numbers of wooden men and women, standing in various attitudes, at the angles and entrances, reminding one of the painted Neptunes and shameless Venuses who adorn those delectable retreats of elegance, the tea-gardens of the metropolis.

Nor was the house itself, a tall, old-maidish form of a building much less laughable. It seemed perfectly riddled with small holes of windows, which seemed to grin down upon the beholder up and up to the very slates of the roof. And then, when the eye turned itself aloft so far, a crowd of long toppling chimneys appeared, bristling up into the very clouds, and filling the spectator with alarm lest every blast of wind, where wind was no rarity, should cause these ill-formed giants, who carried their heads so high, to precipitate themselves down, through the roof, upon the unfortunate tenants of this dangerous mansion.

But, as if the building were not already sufficiently ridiculous, the present laird, on the occasion of his marriage, had caused to be placed, in front of the door, two stumpy round pillars, of the composite order, and other absurdities, by way of a porch, which entirely darkened several of the small windows, and had united at the foot of each gable end two low hulking round houses of a different-coloured stone to the rest of the building, which he chose to call wings, but which, as the wings of Mercury were placed at his feet, seemed to have the same congruity with the tall figure above them.

The sight of these various outré objects was so amusing to Rebecca, as well as to her uncle, that it quite put her in a gay humour, and made her almost wish for, instead of dreading, a sight of the newly-married couple within, who owned so odd a wilderness of monstrosities.

Yet, when they arrived at the entrance, and she observed the bustle that their approach had created within, and Mrs. Dryburgh already planted at one of the port-hole windows, and afterwards at the entrance, she felt some of her former dread at the idea of the officious familiarity of such a horror.

"Bless me, Miss Prior, who could have thought to see you coming of your own accord to visit me and my husband, at Bicknel Hill!" exclaimed the lady, coming forth in person, and speaking from between the stumpy pillars of the porch: "really it is such an honour. But, to be sure, when one is married, they have a right to expect—"

"We are most happy to see you, madam," interrupted Mr. Prior, politely; "but, on this occasion, the visit is somewhat accidental, for, in truth, we had lost our way, when we found ourselves in the lane leading to your house, and, at this hour in the afternoon, must be contented with enquiring for your health, and the shortest way to Lawford, without doing ourselves the pleasure of alighting."

"It's not possible, Mr. Prior," said the lady, with true Scotch vulgarity of tone, "that ye're going away from my door in that manner, without coming in and wishing me weel, now when I am married. The laird, my husband, would tak it quite as an affront, sir, as weel as your old neighbour, my father, the laird of Glauderston, if he were to hear of such a thing; and look you," she added, holding out her hand, elegantly, to catch the rain drops, "there's another shower coming on. Ye must really come into my house, and see what like my gudeman is, Miss Prior. John! Jenny! Jamie!" she screamed to the staring servants, "what do you stand there glowing for? Run, this moment, an' seek the laird. Ye'll find him, nae doubt, on the Parnassus mount, up there beside the nine Mooses, putting up that long-legged image o' the blind 'Pollo'."

The servants scampered off different ways; and Mr. Prior, finding it vain to argue with the classical lady, who, as she said, would take no denial, now, as she was married, alighted with Rebecca, and, following their hostess into a small old-fashioned apartment, lighted with seven or eight holes called windows, were soon after gratified with a sight of the tasteful Mr. Dryburgh.

"This is my gudeman," said Lady Bicknel, introducing the classical laird, in the person of a rosy-cheeked, fair-haired, lively man, with a short neck, round shoulders, and arms that reached almost to his knees, and altogether as unclassically formed a being as ever offered to set up a graven image in honour of the ancients. The elegant admirer of Phidias and Praxiteles was economically dressed in fustian and corduroy; an orange-coloured cotton handkerchief, rolled like a bell-rope, served to fill up the space between his chin and his shoulders; leather leggings, bespattered with mud, encased his brawny limbs, and these were shod by a pair of enormous brogues, which increased the height of the wearer by at least an inch.

"Hoo are ye, Mr. Prior?" said the bluff laird, with a genuine Scottish bow; "and how do ye do, Miss Prior? dear me, mem, I never could get a sight of you, except it might be in Hillington kirk; an' ye're aye sae mim an' sae mute, that I little thought to hae seen you stepping across my floor-head at Bicknel Hill, although we are sic near neighbours, as my gudewife says."

"Deed, gudeman," said Lady Bicknel, "it's my fault entirely; for I should hae renewed acquaintance wi' Miss Prior: but really when folks get married, they have no time for any thing: but will ye not be seated, Miss Prior? Na, na, ye must stay and take a snack: here, John! Jenny! Geordie! what are ye standing there for? bring in the luncheon this moment. Ye'll excuse me, Miss Prior, ye see I'm a plain woman, an' we're a' plain country folks here at Bicknel Hill."

There is nothing that qualifies the manifold afflictions from country kindness, from persons that are in general a horreur, but the disarming consideration that it is well meant; and in this spirit did Mr. Prior and Rebecca suffer themselves to be set down upon long-backed chairs, having leathern seats, with a lunch placed before them, principally consisting of a large dish of coarse cold boiled beef, which would have served as a picnic for a dozen squires of the Caledonian Hunt; and the pressing solicitations to eat and drink, by the laird and lady within, seemed to be seconded by the noisy voice of the storm without, which, by this time, began to batter against the windows, and to whirl about among the lofty chimneys of the rocking mansion.

"Take another wing o' the pullet, Miss Rebecca," insisted the lady: "the storm frae the hills makes people hungry. Dear me, I declare ye're doing nothing!"

"What did you think of my grounds as you came along, Mr. Prior?" said the laird, after a most polite hob-nob with the old gentleman, which helped materially to clear his own mouth.

"You have certainly contrived to introduce considerable variety into them," said Mr. Prior, politely.

"But don't you think, sir," said the lady, striking in across the table, "that my gudeman there is rather too much given to graven images of heathen idolatry, whilk you may have seen sentinelled about the grounds up and down? I assure you, Mr. Prior,—since we married ladies may be allowed to speak among you learned gentlemen,—that it's a real calamity, that I cannot take a walk in my own policy, or turn a corner wi' safety, but up starts a great boughy fallow at the back of every bush; some Hector or Keelis, wi' hardly a tag to cover his nakedness, holding a great sword or spear threateningly o'er my head, as if he meant to fell me: it's a really dreadful."

"These are purely matters of taste, madam," answered Mr. Prior, hardly able to suppress laughter.

The rain being now over, the laird would not suffer Mr. Prior to depart without being shown more fully his grounds and gardens. Having, therefore, persuaded the old gentleman to accompany him without, Lady Bicknel and Rebecca were left together.

A momentary feeling of uneasiness came over the latter, when the gentlemen had departed; for which, however, she blamed herself, when she contrasted her own character with that of her hostess: still, in order to prevent any unpleasant allusions, she adroitly tried to engage her in conversation about the tasteful beauty of the grounds at Bicknel Hill.

But people like Rebecca are far less artful than they think themselves, when brought in contact with such as Mrs. Dryburgh, who had too much of the woman in her to suffer such an opportunity as this to pass, without the enjoyment of a little female triumph over her serious neighbour, in the good fortune of her own marriage. After a few passes of fencing talk, accompanied with a look of extraordinary sweetness and kindness, she thus began upon the sensitive Rebecca:—

"And hoo is your health noo, Miss Prior? I excuse me; but although my father, the laird of Glauderston, or my husband, the laird of Bicknel, cannot hold up their heads wi' the Priors o' Lawford, ye are neighbour and an auld acquaintance, Miss Rebecca. I've had a great concern for you; an', dear me, I thought that ye would have been married long ago; but there's nae signs o' that I can hear of. Dear me, Miss Prior, but ye're looking quite auld-like, an' I say; ye're surely no' in gude health—an' hoo is Mr. Bannatyne?"

"Mr. Bannatyne, madam?" said Rebecca, her face colouring at the other's hypocritical impertinence—"I don't understand you."

"Hoot, ye understand me weel enough, Miss Prior! an' ye'll just excuse my freedom, but ye ken I was a plain-spoken body, an' really I canna help speaking to you about the minister, for he does not do by me as I thought he would. Does he still come to see you and then?"

"I think, Mrs. Dryburgh, you might have more delicacy and good sense than to—" Rebecca could not proceed.

"It is nothing but concern for you, Miss Rebecca, makes me speak, so ye need not take it the least amiss," said the lady, looking with piteous kindness on the irritated girl; "an' really the minister appears to me just as—but I would not say a word ill of a minister; yet Mr. Bannatyne has so long—ye'll excuse me, Miss Prior, but I am a married woman now, and have a right to speak to young folks. Dear me, how ill you look!—but you had always a pale face—take half a glass o' wine."

"If you have any thing to say, Mrs. Dryburgh, let me hear it at once!"

"I see ye're flurried a little, Miss Prior," added the coarse woman maliciously, and enjoying her revenge on Rebecca for rivaling her successfully with the handsome minister of Hillington—"but, ye see, so many women ought to give advice to young inexperienced ladies; and really Mr. Bannatyne, although he was once a sort of joe of my own, is so long about this marriage—if he mean a marriage—that, if ye would take my advice, Miss Prior—"

"Mrs. Dryburgh," interrupted Rebecca, who strove to master her feelings, "I know not why you should make observations to me about Mr. Bannatyne; he visits Lawford as my uncle's friend and mine; and any advice regarding him, or his conduct, addressed to me, is unnecessary and inapplicable."

"Weel, that's very sensibly spoken, Miss Prior: sensible, as I am happy to perceive—an' certainly must ken better than I do; but, ye'll excuse me, the world is an observable world. Indeed, after the talk that has been talked about you and the minister—"

"What talk?—what is your meaning, Mrs. Dryburgh?"

"Why, ye ken, Miss Rebecca, people will speak: I have aye maintained, on your part, that although you forbears, the auld Priors o' Lawford—that is, your father and grandfather, and great grandfather, maybe, as I heard my ain father tell, fell rather into a decremented way, yet surely the minister—dear me, your face is grown like a sheet again—I hope ye're no gann to faint in my lap."

"Is there naeboddy there?" screamed the lady—"John! Jenny! Geordie!"

"I'm better—I'm better now: do not call any one!" urged Rebecca, recovering herself by an energetic effort—"it is only the consequence of my long ride. Now, Mrs. Dryburgh, say, in one word, what you mean by these hints."

"There now—I'm glad to see you come to yourself again," said Lady Bicknell, also recovering—"an' ye speak very sensibly—I aye said ye could talk as sensibly as I could; an' that that could never be the minister's reason for standing aff an' on in that strange sort of way—meaning, Miss Rebecca, by hints? Noo, ye need na be the least flurried; just put that mouthful of wine over—"

"Mrs. Dryburgh," said Rebecca, indignantly, and pushing away the offered wine, "this indelicate freedom with me and my family is what I cannot excuse."

"Odsake, Miss Prior, dinna speak sae sharply," said Lady Bicknell, astonished at Rebecca's scornful energy; "ye'll remember that I'm a married woman, and all I have to say is, that, if ye take my advice, ye'll just tell the minister yourself, plump an' plain, suppose he be a minister—that although, as the folk say, you may be rather—"

"Mrs. Dryburgh, what are you aiming at? It is not fit that I should listen to language like this!"—and, rising as she spoke, while her eyes flashed with scorn, she was proceeding to leave the room.

"Sit doon—just sit doon, Miss Rebecca—odsake but ye're proud an' pettish. I beg your pardon a hundred an' fifty times, although, being a married woman, ye might take my advice when it's all for your gude. But now set ye down, an' smooth your face, for there's your uncle and my gude-man coming back. Odsake, if the laird ken'd that I had wagged a tongue at ony o' the Prior family, I would never hear the last o't. Noo, just forgie me, an' let us be friends—ahem! What a fine afternoon it's turned out!"

As the good lady spoke the last sentence, Mr. Prior and the laird entered the room, to the great relief of Rebecca; and the old gentleman, seeing at a glance that something had been said to ruffle his niece, managed to get off; and in a few minutes they were again driving rapidly towards their own pleasant valley at Lawford.

CHAPTER IX.

The autumnal day, hitherto so variable, had, as has been said, brightened into unusual beauty, as Mr. Prior and Rebecca rode on towards their home. The richness on the landscape, of the afternoon tints, was heightened and enhanced by the shining freshness which the departed storm had left; and the clouds, having cleared away over the nearest range of hills, appeared rolled together in the far distance, and, mixing in contrasting masses with the partial lights shining on the blue summits of the mountains, gave a picturesque grandeur to the still stormy horizon.

As they were driven along, Mr. Prior, as usual, pointed out to Rebecca every peep of nature in sky and landscape that seemed grand or interesting; but he remarked, with concern, that the mind of his niece had been disturbed to a much greater degree than she would confess; for the wide range of "meadow green and mountain gray," now lying gay beneath them, had lost all charm for her, and every effort of his failed to arouse her from that tendency to abstraction, which experience had taught him to regard, in any of his family, with a sympathetic and apprehensive anxiety. The habitual delicacy, however, with which her good uncle had always treated her, prevented him, at this time, from touching upon the cause of her disquietude; and they arrived at home individually brooding in secret over the painful idea, that the world had rejected them as social beings, and already talked of them as ultimately doomed to the melancholy seclusion of mental alienation.

The expected visitors did not come to dinner: but this, so far from being a disappointment to Rebecca, seemed to be a relief to her; for she evidently looked with dread upon the further discussion of a subject with which she thought hope could never be associated. At length a carriage was heard to proceed down the avenue; but, by this time, Mr. Prior was left quite alone, for Rebecca had retired for some time, and, when the gentlemen arrived, was nowhere to be found. As it was on her account, chiefly, that the meeting had been appointed, Mr. Bannatyne, in particular, felt much disappointed at her absence, and at the evident gloom upon her uncle's countenance.

The servant who had been sent to request the attendance of Rebecca now returned to say, that she was neither in her room, nor any where else in the house. Mr. Prior felt strangely at this intelligence, and rose and walked hastily about the apartment. Doctor Heywood was disconcerted, and knew not what to think; Mr. Bannatyne rose also, walked to the window, and drawing the curtains aside, looked abroad upon the lawn, upon which the early moon was now shining dimly. A thought struck him as he gazed down the woody hollow of Lawford, and traced the sinuosities of the streamlet that here and there reflected the watery rays of the moon; and, taking his hat, he was soon in the lawn behind the mansion.

Some impulse led him to take the road towards the height beneath which was the dark chasm into which gushed the streamlet of Lawford, from the solitary pond above, called the Lady's Linn. Rebecca seemed always to have avoided this spot, and he had never been so near it before. The rain of the early part of the day had swollen the waters of the linn, which tumbled with a heavy and saddening sound into the rocky chasm below. Lewis was moved, and contemplated the place as the mysterious emblem of some hidden destruction. But this, he thought, must be fancy only, and the fancy oftener deludes poetical minds into imaginations of sorrow than of joy.

Leaving the falling waters boiling with a hollow sound beneath, Lewis mounted the height to see the linn; but, though the evening was delicious, and the idea of Rebecca had led him abroad, the hope had left him of finding her so far from home as this. He could not resist the impulse, however, of visiting the linn, now as it was so near. The trees that crowned the height were scattered and irregular, and the spot had altogether a neglected appearance; but its very wildness made it more picturesque to Lewis, when, emerging from among the bushes, the open expanse of this hidden lake, made light by the reflection of the moonbeams, now burst upon him.

The solitude of the place was perfect: even the hum of the falling waters below, deadened as it was upon the ear by the intervening thick trees that bordered the lake, seemed to deepen the idea of absolute seclusion; and the still small voice of nature alone was heard to echo through the woods around. Lewis was absorbed, as threading his way among the trees, he traced the green margin of the lake. He had forgotten every thing but some vague and melancholy associations with this holy place, when, as he proceeded musingly forward, he found himself suddenly grasped by the arm, and, looking round, after the start that such an encounter gave him, he perceived the pale features of Rebecca, her person wrapped in a mantle, and her dark eyes gazing on him with unusual animation.

"What seek you here, Lewis?" she said, quickly; "who taught you the way to the Lady's Linn?"

"Rebecca, this is strange," he replied: "why do I find you wandering on this ominous spot?"

"Do not be alarmed, my friend," she answered, calmly; "there is nothing remarkable in an outcast like me loving to brood, in solitude, over thoughts, particularly when my mind is disquieted by this coarse world, and my fancy wanders towards another state of being. But I am glad you are come—very glad it is you that have come to me at this moment!" and, as she earnestly spoke, she clasped closely his arm.

"Then come home with me, Rebecca," he said, kindly, and returning her pressure; "they wait for us at the mansion."

"Not yet, my friend, not yet: let us discourse here an instant. Tell me candidly—tell me, Lewis—did ever a thought come across you—a temptation—to—suicide? Nay, start not. 'Tis not so uncommon. Death, as such, may not be an evil. Life, we know, often is."

"How can you talk thus, Rebecca? Let us leave immediately this solitary place."

"Why should we fear to talk of any thing? See you that small stream that murmurs at the upper end of the linn, how it struggles and foams through obstructing and dividing rocks: how it leaps and bubbles and brawls in its short course; and how quiet it is when it reaches the depths of that placid linn, on the smooth bosom of which the clear moonbeams now sleep so sweetly. 'Tis the old tale, Lewis—struggling time, and quiet eternity."

"You are melancholy to-night, Rebecca; you are not as usual; and here the air is cold. Let us hence to the house."

"You will not, surely, like a worldling, run from me, because I am sorrowful!" she said mournfully. "Is not our friendship, our more than friendship, cemented and strengthened even by melancholy? Nay, let me speak to you, Lewis, as I have always spoken when the sadness of my heart comes upon me. What do you think of the world, which would not allow me to have you, even, for a friend?"

"Dear Rebecca, do not encourage these melancholy reflections. Do come home with me! There is something awful in this wild spot just now. See you, the moon is under a dark cloud—the trees round these waters assume strange shapes in the gloom; and the chill breeze begins to moan in the woods, and to sweep up the hollow past us. I know not how you can linger here, for the cold black depths of that still linn make me shudder when I look into it."

"It is you that are fanciful, Lewis, and apt to be uneasy, and scared by this gloom and solitude. Now, as for me, it does me good, when my heart is disquieted, to gaze upon these dead waters; and when I sit here in the deepening twilight, thinking of the empty idealisms of life, and the numerous disappointments of warmhearted youth,—of the penalties connected with that very reason of which we think so highly, and the sadness that mingles even with truth itself;—I obtain resignation to an anticipated state that the obtuse world abuses with its pity; nay, I feel almost a happiness in my hopeless equanimity, which is only disturbed by such vain discussions as was this night intended; and when, on this spot, I have solemnly made up my mind to the sacrifice of every tender hope, my prayers to Heaven for mental tranquillity mingle with the roar of the falling waters, as they tumble heavily into that chasm among the rocks,—prayers sincerely addressed to the High and Lofty One, that, in my hour of aberration, when reason shall have abandoned this helpless tenement, He will not desert me;—then, then, my friend, the spirit of my unhappy ancestress, who gave up her struggling soul to her Maker beneath the cold waters of this linn, seems to join in my petition for resignation to the sad fate of my fathers, and to point a ghostly hand, over these woods, towards the heaven above us, where that blessed moon, and the stars that twinkle beside it, cannot hide the glory that is beyond; and where there remains a rest for the frail victims of earthly calamity."

Lewis stood for a minute, unable to answer; and then, taking her gently away from the margin of the linn, he said, as they went slowly down the slope, "This is a mournful subject, Rebecca, and these are thoughts which I did not expect you to be occupied with this night: but the mind, I know, is a riddle—I feel it in myself; perhaps the highest minds are the most difficult to understand: but allow me to remind you, that, with all supposable acquirements, and all its intensity, the mind is often its own worst enemy, and huge, with the prejudice of a determined melancholy, the galling chains of its own misery."

"Oh, Lewis!" she said, and by this time the tears were streaming down her cheeks, "your very reproach is a pleasure and a blessing to me: but my weakness—my poor—"

"Do not speak of weakness, my adored Rebecca," he exclaimed, now melted with her emotion; "we never love those who have no weaknesses. It is not weakness that causes the close embrace of the twining tendrils and its supporter,—which, if they must bend under the blast, bend together,—yes, Rebecca, and rise together when the storm is over, and grow together, and bud and blossom together, and rejoice together in the richness of summer, and shed their leaves together, when winter approaches, and wither together at last, Rebecca,—and die together!"

Tears, and broken sentences, and intruding hopes that were too bright, and apprehensions that were too sad for the contrast, occupied the lovers until they reached the mansion, where the approaching discussion was now involuntarily looked to, as that which was to decide their fate for the rest of their lives.

CHAPTER X.

"You would not have me, sir," said Dr. Heywood, addressing Mr. Prior, when all were seated round him, "begin a formal lecture upon so delicate a subject; particularly as I pretend to advance nothing either very new or recondite, but simply to apply what is known regarding a specific malady to the case, in particular, of this young lady. Ask me, therefore, if you please, what questions you think proper, and I will answer them to the best of my ability."

"There is one great principle regarding this point, which, you say, has been universally admitted of late years," said Mr. Prior, "which, I confess, has made a deep and even hopeful impression upon my mind; and that is, that insanity is essentially a bodily or functional derangement only, and so liable to be treated medically, like other maladies. Yet, doctor, you will excuse the scepticism, perhaps of ignorance, if, accustomed to the terms of metaphysics and the impressions of the world, I attach to the notion of the thinking principle—of that essence which, like the great Being who created it, 'no man hath at any time seen nor can see,' res ipsa,—an idea so abstract and mysterious, as to make the ministering effectually to a mind diseased, a thing hardly consistent with human skill, particularly it, like any other mental peculiarity, if may have been transmitted through several generations."

"I sympathise with your doubt, sir," said the doctor, "and with the feelings that give rise to it: yet, as gout and scrofula, the most inveterate, perhaps, of the other hereditary disorders, have been much overcome by scientific treatment, so has even mania hereditaria, as Esquirol calls this dreadful malady. But though I by no means flinch from the consideration, so important in the case of this family, that such an affliction may be inherited; knowing that in all exclusive tribes, as the Jewish people, the Quakers, Moravians, &c. as well as in clanships, and among aristocratic families accustomed to invariable intermarriages among each other, such predisposition has been and is transmitted; yet allow me to say, that persons supposed to be in this unhappy situation are by no means the best judges of the application of any general rule to their own cases; and least of all can they, before such predisposition may have actually manifested itself, be supposed to understand either the doctrine of transmission as likely to affect themselves, or the mode which experience has pointed out of aiding benevolent nature in her usual efforts to free herself from the constitutional derangement to which accident or vice may have, through a series of generations, subjected her."

"Proceed, sir, if you please," said Mr Prior; "we are all attentive."

"Without troubling you at any length upon so wide a subject," continued the doctor, "permit me to observe, that, from several facts that have come to my knowledge, in the history of the cases of several individuals of your family, I am obliged decidedly to conclude that the professional friends of your house, Mr. Prior, and even yourself, have made some capital mistakes, both as to the nature of the malady supposed to be manifested in former generations, and as to the actual danger of your family from it, at the present point of its dreaded transmission. In the first place, allow me to urge upon you, that mania hereditaria does not invariably proceed in a direct course, as the history of your ancestors will prove, nor even per saltum in the second or third generations, as some have maintained; nor is there, indeed, any general rule of transmission that can be relied on as applicable, by anticipation, to the cases of individuals in whom no manifestation of it may yet have taken place, and who may have safely passed the period of majority. It is worthy of consideration, however," added the doctor, addressing Rebecca, "that this malady, madam, never but in one instance appeared among your ancestors in the female line; and then was associated with circumstances of nervous temperament and worldly trial, that make it by no means decisive as to its belonging to the hereditary character. But there is another consideration, applying to yourself individually, Miss Prior, to which I attach great weight in this enquiry. That consideration is, that, in the general history of mania hereditaria, there is hardly a more decided symptom a priori of the predisposition in question, nor a more certain precursor of a sudden manifestation of it, than the attempt to conceal, and even the strenuous denial of, such a predisposition, with a uniform reluctance to advert to its history; for I have constantly observed, that craft and deception applied to self and others, is strictly an attribute of insanity, both symptomatic and confirmed; so that the readiness of this lady, sir,"—he addressed her uncle,—"to confess and to dwell upon, so humbling a calamity, her very dread of its manifestation, and her anxiety to avoid any risk of it, is to me a very strong proof that she is in little danger of its ever breaking in upon the happiness and tranquillity of her accomplished mind. Besides all this, be it observed,—if you will excuse me, madam, for speaking of you in the third person, in your own presence,—that it is circumstances of trial, always apt to disturb the reasoning faculties, or to take from us the command of our own minds,—that commonly bring into action the hereditary disposition; and I hesitate not to affirm, in presence of you all, that few females of her years have suffered patiently, and with noble resolution, as Miss Prior has done, a severer trial to a youthful heart, than I know she has endured before this day."

"Heaven bless you, sir!" exclaimed Mr. Bannatyne, with unconscious emotion, as he hung with increasing interest upon the doctor's words. "You delight me by giving the sanction of your opinion to a consideration which has dwelt upon my mind more than I can now express."

"Proceed, sir! pray proceed!" was echoed by all, not even excepting Rebecca.

"Upon the disposition to this malady generally, since you are pleased thus to listen to me," continued the doctor, "allow me further to remark, that there are several peculiarities remotely symptomatic of it, which are by no means scarce in the world, and of which most people are little aware. The chief are those unaccountable and fanciful freaks practised by some, which we usually designate by the mild name of eccentricities, and of which, from the physical obliquity in perception and judgment whereon they are founded, those who practise them are unconscious in themselves. Although these absurdities of conduct are generally only a matter of laughter in the world, yet, if unnoticed and unchecked, they have a tendency, in time, to ripen into positive insanity. The seriousness of the circumstances in which you are placed, madam," he added, looking to Rebecca, "obliges me to refer even to this remote and indecisive characteristic of what you dread; but which, so far from having been evinced by you, up to this moment you have shown a consistency and a firmness, in circumstances of trial, that indicates any thing but weakness or obliquity of mental constitution. Nay, further,—(since you have placed me in the lecturer's chair, you must hear me out.)—even that disposition, so common in sensitive and intellectual constitutions, which, if indulged in, makes the nearest approach to some kinds of insanity, namely, a tendency to brooding over favourite themes, to fanciful abstractions, and the building up of idealisms, poetical or profound, has, if at all existing in Miss Prior's mind, already withstood, as before observed, such trying circumstances, that I should have little fear of its operation in future, if her abiding good sense enables her to watch over it as a dangerous tendency; and particularly if her situation came to be so changed that the natural feelings of her heart may find their exercise and their repose upon those objects that are applicable to the gushing affections of a woman, and which, excuse me, madam, I give it as my opinion, that it would be as dangerous as it is cruel longer to suppress."

A pause of nearly a minute followed this speech, during which no one had the courage to interrupt the perfect silence. At length, Rebecca, lifting up her head from the position which her state of feeling had caused her to assume, and fixing her dark eye upon the doctor, in a tone of solemn earnestness, said:—

"Sir, there is one point more, to which you have not yet adverted, which, for aught I know, may come to overturn all you have advanced, and which, in the effect it has uniformly had upon my thoughts, is of too much importance for me to suffer even delicacy itself to prevent me from mentioning, placed, as I am, in the midst of my dearest friends. Is there not, in the very look of those who are hereditarily disposed to this sad affliction, something which the experienced can read with ease, and which as surely indicates the fate that is in reserve for them, as the hazy glare surrounding the watery moon foretells the storm that is brewing in the sky? Now, sir—" she was unable to finish the sentence.

"Be explicit, madam; not only your happiness, but that of all present, depends much on the issue of this discussion."

"Oh, sir, satisfy me only on this one point," she exclaimed: "does not your long experience among the breift of reason, enable you to see in my very eyes that peculiar expression which distinguishes the individuals so doomed, as it surely indicates the malady of our unhappy house?—I see, sir, I perceive by your hesitation, that upon this important point you hesitate to answer me;"—and, as she spoke, her large eyes, now sparkling from her emotion, began to fill with tears.

"You are quite mistaken, madam," replied the doctor, a little staggered by her manner and the pointedness of the enquiry, "in supposing that I am unwilling to answer you upon this point also; although, from the nature of the case, I confess, I could have wished you to rely less upon inference from a fact so liable to fallacy or abuse. I do not mean to deny that there is, to my apprehension, in the eyes of both yourself and your uncle, something of that indescribable expression, which is known, to those accustomed to observe it, to accompany the hereditary predisposition to mania. But I have never contended that you are in your generation entirely free from a certain degree of that predisposition, or that you are not, therefore, more in danger on account of it, than if nothing of the kind existed. I have already stated to you the grounds of my opinion, that, admitting a certain degree of that predisposition to exist, it is in your case neither so decided in itself, nor so alarming in its contingent indications, as to warrant the present sacrifice of your happiness. And as to the indication in the eyes, I must say, at a time too solemn for the passing of a mere compliment, that in you it is so blended with the fascinating expression of personal beauty, and the sparkling glance of poetic intellect, that I can scarcely detect a single distinct trace of that nameless glare, which, in many that I have seen, was to me so decisive."

Another silence ensued, after the doctor had finished, which was, after a few seconds, broken, with a striking effect, by a deep and struggling sigh bursting from Rebecca, as if at that moment a heavy load had just been removed from her heart.

"And may there, indeed, be no real danger?" she at length exclaimed. "May this awful calamity ever, probably never, overtake me? Oh, sir, do not deceive me by raising hopes too flattering to me to think of, after all I have suffered. Dear uncle, dear sir, tell me what you think? Are you also convinced, by what seems too delightful for me to listen to?" and by this time she had stepped forward, and was kneeling at her uncle's feet.

"Rise up, my sweet Rebecca, and be not thus agitated," said the old gentleman, much affected: "your feelings are too sharp and powerful for your own tranquillity; but I trust the time is at hand, when this painful consciousness is about to be removed. Be seated, Rebecca, for we have somewhat more to say, and let us calmly come to a conclusion in this matter. Mr. Bannatyne," he added, addressing the minister, who, little less agitated, was by this time standing beside the chair of his Rebecca,—"Mr. Bannatyne, can you forget for a moment your feelings as a near and dear friend to my niece and myself, and tell me, as a man and a minister of the gospel, as dispassionately as you can, what is your own opinion of the facts and reasonings which our medical friend has just offered to our consideration?"

"You will excuse me, gentlemen," said Mr. Bannatyne, recovering himself, "if I am unable to express myself, at this moment, before a man of science, in thus becoming the serious nature of this enquiry. I must say, in a word, that I am entirely convinced by what the doctor has advanced, and neither from reason nor feeling can offer one caveat to the qualified and yet decided conclusion to which he has come. There is but a single point to which my reason, from what little enquiry I could make upon this subject, would seek an answer, and the answer I should like, with Doctor Heywood's permission, to receive from the lips of Miss Prior herself."

"Name it, Lewis, name it!" said Rebecca, aroused again into something like alarm.

"It is simply," he replied, "that it has been observed, as I believe, that one of the conscious experiences of those who have eventually been lost in the oblivion of insanity, has been an occasional strange rapidity of thoughts, over which they had no power, and a wild association of them which they could not resist, with an exaltation of the ordinary qualities of the mind, which was delightful at the time, like the dreams of the opium-eater; and yet, from the restlessness and anxiety with which it was accompanied, was painful, from the intrusive consciousness that it was morbid or unnatural. Rebecca, dare I ask you, if at intervals your experience has been such as this?"

"Alas!" said she, mournfully, "I think it occasionally has been somewhat thus with me. Indeed, the hurry of thought which you describe, I feel at the very moment. And yet, I cannot say—"

"My dear sir," said the doctor, "a moment's consideration will convince you, from analogy, that the very terms of your question are more calculated to create such symptoms, than to explain those that exist. Need I say, that that rapidity and elevation of thought, which is undoubtedly a general precursor of insanity, is so near akin to the ordinary workings and elevations of most high intellect, that, were we to take the one for the other, every man of genius might, at times, make such a confession, as in this way would lay him open to the charge of insanity?"

"Then, sir, does this really amount to nothing?" said Rebecca, with another sigh of relief and hope.

"Your own answers prove it, madam," said the doctor, taking her kindly by the hand. "An intellect like yours is to be guided, not goaded; and feelings like yours are to be allowed to gush forth towards those you love, lest they burst the bosom in which they cannot be confined, and take captive the reason which would check them in vain. Heaven bless you, madam, for you ought to be blessed," said the doctor, becoming almost affected as he looked at her,—“blessed with all those domestic endearments that are suited to the cravings of female affection.”

A pause of some minutes here occurred; for the parties concerned seem to anticipate the result of the whole, and were overpowered with astonishment at the change of prospect that had burst so suddenly upon them. The silence was broken by the old gentleman, on who e countenance the others' looks were now involuntarily fixed.

“My dear children, as I may now call you,” he said, “Providence has at length, in an unexpected way, relieved all our hearts of a heavy burden, and shown us clearly what his will is. I know well your thoughts now, for I have long witnessed your ill-smothered feelings. You have had, indeed, a weary and a sad probation; but Heaven, at last, puts a happy end to it, I trust,—for it calls you, at last, to be man and wife. Stand up, my sweet Rebecca; come forward, Mr. Bannatyne, while I join your hands; and may Heaven above make you abundantly happy; for the dark clouds of sorrow and dread have now been dispelled, and the sun of joy will yet arise, to prevent the extinction of my ancient house.”

Mr. Bannatyne and Rebecca stood for some moments, their hands joined together, but unable to speak. A tumult of joy at the idea of yet being a happy wife to her beloved Lewis so burst upon her, that she seemed completely overpowered; till, looking in the faces, first of her uncle, and then of the minister, she gave a short sob, and was relieved by a gush of tears.

When Rebecca had been assisted to her seat, and the others present had shed their irrepressible tears in silence beside her, they found that something more was wanted to give relief to their feelings, and that relief they found in a quarter, to which the pious and virtuous usually have resort.

Mr. Bannatyne, giving the tone to what each one of them felt, stretched forth his arms towards heaven, when the company had stood up around him, and, in an address of grateful thanksgiving to the Deity, poured forth those aspirations, in the name of all present, which the world can neither give nor take away.

CHAPTER XI.

What a change now took place in the hitherto dignified and dull seclusion of the venerable mansion of Lawford! The excitement of anticipated novelty of circumstances, and the cheerful bustle and business of preparation, is always a pleasing relief from the dull ennui of plenty and lack of care; but it is only once in one's life that any can properly experience the unequalled delight of preparation for their own wedding.

The change in Rebecca's circumstances and prospects was almost beyond her own sober belief, and at times was almost too much for the tranquillity of her spirit. But occupation, cheerful and interesting occupation, that panacea for so much of the evil of life, and antidote to the eating poison of great mental activity, prevented the excess of her happiness from injuring the tone of her sensitive mind. Who shall describe all that is to do in a decaying mansion, which seemed to have been doomed to pass into new hands, by the melancholy event of the extinction of the family—its owners for centuries; but which, as its reinstated occupants, is suddenly restored to the joyful prospects of the continuation of an ancient line, to be its lords in many future years?—or who shall adequately speak of all the bright and happy feelings which connect themselves with such events, in minds like those of the gentle Priors of Lawford?

Artists of the cabinet, and artists du drap, now occupied the busy Rebecca from morning to night, for some weeks prior to her marriage day. Her uncle was not less engaged with architects and decorators; for the old mansion was of course not only to undergo a thorough repair, but to be made to assume a splendour against the time that the happy pair should return from their marriage jaunt, such as was fitting to enhance joys and prospects so pleasing, and of late so unexpected, and to celebrate an event which formed a new era in the family history. The good old gentleman seemed now to be entirely a new man, as Lawford House seemed like a new place from bustle and expenditure, and the very servants flew up and down stairs like fools in their stir and their joy, and made twenty errands into the talking village of Hillington, or to the houses of the numerous small lairds in the neighbourhood, to indulge country gossip, and reciprocate delight in the great event of the approaching marriage.

That marriage in due time did take place, with more general excitement and rejoicing than had been known in the neighbourhood for many years. The whole people of the village of Hillington seemed determined to take a part in it, and in some way did so when the day arrived; for the Priors of Lawford had been from time immemorial so highly respected, and their young minister was by his parishioners so deeply beloved, that himself and his interesting bride, who had so long been observed wandering sadly together, under the strange restraint of their own principles, were regarded with an almost worshipping admiration. The bald marriage ceremonial of the Scottish church was performed in Lawford House by the nearest neighbouring clergyman, and was gone through by the trembling Rebecca with a comparative tranquillity of mind and a leaning of her feelings upon the affectionate attentions of her husband, which delighted her anxious uncle, and greatly assured all present as to the real stability of her powerful yet sensitive mental constitution.

As the carriage in which Rebecca and Mr. Bannatyne, now man and wife at last, which soon drove off with them on their marriage jaunt, passed through the main street of the village of Hillington, the shouts of the waiting people were only subdued by their profound respect; and long after the happy couple had left the town behind them, the noise of the firing of fowling-pieces, which was then the practice at popular weddings in the country, continued at intervals to remind them, by irregular echoes among the hills around, of the affection of the people, who had long watched and talked of their abiding regard. The pair proceeded first to Edinburgh, and thence to visit the more picturesque districts of Scotland; an indulgence which Mr. Bannatyne's fortune, as well as his arrangements in his parish, enabled him to take along with his bride; and in the mean time, Lawford House was left entirely to the tradesmen employed upon it. Soon after the departure of the bridegroom and bride, Mr. Prior and Dr. Heywood took a sober and comfortable tour by themselves, to visit several old places, and see sundry old friends, who might enhance their cheerfulness, by reminding them of the pleasures of former times, and interest them by talking of the changes of years, and of the sweets and bitters of the days that were past.

It is usual to end a tale with a marriage or a death, because men are fond of representing life as a drama, of which all the events tend to one point of happy termination, or to one decisive and awful catastrophe. But this dramatic form of the events of destiny is seldom found to correspond with actual experience; and life itself, if fairly represented, may in many cases happen to furnish passages of genuine interest to those who are tired of the obvious commonplaces which can scarcely at this day be avoided in the artificial arrangement of hackneyed incident. Be this as it may, my tale is not ended, because I have brought it to the time when those whom I knew and loved were made man and wife; nor have I found, from actual observation, that all sorrow and solicitude, all hope and fear, are entirely at an end with the most interesting couple on earth, when they come before the minister, and he has lifted up his hands over them in the presence of many witnesses, and declared them to be from that moment “married persons.”

CHAPTER XII.

Months and months had passed away after this, and the harvest had been got in which followed Rebecca's marriage, and stern winter had come and gone, with its long nights of comfort by the parlour fire, and its blustering blasts heard sweeping over the woods of Lawford without, and rattling and thudding against the windows of the mansion. A new spring had also arisen to “cleid the birken shaw,” and even the soft showers of “summer again” fell warm yet refreshing over the green valleys of Scotland, before I took my tramps once more abroad from the solitude of Balgownie Brae, to see what friends the grave had spared me over the face of this changeable world, and what tears might have wetted the cheeks of those whom, in sundry places, I remembered with concern; for I was acquainted with many a thoughtful soul, to whom laughter itself was not always a pleasure, nor the natural alternations of softening sadness always a pain. Up hill and down dale, therefore, I wandered once more, and saw many a kind body, and heard many a comforting tale; but there were few of all those who at this time interested my thoughts, that I was more anxious to hear of, or more blithe to see, than the amiable family of the Priors of Lawford.

But surely, thought I to myself, as I plodded on, I must be getting to be an old man; for I feel the roads becoming long, and my breath becoming short; the wading of brooks does not agree with the stiffness of eild, and the day is always far spent now, before I can win to the end of my journey. The time was, when I could keep up, foot for foot, with the cleverest lass that ever tramped to market with her basket of eggs; and when the prettiest who was ever wont to look in my face as we padded over the dewy ground, saw nothing in it then to prevent her making me her confidant of all the love that had ever at any time kept her from her sleep. But, alas! I say to myself, surely the days of man are as the grass, and as the flower of the field he withereth; “for the wind passeth over it,” saith the Psalmist, “and it is gone, and the place that now knows it soon knows it no more.”

It was on a dull, dropping, drizzling evening, at the latter end of August, when I found myself at length drawing near to the sweet village of Hillington. I had that day travelled towards it by a different road from that to which I was accustomed; and whether I had wandered out of the straight way, I know not, but it seemed to me unusually long, as well as lonely and dreigh. The mist that had crowned all day the lumpy hills on my right was not disposed in shadowy and floating wreaths of gray white, screening poetically, as I have seen it, the rich purple colour which the hills wore at this season; but lay in dead clouds of sad obscurity all round, limiting the dreary prospect to the watery fields on the lower grounds, and the dull sky in which the sun seemed ashamed to show his face.

The quaint old steeple of Hillington Church, which now shot upwards between me and the fading light, began to relieve me; but, somehow, it and the gothic windows of the building beneath it, reminded me also of age and mortality, into which my thoughts had now taken an unusual turn; and I entered the empty long street of the town with a sadness over my spirit as if Providence were preparing me, as it often has done, by an inward impression, for the sudden surprisal of some evil tidings. I almost mistook the door of my own inn, although I had known it so long and so well; for no one stood at the entrance to welcome me, as had always been the case aforetime, and I saw no other but strange faces in the passage. Although, in going in, I made nought to do, but entered my accustomed room as usual, I soon saw that some change had taken place within the premises. The respectable square-looking high-backed arm-chair, which had hitherto been my favourite resting place in the little parlour, and which I sometimes thought seemed almost to know me, and to stretch out its bowed arms on my arrival with a look of welcome, was now nowhere to be seen, and its place was supplied by a new-fangled signmaleery affair of red mahogany, the very shape of which was a grievance to me to look at.

I deposited my little wallet on another new acquaintance among the furniture, and gladly disposed of myself into a resting position; but I had rung the bell three several times before any one appeared to do the services of the hostelry as I should command, and then, instead of the sweet little fairy of a girl that used to bring me my comforts, and light me to my bed at night, there was a red-elbowed, shock-headed kimmer came blattering in at the door, without the least respect, and impudently asked me what it was I wanted.

The first words I was able to address to this ill-boding apparition were by no means worded with my usual circumspection, and consisted of short spoken enquiries into the meaning of this topsy-turvy state of the head inn of Hillington, and why it was that my old acquaintance the landlady had not on this occasion chosen to wait on me as formerly. It was little to be expected that I should get much satisfaction of the brazen cutty who now stood before me; but I was able to draw from her one piece of news which shocked me not a little in the mood I then was; to wit, that my blithe and kind landlady had been some time dead, and that the inn and its furnishings had, of course, passed into quite new hands.

The reflections that this simple event called up, entirely took away my appetite for the ill-regulated supper that was now set before me; for I felt, in spite of my worldly reasonings, that I had lost a friend who used to cheer me in one of my most interesting rounds; and I remembered with apprehension of further disastrous intelligence, the vile forebodings that had haunted my spirit all day, as I wandered alone by the way-side, and thought with sorrow of the progressive narrowing of the circle of my ancient acquaintances. I further learned, that my old friend, the laird of Glauderston, was also no more; having been cut off shortly after my last departure from the neighbourhood by an hereditary inflammation; and that his son in law, the laird of Bicknel Hill, was now reigning in his stead over the numerous ugly figures which he had contrived to transplant, and to set up all around among the clift bushes of Glauderston plantations.

But, of my interesting friends the Priors of Lawford, I was at length enabled to learn many particulars which had occurred among them since Rebecca's marriage; and the relation of which had various effects upon my own feelings. I stayed, with but little personal comfort, for a few days in the inn at Hillington, to gather together my own thoughts, as well as the different details I was able to pick up. I did not think them altogether satisfactory, but, such as they were, they enabled me in my own way to proceed with my story.

The happiness that fell to the lot of Rebecca Prior and her husband, for a considerable time after their marriage, can only be judged of by those who have themselves tasted what tranquil bliss may be enjoyed in the state of well-assorted wedlock; and who can enter into the appreciation of that intense sense of felicity, which is experienced by minds and hearts such as were those I speak of, now as they were in circumstances so much to their wishes, and with the enhancing recollection of so much previous suffering. If in the world the happiness of mortals were permitted to be long without alloy, assuredly theirs would have been so from their marriage-day forth. But though troubles spring not out of the dust of the earth, nor does sorrow gush, says the sacred murmur, from the ground we tread on; though a man look towards the east, and all is serene brightness, and towards the west, and there appeareth no enemy; yet, above or around, or from within or without, a canker worm shall arise to eat into his joys; or the very winds of heaven shall bring to him on their wings, their commissioned portion of the world's evil.

And yet, to Rebecca, there came nothing outwardly for many a day, to break the pleasing spell of her well enjoyed happiness. She and her fond husband, and her cheerful and revived uncle, enjoyed their dream of conscious felicity in the tranquil domesticity of their hearth at Lawford, amidst the regard and respect of all who knew them. The only thing that could be said to trouble Rebecca's thoughts was, the occasional stealing intrusion of that apprehensive conviction, so natural to minds capable of enjoying very highly any earthly good, that her present felicity was too unmingled to be lasting; and a shadowy presentiment shot, at times, through her mind, that, though neither she nor her Lewis could at present see where it was to come from, some event was not far distant, which would at least cause a ripple upon the tranquil surface of their sea of happiness. Her long indulged dread, too, of the family malady, had taken too fast hold upon her mind to be altogether eradicated, even by the joyous events that had so lately taken place; and although such a thought was now banished as often as it intruded, her very felicity made her at times still turn to this point in the index of possible evil, with a disturbing feeling of nervous anxiety.

The keen eyes of affection enabled Mr. Bannatyne at length to perceive this, and the prospect of an heir being speedily given to the family having increased the joy of all, while it deepened the interest in every thing that concerned Rebecca, he immediately consulted Doctor Heywood, whether some additional society, in the shape of female attendants, might not be likely to banish from her mind what remained of this troublesome though vague dread. The doctor at once agreed in the propriety of the arrangement; observing, at the same time, that it had always been a peculiarity of the Lawford family, that they had kept themselves too much in a state of seclusion, chiefly from their own sensitive refinement of mind, and their too lofty conceptions of what was becoming in human nature. But as Mrs. Bannatyne was, as they knew, too fastidious to admit too much familiarity of such female society as was furnished by her own neighbourhood, if a gentlewoman could be found, possessed of an intellect that should render her worthy to be Rebecca's companion, while her circumstances placed her in the situation, in some degree, of a dependent, such a person might at all times, and particularly at the forthcoming crisis, be a most valuable member of the family at Lawford.

On consulting Rebecca concerning what the gentlemen had concluded for her, she was quite pleased with the idea of what she called so agreeable an indulgence, particularly as the adding such an attendant to the establishment at Lawford, would likely be the means of making comfortable some deserving, and probably unfortunate, person. An application having been at once made to a friend, extensively acquainted in Edinburgh, a gentlewoman was soon introduced to Doctor Heywood, who seemed to be perfectly suited to the wishes of all concerned; and was soon after installed as a permanent inmate in the family of Mr. Bannatyne. Strange as it may appear, however, the only person who entertained a shadowing doubt regarding any part of the high character which this lady had received, was the one principally concerned, namely, Rebecca herself; who, when Mrs. Chapman was introduced to her, thought, that what a first impression enabled her to judge of the stranger, being involuntarily less favourable than description had made her anticipate, ought to be dismissed from her thoughts, as an unworthy and fanciful surmise. But the part that the new inmate at Lawford was destined to play, may excuse a little particularity in my account of her, and of her previous history.

Mrs. Chapman was a widow, now about twenty-eight years of age, a member of a family of some antiquity, though not wealthy, but who, having made an imprudent marriage in her youth, had greatly incurred the displeasure, though she had not lost the good opinion, of her friends. Her husband, as usual in such cases, had used her barbarously; but this she bore so well, and she withal discovered, while he lived, such prudent conduct, and such decision of character, that the displeasure of her relatives turned into sympathy, and they did all they could to alleviate the difficulties into which her husband's early death, as well as his general improvidence, had plunged her. What principally recommended this lady as a companion to Rebecca was, that she was a woman of "strong sense," as well as general intelligence, who had seen not a little of the world, and suffered, with a fair character, not a few of its trials. Her person was ladylike, and her full blue eyes had that peculiarity, that they could express in an instant the various transitions from modest humility to something like boldness.

The constant society of Mrs. Chapman, although it was occasionally felt, both by Rebecca and her husband, to be somewhat of a restraint upon them, yet was, upon the whole, an agreeable accession to their domestic enjoyment; and, ere long, she became a great favourite with every one, high and low in the mansion. The gentlemen seemed to be particularly taken with the gaiety of her manner, and her powerful good sense in conversation; and whenever, in process of time, a suspicion crossed the mind of Rebecca, that her companion seemed to take more pains to show off the admitted goodness of her understanding, than was exactly suited to her own situation, and the respect she owed to her (Rebecca) as the lady of the house and her protectress, she repressed carefully every unfavourable suggestion, and turned the suspicion back upon herself, from a candid dread of indulging any thing like the mean feelings of female envy towards a person in Mrs. Chapman's dependent situation. This suspicion of self, and benevolent tendency to her own crimination, rather than allow of blame upon another, had very much become a rooted habit of Rebecca's mind, and partly arose from her lofty conceptions of virtue and purity, but more from that terror of discovering any thing like perversion of intellect, or the most distant symptoms of the malady of her house, which had haunted her from the moment when she was first made acquainted with the dreadful truth.

Time went on, however, and no incident occurred materially to disturb the smooth stream of happiness which was enjoyed by all who dwelt in the mansion; and the safe birth of a son to bless the delighted parents and family, and to heir the ancient property and name of the house of Lawford as well as Bannatyne, was succeeded by rejoicings such as never had been witnessed in the vicinity of Hillington. Although the recovery of Rebecca was somewhat tedious, her feelings, on finding herself at last occupied with the endearing duties of a mother, and as she often contemplated her own sweet babe, while the infant lay asleep on her knee, seemed almost too acutely delightful for the strength of her mind to bear with sobriety, weak as her accouchement had evidently left her. But the mental wanderings not unusual at periods of weakness, although Rebecca had experienced her full share of them, she did not suffer to fill her with any material alarm, until an evident peculiarity in the manner, to her, of Mrs. Chapman, when she conceived her strength almost completely recovered, aroused her to enquiries and suspicions exceedingly unfavourable to her quiet of mind.

What this peculiarity consisted of, it was not very easy either perfectly to identify or define: it was one of those things in the address and manner, to us, of others, which implies or makes us feel a real degradation, but which is yet too nice in its shadings, and too much blended with kindness and apparent respect, to prevent us from suspecting it of being more or less the creation merely of our own fancies: but it was of such a nature, in Rebecca's case, that she could not, consistently with her own dignity, consent to herself to ask for any explanation concerning it; nor was she sure that, even although she should bring herself to condescend to this, she should obtain an answer on which she ought to depend.

This feeling was the more painful to the private thoughts of Rebecca, as the thing she complained of seemed, at times, to be participated in by her dear Lewis himself; and even his extreme tenderness and caring kindness, during the progress of her recovery, were, in part, attributed to this new sentiment with which she fancied that she began to be regarded. That sentiment, which seemed at first to take the shape of a humiliating, yet kindly, condescension, to her weakness, as if of mind as well as body, when she was perfectly recovered, became, as she thought, of a more decided and expressive character, filling her with alarming cares and enquiries, and again turning her attention intensely inwards. She now observed that often when she spoke at table, Mrs. Chapman would assent studiously to what she said, as one will do to the idle babble of a child, with whom they would not condescend to argue.

Notwithstanding the respect that she had for Mrs. Chapman's understanding, this was conduct which she was determined to take an early opportunity of effectually checking; but it was not easy to do it, without either, to some degree, compromising her own dignity, or increasing the suspicion of being actuated by motives the very idea of which she held in the highest disdain. She did speak to her, however, on an occasion of peculiar provocation, and in the presence of Mr. Bannatyne and her maid; and though this was done with that mixture of sultry and seriousness, which bespoke the considerate delicacy of a mind anxious to convey with tenderness a merited reproof, the colour that rose into the face of the widow, as she observed the surprise that Rebecca's remark excited in Mr. Bannatyne, and the flash that instantly darted from her eyes, indicated, besides a consciousness that the reproof was a just one, sentiments which, at the moment, seemed far from amiable.

The old gentleman, after an embarrassed remark to Mr. Bannatyne, turned off with a laugh this little squabble between the ladies; and before they rose, Mrs. Chapman put on such a look and manner of humility and penitence, that Rebecca was not only completely mollified, but, in the considerate candour of her spirit, retired to rest in a mood of self-accusation, from the suspicion that she might have, after all, unmeritedly wounded the feelings of a destitute woman and a dependent. On meeting of the matter afterwards, privately, to Mrs. Chapman, and comparing the strange looks and guarded replies of that lady, with sundry tender questionings and soothing remarks of Mr. Bannatyne, the thought at once struck home to her heart, that, by something unknown to herself, in her speech or manner, she had been exhibiting, to the alarm and consternation of those around her, some distant symptoms of the dreaded malady of her family.

When this horrid idea took possession of her mind, it is not to be expressed what she felt in private, as she brooded over the fancy with apprehensive despondency; and yet she thought, upon the most rigorous examination of her own mental experience, that, if there did actually exist the surmise that she suspected, it must be founded on a mere mistake of overwatchful anxiety concerning her; for, if her own judgment weighed any thing whatever in such an enquiry, she could find no ground for coming to any such distressing conclusion: but she, insane, she knew, were always deceivers of themselves; and though she would have given worlds to know precisely what her Lewis actually thought concerning her, so sensitive was she upon this dreaded point, that she could not bring herself to disturb his mind with the most distant enquiry upon the painful subject. Unfortunately, at this time, Doctor Heywood was in London, or on the continent, whither he had gone of late to live for a season; and in this state of painful self-observation and uncertainty, the happiness of the married life of the unfortunate Rebecca, was now disturbed and poisoned by the internal struggle and distraction of a nervous anxiety, about what might be evinced by her manner and conversation.

And yet there was something occasionally in the manner of Mrs. Chapman, particularly in her argumentative or playful conversations in presence of Mr. Bannatyne, that, while it challenged her admiration of that lady's talents and tact, excited, unwillingly, flashes of thought across her mind of a nature exceedingly distressing to the feelings of a doting married woman. But again there seemed other things inconsistent with these obtrusive imaginings: and when Rebecca, when alone with the minister, observed his completely artless, and truly affectionate, almost adoring, conduct to herself, she was inclined not only to blame herself for suffering the intrusion of such unworthy and painful fancies, but seriously to suspect that such thoughts were too surely symptomatic of that malady which was at once, perhaps, her companion and her curse. And then, to confirm her in these unhappy suspicions of herself, she observed, along with the humble and deferential manner to all, of the talented widow, that, sometimes, when she (Rebecca) had uttered a sentence, Mrs. Chapman seemed to regard her with a look as if of mingled sorrow and compassion; and, turning her large eyes next upon Mr. Bannatyne's countenance, would playfully, and without noticing what Rebecca had said, proceed with the thread of her own absorbing conversation.

The reader has, by this time, probably, seen, in the conduct of Mrs. Chapman, the real meaning of all this; but which the unsuspecting benevolence of Rebecca's nature would not allow her, in any case, to conclude. To be short, if Mrs. Chapman was a person of "strong sense," she was also a woman of strong passions; and a week had not elapsed from the day of her arrival at Lawford House, before her eye was fascinated, and even her feelings absorbed, by the handsome and unsuspecting minister of Hillington. Nor was this guilty admiration unknown to herself, as such a thing might have been, for a time, to a more simple, or, in plain terms, a more modest woman; but, though fully aware of all the danger and all the wickedness of indulging a sentiment of this sort for a married man and a minister of religion, with that recklessness of consequences which has ever been the characteristic of the most abandoned of her sex, she at once gave herself up to the influence of her vicious passion; and, without any precise design or planned purpose, found her only pleasure in fishing for the admiration and striving to seduce the affections of the youthful minister. Had Mr. Bannatyne been as practised as she was in the ways of the world, he soon could have read the meaning of the alluring arts of the widow: but the feeling of suspicion is the penalty only of the experimental knowledge of evil; and so the single-hearted clergyman was, as yet, perfectly blind to all that Mrs. Chapman dared to show to attract his regard.

CHAPTER XIII.

During all this time, Mrs. Dryburgh, who now lived much at the old-fashioned mansion of Glaunderston, near Hillington, made several attempts to impose herself anew upon the acquaintance of Rebecca, now as the latter was, as she said, a "married woman." In these efforts she was not entirely unsuccessful, particularly after the introduction of Mrs. Chapman into Lawford House; for, as Rebecca's good nature was fully a match for her own shrinking reserve, her crafty dependent easily managed to favour the visits, from motives of her own, of the talkative lady of Bicknel Hill.

One day, Rebecca, having been somewhat discomposed by her own reflections upon something that had occurred at the breakfast table in the morning, had thrown herself upon a couch in her apartment, and, indulging for a time the feelings that oppressed her, insensibly fell into a dreamy sleep, while Mrs. Chapman sat by in professed attendance. She was awakened by the noise below of some one's entrance; but, hearing the voice of Mrs. Dryburgh in the hall, she feigned to be still asleep, as Mrs. Chapman passed out of the room to receive her visitor, in order to avoid the personal annoyance of the former lady's present society. Although, in doing this, she had, as she thought, given sufficient indication to Mrs. Chapman that her slumber was feigned, she was surprised to find the latter return on tip-toe, leading in Mrs. Dryburgh; and the two, seating themselves beyond a light curtain or screen, commenced conversation in her hearing, under the seeming supposition that she was asleep.

"An' hoo are ye, Mrs. Chapman?" began Lady Bicknel, as Mrs. Dryburgh was usually called by the country people, "weel, hoo are ye? Dear me, but I'm quite happy to meet you just by yourself, Mrs. Chapman, for I've often been wishing for a quiet word o' you about Miss Prior—bless me, I never can call her any thing else but Miss! for really I never thought to ha'e seen her a married woman: an' I'm greatly concerned about her—but are ye sure she's fast asleep?"

"Quite sound, Mrs. Dryburgh," said the other;

"besides, she lies off at a distance from us, and cannot possibly hear."

"Weel, ye see, Mrs. Chapman, I would just like, as I say, to hae twa words wi' you about Mrs. — Mrs. Bannatyne—dear me, I never can get my tongue about her married name—for I wonder hoo she is since she was married, puir dear lady, an' hoo she's getting on, an' hoo she's doing with the baby, an' if her head, ye see, is just quite right; for ye know, Mrs. Chapman, that marriage is a trying thing, an' ye have been a married woman yourself, Mrs. Chapman, and I would just like to ken—but are ye sure she'll not hear us?"

"There is no fear of that, if we do not speak any louder."

"Weel, Mrs. Chapman, does your lady, do ye think, just appear aye fair an' square i' the head?—because, ye know, the Prior family was aye an odd family: an' does the puir lady never take ony bits o' tinnivocs, or ony kind o' queer symptoms, or hysterics, or — eh?"

"Ye know, Mrs. Dryburgh," said the widow, with a demure and wise look, "that it would not be becoming in me to let the least word pass my lips that would look like a disclosure of family affairs; and I need not tell a woman of your experience, Mrs. Dryburgh, that in every family there are matters that —"

"I am perfectly aware of that, Mrs. Chapman, an' it's a most wise and sensible observe of you; because I'm a married woman myself, an', as you say, in every family there are little affairs—but as to this lady, there is something in her look—but I may be mistaken, Mrs. Chapman; an' noo, as we are by ourselves, I would just like to hear your breath about her, puir thing; for if she were ever losing her reason, an', as I say, she has sometimes a very strange look with her—God help her puir young family! an' the minister himself would gang clean crazy after her. But what do ye think?"

"I think, Mrs. Dryburgh, that—but it's not to seek what I would say."

"Hech sirs! but ye may tell me, Mrs. Chapman, for I jaloused as much. An', really, ye maun hae a kittle place o' t' amang them a'; for it's so hard to know what to do wi' a daft body: ye'll excuse my plain talk—odd, I hope she doesna hear us."

"No fear of that, madam."

"An' she'll whiles talk quite odd, an' as it were silly?"

"She does talk very strangely sometimes."

"Hech! hech! its just beginning on her."

"One would really at times almost think so."

"And imagines every thing she says, quite gude sense and perfect gospel?"

"You know that is the nature of that unfortunate state of mind."

"Perfectly the nature o' t'; and ye'll no dare to contradict or argue wi' her, whatever she may say."

"It would be of no avail; besides, it would be somewhat cruel to the dear young lady,—an' so I just give a look to the minister or so, and say nothing."

"O but ye're a sensible, wise woman, Mrs. Chapman! what a treasure you must be to that puir demented leddy!"

"Hush—sh! But you must not suppose, Mrs. Dryburgh, that I have mentioned to you any thing particular; Mrs. Bannatyne is a sweet young creature, an' the minister is such a dear kind —"

"Oh, is n't he a fine-looking gentleman, the minister! he's a full head an' shoulders above Mr. Dryburgh, my stumpy gudeman—but, talking of men, Mrs. Chapman, Mr. Bannatyne should never have been a minister wi' a black coat, he should have been a grand dragoon officer, wi' a red coat an' a sword,—that's aye what I say."

"He would have looked just to my mind in the cavalry dress, certainly," said the widow delighted with the thought: "but hush—speak low; it is likely Mrs. Bannatyne will shortly waken, and it would be as well, Mrs. Dryburgh, that you were not found here alone with me."

"Ye say right, Mrs. Chapman," added Lady Bicknel, rising; "an', dear me now, what ye tell me about your lady, is just what I was afraid of, whenever Miss Prior became a married woman."

"Remember, I have not told you any thing particular, Mrs. Dryburgh," continued the widow, looking wise; "for family affairs are what I shall never speak of."

"You are a discreet woman, Mrs. Chapman, I see that; but just trust to me, for I ha'e more sense, after all, than ye maybe would expect, when ye come to find me out."

"It is evident you have a deal of sense, ma'am," said the widow, sily, "and it's a great blessing, Mrs. Dryburgh," she went on, in a louder tone, "to be possessed of one's senses; for if the mind is in any way astray, and the reason out of joint, what a chaos does it not make in the whole system of our mental comprehension!"

"What a beautiful style of language you have in your speech, Mrs. Chapman!" exclaimed Lady Bicknel, with a flattering sweetness of manner, which was exceedingly enchanting to the knowing widow, only she could with much difficulty preserve herself from a burst of laughter.

"Before I was married, my style of language was allowed to be uncommonly elegant, for my father had me at Mrs. Deyelle's boarding-school, which, ye know, was the very first rate; but, when a woman gets married, Mrs. Chapman, an' especially in a country place, why, ye see, we forget our lair, an' our parley-vous, an' every thing. But farewell, mem, an' just give my kind regards to Mrs. Bannatyne, an' say, that I could not think of disturbing her, when I heard she was taking her bon repos. Ah, Mrs. Chapman, what a pity it is to see sae pretty a young creature as that—hush—getting quite out o' her mind. But that was the state o' her puir father before her, wha died demented, an' that is the curse o' the whole Priors of Lawford, as I've heard my father that's dead an' gone often say. What a blessing it is to be in possession of one's sound senses! You and I ought to be thankful for our wits when we look at that unfortunate leddy; an' then there's the baby too. I'm fear'd to think what it's likely to come to yet. Oddsake, mem, do you think that she could be hearing us all this time?"

CHAPTER XIV.

The truth contained in the fable of the Boys and the Frogs, that what is but sport to some is death to others, is oftener applicable than those at least, who are in the habit of looking only for sport, are, in their thoughtlessness, ready to admit: and so it was in the case of Rebecca and Mrs. Chapman, as detailed in the preceding brief chapter. To the unfeeling widow, however, it was more than sport, as has been already hinted, to work as she was doing upon the sensitive mind of the young wife; and her success was equal to the depth of her craft and the singleness of heart of her unsuspecting victim.

Rebecca, compelled as she had involuntarily been, to be an eves-dropper to that which was destructive to her own peace, had only heard distinctly a part of the conversation between the two women; but the widow, having taken this method of making her indirectly acquainted with what she desired might be believed to be her sentiments, took care to give sufficient voice to that part of the talk which she wished her lady to hear; and the way in which it was spoken, and the whispering indistinctness of the remainder, conveyed an impression to the unsuspecting Rebecca, even more deep and decided than the crafty Abigail could have anticipated. Along with that impression, the few words of caution and seeming reluctance to allow her own sentiments to escape, uttered by Mrs. Chapman, in the early part of the conversation, conveyed to the amiable mind of her lady the notion, that the widow was more her friend than, from some other indications, she had been ready to suppose; and, making allowance for the natural talkativeness of her sex, that she was a very prudent and considerate person. Whenever a suspicion contrary to this crossed her thoughts, she only treated it as a further proof of that obliquity of mind which belongs to insanity, and into which she now feared, or rather concluded, in her dread, that she was fast merging.

From this hour there was a decided change in the conduct of the unhappy Rebecca, while her doting husband (her uncle having in the mean time gone to spend a few months in Edinburgh) was obliged to notice in her what filled him with such alarm and distress of mind, as in delicacy towards the old gentleman's peace, he was actually afraid to make the subject of any communication to him for the present. Yet what he could remark in the changed lady of the mansion was not of that nature to enable him to come to a very decided conclusion. Her obstinate yet unwilling taciturnity, which, in fact, arose from her nervous dread of saying any thing which should confirm her own and his suspicion of any aberration of mind, though, at first, set down by Mr. Bannatyne to that cause, became, at length, by the insinuated representations of Mrs. Chapman, to be considered as a proof of something even more intolerable to him than the mental affliction; namely, alienation of heart from himself. What else could it be, he thought, that made her now appear studiously to avoid him; and, dwelling only over the constant contemplation of their infant, instead of being much with him as formerly in their days of happiness, to answer him with suspicious hesitation when he met and addressed her, and even palpably to shun his society?

On her part the change was even more deeply distressing, forasmuch as it centred chiefly in distrust of herself. And yet, with the most rigorous examination of her own thoughts, all the self-humiliation that candour had reared upon extreme modesty could not lead her fully to conclude that a real aberration had actually manifested itself in her mind. But by this time the widow had contrived to turn her suspicions partly into another channel; and the fortune and connections of the minister, leading him, of late, into occupations of a public nature, which took him occasionally from home, the wily woman, with her usual art, contrived, by degrees, to insinuate into the mind of the secluded Rebecca, that Mr. Bannatyne was no longer the man he used to be; and to render her even more guarded than ever, in her behaviour, when in his presence, by the broadly asserted suspicion, that, in consequence of the mental imbecility that she had lately shown, his mind was beginning to be quite estranged from her.

And yet, sometimes, she thought, he looked kindly, and, as she imagined, with compassion, upon her, and addressed her inquisitively, yet with an expression of anxious affection; but this very manner, again, threw her mind back upon her suspected aberration, and she dreaded to reply to him, lest she should further betray something of the malady of her family. But malady, the actual malady, seemed now undeniably to be coming over her, as she would sit wistfully contemplating her slumbering baby in her chamber, the fruit of the love between her and her Lewis, in days when as yet her mind was sound and his affections were to her all in all. And then, when her chosen solitude grew irksome to her, she would steal up to that shut-up chamber, where the portraits of her ancestors, who had died in that dreadful state, glared melancholy around upon her from their dusty frames, and seemed to look piteously down to another hapless daughter of a hapless house, who, with fatal infatuation, had made herself another link to continue the chain of their misery to future generations.

"Is Mrs. Bannatyne not coming to-day also, to meet us at dinner, Mrs. Chapman?" said the minister one evening, as he sat down with the widow to their solitary meal. "Truly, this is very sad and uncomfortable."

"She bade me excuse her again, sir," said the widow, mysteriously; "besides, she complains of being ill."

"What am I to think of this? And is Mrs. Bannatyne really so ill? I will go and speak to her."

"Indeed, sir, excuse me," said the widow, "but it were better not."

"Why, Mrs. Chapman? did she say she would not see me?"

"Something to that purport, sir. But not by any means these words. Excuse me, sir; but I have already said all I could to Mrs. Bannatyne."

"But she seemed obstinate."

"I do not say, obstinate, sir. Mrs. Bannatyne seems to be ill."

"How unfortunate it is that Dr. Heywood is not here! alas, what a case am I in!"

"Shall I go and speak to your lady again, Mr. Bannatyne? I would do any thing to see you happy, sir."

"I know you would, Mrs. Chapman. My obligations to you are infinite. I cannot express my sense of your attention to my poor Rebecca. But you need not go to her again. It might irritate her mind. Heaven will enable me to bear this trial; and time and patience may yet bring her to herself and me. Excuse me Mrs. Chapman, but I cannot partake of these viands;" and, seizing his hat, the distressed Lewis rushed forth, to seek calm to his mind in the woods of Lawford.

He saw Rebecca at night, but only for a few moments, although the crafty widow was constantly in his way. In two days after, he was preparing to depart for Edinburgh, to attend the meeting of his presbytery, his fortune enabling him by this time to have an assistant in his clerical duties; and his communications with Rebecca being now chiefly through Mrs. Chapman, he sent for that lady to enquire if it would be agreeable for Mrs. Bannatyne to see him, that he might take his leave.

"Your lady will see you, sir," said the widow, with seeming joy, after making the enquiry; "but it might be advisable to say but little to her at present, and, above all, not to ask her any particular questions."

"I will attend to your suggestion, Mrs. Chapman," said the minister: "but how will you entertain my poor Rebecca during all the time of my absence?"

"Ah, sir, she will not be entertained, that is the misfortune. But I will do all in my power, and there is Mrs. Dryburgh visits her occasionally."

"Mrs. Dryburgh! and is my Rebecca reduced so low as to take pleasure in the company of Mrs. Dryburgh! Alas! But as for you, madam, I cannot express what I owe to you for this self-denied attention to my poor wife—I trust her entirely to you."

When he entered her chamber to take leave as permitted, he found Rebecca bent over their infant, and her eyes gleamed with joy as she rose to meet him. But she pressed his hands in silence, and looking up in his face, seemed ready to burst into tears.

"How are you, Rebecca? How are your feelings to-day? I am sorry to see you look so pale."

"Are you really sorry for me, Lewis?"

"Truly I am, but——" here a look from the widow admonished him to say little.

"I am going to part with you for some time," he went on; "but I leave you with good attendance in this worthy lady."

"Going to leave me, Lewis—and never told me till this moment?"

"I told Mrs. Bannatyne, sir, but she forgets," said the widow, with a nod to the minister.

"You told me? How can you say so, Mrs. Chapman?" said Rebecca; a slight flush of indignation passing over her pale countenance—"would I forget such news as my husband's going to leave me?"

"My dear lady, I did tell you several times," said Mrs. Chapman, compassionately, "but your mind is——" and she ended with a look towards the minister.

"Is it indeed so, Lewis?" said the unfortunate lady, with moving pathos, as she perused with alarm the countenance of her husband.

"Be tranquil and be happy, until my return, Rebecca; and this excellent lady will, I trust, be a constant comfort to you. Farewell!"

"That is not the way he used to bid me farewell in my happy days," said Rebecca, within herself, as she withdrew her hand silently from his,—"but those days are gone."

He stepped forward to caress their infant—for a moment looked sadly in her face as he passed, offering her his hand again, which she was too much absorbed to take: he then left her in melancholy silence, and went on his journey.

"With what sad thoughts do I leave my home now, which was once so happy!" he murmured to himself as he rode, musing on his solitary way, leaving behind him his beloved village of Hillington. "I wish I had said something more to my poor Rebecca, she looked in my face so sadly, as if something oppressed her. Can it be possible that I am deceived? I feel a strange dissatisfaction with myself, I can scarcely tell why. But yet I might have spoken more to her—I thought she looked disappointed; and my own heart yearned to caress her as I used—but that unhappy malady! What if I have been to blame in increasing her sorrow! I could almost go back this instant, to enquire further concerning her, and judge for myself. But in two weeks I must return to Hillington, and surely by that time her state of mind will be more decided."

With such reflections as these, Mr. Bannatyne pursued his solitary journey to Edinburgh.

CHAPTER XV.

It was a melancholy time to Rebecca, that, while Lewis was from home, and she was left entirely to the brooding abstraction of her own thoughts, and to the constant society of the crafty Mrs. Chapman. "Oh if I could but see my uncle," she would sometimes say to herself; "and now another month must surely bring him to Lawford. But yet I am almost afraid to see him, if this horrid despondency be indeed that unhappy affliction which has been the misery of our house—I have not courage to write to him, to hasten his return."

"Yet surely," she would think within herself, as she sometimes took an airing abroad in the carriage, "this sadness cannot, after all, be decided insanity, for the breeze of heaven seems as delightful to me as ever, and the fragrance of the hills comes as refreshing to my senses; the woods of Lawford look still lovely and green, and the birds on the branches pipe sweetly as I pass. There is not a flower that 'adorns the green valleys,' but I know and delight in as the silent friend of my youth; and the broom that grows yellow on the braes of Greenwood speaks a language as solacing to my poetic apprehension, as does the pretty spire and solemn burying-ground of the old church of Hillington, to the heavenward aspirations of my wounded spirit."

"But I will not be positive in that difficult judgment which is founded merely on my own consciousness; and if the affections of my husband have not yet deserted me, the malady of my family may never come upon me in that full and frightful measure, that shall destroy that reason which preserves my responsibility to Heaven that is above me—the great and merciful Heaven—which does not disdain to watch over the wanderings even of a heart like mine."

But heavy clouds and shadows of despondency would again come over her reflective spirit, as she sat solitary in her chamber; and thoughts would arise in her weary abstractions, which almost convinced her that it was indeed no misrepresentation, that she was really astray in her mind. And then, as she watched the nursing of her beloved infant, and her heart was lightened by his interesting playfulness, she would look through the obscure vista of future time, to the days when the babe might be a man, and the proprietor of Lawford—till the portraits of her ancestors in the deserted chamber seemed, in her thoughts, to prophesy of the child's after-destiny; and the dreadful imagination of his yet being a raving maniac before he left the world, to carry forward to another generation the fatality of her house, would close with anticipated horrors the fancies that oppressed her.

Nearly three weeks had passed away since Mr. Bannatyne left Lawford, and the sacrament Sunday at Hillington church was now at hand, and still the minister had not yet come home. It was a long and sad period to Rebecca; but at length, as the sacrament week advanced, the minister did arrive, in company with another clergyman, one of his intended assistants in the ensuing solemnity.

"Where is Mrs. Chapman? how is my Rebecca?" were the first questions he asked on stepping once more into the hall at Lawford.

"Mrs. Bannatyne, I am sorry to say, is in a very peculiar state," said the widow, who was already in a way.

"Let me see her; I wish to speak to her," said the minister, eagerly.

"Pardon me, sir, but it might not be wise all at once to break in upon your poor lady, in the state she is."

"What state is she in, Mrs. Chapman? Inform me quickly, for this is worse than I had imagined."

"I am no physician, sir, and I cannot describe her state in a way that, perhaps, you could well understand. But, sir, she is very silent and low. I have, however, Mrs. Dryburgh to visit her sometimes, and that lady is with her now."

"And may I not see her, as well as Mrs. Dryburgh?"

"Certainly, sir, if it is your wish—but——"

"What would you say, Mrs. Chapman?"

"You know, sir, that it is a peculiarity of those who have unhappily fallen into that state, that they have a distaste at those whom they formerly loved the most, and that the very sight of them irritates their disorder."

"Gracious Heavens! and has it come to that with my poor Rebecca?"

"I do not absolutely say so, sir; but from some expressions she has used——"

"I understand you, Mrs. Chapman, and perceive the considerate delicacy by which you are actuated. Alas! and this is, at length, the state of my adored wife!"

"But I will hint to her cautiously, that you are come home, sir," continued the widow, happy at the success of her diabolical insinuations, "and see if it would be at all safe for you to see her; and surely she will consent to meet you. Then, if you take no notice of what she may say, you may see the dear lady for a few minutes with little danger."

"God bless you, Mrs. Chapman, do what you can to enable me to see her without aggravating the state of her mind. And in the mean time, pray say to Mrs. Dryburgh, that I should be glad if she would step this way."

"I feel for you much in this affliction, sir," said Mr. Bryce, the clergyman, whom he had brought with him, when the widow had withdrawn. "But as, in the world, we require oftener to be reminded than interested, allow me the liberty of reminding you of the necessity now for exercising the much talked of virtues of fortitude and resignation."

"I thank you for counsel, sir," said Lewis, sadly; "but do you think I am right in giving way to the judgment of this woman, in abstaining from seeing my poor wife in her affliction?"

"The lady speaks sensibly, and with much apparent reason," said the stranger clergyman; "and, certainly, I have heard of cases wherein the patients could not bear the sight of those who once were the most dear to them; but I would have you to make enquiry of the other lady who visits Mrs. Bannatyne, and if she confirms the opinion of this Mrs. Chapman, no private feelings which you must naturally have, ought to be gratified at the risk of aggravating the disorder of your unhappy wife."

Lewis agreed, with a sigh, to the opinion of his friend; and, as they were talking, Mrs. Dryburgh entered the apartment.

"I am obliged by your attention to my unfortunate lady, madam," said Lewis, as she came forward; "and, pardon me, Mrs. Dryburgh, but as you have had opportunity of seeing her often in my absence, may I ask you if you think she is so ill, that my seeing her now might be injurious to her tranquillity?"

"I am much afraid o' 't, sir; and, indeed, it would be a black danger and detriment the way the pair lady is in," said Lady Bicknel, having received her cue from the widow: "and, mair than that, sir, as I was saying to that worthy woman, Mrs. Chapman, if ye would take my advice, ye would take away that bonnie bairn o' yours frae her, or at least watch her very carefully anent it."

"What mean you, Mrs. Dryburgh?"

"If ye had heard, sir, what strange talk she was talking to the infant, one day when she thought I was not hearing her; and she looked at the dear bairn wi' such eyes! Lord preserve us, sir, but I could na but think o' that dreadful story o' Lady Belldowie, that ye may hae heard o'."

"What story do you allude to, madam? this is strange talk."

"Did you never hear of Lady Belldowie, sir, that lived at the Point o' Garnoch, by the sea-side, in the next shire. The pair woman, sir, went clean out o' her senses; for, ye see, it was in the family, and she actually murdered her ain bairn!"

"Mrs. Dryburgh," said Lewis, with a look of more than horror, "I hope you did not tell this story to my unhappy wife."

"Ne'er a bit, sir; but she did hear it, and that when I could na hae thought she was minding me telling it to Mrs. Chapman; an' if ye had just seen, sir, how she scream'd, as it were, into hersel' an' wrung her hands together fearfully!"

Mr. Bannatyne rose, and paced the room, in dreadful agitation.

"But have you heard Mrs. Bannatyne talk in such a manner of me, madam—you will excuse me," said Lewis, stopping, and fixing his eyes on Mrs. Dryburgh—"as to induce you to suppose, as Mrs. Chapman does, that I ought not to see her for the present?"

"I have never heard the pair lady talk much at all; an', indeed, she'll hardly speak to me: but I see plainly that the least iota would put her clean into the hysterics, an' I would advise you, sir, not to go near her until Mrs. Chapman, who understands her far better than I, give you permission."

"I think that advice is safest, sir, under all the circumstances," said the stranger clergyman, "however painful it may be to your own feelings."

By such reasoning was Mr. Bannatyne—after despatching letters to her uncle and Dr. Heywood, requesting, if possible, their instant return to Hillington—restrained from visiting his unhappy Rebecca, until the following Sunday morning; when, just as he was preparing to go to his church, to attend the solemn ministrations of the sacrament, he found his mind so depressed, and uneasy with himself, that he intimated his determination to risk a short interview with her, having learned that she was already up, and engaged in her devotions, and he requested Mrs. Chapman to prepare her for his coming.

The widow, somewhat alarmed by the minister's determined manner, did prepare Rebecca, agreeably to what she had so carefully insinuated since his return; and soon Lewis, accompanied by Mr. Bryce, his friend, found himself once more in the presence of his spouse.

Rebecca did not rise as he entered, although she gave a slight start upon first setting her large liquid eyes again upon him, as if the sight was almost too much for her now; but immediately observing that he was accompanied by a stranger, she turned her face towards the book that was before her, and appeared to take no notice of his presence.

"Rebecca!—Rebecca, my love!"—he said, drawing near, "will you not speak to me, when, in my anxiety for you, I have at last come to pay you a visit?"

"I cannot recognise a visit of ceremony from you, Lewis, as my husband," she said; "and this, I perceive, is perfectly such; as besides the formality of announcement, you have, I observe, come to me with a suite behind you."

This speech was so sensible, both as to its matter and the tone in which it was spoken, and the reproach in it was so reasonable, upon a supposition of her sanity, that Mr. Bannatyne was perfectly thunderstruck. But, fearing to give a direct reply, until he saw further into her state of mind, he only said,—

"I wish you were sensible how much it is the contrary of what you say, Rebecca. But you are attired for going abroad. Are you really well enough to venture forth this morning?"

"I would be ill indeed," she replied, "if that prevented me from attending the Hillington sacrament. It is good for those who are broken in spirit to go up betimes to the Lord's house, for he spreads a table in the wilderness, even for those who are left without a comforter; and the deeply depressed under the world's sorrows he strengthens, and raises up from the depths of despair, and fills their mouths with songs of deliverance."

"Rebecca," said Lewis, more and more astonished, "I did not expect to find you in this placid spirit. There is always hope for those who turn to Heaven in their sorrows, for the consolations of religion are neither few nor small."

"And it is consolation I am in need of, Lewis," she said, hardly able to articulate; "since I have lost your affection."

"I cannot bear to hear you speak thus, Rebecca. I am under some delusion. For Heaven's sake do not give way to this emotion."

"You have been four days at home without coming to speak to me, Lewis. I am an outcast and a spectacle in my own house!—but go away to the table of the Lord. Dispense with your own hands the sacred symbols of affliction and humiliation. It well becomes you, after the sorrow you have brought to my heart."

"You must not allow yourself to be thus agitated, sir," cried Mr. Bryce, as the distressed young clergyman smote his forehead, and looked wildly, first at Mrs. Chapman and then at Rebecca. "Remember the duties that you have this day to perform, and there is the Sabbath bell already sounding from Hillington kirk. Postpone, I beseech you, this trying matter, at least, until the services of the day are ended." And saying this, Mr. Bryce, along with the now rallied Mrs. Chapman, succeeded in withdrawing Mr. Bannatyne from his wife's apartment.

CHAPTER XVI.

It was with a sad and perplexed spirit, on the same quiet Sabbath morning, that the Reverend Mr. Bannatyne proceeded to Hillington kirk, and mounted his pulpit to commence the public worship of the day. The reasoning of Mr. Bryce, on their way to the village, benevolently intended to calm his mind regarding his conduct to Rebecca, by urging, in extenuation, the deceptive nature of the malady with which she was suspected to be afflicted, and the probably ignorant zeal of Mrs. Chapman, by whom he had suffered himself to be persuaded, had but little effect against the cutting conviction of having caused suffering to her whom he loved above all objects on the earth, which now stung him with a thousand almost intolerable regrets.

Never before had the beloved minister of Hillington begun the solemn duties of a sacramental occasion with such an uncomfortable and disturbed mind. There may have been some cause, he thought, for the representations of Mrs. Chapman; but, at least, Rebecca had had reason enough left to feel bitterly the systematic cruelty with which he appeared to have treated her; and, if she were now returning to perfect mental health, he was conscious of having caused her, perhaps, irreparable misery, at a time when he ought to have been her comfort and her stay. 'Tis true, his regret was in some sort needless, as applying to what could not now be recalled; but when, in the course of his preaching, he unavoidably cast his eyes to where she now sat, as formerly, looking up in his face, and drinking in the word of Divine consolation from his lips, as she had ever done, his heart yearned towards her, as the best beloved of his soul; and he could have gladly undertaken any personal suffering, if that could make up for one pang that he had unwittingly caused her to feel.

What Mrs. Chapman had, by degrees, insinuated into Rebecca's mind, to string it up to the pitch at which it was on this Sabbath morning, it were tedious now at any length to particularise. But with all the understood weakness and softness of her sex, the very intensity of her feelings upon a subject so precious to her, and so interwoven into her heart, as her husband's affections, gave her mind a strength, or at least, a tension, upon that particular point, of which her Lewis could have had no idea. She heard, therefore, his discourse this day with all the piety which the subject matter of it was calculated to promote; but, instead of yet reading his compunction in his countenance, every thought that he uttered, that she was constrained to admire, only sent, with the approbation of it, an additional pang to the core of her heart, from the feeling that she had alienated and lost the regard of so admirable a man, and so deeply beloved a husband.

When the sermon was ended, she felt an exhaustion coming over her, and pressed forward, on the opening of the tables, to take the sacrament on its first dispensation, in order the more speedily to retire to her home. By this time her mind was in a strangely excited state, and while the people sung the preliminary psalm, she was pressed forward among a few others, who were filling up the upper end of the tables, just at the time when Lewis was descending from his pulpit to preside at the first, after the manner of the Scottish church; and, from the politeness of those around, or some chance cause, she was placed at the head almost beside her husband, and next to Mr. Bryce, who was, after the pastor, to officiate at the tables.

When Mr. Bannatyne took his seat at the upper end of the tables, and found his Rebecca, whom he had been considering as a lunatic, and with whom he had had so unsatisfactory a scene in the morning, seated so near him at this ordinance, his feelings were such as it would not be easy by any words to convey a just idea. A series of events, very unlooked for, had made his wife and himself, who had for so long been to each other like the apples of their eyes, almost perfect strangers for several weeks; and the pleasure that he felt in seeing her thus recovered, and seated beside him at this sacred ordinance, was strangely dashed by what he knew was the state of her feelings with regard to himself. But the long extempore prayer was immediately proceeded in, and the abundance of the heart of the deeply-impressed minister gave forth things, in his fervent address to the Deity, which took their tone much from the emotions that struggled in his bosom with reference to her, whose case lay now so heavily on his spirit.

It was no common prayer offered to the Father of mercies and the God of all grace and consolation, which now ascended up to Heaven from the burning heart of the pious minister of Hillington. It was an unbecoming of himself, and on the part of his people, to the Deity, which touched the hearts of all present, with an unction and a fire almost beyond utterance. He knew he was praying both for Rebecca and himself, as well as for his beloved communicants around, now also deeply affected; but what she felt at every word that he uttered while standing trembling under the influence of her feelings, almost by his side, it would not be easy to find language to express.

The assembly sat down; and the bread was broken and distributed to the disciples, while the whole congregation was melted in tears, and all thought they never had witnessed such deep feeling in their minister. But not a tear would come from the eyes of Rebecca, although the crowding emotions which struggled for vent in her bosom were mounting fast to something surpassing the mastery of human infirmity. Continuing speaking to the communicants the words of consolation, while the elders went down the paces with the elements, as is the manner of the Scottish church, Mr. Bannatyne next "took the cup," and gave one to the clergyman on his right; but, in handing the other to his left, he was so strangely overpowered and confused in his thoughts, that, instead of giving it to Mr. Bryce, who was the person next to him, he handed it at once to his own beloved wife.

Rebecca, who was looking up in his face at the moment, took the cup from his hand, and, putting it to her lips, drank of the symbolic wine, under the influence also of overpowering and absorbing feelings, which prevented her from being sensible to any impropriety, while the elders, who stood looking on, and the other people near, were quite struck with this strange and unexpected communication.

To both, this was a peculiar and an awful moment. It was a solemn communion of both with their Heavenly Father; but it was also an involuntary communion between husband and wife, expressing thoughts and feelings which language could not evolve. "He whose death we are now commemorating," went on Mr. Bannatyne, in his exhortation at the time to the communicants, "who was himself deeply touched with a feeling of our infirmities, enters into the closet of our inmost spirits, and draws the poison from the wounded mind; for, knowing our frame, and remembering that we are but dust, he forgiveth all our wanderings and healeth all our sorrows; and when heart and flesh do faint and fail, he has promised to be himself the strength that we need and our comfort for ever; that comfort and support, which all who love Him ought, also, in this world of trial, to be constantly to each other."

At this moment the still solemnity of the communion was broken by a scream, which appalled every heart, to the outermost aisles of the church; and the people simultaneously rose to look round them for the cause. The scream was from Rebecca; and what must have been passing in her bosom, while her Lewis uttered these words, no language can describe; but her cry was so loud, and yet so impetuous in its expression, that every heart was pierced as with a sharp instrument, to the very extremity of the assembly, and all were horrified at the suspicion of what could have taken place to the lovely wife of their much-regarded minister.

It was, indeed, a sad moment for him, and an awful interruption of the solemn services of the day. The working emotions of Rebecca, which she had mastered in her solitary chamber at Lawford, and borne up against during all the time of the supposed alienation of her husband's affections, proved too strong for the cutting conviction that she had on that morning been blaming him wrongfully; and thus, all that was favourable to exciting the malady of her family, meeting together in her breast at the moment of their mutual communion, overpowered that reason, at last, of which she had so long been jealous; and the unhappy Rebecca was obliged to be carried out of Hillington church, now evidently, at length, in the masterless paroxysms of insanity.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was a strange tale that was told from mouth to mouth through all the parish of Hillington, that the minister's lady had gone out of her mind on the sacrament Sabbath day, and had screamed out in the kirk at the very communion table. It was a sad event to all but one within the walls of the ancient mansion of Lawford.

Every suspicion regarding her, which had been infused by the crafty widow, and which the affectionate minister had so deeply repented of indulging, was now fully confirmed, to Mrs. Chapman's infinite gratification, by the manner which the unhappy lady evinced, during the frightful insensibility of madness. The experience of the past would not from henceforth allow Mr. Bannatyne to absent himself from her: she now exhibited a general alarm whenever he came near her; and when, in particular, he spoke to her with kindness, she seemed ready to hide herself in the very stone of the wall, in her maniac anxiety to flee from his presence.

Rebecca now, with the wild but pathetic obstinacy of the peculiar state of her mind, took up her abode in the chamber next to that deserted one before alluded to, which contained the portraits of her line of ancestors, most of whom had spent the last days of their unhappy existence in that very apartment to which she from this time would cling and claim as her own. In the mean time, letters with the painful intelligence of what had occurred had reached her uncle, and, in three days after the event, the old gentleman had returned to Lawford, in company with the valued friend of the family, Doctor Heywood.

It was a sad sight for the worthy doctor, who had taken so much interest on behalf of Mrs. Bannatyne, to see her as he did on his arrival at Lawford; and it was a sadder meeting which took place in that ominous chamber between her and her excellent and grieved uncle. Yet she was perfectly tranquil, and even wildly sensible. Her face was pale and her eyes were dilated; and though she said little and looked humbled and sad in their faces, there was a touching pathos in the tones of her voice, which melted the hearts of her visitors with sorrow.

"Uncle, good uncle," she said, caressingly hanging on the old man, "how long is it since I have seen you? Many a weary day have I spent in Lawford since you left us; and are you really come back to see me at last? Bless you, uncle! but I am happy to see you! Yes, I am very happy. I am quite happy now! for I always knew it was ordained I should come to this little room at last. And here I shall remain by day and by night, until the ladder is let down for me to climb to heaven by; and then I shall mount—mount—aspire and struggle:—how finely saith the poet,

'Oh, the pain—the bliss of dying!'

What makes you look so sad, sir?"

"I am sad for you, Rebecca. I wish you would leave this room, and come down stairs again."

"Oh, no, no, dear uncle! are not these all our ancestors' pictures in that next room, that I am so well acquainted with? Did not my father and grandfather live in this room, and look out at this little window, till the day of their deaths? Did not my grand-aunt live in this room —and see you there abroad—is that not the Lady's Linn on the height, where she drowned herself, poor soul! when the evil spirit mastered her? I will not leave this room, sir—never till the last!"

"God help her, poor heart!" said Mr. Prior, turning away his head, and wiping off the tears which started into his eyes.

"And I am happy to see you too, doctor—good doctor," she continued, smiling with melancholy wildness in that gentleman's face, as she clung to his arm, "and I love you—love you much, Doctor Heywood, for you were the man that got my Lewis and me married. These were happy days, doctor! but Lewis has quite changed, and hates me now; does he not, goody?—you told me so," she said, with a bitter expression, as she turned towards Mrs. Chapman. "But I thought he had made it up with me one Sabbath day in Hillington church, when he gave me the red wine to drink, out of the silver cup, with his own hand, and the tables were covered with a white linen cloth before me; but a darkness came across my eyes, and a ringing rung in my ears, and the owls seemed to scream from the rafters of the kirk, and voices sounded from the hollows of the steeple, and the minister and all left me alone at the Lord's table, and I've never seen him since. Alas, for me!"

The gentlemen descended, much affected, to the room below, where the melancholy minister waited to receive them; and a serious and lengthened consultation took place as to what was to be done in regard to the unfortunate lady.

One of the first things that struck Doctor Heywood, on his entrance once more into Lawford House, and especially on his ascending to the apartment which Rebecca had chosen, was a palpable error in his own management in regard to her who might now be called his patient, and which arose from the character of his mode of philosophising upon insanity, as was briefly hinted at several chapters back. The doctor had accustomed himself so much to generalise the application of principles which he understood with perspicacity, that he overlooked those details of practice and those considerations of exception and individuality, which so essentially change the bearings of many general conclusions. Had he attended, as he ought, to the history of the maladic héréditaire of the Priors of Lawford, he would have seen at once the great effect of the constant presence of those objects which handed down to each generation a crowd of associations, calculated to keep constantly before the mind all the sad circumstances which that history furnished; and, in venturing to advise the marriage of Rebecca, he would have carefully withdrawn her, from that moment, from the scene of the afflictions which had almost destroyed the house of Lawford.

There were other things that occurred to him, in consequence of what fell from Rebecca as well as from what was related by the minister himself, that made him resolve carefully to sift the conduct of those who were much in the way of his patient; but, before he could obtain opportunity of any other than a general conversation with Mrs. Chapman, he heard with surprise that the latter lady had talked of giving up her charge, for what cause he could not learn, while, in the mean time, chance threw him in the way of a very familiar and unexpected tête-à-tête with Mrs. Dryburgh. Having, besides, perceived something in the manner of Rebecca, which quite cheered him as to what could be done for her, and having found little satisfaction in what he could learn from Mrs. Chapman, he was well pleased, for the present, to encourage the communicative spirit of the loquacious Lady Bicknell.

"Weel, sir, dear me, doctor," said the lady, "but it's a pity that ye ha'e gien up the doctor trade; ye'll excuse me, for I hear you so much roosed up for your skill an' sense, an' ye ha'e sic a notion of the women's complaints, and sic a handiwork about them, Mr. Heywood, that it mair be a perfect pleasure to see you lay your finger on a pulse. But I'm thinking the minister's wife is in a state that's beyond your skill. Ae, but she's a heavy handfu' to the pair minister, an' she never was a wife for the like of him. Noo, if anything was happening her—which would be a great relief, nae doubt, frae the way she's in—I'm just thinking what the minister would do, the dear gentleman:—what think ye, doctor?"

"Really, Mrs. Dryburgh, I have formed no opinion; but what makes you talk upon such a supposition?"

"Oo, sir, it's no a'thegither my supposie—it's Mrs. Chapman's supposie, too; for the pair demented creature canna live lang in yon way, for she eats just nothing. Now, if ought was happening, I ken somebody that would jump at the minister. Oo, but I maybe shouldna tell you, sir."

"Why not tell me, Mrs. Dryburgh, if I'm such a man about the women as you say?"

"Deed, sir, as you're a jocosie sort o' man, an' likes a crack, I can tell you, that that sneek-drawing widow would gie the very eye out of her head for the minister's little finger, if that dowie creature the present Mrs. Bannatyne were awa', an' I dinna see but ye might speak a gude word for her yoursel, Mr. Heywood, (if anything should be likely to happen,) an' if she got an inkling o' that, I'm sure the very thought o' it would gar her wait on this demented lady, till see what might turn about."

A light flashed across the mind of Doctor Heywood, at this conclusion of the speech, that raised thoughts and suspicions on the instant, the bare idea of which almost took his breath from him. But, suppressing any indication of the ideas that had struck him, he merely said,—

"I've certainly heard of such things as parties speculating about prospective marriages in this way, but, having no skill in matchmaking, I cannot pretend even to form an opinion upon the subject: but now, Mrs. Dryburgh, allow me to ask you, if, in your intercourse backwards and forwards with Mrs. Chapman, and as far as you had opportunity of observing Mrs. Bannatyne, before the period of her screaming out in the church, you witnessed any particular repugnance, on her part, to the company of her husband?"

"Why, sir, as to repugnance, ye see, sir, I canna just say, doctor; but if you would make your meaning a wee thought clearer, and not use such lang-uebbid words, I would answer you to the best o' my pith; for, to tell you the truth, although I was weel brought up at the besting schools, an' the tip-top masters, I have not what ye ca' much dictionary learning."

"Have you ever observed, madam," said Mr. Heywood, with some shortness of manner at the dawdling lateness of Lady Bicknell, "that Mrs. Bannatyne seemed to have a dread to meet with her husband, as did you ever hear her express alarm at the idea of his visiting her?"

"Why, sir, to speak the honest truth, I never heard her speak much at all. But Mrs. Chapman told me that she was quite against his seeing her, which I thought very unnatural. And yet, one day, now when ye're in mind me—"

"Well, madam?"

"I thought it very odd after that; for I heard her say, see pitiful, to Mrs. Chapman, 'Does my Lewis never offer to come to see his forlorn Rebecca?' that was the very words, and the pair young lady looked see wistful. But then ye ken, sir, she was not hersel, an' quite madder in her mind."

"And what did Mrs. Chapman say to that?"

"I didna hear ony reply, sir, an' I think the widow only shook her head."

Doctor Heywood rose hastily, and began with long and rapid strides to pace up and down the room.

In a few minutes after, he was out and through the house, looking for an opportunity of speaking privately with Mr. Bannatyne.

"Have you attended to my wishes, sir," he said, somewhat abruptly, on meeting him, "not to go near your lady's apartment, since my return to Lawford?"

"I have never seen my poor Rebecca since your arrival here, sir," said the minister, with a melancholy expression, "and your injunctions are exceedingly painful: besides, were it not for my confidence in you, I should be strongly inclined to doubt of their wisdom."

"You speak, as most men do, from your feelings and wishes only, and little from reason, my dear sir," said the doctor: "you must give me your entire confidence, Mr. Bannatyne; for this is the physician's first requisite for success: have I it, or not?"

"You have it unreservedly, sir," said the minister: "for heaven's sake do as you will in my house, only restore to me, if it be possible, my beloved Rebecca."

"Then, sir, remain where you are until I return," and without another word the doctor left him alone.

But a few minutes elapsed, in painful mental suffering, when the doctor again entered the room, accompanied by Mr. Prior.

"I have brought you together, gentlemen," he said, "in order that you may both judge of the result of a conversation I have just had with that viper, Mrs. Chapman. You start, as all good men do, at unexpected treachery; but had you seen as much as I have of the baseness of the base, of the cruelties practised upon those who are least able to bear mental pain, and that on the conventional plea of their insanity, you would be no way astonished at what I have now discovered. In two words, I am convinced that this woman, whom we all treated, when I was the means of recommending to this respected family, has been practising on the mind of her unhappy lady, for the purpose of sending her ultimately to the grave, with the presumptuous hope of one day sitting in her own chair at the head of Mr. Bannatyne's table! Well may you be astonished, sir, living as you have lived, and occupied as you have been. Even I would be incredulous, after all I have seen, did I not know that the whole struggle of selfishness in this world consists in one species of mind taking advantage of another,—the cunning deceiving the upright and virtuous,—the coarse fattening upon the sufferings of the fine,—the obtuse and cruel making a prey of the sensitive; until the capacity to feel is justly regarded as a misfortune, and one half of the world is almost driven to insanity by the oppression of the other.

"Your astonishment silences you," continued the doctor, after a pause, "and you wish to be further satisfied? You shall be so, fully, else I am mistaken, if you will observe the result of my communication with this person, and the representation she is likely to make to her most injured lady. This you shall soon do, if you will condescend to place yourselves where you can overhear what they say. You consent? Then follow me. We can get, unobserved, into the recess, immediately contiguous to Mrs. Bannatyne's apartment."

They all proceeded towards the chamber: but while the minister expressed the relief that Doctor Heywood's opinion had given to his mind, he almost feared when he reverted to the painful scene in the church, that the surmise was too joyful to be true; and put further questions as to the likely nature of the disorder, as well as to the necessity of such a mode of satisfying themselves, as they now were unwilling about to adopt.

"Did you know, sir," said the doctor, "how many persons have been persuaded that they were insane, or actually made so by others, when under the influence of strong feeling, you would not spare any pains to get at the bottom of the character of those who are chiefly about the person of your lady. My suspicion now is, that more depending hypochondriasis, which may be transient in its duration like a fit of passion or of sorrow, is all that at present divides her from her family, and has been entirely brought on, I conceive, by the cunning arts of this horrid woman. But haste, and we shall speedily ascertain."

When the gentlemen had mounted the stairs, and placed themselves where they could plainly hear what passed between Mrs. Chapman and Rebecca, the low murmuring tone of plaintive sorrow, in which the latter spoke in answer to the widow, struck upon the heart of Lewis with such affecting impression, that he was with difficulty prevented from rushing at once into the room.

"To leave me again, did you say?" said Rebecca, her voice rising as she seemed to meditate upon the widow's words; "you cannot mean so, Mrs. Chapman! Not, surely, without seeing me and his child."

"I heard no wish of the kind expressed," said the widow: "truly, madam, I pity you deeply. She who has outlived the affections of a husband that she loves, has little inducement to prolong a neglected existence."

"What a change has come over the spirit of my life!" said Rebecca, resuming her plaintive tone: "even this very morning I rose unusually refreshed, for my dreams were of Lewis and my lovely baby, and the thoughts that used to hang like a heaviness on my heart seemed to have vanished before some unusual sunshine. But now all is gone again, and I am weary, weary of my life. Forgotten!—lost the affections of my husband?—was not that the word you said, Mrs. Chapman?"

"Yes, madam, that was the word; and before I should be so used, I would—would do some rashness—I am a strong passioned woman, but—"

"Why don't you say it all?"

"I would slip out of this room when the gloaming came down, and end my life and my wrongs at the bottom of that linn there on the height among the trees."

"What frightful temptation is this coming over me?" said Rebecca, with a shudder. "Woman, what is this to hint at? I see something horrid in your face."

"The widow merely looked at her, and shook her head."

"Surely, Mrs. Chapman, you are not advising me to be away the life that God hath given me! And have not a baby—a lovely baby, and my Lewis will not leave me and see him or me? Neglect! pity! what words are those that I have been hearing of late? and from you? Your pity, woman! that art eating my bread, and ought to comfort me under my trials. What is this? and this be called insanity? Am I a maniac because I love my husband? Woman, you are imposing upon me; answer me one question—did Mr. Bannatyne really say he would not see me?"

"Not exactly, madam; but I told him—that—"

"Wretch! there is guilt in your face! your tongue filters, and your eye quails at my questions. What thought is this breaks upon me? Now I remember the horrible insinuations you uttered to that ignorant creature, Mrs. Dryburgh, while I lay on my sick couch. Now I see it all! You have made me contemptible in the eyes of my beloved husband! You have persuaded me against my own convictions almost into madness itself. When I think of all that I can now recollect, a crowd of horrible suspicions rises into my brain, that I can hardly attribute to humanity. Out, vile woman! that speakest to me of the drowning pool of the lady's linn, and hast put evil and alienation between me and my husband!"

What an impression there is in talent! what a majesty in truth! As Rebecca spoke, her delicate figure seemed to tower upwards into the size of an incensed queen, while the quailing widow sunk lower and lower, until, overwhelmed with confusion that the other had penetrated her, she at last sunk in supplication at her feet.

"You wrong me, lady," said the alarmed widow; "your own mind is wronging us both. If Mr. Bannatyne was as before, surely—"

"I will not hear you, widow! You are deceiving me about Lewis. He loves me still: I know he does; for, when we sat together at the table of the Lord in Hillington church, I myself saw the affection that beamed in his eye: and he prayed for me—I know it was for me, until the big tears rolled down his trembling lips, and he gave me the cup with his own hand. I will go down this instant and humble myself before him. I will confess that my poor mind has wandered, and that my temper requires indulgence. Give me my shawl. Nay, attempt not to prevent me—for a woman's affection is strong as death, and mighty as the grave—as the grave, woman! where it only can be ended."

Voices were now heard in the adjacent apartment:—"Stand back—come forth!" said Mr. Heywood, as the panting minister came forward, eager to receive into his arms his distracted wife; and, as they retired a few paces into the large ante-room, the door burst open, and Rebecca, followed by the widow, issued hastily forth.

Her start at the sight of the three gentlemen was neither so sudden nor so alarmed as that of Mrs. Chapman. Standing stock-still for a moment, while no one had as yet the power to move, she gave a slight scream of joy, and threw herself forward into her husband's arms.

"I knew you would come to see me! I was sure you would not quite desert me! Oh! Lewis," she said, looking piteously in his face, as she held him round the neck, "forgive and pity the wandering and the weakness of your poor Rebecca."

"I have been deceived, Rebecca," he said, at length, as he dried his eyes, while Mr. Prior, and even the physician, were also affected to tears. "I have been abused. I have been misrepresented. I never wished to desert you. I will watch over you myself from hence, and be a stay to you in all your wanderings; for you are my wife—my valued, my adored wife. Now, come down with me, and away from that detestable woman, and this day shall be a day of rejoicing at Lawford."

"And my uncle, too!" she said, grasping hold of his hands—"my dear uncle: surely I am not quite astray in my mind, or I should not so feel the joy of this happy moment. And has this woman been deceiving you too? Alas, widow, it was cruel of you to vex the hearts of those who loved as we have done."

"Hence, cockatrice!" exclaimed Doctor Heywood, swelling with indignation, as he looked on the abashed and confounded widow. "Woman, you are not fit to live in a world where there is already so much misery, when you could have the heart to drive to temporary madness such a sweet spirit as this!"

Why need we tell further what more happened at Lawford, to the joy and pleasure of all the kind hearts who dwelt far and near in the parish of Hillington? Whatever distraction of the mind had happened to Rebecca was soon dispelled by the affectionate conduct and constant society of her husband, and the judicious attention of Doctor Heywood; the latter, after Mrs. Chapman was disgracefully dismissed, insisting upon an entire change of scene to Rebecca, and that she might be taken from beside the unpleasant associations connected with the history of her ancestors. The health of her mind was fully completed by an easy excursion to the capital, and was insured by the ultimate removal entirely from the old mansion of the family.

Months and years, since those events took place, have now passed away, and Rebecca is still the beloved wife of Mr. Bannatyne, without experience, or dread, of any mental aberration; living in tranquillity and happiness, mother of a numerous family of promising sons and daughters, who, the uncle having died at a good old age, have since grafted the name of Bannatyne, with good hopes and prospects, upon the ancient designation of the Priors of Lawford.

Note.—The names and local allusions in this story, as in that of Lady Barbara of Carloghie, are entirely imaginary, and we abstain from all particulars, for reasons which must be obvious to the reader. That in forming a connection so interesting as marriage, however, attention should be given to many enquiries of the deepest importance to individuals, both for their own sakes and that of generations of posterity, will be evident from a little consideration of what experience has ascertained, and physiological enquiries have set forth. This is indeed the true moral of many painful cases of the sort we allude to, that have come within our personal enquiries, and which we have endeavoured to illustrate in the Dominie's tale.

The facts illustrative of the well-established doctrine of the transmission from generation to generation of peculiar qualities, both physical and mental, are not only most curious and interesting, philosophically, but deserves a much greater degree of attention practically, than they usually meet with from a thoughtless world, unwilling to learn what is most important for it to know, and constantly swayed, upon such a subject, by some predominating motive of passion, which, for the time being, is all in all.

That, in the transmission of life, both animal and vegetable, every thing is uniformly after its kind, is a rule of nature observed from the beginning; and to its extreme importance to ourselves and our posterity in the formation of unions, and the entailing of existence, we would do well to take heed. Hence the decided characteristics observable in families, not only in bodily form or strength, but for virtue or for vice, for feebleness or for capacity, especially where their position obliges them much to marry among each other. "In this way," says Dr. Gregory (not to speak at present of the obvious mental qualities by which many of the prominent families of Europe are distinguished), "parents frequently live over again in their offspring; certainly children are born similar to their progenitors, not only in expression of countenance and form of body, but also in the character of their minds, and their virtues and their vices. The imperial Claudian family, for a long time flourished at Rome, brave, fierce, proud: it produced the cruel Tiberius, who was a most gloomy tyrant; it numbered among its members a Caligula, a Claudius, an Agrippina, and at last, after a duration of six hundred years, terminated in Nero himself."—Gregory's Consp. Medicinæ Theoreticæ, p. 4. Edin. 1815.

Not only are the mental qualities very generally transmitted (though rarely to all their extent of power), but also the peculiar conformations of the person.

"It appears to be a general fact," says Dr. Prichard, "that all connate varieties of structure, or peculiarities which are congenital, or which form a part of the natural constitution impressed on an individual from his birth, or rather from the commencement of his organisation, whether they happen to descend to him from a long inheritance, or to spring up for the first time in his own person,—for this is perhaps altogether indifferent,—are apt to reappear in his offspring. It may be said, in other words, that the organisation of the offspring is always modelled according to the type of the original structure of the parent."

"On the other hand, changes produced by external causes in the appearance or constitution of the individual are temporary, and, in general, acquired characters are transient; they terminate with the individual, and have no influence on the progeny."

This transmission, through families, of original conformation, applies not only to external form and peculiarities of shape, &c., but to the type of character and disposition, or even to some malformations of the mind or constitution, usually denominated disease. Of the former sort many curious instances are on record, as the case mentioned by Maupertius and adverted to by Prichard, of two families in Germany which had been distinguished, for several generations, by six fingers on each hand, and as many toes on each foot. The instance of the family of Jacob Riche, the surgeon of Berlin, belonging to one of these, is curious, who had the twelve toes and fingers. He inherited this from his mother and grandmother: the latter was married to a man of the ordinary make, to whom she bore eight children, four of whom had only the ordinary number of these, like the father, and the other four had the long and short sizes like the mother.

There are even instances of similar peculiarities running through families mentioned by Pliny. The Philosophical Transactions record an instance where the writer had known of the transmission of supernumerary fingers and toes for four generations; and in the Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal, vol. iv., is an account of a family at Iver who for nine generations had transmitted a peculiarity of this sort, in general only through the women. The imperial house of Austria has had transmitted through it, for many centuries, as we learn from Archdeacon Coxe, a singular thickness of the upper lip, which is believed to have been originally introduced into the Hapsburg family by an intermarriage with the ancient house of Jagellon.

But it is a singular and wise provision of Nature, that though she transmits, until accident terminates them, these her own original formations, she never transmits the external mutilations or alterations performed by man, as in the case of cutting off of limbs or splitting of ears, or docking of the tails of animals. Were she to do this, human caprice, fancy, or fashion, would soon throw all nature into monstrous confusion.

But the liability of the peculiarities of the mind, and even of some of the more rooted diseases interwoven into the constitution, to be transmitted and entailed upon one's posterity, deserve a degree of attention which the subject seldom receives even from the more thinking part of mankind.

"It is well known to medical practitioners," adds Dr. Prichard, "that (the doctrine of transmission) equally applies to those minute varieties of organisation which give rise to peculiarities of habit or temperament, and predispose to a variety of morbid affections, as deafness, scrofulous complaints, and the whole catalogue of disorders in the nervous system. Even those singular peculiarities termed idiosyncrasies are often hereditary, as in the instance of a remarkable susceptibility of the action of particular medicines, such as mercury."—Prichard's Researches into the Physical History of Mankind, vol. ii. p. 539., &c.

Insanity, as a disease, like other diseases which, being inwrought into the physical constitution, is transmissible, would seem, from its connection with the brain, to partake of the hereditary qualities both of body and mind. Upon the general subject, however, we have been favoured, since the foregoing story was written, with a communication from our respected friend, Sir Andrew Halliday, of Hampton Court, M. D., formerly physician to his majesty, when Duke of Clarence, then living at Bushy, and himself author of some tracts on insanity,—which we consider peculiarly valuable. Sir Andrew, speaking of the admitted effects of families constantly intermarrying among each other, says, "That it deteriorates the race, is a fact known to all men; and that diseases accidentally engendered very soon become hereditary, is equally well established; and insanity, as a bodily disease, is one of those that are easily continued from one generation to another. Yet the fact seems not so well known, or is not attended to as it ought, that it is the physical qualities of the male parent, whether good or bad, that are chiefly formed in the offspring, and the mental endowments of the mother: that is, a strong healthy father will have a strong healthy son, even though the mother may be so diseased or delicate, as not to survive the birth: but a puny father will never have a healthy progeny, even though married to the finest woman in the nation."

"Insanity," he goes on, philosophically, "arises from physical causes, that is, weakness or irregularity in the construction of the instruments of the mind. The healthy strong energetic father gives the instruments which, when cultivated in earliest infancy, by the sound mind of a superior mother, forms the man of talent; and nothing else will do it."

The extensive observation of Sir Andrew, both at home and on the continent, as well as his sound natural sagacity, entitles his opinion, on such subjects, to the highest consideration; and had these important conclusions been as widely made known as it is our wish to make them, many painful cases of family distress, from the apprehension of insanity, which have come under our own observation, where sensitive and high-minded females were the sufferers, might have been gently mitigated, or rather, as we believe, entirely saved.

With regard to the effects of particular families marrying for many generations continually among each other, considered to be so deteriorating to any race, which forms such an objection to hereditary honours, and which furnishes such men as the late President Jefferson with his republican sneer against the sovereigns of Europe, we have met with many facts that we consider curious and interesting, but none so little known or so applicable as two for which we are indebted to the same authority. When the first De Bruise, grandfather of the Scottish hero, obtained from David I. the lordship of Annandale, north of the Tweed, the Celtic inhabitants, whom he found on his new property, were too proud and independent to do any menial labour for a Saxon, as Bruise originally was; consequently, when he planned his castle of Lochmaben, he was obliged to import from England all his domestic establishment to do the work of building. These he located near him, and as they increased he formed them into four divisions, founding for them towns, which are known to this day by the names of the Four Towns of Lochmaben. The people who formed this English colony were, by the natives around, so despised, that they were shunned as if they had been lepers, and obliged constantly to marry among themselves: they have long formed a distinct race, and are called by their common appellation, although all the reasons that originally made them so have for centuries ceased to exist. These people are so evidently inferior to all around them, that no one has ever risen up among them who has shown any qualities to remove the stigma by which they are known. They are even lower in stature than the usual standard of Scotsmen; and Sir Andrew thinks they have less than common physical strength, besides being known in the neighbourhood as "a quarrelsome and litigious race,"—characteristics certainly bespeaking no enlarged capacity.

The other instance is to be found in the small island of Lismore, in Argyshire, where a colony of English was originally planted by the Bishop of the Isles, under similar circumstances. These foreigners being despised and avoided for the menial services they performed for the priesthood, and forced to continue intermarrying among themselves, became so deteriorated in every manly quality, as to obtain the local sobriquet of the Lismore sheep; and, to cry "baa," like that animal, in the presence of a native of this island, is so mortal an offence, that, during the American war, when some of them had enlisted in the army, bloody quarrels were often the consequence of this trick upon the Lismore men. Some other instances of similar effects from colonisation in the isles are given, as we believe, by Colonel David Stewart, in his "Sketches of the Highland Regiments."

EXCERPTS.

About one hundred and fifty millions of people are calculated to exist in Europe; double the number in Africa; more than treble the amount in Asia. Supposing that America and the Australian territories only contain one half of what Europe possesses, we may boldly assert that more than 100,000 individuals die every day on this globe. A man whose life has not exceeded thirty years, must have escaped about 1400 times this frightful destruction.

No man would wish to be alone in this world, not even the miser, although he could possess all—not even the envious man, although surrounded by ruins.

The modest man has every thing to gain, the proud man has every thing to lose; for modesty always comes in contact with generosity—pride with envy.

Morality raises a more lofty and more imposing tribunal than the laws of man; religion not only ordains that we should do no evil, but that we should do good; not only that we shall appear virtuous, but that we should be so in reality—depending not upon public esteem, which may be acquired, but upon our own esteem, which never deceives us.

The number of individuals who have received the title of Pope has been 354; a long "succession."

The follies of philosophy have been the equaring the circle, the perpetual motion, the inextinguishable lamp, attraction and repulsion, the philosopher's stone, the universal solvent, the elixir of life, the influence of the stars, and the raising of spirits. These several subjects have absorbed in the last fifty generations, the lives of at least 10,000 men in each, and the veneration or fear of the vulgar in all ranks.

In 1829, the British and Foreign Bible Society had circulated, in twenty-five years, eleven millions of copies of the Jewish Scriptures, in one hundred and fifty languages; a calculation has been made that the cost of editing and printing was a million sterling; paper another million, and in binding £825,000, in round numbers fourteen millions of dollars. Where is the result?

THE

Infirmities of Genius

ILLUSTRATED

BY REFERRING THE ANOMALIES IN THE LITERARY CHARACTER TO THE HABITS AND CONSTITUTION. A PECULIARITY OF MEN OF GENIUS.

BY R. R. MADDEN, ESQ.

Author of "Travels in Turkey," &c.

INTRODUCTION.

The following work is of a literary character superior to the general productions of the press, and of that kind which it is part of the plan of the "Library" to make known in places where such works might otherwise never penetrate.

Whether the seat of the mind is in the brain, the spine, or the stomach, has long been a debated point; it will be found that Mr. Madden places it in the digestive organ, and the instances he has selected are well chosen for his theory. Instead of pitying the mental sufferings of men of genius, our author calls upon us to extend sympathy to their physical ills. The bodily afflictions of Burns, Cowper, Byron and Scott, are forcibly drawn, and Cowper's afflictions traced to religious monomania. The tone of the remarks is candid, and the whole essay exhibits research, and is written in a philosophical spirit.

An able London critic, speaking of the Infirmities of Genius, says,—"This is a very valuable and interesting work, full of new views and curious deductions." Again;—"These volumes ought to be read by every literary person, and we dismiss them with cordial approbation."

The chapter on the advantages of literary pursuits contains some observations of striking import—the arm against ennui furnished by good books are truly invaluable; books are a resource in every privation to those who have learned their value, and have a cultivated taste for their enjoyment. Seneca might well exclaim that "leisure without books is the sepulchre of the living soul."

The Author has dropped the title of M. D.; he is however a physician, and the following pages give evidence that he has been a student of no ordinary kind. His previous work, Travels in Turkey, exhibits him in the character of a medical man;—popular as that book was, we imagine the present will be more generally sought after.

CHAPTER I.

THE EFFECTS OF LITERARY HABITS.

It is generally admitted that literary men are an irritable race, subject to many infirmities, both of mind and body; that worldly prosperity and domestic happiness are not very often the result of their pursuits.

Eccentricity is the "badge of all their tribe;" and so many errors accompany their career, that fame and frailty would almost seem to be inseparable companions. Perhaps it is wisely ordained that such should be the case, to check the pride of human intellect, and to render the humbler capacities contented with their lot, to whom nature has denied the noblest of her gifts.

It is the unfortunate tendency of literary habits to enmesh the studious of the seclusion of the closet, and to render them more conversant with the philosophy and erudition of bygone times, than with the sentiments and feelings of their fellow-men. Their knowledge of the world is, in a great measure, derived from books, not from an acquaintance with its active duties; and the consequence is, that when they venture into its busy haunts they bring with them a spirit of uncompromising independence, which arrays itself at once against every prejudice they have to encounter: such a spirit is but ill calculated to disarm the hostility of any casual opponent, or in the circle where it is exhibited "to buy golden opinions" of any "sorts of people." If the felicitous example of the poet of the drawing room seduce them into the haunts of fashionable life, they find themselves still less in their element; the effort to support the dignity of genius in a common-place conversation, costs them, perhaps, more fatigue than the composition of half a volume would occasion in their study. Or if any congenial topic engage attention, they may have the good sense to subdue their ardour, and endeavour to assume an awkward air of fashionable nonchalance; they may attempt to be agreeable, they may seem to be at ease, but they are on the stilts of literary abstraction all the time, and they cannot bow them down to kiss the crimson robe of good society with graceful homage. But these are the minor inconveniences that arise from long indulgence in literary habits; the graver ones are those that arise from impaired health and depressed spirits, the inevitable consequences of excessive mental application. Waywardness of temper, testiness of humour and capriciousness of conduct, result from this depression; and under such circumstances the errors of genius are estimated too often by their immediate consequences, without any reference to predisposing causes. The fact is, the carriage of genius is unlikely to conciliate strangers, while its foibles are calculated to weary even friends, and its very glory to make bitter rivals of its contemporaries and comrades.

Accordingly we find that its ashes are hardly cold, before its frailties are raked up from the tomb, and baited at the ring of biography, till the public taste is satiated with the sport. It is only when its competitors are gathered to their fathers, and the ephemeral details of trivial feuds, of petty foibles, and private scandal, are buried with their authors, that the conduct of genius begins to be understood, and its character to be fairly represented.

The luminary itself at last engages that attention which had previously been occupied with the speck upon its disc. It was nearly a quarter of a century before "the malignant principles of Milton" gave the world sufficient time to ascertain there was such a poem in existence as Paradise Lost. Only three thousand copies of it were sold in eleven years, while eight thousand copies of a modern novel have been disposed of in as many days; but we need not go back to the age of Milton for evidence of the tardy justice that is done to genius. Ten years ago the indiscretions of Shelley had rendered his name an unmentionable one to ears polite; but there is a reaction in public opinion, and whatever were his follies, his virtues are beginning to be known, and his poetry to be justly appreciated. It unfortunately happens that those who are disqualified by the limits of their capacities for the higher walks of learning, are those who take upon them the arduous duties of the literary Rhadamanthus, and at whose hands the "masters of the world" generally receive the roughest treatment. The competency of such a tribunal, however, must not be questioned, even when a Byron is at its bar: genius has not the privilege of being judged by its peers, for the difficulty would be too great of impaneling a jury of its fellows.

But how few of those who fasten on the infirmities of great talent, for the purpose of gnawing away its fame, like those northern insects that prey

"On the brains of the elk till his very last sigh"—

how very few who track the errors of genius to the tomb, take into consideration, or are capable of estimating the influence on the physical and moral constitution of studious habits inordinately pursued, of mental exertion long continued, of bodily exercise perhaps wholly neglected! How little do they know of the morbid sensibility of genius, who mistake its gloom for dreary misanthropy; or the distempered visions of "a heat oppressed brain," for impersonated opinions; or the shadows of a sickly dream, for the real sentiments of the heart! How few of the fatal friends who violate the sanctity of private life to minister to the prevailing appetite for literary gossip, ever think of referring the imperfections they drag into public notice, (yet fail not to deplore,) to a temperament deranged by ill-regulated, or excessive, mental application, or of attributing "the variable weather of the mind, which clouds without obscuring the reason" of the individual, to the influence of those habits which are so unfavourable to health! Suicide might, indeed, have well had its horrors for that bard, who was even a more sensitive man than "the melancholy Cowley," when he was informed that one of his best-natured friends was only waiting for the opportunity to write his life. But how devoutly might he have wished that "nature's copy in him had been eternal," had he known how many claims were shortly to be preferred to the property of his memory, and how many of those who had crawled into his confidence were to immortalise his errors, and to make his imperfections so many pegs for disquisitions on perverted talents.

Of all persons who sacrifice their peace for the attainment of notoriety, literary men are most frequently made the subject of biography; but of all are they least fitted for that sort of microscopic biography which consists in the exhibition of the minute details of life. The Pythones, we are told, was but a pitiable object when removed from the inspiration of the tripod, and the man of genius is, perhaps, no less divested of the attributes of his greatness when he is taken from his study, or followed in crowded circles. We naturally desire to know every thing that concerns the character or the general conduct of those whose productions have entertained or instructed us, and we gratify a laudable curiosity when we enquire into their history, and seek to illustrate their writings by the general tenor of their lives and actions. But when biography is made the vehicle, not only of private scandal, but of that minor malignity of truth, which holds, as it were, a magnifying mirror to every naked imperfection of humanity, which possibly had never been discovered had no friendship been violated, no confidence been abused, and no errors exaggerated by the medium through which they have been viewed, it ceases to be a legitimate enquiry into private character, or public conduct, and no infamy is comparable to that of magnifying the faults, or libelling the fame of the illustrious dead.

"Consider," says a learned German, "under how many categories, down to the most impertinent, the world enquires concerning great men, and never wearies striving to represent to itself their whole structure, aspect, procedure outward and inward. Blame not the world for such curiosity about its great ones; this comes of the world's old-established necessity to worship. Blame it not, pity it rather with a certain loving respect. Nevertheless, the last stage of human perversion, it has been said, is, when sympathy corrupts itself into envy, and the indestructible interest we take in men's doings has become a joy over their faults and misfortunes; this is the last and lowest stage—lower than this we cannot go."

In a word, that species of biography which is written for contemporaries, and not for posterity, is worse than worthless. It would be well for the memory of many recent authors, if their injudicious friends had made a simple obituary serve the purpose of a history.

It is rarely the lot of the wayward child of genius to have a Currie for his historian, and hence is it that frailties, which might have awakened sympathy, are now only mooted, to be remembered with abhorrence. It is greatly to be regretted that eminent medical men are not often to be met with qualified, like Dr. Currie, by literary attainments, as well as professional ability, for undertakings of this kind. No class of men have the means of obtaining so intimate a knowledge of human nature, so familiar an acquaintance with the unmasked mind. The secret thoughts of the invalid are as obvious as the symptoms of his disease: there is no deception in the sick chamber; the veil of the temple is removed, and humanity lies before the attendant, in all its truth, in all its helplessness, and for the honourable physician it lies—if we may be allowed the expression—in all its holiness. No such medical attendant, we venture to assert, ever went through a long life of practice, and had reason to think worse of his fellow-men for the knowledge of humanity he obtained at the bed-side of the sick. Far from it, the misintelligence, the misapprehension, that in society are the groundless source of the animosities which put even the feelings of the philanthropist to the test, are here unknown; the only wonder of the physician is, that amidst so much suffering as he is daily called to witness, human nature should be presented to his view in so good, and not unfrequently in so noble, an aspect.

It is not amongst the Harveys, the Hunters, or the Heberdens of our country, or indeed amongst the enlightened physicians of any other, that we must look for the disciples of a gloomy misanthropy.

In spite of all the Rochefoucaults, who have libelled humanity,—in spite of all the cynics, who have snarled at its character, the tendency of the knowledge of our fellow-men, is to make us love mankind. It is to the practical, and thorough knowledge of human nature, which the physician attains by the exercise of his art, that the active benevolence and general liberality, which peculiarly distinguishes the medical profession, is mainly to be attributed. "Do I," says Zimmerman, "in my medical character feel any malignity or hatred to my species, when I study the nature, and explore the secret causes of those weaknesses and disorders which are incidental to the human frame; when I examine the subject, and point out, for the general benefit of all mankind as well as for my own satisfaction, all the frail and imperfect parts in the anatomy of the human body?"

The more extensive our knowledge of human nature is, and the better acquainted we make ourselves with that strong influence which mind and body mutually exert, the greater will be the indulgence towards the errors of our species, and the more will our affections be enlarged. How slight are those alterations in health—almost imperceptible to the ordinary observer—which have produced or aggravated the gravest mental infirmities! And how incapable is he of forming a just idea of them, who is unable, not only to detect, but to estimate the importance of those apparently trivial physical derangements with which they are so intimately connected!

It would be a folly to imagine that an ordinary disease exerts such an absolute dominion over the mind, that the moral perceptions are overpowered or perverted, and that the individual ceases to be responsible for his errors. When the intemperate man "puts an enemy into his mouth to steal away his senses," and under its maddening influence commits a violent assault upon his neighbour, no one doubts but that a state of temporary insanity was productive of the offence; nevertheless, the offender knew that such insanity was the inevitable consequence of intemperance, and he is punished for it accordingly.

The literary man who indulges in habits prejudicial to his health, cannot be supposed ignorant of the effects that must arise from excessive application; and who can say he is guiltless of the infirmities he drags upon him?

There is a case in our criminal records of a thief going out in the middle of the night to rob a hen-roost, and being attacked by a dog, he fired at the animal, and chanced to kill a servant of its owner, who had concealed himself behind the kennel. There was no malice; the mischief was unpremeditated, but the last degree of violence was incidental to the first, and the law did not hold him guiltless of the murder.

The studious man sets out with stealing an hour or two from his ordinary repose; sometimes perhaps more; and finishes by devoting whole nights to his pursuits. But this nightwork leads to exhaustion, and the universal sense of sinking in every organ that accompanies it, suggests the use of stimulants, most probably of wine; alcohol, however, in some shape or other. And what is the result? Why, the existence that is passed in a constant circle of excitement and exhaustion, is shortened or rendered miserable by such alternations; and the victim becomes accessory to his own sufferings.

These are, indeed, extreme cases, yet are they cases in point; in all, are the offenders held responsible for their crimes or errors, but nevertheless they are entitled to our pity.

In a word, if the literary man consume his strength and spirits in his study, forego all necessary exercise, keep his mind continually on the stretch, and even, at his meals, deprive the digestive organs of that nervous energy which is then essential to their healthy action; if the proteiform symptoms of dyspepsia at last make their appearance, and the innumerable anomalous sufferings which, under the name of nervous and stomachic ailments, derange the viscera, and rack the joints of the invalid; if by constant application, the blood is continually determined to the brain, and the calibre of the vessels enlarged to the extent of causing pressure or effusion in that vital organ; in any case, if the mischief there is allowed to proceed slowly and steadily, perhaps for years, (as in the case of Swift,) giving rise to a long train of nervous miseries—to hypochondria in its gloomiest form, or mania in its wildest mood, or paralysis in the expressionless aspect of fatuity, (that frequent termination of the literary career;)—who can deny that the sufferer has, in a great measure, drawn the evil on himself, but who will not admit that his infirmities of mind and body are entitled to indulgence and compassion?

The errors of genius demand no less. "A vigorous mind," says Burke, "is as necessarily accompanied by violent passions, as a great fire with great heat." And to such a mind, whatever be its frailties, the just and the charitable will be inclined to deem it, like poor Burns,

"Misled by fancy's meteor ray,
By passion driven,
But yet the light that led astray
Was light from heaven."

CHAPTER II.

ADVANTAGES OF LITERARY PURSUITS.

A distinction has been made between literary men and men of letters; the former title has been given to authors, the latter to the general scholar and lover of science.

In these volumes the term literary is applied to all

"to drop through a small capillary tube, the moment you electrify the tube, the fluid runs in a full stream. Electricity," he adds, "must be considered as the great vivifying principle of nature, by which she carries-on most of her operations. It is the most subtle and active of all fluids—it is a kind of soul which pervades and quickens every part of nature. When an equal quantity of electricity is diffused through the air, and over the face of the earth, every thing is calm and quiet, but if by accident one part of matter has acquired a greater quantity than another, the most dreadful consequences ensue before the equilibrium can be restored: nature is convulsed, and thunder, lightning, earthquakes, and whirlwinds ensue."

But it is not the elements only that are thrown into disorder, by these electrical changes in the atmosphere; every thing that is organic suffers by them; the vigour of plants is diminished, the animal functions are disturbed, and the nervous system, of delicate individuals, strangely and unaccountably depressed.

Who has experienced the influence of the sirocco of the south of Europe, the poisonous kamsin of the East, or even the summer southeast wind of our own clime, without feelings of indescribable lassitude, which are not to be accounted for by any alteration in the temperature, but solely to the variation in the quantity of electricity diffused through the atmosphere? In the prevalence of these winds, the air is nearly deprived of it altogether, and the nervous system is simultaneously deprived of its elasticity. In damp weather likewise, when it becomes absorbed by the surrounding humidity, every invalid is well aware how unaccountably dejected his spirits become, and how feebly the various functions of the body are performed, especially those of the digestive organs. This state of morbid irritability of the whole frame continues till the north or west wind, as Brydone has well expressed it, "awakens the activity of the animating power of electricity, which soon restores our energies and enlivens all nature, which seemed to droop and languish in its absence."

In very frosty weather, on the other hand, when the atmosphere is surcharged with electricity, there is a corresponding elevation of spirits, which sometimes amounts to an almost painful state of excitement. In our temperate climate, this phenomenon, perhaps, is seldom experienced, but, in a certain degree, its influence in very cold dry weather is evident enough. On a frosty day, for one melancholy mien we observe, we meet a hundred smiling faces, the hilarity of whose expression is due to no other cause than that which has been just named. Rousseau has eloquently described the extraordinary elasticity of spirits which he experienced in ascending some of the higher regions of the Alps. Every traveller is aware of the more than usual lively sentiment of existence which he feels within him when he is traversing a lofty mountain.

The painful effects arising from too much electricity in the air, were experienced by Professor Saussure and his companion, while ascending the Alps: they were caught amidst thunder clouds, and were astonished to find their bodies filled with electricity, and every part of them so saturated with it, that spontaneous sparks were emitted with a crackling noise, and the same painful sensations which are felt by those who are electrified by art.

Larrey, in his memoirs of the Russian campaign, mentions his having seen similar effects, from the excess of the electric fluid. On one occasion he says, when the cold was excessive, the manes of the horses were found electrified in a manner similar to that described by Saussure.

Altogether it is truly wonderful that an agent that exerts so powerful an influence on vitality, should have met with so little enquiry from the time of Priestley to that of Davy, or at least that no discovery, except that of electro-chemical agency, should have resulted from any enquiry that may have been attempted. And that wonder is the greater, when we recall the prophetic enthusiasm with which both of those illustrious men, whom we have just named, have spoken of the results which science has to expect from the enlargement of our knowledge of the elements of electricity.

Mr. Faraday, however, we are happy to find, has lately taken up this neglected branch of science, and made discoveries which are likely to lead to most important results.

Sir Humphry Davy concludes the account of the extraordinary effects he had experienced by the application of electrical agency to chemical action, in these words: "Natural electricity has hitherto been little investigated, except in the case of its evident and powerful concentration in the atmosphere. Its slow and silent operations in every part of the surface of the globe will probably be found more immediately and importantly connected with the order and economy of nature; and investigation on this subject can hardly fail to enlighten our philosophical systems of the earth, and may possibly place new powers within our reach."

Priestley sums up his opinions on this subject in these emphatic terms:—"Electricity seems to be an inlet into the internal structures of bodies, on which all their sensible properties depend: by pursuing, therefore, this new light, the bounds of natural science may possibly be extended beyond what we now can form any idea of. New worlds may be opened to our view, and the glory of the great Sir Isaac Newton himself may be eclipsed, by a new set of philosophers, in quite a new field of speculation."

Before we conclude this subject, there is a circumstance respecting Davy and his biographer, Dr. Paris, deserving of attention. It appears that Davy, in common with many enlightened philosophers and physicians of the present day, was dissatisfied with the explanation which is commonly given of the physiology of respiration, and the mode in which heat is supposed to be evolved by that process. Where Davy doubted, he was not a man likely to be stopped in the search of truth, by the jargon of science or the plausible fallacies of physiology. He accordingly applied himself to the discovery of a more satisfactory theory of respiration, and the result of his enquiry was, that the nervous fluid was identical with electricity, and that the heat that was supposed to be evolved by the process of respiration, was extricated by electrical agency.

This theory of the identity of the nervous fluid with electricity, we look upon as a conjecture (discovery it cannot be called) which will one day lead to more important results than have arisen from the grandest of his electro-chemical discoveries.

His biographer tells us that "in considering the theory of respiration, Davy supposed that phos-oxygen combined with the venous blood without decomposition; but on reaching the brain that electricity was liberated, which he believed to be identical with the nervous fluid; supposing sensations to be motions of the nervous ether, or light, in the form of electricity exciting the medullary substance of the nerves and brain."

This opinion Dr. Paris calls "a theory which has scarcely a parallel in extravagance and absurdity!!!" These are strong terms. Science, we think, should discard the use of harsh ones; but whatever be the fate of this opinion of Davy, the commentary has no parallel in presumption.

The theory of the identity of the nervous and electric fluid may receive little countenance for a time; it may be too much condemned to attract even the notoriety of opposition to its doctrine; it may be buried in oblivion for half a century, but the ghost of this opinion will rise again, though it may not be in judgment against its impugnors—their peaceful slumbers will probably be too profound to be incommoded by the resurgam of the opinion they opposed. Perhaps when Davy propounded it, he might have thought like Kepler, "My theory may not be received at present, but posterity will adopt it. I can afford to wait thirty or forty years for the world's justice, since nature has waited three thousand years for an observer;" for Davy like Kepler, had his moments of "glorious egotism," but like the astronomer, he had genius to redeem his vanity.

CHAPTER VI.

INFLUENCE OF STUDIOUS HABITS ON THE DURATION OF LIFE.

It is a question whether different kinds of literary pursuits do not produce different diseases, or at least different modifications of disease; but there is very little doubt, that a vast difference in the duration of life is to be observed in the various learned professions, and the several directions given to mental application, whether by the cultivation of poetry, the study of the law, the labours of miscellaneous composition, or the abstraction of philosophical enquiries. "Every class of genius," says D'Iserli, "has distinct habits; all poets resemble one another, as all painters, and all mathematicians. There is a conformity in the cast of their minds, and the quality of each is distinct from the other; the very faculty which fits them for one particular pursuit is just the reverse required for the other."

An excellent old author, who wrote on the diseases of particular vocations about two centuries ago, has spoken in the following terms of the diseases of literary men. "Above all the retainers to learning, the bad influence of study and fatigue falls heaviest upon the writers of books for the public, who seek to immortalise their names: by writers I mean authors of merit, for there are many, from an insatiable itch for notoriety, who patch up indigested medleys, and make abortive rather than mature productions, like those poets who will throw you off a hundred verses, 'Stantes in pede uno,' as Horace has it. It is your wise and grave authors, day and night, who work for posterity, who wear themselves out with labour. But they are not so much injured by study who only covet to know what others knew before them, and reckon it the best way to make use of other people's madness, as Pliny says of those who do not take the trouble to build new houses, but rather buy and live in those that are built by other people. Many of these professors of learning are subject to diseases peculiar to their respective callings, as your eminent jurists, preachers and philosophers, who spend their lives in public schools."

For the purpose of ascertaining the influence of different studies on the longevity of authors, the tables which follow have been constructed, in which the names and ages of the most celebrated authors in the various departments of literature and science are set down, each list containing twenty names of those individuals who have devoted their lives to a particular pursuit, and excelled in it. No other attention has been given to the selection than that which eminence suggested without any regard to the ages of those who presented themselves to notice. The object was to give a fair view of the subject, whether it told for or against the opinions that have been expressed in the preceding pages. It must, however, be taken into account, that as we have only given the names of the most celebrated authors, and in the last table those of artists in their different departments, a greater longevity in each pursuit might be inferred from the aggregate of the ages than properly may belong to the general range of life in each pursuit. For example, in moral or natural philosophy, a long life of labour is necessary to enable posterity to judge of the merits of an author; and these are ascertained not only by the value, but also by the amount of his compositions. It is by a series of researches, and re-casts of opinion, that profound truths are arrived at, and by numerous publications that such truths are forced on the public attention. For this a long life is necessary, and it certainly appears from the list that is subjoined, that the vigour of a great intellect is favourable to longevity in every literary pursuit, wherein imagination is seldom called on.

There is another point to be taken into consideration, that the early years of genius are not so often remarkable for precocity, as is commonly supposed, and when it is otherwise, it would seem that the earlier the mental faculties are developed, the sooner the bodily powers begin to fail. It is still the old proverb with such prodigies, "So wise, so young, they say do ne'er live long." Moore says, "the five most remarkable instances of early authorship, are those of Pope, Congreve, Churchill, Chatterton, and Byron." The first of these died in his fifty-sixth year, the second in his fifty-eighth, the third in his thirty-fourth, "the sleepless boy" committed suicide in his eighteenth, and Byron died in his thirty-seventh year.

Mozart, at the age of three years, began to display astonishing abilities for music, and in the two following years composed some trifling pieces, which his father carefully preserved, and like all prodigies, his career was a short one—he died at thirty-six. Tasso from infancy exhibited such quickness of understanding, that at the age of five he was sent to a Jesuit academy, and two years afterwards recited verses and orations of his own composition; he died at fifty-one. Dermody was employed by his father, who was a schoolmaster, as an assistant in teaching the Latin and Greek languages in his ninth year; he died at twenty-seven. The English prodigy, Lucretia Davidson, was another melancholy instance of precocious genius, and early death. She wrote several pieces before he was fifteen, and only reached his twenty-fifth year. The ardour of Dante's temperament, we are told, was manifested in his childhood. The lady he celebrated in his poems under the name of Beatrice, he fell in love with at the age of ten, and his enthusiasm terminated with a life at fifty-six. Schiller, at the age of fourteen, was the author of an epic poem; he died at forty-six. Cowley published a collection of his juvenile poems, called "Poetical Blossoms" at sixteen, and died at sixty-nine.

But it would be useless to enumerate instances in proof of the assertion, that the earlier the development of the mental faculties, the more speedy the decay of the bodily powers.

CHAPTER VII.

PRECOCIOUS TALENTS.

No common error is attended with worse consequences to the children of genius than the practice of dragging precocious talent into early notice, of encouraging its growth in the hot-bed of parental approbation, and of endeavouring to give the dawning intellect the precocious maturity of that fruit which ripens and rots almost simultaneously. Tissot has admirably pointed out the evils which attend the practice of forcing the youthful intellect. "The effects of study vary," says this author, "according to the age at which it is commenced; long-continued application kills the youthful energies. I have seen children full of spirit attacked by this literary mania beyond their years, and I have foreseen with grief the lot which awaited them; they commenced by being prodigies, and they ended by becoming stupid. The season of youth is consecrated to the exercise of the body, which strengthens it, and not to study, which debilitates and prevents its growth. Nature can never successfully carry on two rapid developments at the same time. When the growth of intellect is too prompt, its faculties are too early developed, and mental application is permitted proportioned to this development; the body receives no part of it, because the nerves cease to contribute to its energies; the victim becomes exhausted, and eventually dies of some insidious malady. The parents and guardians who encourage or require this forced application, treat their pupils as gardeners do their plants, who, in trying to produce the first rarities of the season, sacrifice some plants to force others to put forth fruit and flowers which are always of a short duration, and are inferior in every respect to those which come to their maturity at a proper season."

Johnson is, indeed, of opinion, that the early years of distinguished men, when minutely traced, furnish evidence of the same vigour or originality of mind, by which they are celebrated in after life. To a great many memorable instances this observation does not apply, but in the majority it unquestionably holds good, and especially in those instances in which the vigour which Johnson speaks of displays itself in the development of a taste for general literature, and still more for philosophical enquiries.

Scott's originality was early manifested as a story-teller, and not as a scholar; the twenty-fifth seat at the high school in Edinburgh was no uncommon place for him. Yet was the future writer of romance skilful in the invention and narration of tales of knight-errantry, and battles, and enchantments!"

Newton, according to his own account, was very inattentive to his studies, and low in his class, but was a great adept at kite-flying, with paper lanterns attached to them to terrify the country people of a dark night with the appearance of comets; and when sent to market with the produce of his mother's farm, was apt to neglect his business, and to ruminate at an inn over the laws of Kepler.

Bentham, we are told, was a remarkably forward youth, reading Rapin's England at the age of three years, as an amusement; Telemachus, in French, at the age of seven; and at eight the future patriarch of jurisprudence, it appears, was a proficient on the violin.

Professor Lesley, before his twelfth year, had such a talent for calculation, and geometrical exercises, that when introduced to Professor Robinson, and subsequently to Playfair, those gentlemen were struck with the extraordinary powers which he then displayed.

Goethe, in childhood, exhibited a taste for the fine arts; and at the age of eight or nine wrote a short description of twelve scriptural pictures.

Franklin, unconsciously, formed the outline of his future character from the scanty materials of a tallow-chandler's library; and the bias which influenced his after career, he attributes to a perusal in childhood of Defoe's Essay on Projections.

All these, with the exception of Scott and Lesley, arrived to extreme old age; but there is nothing in the early indication of the ruling pursuit of their after lives, that was likely to exert an unfavourable influence on health. Those early pursuits were rather recreations than laborious exertions, and far different in their effects from those we have spoken of in the preceding instances of precocious talent. That difference in the various kinds of literary and scientific pursuits, and the influence of each on life, the following tables are intended to exhibit; each list of names, it being remembered, containing twenty names, and the amount at the bottom of each the aggregate of the united ages.

CHAPTER VIII.

LONGEVITY OF PHILOSOPHERS, POETS, AND ASTRONOMERS.

From these tables it would appear, that those pursuits in which imagination is largely exerted is unfavourable to longevity. We find the difference between the united ages of twenty natural philosophers, and that of the same number of poets, to be no less than three hundred and sixty years; or in other words, the average of life to be about seventy-five in the one, and fifty-seven in the other.

Natural philosophy has, then, the first place in the list of studies conducive to longevity, and it may therefore be inferred, to tranquillity of mind, and bodily well-being: and poetry appears to occupy the last. Why should this be so? Is natural philosophy a less laborious study, or calls for less profound reflection than poetry? Or is it that the latter is rather a passion than a pursuit, which is not confined to the exertion of a particular faculty, but which demands the exercise of all the faculties, and communicates excitement to all our feelings? Or is it that the throes of imaginative labour are productive of greater exhaustion than those of all the other faculties?

Poetry may be said to be the natural language of the religion of the heart, whose universal worship extends to every object that is beautiful in nature or bright beyond it. But this religion of the heart is the religion of enthusiasm, whose inordinate devotion borders on idolatry, and whose exaltation is followed by the prostration of the strength and spirits.

"Poetry," as Madame De Stael has beautifully expressed it, "is the apotheosis of sentiment." But this deification of sublime conceptions costs the priest of nature not a little for the transfiguration of simple ideas into splendid imagery; no little wear and tear of mind and body, no small outlay of fervid feelings. No trifling expenditure of vital energy is required for the translation of fine thoughts from the regions of earth to those of heaven, and by the time that worlds of invention have been exhausted and new imagined, the poet has commonly abridged his life to immortalise his name. The old metaphysicians had an odd idea of the mental faculties, and especially of imagination, but which is fully as intelligible as any other psychological theory. They believed, we are told by Hibbert, that the soul was attended by three ministering principles—common sense, the moderator, whose duty it was to control the sensorium—memory, the treasurer, whose office it was to retain the image collected by the senses—and fancy, the handmaid of the mind, whose business it was to recall the images which memory retained, and to embody its conceptions in various forms. But as this handmaid was found to be very seldom under the control of the moderator, common sense, they attributed the constant communication between the heart and brain to the agency of the animal spirits which act through the nerves, as couriers between both. At one period conveying delightful intelligence, at other times melancholy tidings, and occasionally altogether misconceiving the object of their embassy. By this means both head and heart were often led astray, and in this confusion of all conceived commands and all concocted spirits—the visions of poets, the dreams of invalids, and the chimeras of superstition, had their origin. The greatest truths may be approached by the most fanciful vehicles of thought. Be these chimeras engendered where they may, in whatever pursuit the imagination is largely exercised, enthusiasm and sensibility are simultaneously developed, and these are qualities whose growth cannot be allowed to exuberate without becoming unquestionably unfavourable to mental tranquillity, and consequently injurious to health.

Again, we find the cool dispassionate enquiries of moral philosophy, which are directed to the nature of the human mind, and to the knowledge of truths whose tendency is to educate the heart by setting bounds to its debasing passions, and to enlarge the mind by giving a fitting scope to its ennobling faculties, are those pursuits which tend to elevate, and at the same time to invigorate our thoughts, and have no influence but a happy one on life. We need not be surprised to find the moral historians occupying the second place in the list of long-lived authors.

But, if the list of natural philosophers consisted solely of astronomers, the difference would be considerably greater between their ages and those of the poets, for the longevity of professors of this branch of science is truly remarkable. In the Times Telescope for 1833, there is a list of all the eminent astronomers, from Thales to those of the last century; and out of eighty-five only twenty-five had died under the age of sixty, five had lived to between ninety and a hundred—eighteen between eighty and ninety—twenty-five between seventy and eighty—seventeen between sixty and seventy—ten between fifty and sixty—five between forty and fifty—and four between thirty and forty. In no other pursuit does the biography of men of genius exhibit a longevity at all to be compared to this. No other science, indeed, tends so powerfully to raise the mind above those trivial vexations and petty miseries of life, which make the great amount of human evil. No other science is so calculated to spiritualise our faculties, to give a character of serenity to wonder, which never suffers contemplation to grow weary of the objects of its admiration. The tyranny of passion is subdued, the feelings tranquillised; all the trivial concerns of humanity are forgotten when the mind of the astronomer revels in the magnificence of "this most excellent canopy, the air; this brave o'rhanging firmament—this majestic roof, fretted with golden fire;" when he beholds worlds on worlds of diversified forms, rolling, in fields of immeasurable space: the planets that encircle the sovereign of our skies; the queen of night, that walks in beauty along the starry plain of heaven, and the innumerable specks, that may be suns to other systems! When he reflects on the display of the Almighty power and wisdom, in the immutability of the laws which regulate the motions of every orb; the wonderful velocity of some planets, and the astonishing precision of the complicated movements of the satellites of others, his faculties are bound up in astonishment and delight; but every emotion of his heart is an act of silent homage to the Author of this stupendous mechanism. Though he advances to the threshold of the temple of celestial knowledge, he knows the precincts which human science cannot pass; reason tells him, these are my limits, "so far may I go but no farther;" but he turns not away like the vain metaphysician, bewildered by fruitless speculations; for the voice of the spirit, that lives and breathes within him, encourages the hope that futurity will unveil the mysteries which now baffle the comprehension of science and philosophy. There glitters not a star above his head that is not an argument for his immortality; there is not a mystery he cannot solve that is not a motive for deserving it. And to the brightest luminary in the heavens, in the confidence of that immortality, he may say in the beautiful language of Campbell,

"This spirit shall return to him,
That gave its heavenly spark,
Yet think not, sun, it shall be dim
When thou thyself art dark!
No; it shall live again, and shine
In bliss unknown to beams of thine,
By him recalled to breath,
Who captive led captivity,
Who robbed the grave of victory,
And took the sting from death."

CHAPTER IX.

LONGEVITY OF JURISTS AND DRAMATISTS.

The lists of the law authors and the dramatists present a striking contrast in respect of age. Here we find a difference of one hundred and forty-six years: the gentlemen of the gown being so much longer lived than those of the sock and buskin. And here, again, the unfavourable influence of pursuits, in which imagination is largely exercised, is to be observed. Though law has occasionally to do with fiction, it is only in Ireland that it has to deal with fancy; so that the gentlemen of this profession have little to apprehend from the influence we have just spoken of; nevertheless, the result of this calculation in favour of the longevity is what we certainly did not expect. Generally speaking, no professional people have less salubrious countenances, or more of the sickly cast of thought in their complexions, than lawyers; and if Hygieia were to descend upon earth with the emblem of health in her right hand, in quest of half-a-dozen wholesome looking votaries, Westminster-hall is the last place the daughter of Esculapius would think of visiting. That famous letter of Xlander, the lawyer, prefixed to the work of Plombius, "De toenda valetudine togatorum," has admirably described the ill and uncomfortable conditions of that sort of life which the members of the legal profession generally lead. The work is so rare in this country, that we have been induced to transcribe the greater portion of the prefatory epistle. "I readily comply with your request, and willingly proceed to relate those infirmities and obstacles to health which seem most to follow the bustling life we lawyers are wont to lead, that you may be able to lay down for us more accurate rules and modes of managing our health, in the treatise you are about to publish on the disorders of the members of our profession.

"A country life is not only more agreeable but more healthful than that spent in town, in the discharge of public duties, which drag peculiar diseases after them. Stomachic and nephritic affections, and innumerable other ills that follow in their train, are the consequences of the sedentary habits of our city life. The sources of all our disorders is easily traced; that which murders us is the constant sitting that is unavoidable in our profession: we sit whole days like lame-cobblers, either at home or in the courts of justice; and when the meanest fellow in the state is either exercising his body, or unending in mind we must be in the midst of wrangling disputes.

"Though the condition of all men too busily employed is miserable, yet are they most miserable who have no leisure to mind their own affairs. The torment of the constant babbling in the courts is pleasantly of itself in that old play, where one complains to Hercules—'You know what wretchedness I underwent when I was forced to hear the lawyers plead. Had you been compelled to listen to them, with all your courage you would rather have wished yourself employed in cleansing the Augean stable.'

"It is an ugly custom we have brought into us of getting into a coach every foot we have to go; if we did but walk the fourth part of the distance that we ride a day, the evils of our sedentary habits might be greatly obviated by such exercise. But the world is come to the pass, that we seem to have lost the use of our feet, and doubtless you will think it necessary to recommend an ancient method of perambulating.

"Martial thought it madness for a hale young man to walk through the town on the feet of a quadruped. Another of our disadvantages is, that our doors are kept continually by a crowd of people. The most disgusting pettifoggers, and brawlers by profession, are over-teasing us with their outrageous jargon of the law. Now Seneca says a man cannot be happy in the midst of many people, for it fares with him as it does with a tranquil lake, which is generally disturbed by visitors.

"Another unreasonable annoyance of ours, is to be interrupted in our meals by business; and Hippocrates condemns all study soon after meals, especially in those of a bad digestion. So taken up are we—with the contentions of our clients, our own incessant cogitations, and daily attendance in courts and chambers, that we have no leisure to unbend our mind or to act the part of plain simple men in private life, but are obliged to personate a certain character; for our profession obliges us to be constantly observant of our steps. But as the philosopher again remarks—'those who exist under a mask cannot be said to lead pleasant lives,' for the pleasure of life consists in that open, sincere simplicity of mind and manner, that rather shuns than seeks observation.

"As for my way of living, it inclines to no extreme: a spare diet is perhaps fittest for the life we lead, for Celsus wrote not for us when he said, that men should eat much meat—though he subjoins the caution—provided they can digest it. Though we are not great drinkers in general, yet sometimes we give way to jollity in company, and mingle our wisdom with wine, without observing the nice limits of sobriety. But how far these things are to be allowed or avoided—how far it may be advisable to exercise the body, to correct the evils of repletion, to walk in the free air to expand the chest with plentiful breathings; how far it may be necessary occasionally to change scene or climate to renovate our strength and spirits—these are things in which we expect to be directed by your wisdom. Truly, it is most reasonable to advise us to take air and exercise, and to recreate our minds: holidays were set apart by public authority for that purpose. But we are like slaves, who have no remission from labour; on some festivals, indeed, we alternate our toil, but we do not lay it aside; we must attend to business in some shape or other, whether in listening to depositions abroad, or in giving opinions at home; we are like the persons described by Euripides—we are the slaves of the public, and our lives are in the hands of the people.

"Let us profit by the melancholy example of those who have tarried too long on the bench, or at the bar; and as years gain on us let us contract our toils, and secure an honest retreat for our old age, for its latter days are the lawyer's only holidays. In proper time, let us bid our long farewell to the bench and to the court.

"The first and middle terms of existence we sacrifice to the public—why should we not bestow the latter on ourselves? Let us take in due time the counsel of the Roman:—Pack up our awls at the approach of old age—and having lived in straits the greater portion of our days, let us die in harbour."

Such is the Sieur Xilander's account of the toils of the profession of which he was a distinguished member. But with all its labours, we find that our list of eminent lawyers indicates a length of life considerably greater than that of the imaginative pursuits of the poets, dramatists, novelists, and musical composers.

The distinction has been made between dramatists and poets, because the most numerous instances of advanced age are found amongst the former. The toils of the dramatist and those of the general poet are of a very different character; every dramatist, indeed, must be a poet, but many of the greatest poets have proved very indifferent dramatists. The list of the latter gives an amount of one hundred and five years more than the poets, and that of the dramatists two hundred and fifty-five years less than the natural philosophers. Though the difficulty of succeeding in this branch of poetry is infinitely greater than in any other, and imagination in no small degree is essential to its successful cultivation, it is still to a happy combination of other qualities, and the exercise of other and more sober faculties, that this art is indebted for success. The business of the dramatist is to realise the images of fancy, to clothe the airy conceptions of poetry in the garb of real life.

The aim of tragedy is to give breath and animation to exalted sentiments, to bring the dim shadows of imagination into being, and give to legendary exploits the vivid character of actual events. The office of Comedy, on the other hand, is to catch the living manners as they rise, to place the peculiarities of national character in their strongest light, to make the follies of the time the food of wit, and in the correction of malevolent absurdity to make ridicule do that for which reason may not be appealed to. In a word, to mingle mirth with morals, "to hold the mirror up to nature, to show virtue her own image, vice her own deformity, the very age and body of the time its form and pressure."

That the labours of dramatic composition have not the same depressing influence on the energies of life as those of the other branches of poetry, may be inferred from the astonishing fertility of dramatic invention, and likewise of the longevity of many of its authors. Lope de Vega is said to have written eighteen hundred pieces for the theatre; forty-seven quarto volumes of his works are extant, twenty-five of which are composed of dramas: he died of hypochondria in his seventy-third year; and little is it to be wondered at, that the literary malady should have closed the career of so voluminous an author. Goldoni wrote two hundred plays, which are published in thirty-one octavo volumes. Had Shakespeare attained the age of Goldoni, he would probably have been as prolific an author;—thirty-seven dramas have immortalised his short career, and these productions have to boast of a fate which those of no other dramatist, ancient or modern, ever met with. After an interval of two hundred years, five-and-twenty of his pieces still keep possession of the stage.

CHAPTER X.

LONGEVITY OF MEDICAL AUTHORS, AND MISCELLANEOUS WRITERS.

The amount of the united ages of the medical authors exceeds that of the novelists and essayists by one hundred and twelve years; and here again, the authors "of imagination all compact" are found very nearly at the bottom of the list, while those, into whose pursuits imagination little enters, in point of longevity rank high above them. It may be truly said, without any hyperbole, that every pursuit which ennobles the mind, has a tendency to invigorate the body, and by its tranquillising influence, to add to the duration of life.

That study which carries the contemplation of its followers to the highest regions of philosophy, we have already seen, is the pursuit, of all others, the most conducive to longevity. But the mechanism of the heavens is only more wonderful than that of the human form, because the magnitude of the scale on which the movements of that mechanism are carried on, require the greatest effort which the mind is capable of making, even imperfectly to conceive. But what is there more wonderful in the laws which regulate the motions of innumerable worlds, than that principle of life which animates the dust of which one human being is compounded? What is there more stupendous in the idea of the power that gives precision, velocity, and effluence to the swiftest and the brightest of those orbs, than in the conception of that power, which bestows the spirit of vitality and the attribute of reason on man? Infinite wisdom is only differently displayed; it matters not how, whether in the revolutions of the planets, or the circulation of the blood, in the transmission of solar light and heat, or in the mechanism of the eye, or the sensibility of the nerves, the enquiring mind is ultimately carried to the same creative power. But above all philosophers, to the medical observer what a miracle of wisdom is the formation of the human body, and the wonderful faculties superadded to its organisation! "What a piece of work is man! How noble in reason! how infinite in faculties! In form and moving how express and admirable! In action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a God! The beauty of the world! The paragon of animals!" In a word, the tendency of the pursuits of the physician is to enlarge his understanding, and to enlighten his views on every subject to which they are directed.

The list of miscellaneous writers is equally divided between the novelist and essayist. The former, whom we may consider as the regular practitioners of literature, appear to enjoy a greater length of days than their periodical brethren who cannot boast the voluminous dignity of the acknowledged novelist. The result, however, shows that the compulsory toil of periodical composition has a greater influence on health than voluntary labours to a far greater amount. This opinion is corroborated by an observation of Dr. Johnson, no mean authority on any subject connected with literary history. "He that condemns himself to compose on a stated day, will often bring to his task an attention dissipated, a memory embarrassed, a mind distracted with anxieties, a body languishing with disease; he will labour on a barren topic till it is too late to change it; for in the ardour of invention, his thoughts become diffused into a wild exuberance which the pressing hour of publication cannot suffer judgment to examine or reduce." There is, indeed, no labour more destructive to health, than that of periodical literature, and in no species of mental application, or even of manual employment, is the wear and tear of mind and body so early and so severely felt. The readers of those light articles which appear to cost so little labour in the various literary publications of the day, are little aware how many constitutions are broken down in the service of their literary taste.

But with the novelist, it is far different; they have their attention devoted, perhaps for months, to one continued subject, and that subject neither dry nor disagreeable. They have no laborious references to make to other books, they have to burthen their memories with no authorities for their opinions, nor to trouble their brain with the connection of any lengthened chain of ratiocination. They have but to knock at the door of their imagination to call forth its phantasies, and if the power of genius is present, "to collect, combine, amplify, and animate" the ideas these phantasies suggest; which, after all, are the creations of that faculty "without which judgment is cold, and knowledge is inert." To weave these phantasies into fiction, to call new worlds of imaginary being into existence, to endow an Anastasio or a Corianno with thoughts that breathe and words that burn, to picture a Rebecca, gazing from her dizzy casement on the tide of battle rolling beneath the castle walls, to bring the very spot to the mind's eye, where "death has broken the strong man's spear, and overtaken the speed of his war-horse:"—to invest the soldier of the cross, in his panoply of steel; like Cervantes, to carry the exaltation of knight-errantry to the extremest verge of credible absurdity, to array it against windmills; to couch the lance of the cavalier, and send his gallant steed against an army of soldadoes, or a flock of sheep, or to give the shadowy forms of mental entrancement a spiritualised being, made up of beauty and romance, or of baleful passions—a Flora M'ivor or a haggard Elspeth:—this is the business of the novelist, and it must be allowed no unpleasing occupation is it.

So far as the labour we delight in physics pain, pleasant unquestionably it is, but light and amusing as it may seem, still is it laborious.

The author of the Rambler has justly observed, it is no unpleasing employment "to write when one sentiment readily produces another, and both ideas and expression present themselves at the first summons; but such happiness the greatest genius does not always attain, and common writers know it only to such a degree as to credit its possibility." In fact, there is no man, however great his powers, to whom extensive composition is not a serious labour; and in fiction, those productions, like Sterne's, which seem to be the very outpourings of the mind, are generally those which cost the greatest effort.

The most accurate observer of nature, is generally the most painful thinker; the deepest thinker is seldom the best talker; and he whose memory draws least on his own imagination, (paradoxical as it may seem,) is often the most fluent writer. "Those animals," says Bacon, "which are the swiftest in the course are nimblest in the turn."

But the great evil of every department of literature which deals in fiction, is the habit the imagination acquires of domineering over sober judgment.

"In time," says the great moralist, "when some particular train of ideas has fixed the attention, all other intellectual gratifications are rejected, the mind, in weariness or leisure, recurs constantly to the favourite conception, and feasts on the luscious falsehood, whenever she is offended with the bitterness of truth. By degrees the reign of fancy is confirmed. She grows first imperious, and in time despotic. Then fiction begins to operate as reality, false opinions fasten on the mind, and life passes in dreams of rapture or anguish."

Such is the progress, but its origin is in the infatuation of the pursuits which draw him into labour beyond his strength, and causes a prolonged application to composition, because the interest of the subject renders the mind insensible to fatigue. Scott seldom exceeded fifteen pages a day, but even this for a continuance was a toilsome task, that would have broken down the health of any other constitution at a much earlier period. Byron, in his journal, says he wrote an entire poem, and one of considerable length, in four days, to banish the dreadful impression of a dream—an exertion of mind and body which appears almost incredible.

Pope boasts in one of his letters of having finished fifty lines of his "Homer" in one day; and it would appear to be the largest number he had accomplished.

Cowper, however, in his blank verse translation of the same author, for some time was in the habit of doing sixty lines a day; and even in his last illness, of revising one hundred lines daily. But of all literary labour that of Johnson appears the most stupendous. "In seven years," to use his own language, "he sailed a long and painful voyage round the world of the English language," and in that brief term produced his dictionary. The similar French performance occupied forty academicians nearly as many years.

During the period that Johnson was thus employed, he found leisure to produce his tragedy, to complete the "Rambler," the "Vanity of Human Wishes," and several minor performances. At the latter period, he speaks of having written forty-eight octavo pages of the "Life of Savage," in one day, and a part of the night.

Such labours as these, if they do not shorten life, are calculated to make it wretched, for hypochondria invariably follows close upon them.

CHAPTER XI.

LONGEVITY OF POLEMICAL AUTHORS—PHILOLOGISTS.

In the list of polemical authors we find the longevity of those of fixed opinions on the subject of religion greater, by a hundred and five years, than that of authors of unsettled sentiments on this important inquiry after truth. The only wonder is, that the ages of the former have not furnished a still larger amount, when the different effects on health and life are taken into account, of certainty of opinion on the most important of all subjects; of tranquillity and peace of mind on the one hand; and on the other, of inquiries that present difficulties, doubts, or disbelief—of mental anxiety, and of the insecurity of the virtue of those whose sole dependance is on worldly honour, whose only guidance is the philosophy of men as fallible as themselves.

The list of philologists exhibits very little difference from that of the divines in the amount of the united ages of each. Though many of the former have been devoted solely to scholastic pursuits, these pursuits to a great extent are necessary to qualify the latter for their profession. But seclusion from the world, and sedentary habits, can alone enable the philologist to make his memory the store-house of the erudition of past ages, or furnish the necessary materials for that vast pyramid of classical erudition, which is based on a catacomb of ancient learning, and has its apex in a cloud that sheds no rain on the arid soil beneath it.

The more we contemplate so wonderful a structure, the greater must be our disappointment if we fail to discover its utility, and the larger the surface over which its shadows are projected, the more must be questioned the advantage of the erroneous expenditure of time and labour that was necessary for the erection of such a pile. If Cobbett should ever deign to peruse these volumes, he will pardon our metaphor for the sake of its application; but none can be more sensible of the misfortune of entitling an opinion of the inutility of any branch of learning to the approbation of that gentleman than we are; but, nevertheless, we are inclined to question the advantage of a whole life's devotion to the study of the dead languages.

What good to science, or to society, has accrued from Parr's profound knowledge of the dialects of Greece? What original works, even on the subject of his own pursuit, have issued from his pen? A few tracts and sermons, and a new edition of "Bellendenus," are his only title to the remembrance of the next age.

Languages are but the avenues to learning, and he who devotes his attention to the formation of the pebbles that lay along the road, will have little leisure for the consideration of more important objects, whose beauty or utility arrest the attention of the general observer.

We have been carried away from the subject of the effects of sedentary habits to which the pursuits that are carried on in cloisters of ancient learning are apt to lead; but in truth, there remained little to be said on the subject. If such habits appear less injurious to health in this branch of study than might have been expected, it is only because memory and not imagination, industry and not enthusiasm, have to do with the pursuits of the philologist.

CHAPTER XII.

LONGEVITY OF MUSICAL COMPOSERS, SCULPTORS, AND PAINTERS.

Finally, we have to observe the extraordinary difference in the longevity of the musical composers, and that of the artists. We find the amount of life in the list of the sculptors and painters larger, by one hundred and twenty-eight years, than in that of the votaries of Euterpe.

Music is to sensibility what language is to poetry, the mode of expressing enthusiastic sentiments, and exciting agreeable sensations. The more imagination the composer is able to put into his music, the more powerfully he appeals to the feelings. Sensibility is the soul of music, and pathos its most powerful attribute.

Pythagoras imagined that music was the soul of life itself, or that harmony was the sum total of the faculties, and the necessary result of the concert of these faculties, and of the bodily functions.

Musical composition, then, demands extraordinary sensibility, an enthusiastic imagination, an instinctive taste, rather than deep thought. The same qualities differently directed make the poet. Is it, then, to be wondered at, that we should find the poets and the musical composers considerably shorter lived than the followers of all other learned or scientific pursuits, whose sensibility is not exercised by their studies, whose imaginations are not wearied by excessive application and enthusiasm? The term "genus irritabile" deserves to be transferred from the poetical to the musical tribe; for we take it that an enraged musician is a much more common spectacle than an irritated bard, and infinitely more rabid in his cholera.

Generally speaking, musicians are the most intolerant of men to one another, the most captious, the best humoured when flattered, and the worst tempered at all other times. Music, like laudanum, appears to soothe the senses when used in moderation, but the continual employment of either furries and excites the faculties, and often renders the best natured men in the world, petulant, irritable, and violent.

In the list of artists the sculptors and painters have been placed apart for the purpose of showing the greater longevity of the former. The united ages of both exceed the poet's amount of life by no less than three hundred and thirty-two years—an ample indication of the difference of the influence of the imagination and the imitative art on health. Many, we are aware, think that imagination enters as largely into the pursuits of painting as into poetry. But, if such were the case, sculpture might indulge in the vagaries and chimeras of fancy without being obliged to have recourse to the centaurs and satyrs of poetry for its monsters, and painting might not have had to borrow its most beautiful subjects from the servid description of Madonnas and Magdalens in the monkish records of the middle ages. It has been truly observed by an intelligent traveller, that "what the ancient poets fancied in verse, the sculptors formed in marble; what the priests invented afterwards in their cells, the painters have perpetuated on canvass. And thus the poetic fiction and the sacerdotal miracle—the ancient fable and the modern legend, by the magic influence of the chisel and the pencil, are handed down from age to age." A vivid perception of all that is sublime and beautiful in imagination is essential to the artist; but it does not follow because Hogarth had an excellent perception of the ridiculous, that nature had endowed him with the comic talent of a Liston. The elements of painting are said to be, invention, design, colouring, and disposition. But, if invention implies here original creative power, independent of the imagery of nature and poetry, or of events detailed in history, the term is erroneously applied. The sublimest effort of pictorial art that can be adduced in favour of the received opinion of the inventive genius of painting, is that wonderful picture of the Last Judgment, by Michael Angelo. But the majesty and glory, the terror and despair, that are depicted in it, are not invented, but embodied. The original of each outline is in the Sacred History, and our wonder is not more at the execution of such a design than at the boldness of the genius that had the courage to undertake it. Imagination is the power which the artist is least necessitated to call into action; judgment is the master excellence which is requisite to regulate and direct the minor qualities that are given by nature, or acquired by experience. "Good sense and experience," says Burke, "acting together, find out what is fit to be done in every work of art." Painting, in a word, is the adaption of poetry to the eye, the concentration of natural imagery—the skilful combination, in a limited space, of the idea of infinity, with the perception of objects that are visible at a glance. Many of the ancient painters, it is true, were tolerable poets. Michael Angelo and Salvator Rosa were good ones; but it does not follow that imagination is essential to the production of art. Some of the most eminent lawyers wrote excellent verses. Sir Thomas More, Jones, Blackstone, Erskine, and Curran, had considerable talents for poetry. But poetry has very little to do with law; neither has it with chemistry, and yet Sir Humphry Davy has left effusions of this kind behind him which would not be discreditable to any bard.

We may conclude with Goethe, "there is a difference between the art of painting and that of writing; their bases may touch each other, but their summits are distinct and separate." And from the list that have been noticed of the painters and poets, we have seen there is a wide difference between the influence of an imitative art and an imaginative pursuit, on health.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE LAST MOMENTS OF MEN OF GENIUS.

Though to the moralist it is of much less importance how a man dies than how he lives, it is nevertheless a matter of more than curiosity to enquire how far the words and actions, the theoretical philosophy and the practical conduct of men correspond in their last moments. In such moments, what influence has mental cultivation on the conduct of individuals? Or, is there indeed any perceptible difference between the bearing of the cultivated and uncultivated mind in the last scene of all? Generally speaking, the influence of literature and science over the mind and the demeanor of men, is at no period displayed to such advantage as at that of the close of life. What medical man has attended at the death-bed of the scholar, or the studious man, and has not found death divested of half its terrors by the dignified composure of the sufferer, and his state one of peace and serenity, compared with the abject condition of the unenlightened mind in the same extremity? Those, perhaps, who relinquish life with the most reluctance, paradoxical as it may appear to be, are to be found in the most opposite grades of society—those in the very highest and lowest walks of life. In different countries, likewise, it is singular in what different degrees people are influenced by the fear of eternity, and in what different ways the pomp of death, the peculiar mode of sepulture, reasonable views of religion, and terrifying superstitions, affect the people of particular countries. The Irish, who are certainly not deficient in physical courage, support bodily suffering, and encounter death, with less fortitude than the people of this country. A German entertains his fate, in his dying moments, more like a philosopher than a Frenchman. And, of all places in the world, the capital of Turkey is it, where we have seen death present the greatest terrors, and where life has been most unwillingly resigned. The Arabs, on the other hand, professing the same religion as the Turks, differ from them wholly in this respect, and meet death with greater indifference than the humbler classes of any other country, Mahomedan or Christian. It is truly surprising with what apathy an Arab, in extremity, will lay him down to die, and with what pertinacity the Turk will cling to life—with what object inportunity he will solicit the physician to save and preserve him.

In various epidemics in the East, we have had occasion to observe the striking difference in the conduct of both in their last moments, and especially in the expedition of Ibrahim Pasha to the Morea, when hundreds were dying daily in the camp at Suda. There the haughty Moslem went to the society of his colonial hordes like a miserable slave, while the good-humoured Arab went like a hero to his long last home. The difference in their moral qualities, and the moral superiority of the Egyptian over the Turk, made of the distinction.

The result of the observation of many a closing scene in various climes, leads to the conclusion that death is envisaged by those with the least horror, whose lives have been least influenced by superstition or fanaticism, as well as by those who have cultivated literature and science with the most ardour. "Of the great number," says Sir Henry Hallford, in his Essay on Death, "to whom it has been my painful professional duty to have administered in the last hours of their lives, I have sometimes felt surprised that so few have appeared reluctant to go to 'the undiscovered country, from whose bowels no traveller returns.'"

And probably, were it not for the adventitious terrors which are given to death—for all the frightful paraphernalia of the darkened chamber, the hideous vesture of the corpse, and the lugubrious visages of the funeral performers, the solemn mutes who 'mimic sorrow when the heart's not sad,' and all the frightful 'pomp and circumstance' of death—the sable pall, the waving plumes;—were it not for these, and the revolting custom of heightening the horrors of sepulture, the formal mode of doing violence to the feelings of the friends who stand over the grave, death might be divested of half its terrors, and its approach even hailed as a blessing by the majority of mankind—by those, at least, who are weary of the world, whatever portion of it they may be. Is it not Johnson who has said, there is probably more pain in passing from youth to age, than from age to eternity?

Professor Hufeland, whose observations on this subject are worth all the essays that have lately obtained a temporary notoriety, and that too without any chemical clap-traps or shreds and patches of ancient scholarship, has well observed in his work on longevity, "that many fear death less than the operation of dying. People, he says, form the most singular conception of the last struggle, the separation of the soul from the body, and the like. But this is all void of foundation. No man certainly ever felt what death is; and as inensibly as we enter into life, equally inensibly do we leave it. The beginning and the end are here united. My proof are as follows. First, man can have no sensation of dying; for, to die, means nothing more than to lose the vital power, and it is the vital power which is the medium of communication between the soul and body. In proportion as the vital power decreases, we lose the power of sensation and of consciousness; and we cannot lose life without at the same time, or rather before, losing our vital sensation, which requires the assistance of the tenderest organs. We are taught also by experience, that all those who ever passed through the first stage of death, and were again brought to life, unanimously as-asserted that they felt nothing of dying, but sunk at once into a state of insensibility."

"Let us not be led into a mistake by the convulsive throbs, the rattling in the throat, and the apparent pangs of death, which are exhibited by many persons when in a dying state. These symptoms are painful only to the spectators, and not to the dying, who are not sensible of them. The case here is the same as if one, from the dreadful contortions of a person in an epileptic fit, should form a conclusion respecting his internal feelings: from what affects us so much, he suffers nothing."

"Let one always consider life, as it really is, a mean state, which is not an object itself, but a medium for obtaining an object, as the multifarious imperfections of it sufficiently prove; as a period of trial and preparation, a fragment of existence, through which we are to be fitted for, and transmitted to, other periods. Can the idea, then, of really making this transition—of ascending to another from this mean state, this doubtful problematical existence, which never affords complete satisfaction, ever excite terror? With courage and confidence we may, therefore, resign ourselves to the will of that Supreme Being, who, without our consent, placed us upon this sublimity theatre, and give up to his management the future direction of our fate."

"Remembrance of the past, of that circle of friends who were nearest and always will be dearest to our hearts, and who, as it were, now smile to us with a friendly look of invitation from that distant country beyond the grave, will also tend very much to allay the fear of death."

There is one point connected with this subject—the brightening up of the mind previously to its dissolution; or, to use the common expression, "the lightness before death,"—on which a few words remain to be said. The notion that dying people were favoured beyond others with a spiritualised conception of things, not only relating to time, but likewise to eternity, was familiar to the ancients, and was probably borrowed by the Jews from the Egyptians, amongst whose descendants the words and wishes of a dying man are still regarded as manifestations of a spirit of wisdom that has risen superior to the weaknesses and passions of humanity. The doctrine, however, shared the fate of all similar opinions that are specious without being solid, and entertaining without being true: it was forgotten till revived by Aretæus; and from his time to that of Sir H. Hallford, millions of people were born and buried, and no indications of a prophetic spirit exhibited by the dying, or recorded of them, till the learned baronet produced his essay on the subject. In truth, this lighting up of the mind amounts to nothing more than a pleasurable excited condition of the mental faculties, following perhaps a state of previous torpor, and continuing a few hours, or oftentimes moments, before dissolution. This rousing up of the mind is probably produced by the stimulus of dark venous blood circulating through the arterial vessels of the brain, in consequence of the imperfect oxygenation of the blood in the lungs, whose delicate air-cells become impeded by the deposition of mucus on the surface, which there is not sufficient energy in the absorbents to remove, and hence arises the rattling in the throat which commonly precedes death."

The effect of this new stimulus of dark-coloured blood in the arterial vessels, appears strongly to resemble the exhilarating effects of the opium, inasmuch as physical pain is lulled, the sensations soothed, and the imagination exalted. Long-forgotten pleasures are recalled, old familiar faces are seen in the mind's eye, and well-remembered friends are communed with, and the imaginative power of giving a real presence to the shadowy reproductions of memory is busily employed, and a sort of delirium, or rather of mental exaltation, is the consequence, in which a rapid succession of ideas, in most instances apparently of an agreeable nature, pass through the mind, and the sense of bodily pain to all appearance is wholly overpowered. These phenomena were, perhaps, never more strikingly exhibited than in the case of the late Mr. Salt. The last three or four days of his life his mind seemed to have regained all its former activity. He spoke in various languages to his attendants, some of which, as the Amharic, he had not used for many years; he composed some verses that referred to his previous offerings, and repeated them with great energy to the friend who accompanied him. The prophetic spirit which, to some degree is supposed, by the authors we have alluded to, to be attained by the dying, was likewise aimed at, though not attained in this instance—for poor Salt frequently predicted that he would die on a Thursday, but the prediction was not accomplished.

Some of the following brief accounts of the closing scene of men of genius, may tend to illustrate the preceding observations, and to show how far a predominant passion or favourite pursuit may influence the mind even at the latest hour of life. In nearly every instance, "the ruling passion strong in death" is found to be displayed.

Rousseau, when dying, ordered his attendants to place him before the window, that he might once more behold his garden, and bid adieu to nature.

Addison's dying speech to his son-in-law was characteristic enough of the man, who was accustomed to inveigh against the follies of mankind, though not altogether free from some of the frailties he denounced. "Behold," said he to the dissolute young nobleman, "with what tranquillity a Christian can die!"

Roscommon uttered at the moment he expired, two lines of his own version of "Dies iræ."

Haller died feeling his pulse, and when he found it almost gone, turning to his brother physician, said, "My friend, the artery ceases to beat," and died.

Petrarch was found dead in his library, leaning on a book.

Bead died in the act of dictating.

Herder closed his career writing an ode to the Deity, his pen on the last line.

Waller died repeating some lines of Virgil.

Metastasio, who would never suffer the word death to be uttered in his presence, at last so far triumphed over his fears, that, after receiving the last rites of religion, in his enthusiasm he burst forth into a stanza of religious poetry.

Lucan died reciting some verses of his own Pharsalia.

Alfieri, the day before he died, was persuaded to see a priest; and when he came, he said to him with great affability, "Have the kindness to look in to-morrow—I trust death will wait four-and-twenty hours."

Napoleon, when dying, and in the act of speaking to the clergyman, reproved his sceptical physician for smiling, in these words—"You are above those weaknesses, but what can I do? I am neither a philosopher nor a physician; I believe in God, and am of the religion of my father. It is not every one who can be an atheist." The last words he uttered—Head—Army—evinced clearly enough what sort of visions were passing over his mind at the moment of dissolution.

Ta-so's dying request to Cardinal Cynthia was indicative of the gloom which haunted him through life; he had but one favour, he said, to request of him, which was, that he would collect his works, and commit them to the flames, especially his Jerusalem Delivered.

Leibnitz was found dead in his chamber, with a book in his hand.

Clarendon's pen dropped from his fingers when he was seized with the palsy, which terminated his life.

Chaucer died ballad making. His last production he entitled, "A Ballad, made by Geoffrey Chaucer on his death-bed, lying in great anguish."

Barthelemy was seized with death while reading his favourite Horace.

Sir Godfrey Kneller's vanity was displayed in his last moments. Pope, who visited him two days before he died, says, he never saw a scene of so much vanity in his life; he was sitting up in his bed, contemplating the plan he was making for his own monument.

Wycherly, when dying, had his young wife brought to his bed-side, and having taken her hand in a very solemn manner, said, he had but one request to make of her, and that was, that she would never marry an old man again. There is every reason to believe, though it is not stated in the account, that so reasonable a request could not be denied at such a moment.

"Bolingbroke," says Spence, "in his last illness, desired to be brought to the table where we were sitting at dinner; his appearance was such that we all thought him dying, and Mrs. Arbuthnot involuntarily exclaimed, 'This is quite an Egyptian feast.'" On another authority he is represented as being overcome by terrors and excessive passion in his last moments, and, after one of his fits of cholera, being overheard by Sir Harry Milmay complaining to himself, and saying, "What will my poor soul undergo for all these things?"

Keats, a little before he died, when his friend asked him how he did, replied in a low voice, "Better, my friend. I feel the daisies growing over me."

In D'Israeli's admirable work on "Men of Genius," from which some of the preceding accounts are taken, many others are to be found, tending to illustrate more forcibly, perhaps, than any of those instances we have given, the soothing, and if the word may be allowed, the benign influence of literary habits on the tranquillity of the individual in his latest moments.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE IMPROVIDENCE OF LITERARY MEN.

If the misfortunes of men of genius were unconnected with their infirmities, any notice of them, however brief, would be irrelevant to the subject of these pages. In literature itself, there surely is nothing to favour improvidence, or to unfit men for the active duties of life; but in the habits which literary men contract from excessive application to their pursuits, there is a great deal to disqualify the studious man for those petty details of economy and prudence, which are essential to the attainment of worldly prosperity. "It is incongruous," says Burns, " 'tis absurd to suppose that the man, whose mind glows with sentiments lighted up at the sacred flame of poetry—a man whose heart distends with benevolence to all the human race, who soars above this little scene of things, can condescend to mind the paltry concerns about which the terre-filial race fret, and fume, and vex themselves." Poor Burns had evidently his own improvidence in view when he made this observation, but he must have been the most simple-minded of bards if he expected to disarm the censure of the world by it. Its charity may sometimes extend to the eccentricities of genius, but seldom to the poverty that springs from its improvidence. The greatest explosion of periodical morality that we remember to have occurred for some years, took place in most of the newspapers of the day, not many months ago, on the occasion of the appearance of the life of a celebrated bard, in which the biographer had unfortunately spoken of the poetic temperament as one ill calculated to favour the cultivation of the social and domestic ties. Many men of genius have unquestionably been every thing that men should be in all the relations of private life; therefore, with those outrageous moralists, there was no reason why all men of genius should not be patterns of excellence to all good citizens, husbands, fathers, and economical managers of private affairs. No reason can be given why they should not be such. We only know, that such the majority of them unfortunately are not; and, indeed, in the varied distribution of nature's gifts, when we generally find the absence of one excellence atoned for by the possession of another, it would be in vain to expect a combination of all such advantages in the same individual. Nature cannot afford to be so profusely lavish even to her favourites. It is somewhat singular, that those instances of pre-eminent genius, accompanied by well-regulated conduct and domestic virtues, which are adduced in opposition to the notion that the temperament of genius exerts an unfavourable influence on the habits of private life, are of persons who never took upon them the ties of husbands or of fathers. And had they done so, who knows what their conduct might have been in these relations? Newton, Galileo, Michael Angelo, Locke, Hume, Pope, never married; neither did Bacon, Voltaire, and many other illustrious men, who either distrusted their own fitness for the married state, or were afraid to stake their tranquillity on the hazard of the matrimonial die.

Whatever doubt there may be, whether the man who lives sibi et musis in his study, and not in society, who communes with former ages, and not with the events which are passing around him, is eminently qualified for the duties and offices of married life, it cannot be denied that his habits, and the tendency of his pursuits, are ill calculated to make him a provident or a thrifty man.

In all ages and in all countries, poverty has been the patrimony of the muses. Johnson, Goldsmith, Fielding, and Butler, commenced their literary career in garrets, from which, no doubt, they had as unimpeded a prospect of the workhouse as the summits of Parnassus are said to afford. Even Addison wrote his Campaign in a garret in the Haymarket. Camoens died in an almshouse, and fifteen years afterwards had a splendid monument erected to his memory. It was with the poor man of genius in that day as the present: "And they who loathed his life, might gild his grave." Chatterton lies buried in Shoe-lane workhouse, and Otway expired in a pot-house. The Adventurer goes so far as to state, that not a favourite of the Muses, since the days of Amphion, was ever able to build a house. Poor Scott, however, did more than build one, and the example is certainly not encouraging to authors.

But perhaps there is not another instance, even in this land of wealth, of an author by profession dwelling in a habitation of his own erection.

Burton ascribes the heedlessness of literary men, of

* In the Quarterly Review for April, the explanation of the phenomena here glanced at is sensibly and intelligibly given, and may be referred to with advantage for larger information on this subject.

their own affairs, and consequently their poverty, to the unhappy influence of the Muses' destiny. "When Jupiter's daughters," he says, "were all married to the gods, the Muses alone were left solitary, probably because they had no portions. Helicon was forsaken of all suitors, and Calliope only continued to be a maid, because she had no dower." Petronius, he narrates, knew a scholar by the meanness of his apparel. "There came," saith he, "by chance into my company, a fellow not very spruce to look on, whom I could perceive, by that note alone, to be a scholar, whom commonly all rich men hate. I asked him what he was? and he answered—I a poet. I demanded, why he was ragged? he told me this kind of learning never made any man rich."

"All which our ordinary students," says Burton, "right well perceiving in the Universities, how unprofitable are these poetical and philosophical pursuits of theirs, apply themselves, in all haste, to more commodious and lucrative professions. They are no longer heedful of knowledge—he who can tell his money, hath arithmetic enough: he is a true geometrician, who can measure a good fortune to himself: a perfect astrologer, who can cast the rise and fall of others, and turn their errant motions to his own advantage: the best optician, who can reflect the beams of a great man's favour, and cause them to shine upon himself."

Æneas Sylvius says he knew many scholars in his time "excellent, well-learned men, but so rude, so silly, that they had no common civility, nor knew how to manage either their own affairs, or those of the public."

"They are generally looked down upon," continues Burton, "on account of their carriage, because they cannot ride a horse, which every clown can manage; salute and court a gentlewoman; carve properly at table; cringe and make conceits, which every common swasher can do." They cannot truly vaunt much of their accomplishments in this way; they belong to that race, of one of whom Pliny gave the description—"He is yet a scholar: than which kind of men there is nothing so simple, so sincere, and none better."

But the miseries of Grub-street are no longer known; well-fed authors may be daily encountered in "the Row," and no writer of any repute perambulates the town, at least within a rood of Bond-street, in a thread-bare coat. In short, there is a general opinion that literature has of late become a lucrative employment; that God has mollified the hearts of booksellers—"hearts," which in by-gone times had "become like that of Leviathan, firm as a stone, yea hard as a piece of nether mill-stone."

It is commonly imagined, that because it has become the fashion for people of rank to write books, there are no poor authors, no "patient merit" unrewarded in the metropolis—no unfortunate men of genius condemned to bear "the whips and scorns of the time," to hawk about their intellectual wares from publisher to publisher, till they are tempted, like poor Collins, to consign them to the flames; to dance attendance on some bashaw of "the trade," who rubs his soft hands, while he is sifting, not the merit of the performance, but the politics and connections of the author; and when he has duly ascertained that he is dealing with a man of the principles which every author who is a gentleman is supposed to profess, he then may be open to an offer for the work, and perhaps in as many weeks as days have been promised,—(and if the author is a very poor and modest man,) in as many months—the manuscript may be examined, and in all probability very civilly declined by one whose promises may have proved the bitter bread of disappointment, and who never may have known what it is to feel that sickness of the heart which arises from hope deferred. Or perhaps the poor author may try his fate elsewhere, and his heart may die away within him, while he is kept waiting in an ante-room for the customary period of solitary confinement, that is sufficient to subdue the ardent expectations of an author, before he is admitted to the presence of "the great invisible." But when at length his form is revealed to the author's eye, emerging from a pile of fashionable publications, to be frozen to death by inches by the cold civility of his smile, to be asked in "bated breath and bondsman key," for the nature of the influence that is to push the book, and in default of an aristocratic name, and a fashionable acquaintance, to be bowed like a mandarin to the outer door, is what he has to expect, and to be assured all the time that the work is a very good work in its way, but that authors who would be read, must have titles as well as their books, and that nothing short of a baronetcy will go down in a title-page.

If it be imagined there are no authors now-a-days, pining as in former times, in want and wretchedness, because their destitution is not so much obtruded on the public as it formerly was wont to be, little is the condition of a vast portion of the literary men of London known. Because shame may not allow them to parade their poverty before the eyes of their fellow-men in Regent street or Hyde Park, because their seedy garments and attenuated forms are not to be seen in public places, forsooth they exist not!—alas! they are to be found elsewhere, and their familiar companions are still but too frequently

*Pallentes morbi, luctus, curæque laborque
Et metus, et malesuada fames, et turpis egestas
Terribiles visu formæ.*—

But it would be absurd, as well as unjust, to attribute the misfortunes of literary men to the conduct of those whose business it is to cater for the literary taste of the public. If authors have to complain, it is of the system on which the book trade is carried on, and not of the individuals who are employed in it: generally speaking, it must be acknowledged, men more liberal and more honourable are not to be met with.

It cannot be denied that literary men are too often desirous to cover their own imprudence by taxing the world with neglecting merit, by railing at fortune for the blind distribution of her gifts. "Many of the English poets," says Goethe, "after spending their early years in folly and licentiousness, have afterwards thought themselves entitled to deplore the vanities of human life. It is unreasonable of those who have wholly devoted themselves to the acquisition of fame, and not of fortune, to expect the advantages that are solely in the latter's gift. Forson, in his embarrassment, thought it a hard case, that with all his Greek, he could not command a hundred pounds; and Burns, in his letters, whines about his poverty, as if he had expected, by the cultivation of poetry, to have amassed a fortune."

The most sensible observations we have ever seen on this subject are those of a lady, whose reputation deservedly ranks high in the literary world, and such is their merit, that we may be permitted to end this subject with their insertion.

"The poet complains of his poverty when he sees a rich booby wallowing in wealth, forgetting such wealth is acquired or retained by such paltry arts as he disdains to practise; if he refuse to pay the price, why expect the purchase? We should consider this world as a great mart of commerce, where wealth, ease, fame, and knowledge, are exposed to our view. Our industry and labour are so much ready money, which we are to lay out to the best advantage. Examine, choose, or reject the wares, but stand to your own judgment, and do not like children, when you have purchased one thing, repine that you do not possess another, which you did not purchase. If you would be rich, you must put your heart against the Muses, and be content to feed your understanding with plain and household truths. You must keep on in one beaten track, without turning to the right hand or the left. 'But I cannot submit to drudgery like this—I feel a spirit above it.' 'Tis well to be above it then, only do not repine that you are not rich."

"Is knowledge the pearl of price? you see that too may be purchased by steady application, and long solitary hours of study and reflection. 'But,' says the man of letters, 'is it not a hardship that many an illiterate fellow, who cannot construe the motto on his coach, shall raise a fortune, and make a figure, while I have little more than the common necessities of life?'"

"Was it in order to raise a fortune you consumed the sprightly hours of youth in study and retirement? Was it to be rich that you grew pale over the midnight lamp? You have then mistaken your path, and ill employed your industry. 'What reward have I then for all my labours?' What reward!—A large comprehensive soul, well purged from vulgar fears, and perturbations, and prejudices, able to interpret the works of man and God. A rich, flourishing, cultivated mind, pregnant with inexhaustible stores of entertainment and reflection. A perpetual spring of fresh ideas, and the conscious dignity of superior intelligence. Good heavens! and what reward can you ask beside?"

"If a mean dirty fellow should have amassed wealth enough to buy half a nation, is it a reproach upon the economy of Providence? Not in the least. He made himself a mean dirty fellow for that very end. He has paid his health, his conscience, his liberty for it, and will you envy him his bargain? Will you hang your head and blush in his presence, because he outshines you in show and equipage? Lift your head with a noble confidence, and say to yourself, 'I have not these things, it is true; but it is because I have not sought them; it is because I possess something better. I have chosen my lot; I am content and satisfied.'"

CHAPTER XV.

APPLICATION OF THE PRECEDING OBSERVATIONS.

The history of men of genius affords abundant proof that the habits of literary men are unfavourable to health, and that constant application to those studies, whose acknowledged tendency is to exalt the intellect, and to enlarge the faculties of the mind, are nevertheless productive of consequences similar to those which arise from physical infirmities. "The conversation of a poet," says Goldsmith, "is that of a man of sense, while his actions are those of a fool."

There is no reason why folly should emanate from poetry; but we have reason enough to know that many mental infirmities arise from sedentary habits and their accompanying evils; yet in the face of modern biography, it requires a little courage to assert that bodily disease has an influence over the feelings, temper, or sensibility of studious men, and that it gives a colour to character, which it is often impossible to discriminate by any other light than that of medical philosophy. In the following pages we purpose to illustrate this opinion, by referring to the lives of a few of those individuals, the splendour of whose career has brought, not only their frailties, but their peculiarities into public notice, and by pointing out, in each instance, those deviations from health which deserve to be taken into account in fairly considering the literary character.

The most frequent disorders of literary men are dyspepsia and hypochondria, and in extreme cases, the termination of these maladies is in some cerebral disorder, either mania, epilepsy, or paralysis, and these we intend to notice in the order of their succession in the following brief sketches of the physical infirmities of Pope, Johnson, Burns, Cowper, Byron, and, lastly, Scott, in whose case the absence of the ordinary errors of genius may be ascribed in a great measure to well-regulated habits, which certainly were not those of the others here mentioned.

POPE.

For about three quarters of a century the public laboured under the delusion that Pope was a poet, and moreover a man of tolerable morals, till an amiable clergyman, instigated no doubt by the most laudable motives, took upon himself to disabuse the world of its error, and to pull down the reputation of Homer's translator from the eminence it had undeservedly attained. It was an adventurous task, and one which required a mind fraught with all the fervour of literary controversy, and actuated solely by an honest detestation of false pretensions and flagrant imposition. He had to invade the title of an impostor to literary immortality; he had to impugn the character of a man who is supposed to have had some virtues, and whose failings had unfortunately been almost forgotten; and verily, the task was performed with signal intrepidity, though not perhaps with complete success. A troublesome opponent took the field in defence of a brother bard's disparaged fame, and he laid about him like one who was accustomed to spare no critic in his rage, and no reviewer in his anger. The distinction of being attacked by such an adversary was the only advantage to be gained by the contest; but this advantage was purchased at the expense of considerable punishment. The controversy was a hot one, and the fame of the individual who was the subject of the quarrel had to pass through an ordeal of fire; but phoenix-like, the character of the poet rose triumphant from the flames, albeit the conduct of the man came forth, not altogether unscathed by the conflagration. Not even Byron's genius could rescue the memory of Pope from the obloquy of the long forgotten errors that had been piled up by the indefatigable industry of his opponent; for in attempting to palliate those errors, the bodily infirmities of the victim of the controversy were overlooked, and no satisfactory explanation was given of that peevishness of temper, and waywardness of humour, which unquestionably tarnished the character of this favourite—we had almost said, this spoiled child of genius.

The following references to his habits and temperament may probably throw some little light on the nature of his failings, and tend even to remove the impression which the animadversions of Mr. Bowles may have produced. "By natural deformity, or accidental distortion," we are told by Johnson, "the vital functions of Pope were so much disordered, that his life was a long disease." The deformity alluded to arose from an affection of the spine, contracted in infancy, and to which the extreme delicacy of his constitution is to be attributed.

When it is recollected that the nerves which supply the abdominal viscera with the energy that is essential to their functions, are derived from the spinal column; the cause of the disorder of his digestive powers during the whole of his life is easily conceived. As he advanced in life the original complaint ceased to make any further progress, and its effects on his constitution might have been removed by due attention to regimen and exercise; but instead of these, active medicines and stimulating diet were the means he constantly employed of temporarily palliating the exhaustion, and obviating the excitement consequent on excessive mental application. None of his biographers, indeed, allude to his having suffered from indigestion; and it is even possible that he might not have been himself aware of the nature of those anomalous symptoms of dyspepsia, which mimic the form of every other malady; such symptoms of giddiness, languor, dejection, palpitation of the heart, constant headache, dimness of sight, occasional failure of the mental powers, exhaustion of nervous energy, depriving the body of vital heat, and the diminution of muscular strength, without a corresponding loss of flesh, he frequently complains of; and every medical man is aware, that they are the characteristic symptoms of dyspepsia.

One patient calls his disorder spleen, another nervousness, another melancholy, another irritability: the medical nomenclature is no less prolific, but all their titles are for a single malady, and "not one of them," says Dr. James Johnson, in his admirable treatise on the "Morbid Sensibility of the Stomach," "expresses the real nature of the malady, but only some of its multifarious symptoms. Of all these designations, indigestion has been the most hackneyed title, and it is, in my opinion, the most erroneous. The very worst forms of the disease—forms in which the body is tortured for years, and the mind ultimately wrecked, often exhibit no sign or proof of indigestion, in the ordinary sense of the word, the appetite being good, the digestion apparently complete."

The fact is, that where pain is not the character of the disease, the attention of the patient is carried to the symptoms in organs, perhaps the remotest from the cause; and in this particular disorder the patient is seldom or ever sensible of pain in the actual seat of it.

We are told by Pope's biographer, "that the indulgence and accommodation that his sickness required, had taught him all the unpleasant and unsocial qualities of a valetudinarian man." And in various other passages we are informed that he was irascible, capricious, peevish, and resentful; often wanton in his attacks, and unjust in his censures; that he delighted in artifice in his intercourse with mankind, so that he could hardly drink tea without a stratagem; that his cunning sometimes descended to such petty parsimony as writing his composition on the backs of letters, by which perhaps he might have saved five shillings in five years, (a crime against stationery, by the way, which he shared in common with Sir Walter Scott), that although he occasionally gave a splendid dinner, and was enabled to do so on an income of about eight hundred a year, his entertainment was often scanty to his friends, and he was capable of setting a single pint upon the table, and saying to his guests when he retired, "Gentlemen, I leave you to your wine." We are told, moreover, that his satire had often in it more of petulance, personality, and malignity, than of moral design, or a desire to refine the public taste.

These are serious charges against the justice and amiability of his character; and probably there is a great deal of truth in them, but they only apply to his character, not to his disposition.

There is a paradox in the conduct of literary men, which makes it necessary to draw a distinction between their actions, and their sentiments, between the author with a pen in his hand, and the man without it; between the character that is formed by the world, and the disposition which is only known by private friends.

Johnson has pictured Pope as he really appeared to the world; but Bolingbroke spoke of him when he was in his death-bed, not as he appeared to be, but as he knew him to have been, when he said to his weeping attendants,—"I have known him these thirty years; he was the kindest hearted man in the world." Who knows under what paroxysm of mental irritation of that disease which, more than any other, domineers over the feelings of the sufferer, he might have written those bitter sarcasms which he levelled against his literary opponents? Who knows in what moment of bodily pain his irascibility might have taken the form of unjustifiable satire, or his morbid sensibility assumed the sickly shape of petulance and peevishness? Who knows how the strength of the strong mind might have been cast down by his sufferings, when "he descended to the artifice" of imitating on a bookseller, and of "writing those letters for effect which he published by subterfuge?" Who, that has observed how the vacillating conduct of the dyspeptic invalid imitates the vagaries of this proteiform malady, can wonder at his capriciousness, or be surprised at the anomaly of bitterness on the tongue, and benevolence in the heart, of the same individual?

But Pope's biting sarcasm was only aimed at his enemies. Byron little cared whether friend or foe was the victim of his spleen; those he best loved in the world were those who suffered most from the bitterness of his distempered feelings. To read those injurious lines on "Rogers," that have lately appeared, and which never ought to have been dragged into public notice, is to fancy the malignity of Byron greater even than Milton's, which (we are falsely told) was sufficient to make hell grow darker at its scowl.

But whose, in this instance, was the greater malignity of the two—the writer of productions, penned, in all probability, under the excitement of mental irritability and bodily infirmity, without a moment's forethought, or an aim, or an object, beyond the miserable gratification of seeing on paper the severest thing he could say of his best friend: an exercise of melancholy, to try how far poetic ingenuity could exaggerate the foibles of those he knew to be exempt from grave defects—written without premeditation, and never intended for publicity;—or the deep deliberate malignity of the literary jackal, that panders to the rage of the noble-hearted lion, and then prowls about his lair, and steals away, when the creature sleeps, the provender of the mangled disjecta membra humanitatis, for the "omni vorantia et homicida gula" of the savage community of his own species?

Who might not wish that "a whip were placed in every honest hand," to punish the offender, who, reckless of the feelings of the living, and regardless of the fame and honour of the dead, dragged those effusions into light which were born in the obscurity of the study, and never meant to be sent beyond its precincts? No malignity is comparable to his, for whom there is no sanctity in the grave, in friendship no respect, and no restraint on the pen that perpetuates a slander that had otherwise been forgotten.

But what have the failings of Lord Byron, or the perfidy of his friends, to do with our subject?—little more, indeed, than to break up the monotony of the task of recording the infirmities of his brother bard. That these had their origin in his dyspeptic malady, we have little doubt.

"From numerous facts," says Dr. James Johnson, which have come within my own observation, I am convinced that many strange antipathies, disgusts, caprices of temper, and eccentricities, which are considered solely as obliquities of the intellect, have their source in corporeal disorder.

"The great majority of those complaints which are considered as purely mental, such as irascibility, melancholy, timidity, and irresolution, might be greatly remedied, if not entirely removed by a proper system of temperance, and with very little medicine. There is no accounting for the magic-like spell, which annihilates for a time the whole energy of the mind, and renders the victim of dyspepsia afraid of his own shadow, or of things, if possible more unsubstantial than shadows.

"It is not likely that the great men of the earth should be exempt from these visitations any more than the little; and if so, we may reasonably conclude that there are other things besides 'conscience' which 'make cowards of us all'; and that by a temporary gastric irritation many an 'enterprise of vast pith and moment' has had 'its current turned awry,' and 'lost the name of action.'

"The philosopher and the metaphysician, who know but little of these reciprocities of mind and matter, have drawn many a false conclusion from, and erected many a baseless hypothesis on, the actions of men. Many a happy thought has sprung from an empty stomach; many a terrible and merciless edict has gone forth in consequence of an irritated gastric nerve.

"Thus health," continues the author we have just quoted, "may make the same man a hero in the field, whom dyspepsia may render imbecile in the cabinet."

It was under the influence of this malady that Pope's better judgment was occasionally warped, and that his feelings, for the time, swayed to and fro with his infirmities. On no other supposition can the anomalies in his character be reconciled. Both of his early biographers admit that his writings, especially his letters, were at variance with his conduct; they exhibit, we are told by Johnson, a distaste of life, a contempt of death, a perpetual and unclouded effulgence of general benevolence and particular affection; "but it is easy," he adds, "to despise death, when there is no danger, and to glow with benevolence when there is nothing to be given."

But surely it is not so very heinous an offence against the epistolary statute of sincerity, to "assume a virtue," even "when we have it not;" and Johnson, himself, even questioned the truth of the common opinion, that "he who writes to his friend, lays his bosom open before him. Very few," he says, "can boast of hearts which they dare lay open to themselves; and, certainly, what we hide from ourselves we do not show to our friends. In the eagerness of conversation the first emotions of the mind often burst out before they are considered, but a friendly letter is a calm, deliberate performance, in the cool of leisure, in the stillness of solitude; and surely no man sits down to depreciate, by design, his own character. By whom can a man wish to be thought so much better than he is, than by him whose kindness he desires to gain or keep? Even in writing to the world there is less restraint."

But though his letters are filled with those ordinary topics of literary correspondence, a sense of the worthlessness of his own productions, a spirit of invulnerability against the shafts of censure, nevertheless though censure is the tax, according to Swift, which a man pays to the public for being eminent, no one paid that tax with a worse grace than Pope. "There are but three ways," (he remarks elsewhere,) "for a man to revenge himself of the censure of the world; to despise it, to return the like, or to endeavour to live so as to avoid it. The first of these is usually pretended, the last is almost impossible—the universal practice is for the second." Pope, forsooth, did practise the second with a vengeance, but to use the expression Johnson applied to another of the genus irritabile, he still was "a sapling on the summit of Parnassus, blown about by every wind of criticism."

How severely he suffered from his malady may be inferred from the account Johnson has given of his habits and condition about the middle of his life. "His constitution," he says, "which was originally feeble, became now so debilitated that he stood in perpetual need of female attendance; and so great was his sensibility of cold, that he wore a kind of fur doublet under a shirt of very coarse warm linen. When he rose he was invested in a bodice made of stiff canvass, being scarcely able to hold himself erect till it was laced, and he then put on a flannel waistcoat. His legs were so slender, that he enlarged their bulk with three pairs of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid; for he was not able to dress or undress himself, and he neither went to bed nor rose without help." This extraordinary necessity for artificial warmth was an evident indication of the deficiency of nervous energy; and what could be expected from the prostration of mental and bodily power, the inevitable consequence of such a miserable condition of the system, but irritability of temper, peevishness, and petulance? "It is said," says Dr. James Johnson, "and I believe with justice, that an infant never cries without feeling some pain.

"The same observation might be extended to maturer years, and it might be safely asserted that the temper is never unusually irritable without some moral or physical cause—and much more frequently a physical cause than is suspected. A man's temper may undoubtedly be soured by a train of moral circumstances, but I believe that it is much more frequently rendered irritable by the effects of those moral causes on his corporeal organs and functions. The moral cause makes its first impression on the brain, the organ of the mind. The organs of digestion are those disturbed sympathetically and re-act on the brain; and thus the reciprocal action and re-action of the two systems of organs on each other produce a host of effects, moral as well as physical, by which the temper is broken, and the health impaired."

Head-ache was the urgent symptom which Pope constantly complained of, and this he was in the habit of relieving by inhaling the steam of coffee. It is difficult to conceive on what principle this remedy could alleviate his sufferings; but from the manner in which he aggravated them by improper diet, it is very probable that his remedy was no better than his regimen. It appears that, like all dyspeptic men, he was fond of every thing that was not fit for him. "He was too indulgent to his appetite," says his biographer; "he loved meat highly seasoned, and if he sat down to a variety of dishes, he would oppress his stomach by repletion; and though he seemed to be angry when a dram was offered him, he did not forbear to drink it: his friends, who know the avenues to his heart, pampered him with presents of luxury which he did not suffer to stand neglected. We are told by Dr. King, his contemporary and friend, that his frame of body promised any thing but long health, but that he certainly hastened his death by feeding much on high seasoned dishes, and drinking spirits."

From the various accounts given of his mode of living, and of the sufferings it entailed on him, it was evident that his appetite was depraved by indigestion; and it is no less obvious, that constitutional debility induced by that deformity, either natural or accidental, under which he laboured from his cradle, had given the predisposition to this disorder. His frequent head-aches, and the sensation of confusion and giddiness after application to study, or excess in diet, those premonitory symptoms of dyspepsia, he appears to have looked upon as his original disease, whereas the stomach was the seat of his disorder, and the affection of the head only sympathetic with it. Yet it must be admitted, that when literary men are the subjects of this disorder, that it is very often exceedingly difficult to determine whether the head or the stomach is primarily affected; but in whichever of them is its origin, so immediate is the influence of the one on the other, that the treatment is not materially embarrassed by our uncertainty of the primary seat of the disease. It is the nature of parts sympathetically affected to become disordered in their functions, rather than organically diseased: at least it is a considerable period before any alteration of structure in a symptomatic disorder takes place. The interval between the two results is occupied by a long train of anomalous ills, which are generally denominated nervous. The term is vague and unmeaning enough for all the purposes of nosology. It implies a host of sufferings which sap the strength and sink the spirits of the invalid, and this hydra-headed malady may continue for years an incubus on his happiness, which utterly destroys not health, but renders valetudinarianism a sort of middle state of existence between indisposition and disease. The symptomatic affection of the head only becomes an organic disease, when the long-continued cause has given it such power that the effect acquires the force of a first cause in its influence on an organ previously weakened or predisposed to disease. It is then easily conceived how the simple head-ache, in the case of Pope, continued for years symptomatic of a disorder of the stomach, aggravated by mental excitement and improper diet; till the disturbance of the functions of the brain ultimately debilitated that organ, and left it no longer able to resist the effects of the constant exercise of the mental faculties. The result of such long-continued disturbance of the cerebral functions, there is generally great reason to apprehend, will be either alteration in the structure, softening of its substance, or effusion serous or sanguineous.

There is great reason to believe that one of these terminations took place in the case of Pope several years before his death, as it was found to have done in the case of Swift, and more recently in that of Scott. Even when Pope was apparently in the enjoyment of tolerable health, he had evident symptoms of pressure on the brain, or at least of an unequal and imperfect distribution of the blood in that organ. Those symptoms are only noticed by his contemporaries as curious phenomena connected with his habits of life. Spence says he frequently complained of seeing every thing in the room as through a curtain, and on another occasion of seeing false colours on certain objects. At another time, on a sick bed, he asked Doddsley what arm it was that had the appearance of coming out from the wall; and at another period he told Spence, if he had any vanity, he had enough to mortify it a few days before, for he had lost his mind for a whole day. Well might Holingbroke say, "the greatest hero is nothing under a certain state of the nerves; his mind becomes like a fine ring of bells, jangled and out of tune!"

The debility of his constitution in his latter years rendered his existence burthensome to himself and others; his irritability increased with his infirmities, and the peevishness of disease was aggravated by the unkindness and unfeeling conduct of the woman who had been his companion and attendant for many years. The frequent expression of his weariness of life hardly deserves the suspicion of affectation which Johnson entertained of its sincerity. Surely there must have been no little inherent melancholy in the temperament of a man who, in Johnson's own words, "by no merriment either of others or his own, was ever seen excited to laughter."

For five years previous to his decease he had been afflicted with asthma; his constitution was completely shattered, and at length dropsy, the common attendant on long sufferings and extreme debility, made its appearance. He was for some time delirious, but a day or two before his death he became collected. He was asked whether a Catholic priest should not be called to him; he replied, "I do not think it is essential, but it will be very right, and I thank you for putting me in mind of it." The calm self-possession, the dignity, and the decorum of his reply, well became the last moments of a Christian philosopher; the forms of his religion had no hold of his affections, but that was no reason why its duties should be neglected, or why the feelings of those who believed in the efficacy of its forms should be outraged. Death at length happily terminated the sufferings of a life which was a long disease, for such was the career of Pope, from his cradle to the tomb, in which he was deposited in his fifty-sixth year.

Whatever were his infirmities, however great their influence on his temper or his conduct, it appears that neither his irascibility, nor his capriciousness, had ever estranged a real friend. His biographer, who has spared none of his failings, has admitted this fact. The cause of his defects was too obvious to those who were familiar with him, to be overlooked; they knew that ill-health had an unfavourable influence on his character, and that knowledge was sufficient to shield his errors from inconsiderate censure, and uncharitable severity.

CHAPTER XVI.

JOHNSON.

"There are many invisible circumstances," says the author of the Rambler, "which, whether we read as enquirers after natural or moral knowledge, whether we intend to enlarge our science, or increase our virtue, are more important than public occurrences. All the plans and enterprises of De Witt are now of less importance to the world, than that part of his personal character which represents him as careful of his health, and negligent of his life."

There are three peculiarities in Johnson's character which every one is aware of, his irascibility, his superstition, and his fear of death; but there are very many acquainted with these singular inconsistencies of so great a mind, who are ignorant, or at least unobservant, of that malady under which he laboured, from manhood to the close of life, the symptoms of which disease are invariably those very moral infirmities of temper and judgment, which were his well known defects. Few, indeed, are ignorant that he was subject to great depression of spirits, amounting almost to despair, but generally speaking, the precise nature of his disorder, and the extent of its influence over the mental faculties, are very little considered.

There are a train of symptoms belonging to a particular disease described by Cullen, and amongst them it is worth while to consider whether the anomalies that have been alluded to in the character of Johnson are to be discovered. The following are Cullen's terms:

"A disposition to seriousness, sadness, and timidity as to all future events, an apprehension of the worst and most unhappy state of them, and, therefore, often on slight grounds, an apprehension of great evil. Such persons are particularly attentive to the state of their own health, to every the smallest change of feeling in their bodies; and from any unusual sensation, perhaps of the slightest kind, they apprehend great danger and even death itself. In respect to these feelings and fears, there is commonly the most obstinate belief and persuasion." It is needless to say, the disease that is spoken of is hypochondria. Whether Johnson was its victim, or whether the defects in his character were original imperfections and infirmities, natural to his disposition, remains to be shown in the following pages.

We have a few words to say of the nature of hypochondria, which need not alarm the general reader; so little is known of anything relative to it besides its symptoms, that very little can be said upon the subject. In the first place it may be as well to acknowledge that the seat of the disorder is unknown. Secondly, be the seat where it may, the nature of the morbid action that is going on, we likewise know not; and, thirdly, that it is a disorder little under the influence of medicine, almost all medical authors do admit. These admissions, we apprehend, bring the question to very narrow limits; to limits which trench on the boundaries of every literary man's estate: for, indeed, the most important points left for consideration are whether men of studious habits are more subject than other men to this disorder; and if more so, whether the moral infirmities of the hypochondriac are entitled to more indulgence than those of an individual who labours under no such depressing ailment.

In proof of the first assertion, we have only to say, that Hippocrates places the seat of the disorder in the liver; Boerhaave in the spleen; Hoffman in the stomach; Sydenham in the animal spirits; Broussais in the intestines; and Willis in the brain. In corroboration of the second, we have but to adduce Sydenham, describing it as a disease of debility; Dr. Wilson Phillip, as one of chronic inflammation; and Dr. James Johnson, (and, perhaps, with the most reason,) as one of morbid sensibility: but, like taste, there is no accounting for theories.

For the truth of our last proposition, we appeal to general experience, for the confirmation of the opinion, that time and temperance are the two grand remedies of morbid melancholy. The symptoms of hypochondria are generally preceded by those of indigestion, though not in very many cases accompanied by them, and not as frequently do those of hypochondria degenerate into one form or other of partial insanity; in short, hypochondria is the middle state between the vapours of dyspepsia and the delusions of monomania. One of the greatest evils of this disorder is the injustice that is invalid is exposed to from the common opinion that it is the weakness of the sufferer, and not the power of the disease, which makes his melancholy "a thing of life apart;" and the neglect of exerting his volition, which enables it to take possession of his spirits, and even of his senses. His well meaning friends see no reason why he should deem himself either sick or sorrowful, when his physician can put his finger on no one part of his frame, and say, 'Here is a disease;' or when the patient himself can point out no real evil in his prospect, and say, 'Here is the cause of my dejection.' It is vain to tell him his sufferings are imaginary, and must be conquered by his reason, and that the shapes of horror, and the sounds of terror, which haunt and harass him by day and night, are engendered in his brain, and are the effects of a culpable indulgence in gloomy reveries. In his better moments he himself knows that it is so, but in spite of every exertion those reveries do come upon him; and instead of recoiling from the gulf they open beneath his feet, he feels like a timid person standing on the verge of a precipice, irresistibly impelled to fling himself from the brink on which he totters. It were than useless to reason with him about the absurdity of his conduct—his temper is only irritated: it is cruel to laugh at his delusions, or to try to laugh him out of them—his misery is only increased by ridicule.

It may be very true, that he exaggerates every feeling; but, as Dr. James Johnson has justly observed, "all his sensations are exaggerated, not by his voluntary act, but by the morbid sensibility of his nerves, which he cannot by any exertion of his mind prevent." Railery, remonstrance, the best of homilies, the gravest lectures, do not answer here; the argument must be addressed to the disordered mind, through the medium of the stomach. A well regulated regimen, and an aromatic aperient, may do more to remove the delusion of the hypochondriac, than any thing that can be said, preached, or prescribed to him.

Indigestion is often one of the accompanying symptoms of hypochondria; but, as we have before remarked, it may be often wanting in the severest forms of the disorder, yet there is great reason to regard hypochondria in no other light than that of an aggravated form of dyspepsia. At all events there is no shape of this disease, as Dr. J. Johnson has observed, which is not aggravated by intemperance in diet, and not mitigated by a salutary regimen. Burton's account of the horrors of hypochondria, is one of the most graphic of all the descriptions of its sufferings. "As the rain," said Austin, "penetrates the stone, so does this passion of melancholy penetrate the mind. It commonly accompanies men to their graves; physicians may ease, but they cannot cure it; it may lie hid for a time, but it will return again, as violently as ever, on slight occasions as well as on casual excesses. Its humour is like Mercury's weather-beaten stature, which had once been gilt; the surface was clean and uniform, but in the chinks there was still remnant of gold: and in the purest bodies, if once tainted by hypochondria, there will be some relics of melancholy still left, not so easily to be rooted out. Solon does this disease procure death, except (which is the most grievous calamity of all) when the patients make away with themselves—a thing familiar enough amongst them when they are driven to do violence to themselves to escape from present insufferable pain. They can take no rest in the night, or if they slumber, fearful dreams astonish them, their soul abhorreth all meat, and they are brought to death's door, being bound in misery and in iron. Like Job, they curse their stars, for Job was melancholy to despair, and almost to madness. They are weary of the sun and yet afraid to die, ricore nati et mori neant. And then, like Esop's fishes, they leap from the frying-pan into the fire, when they hope to be eased by means of physic;—a miserable end to the disease when ultimately left to their fate by a jury of physicians furiously disposed; and there remains no more to such persons, if that heavenly physician, by his grace and mercy, (whose aid alone avails,) do not heal and help them. One day of such grief as theirs, is as an hundred years: it is a plague of the sense, a convulsion of the soul, an epitome of hell; and if there be a hell upon earth it is to be found in a melancholy man's heart! No bodily torture is like unto it, all other griefs are swallowed up in this great Euripus. I say of the melancholy man, he is the cream and quintessence of human adversity. All other diseases are trifles to hypochondria; it is the pith and marrow of them all! A melancholy man is the true Prometheus, bound to Caucasus; the true Tityus, whose bowels are still devoured by a vulture."

CHAPTER XVII.

JOHNSON CONTINUED.

Our attention was some time ago called to the peculiarities of Johnson's malady, by an attack which we heard made on his feelings and infirmities by one of the greatest of our living poets: and one of those literary ephemeras who flutter round the light of learning.

We heard it asserted that Johnson "was far behind the intelligence of his age; that his mind was so imbued with the legends of the nursery, and the fables of superstition, that his belief extended to the visionary phantoms of both." In short, that he had neither the heavenly armour of religion, which is hope and confidence in the goodness of the Deity—nor the earthly shield of honour, which is freedom of spirit and fearlessness of death.

The minor critic, with supercilious air, spoke of the ferocious powers of the great bear of learning, the unrepresentable person of the "respectable Hottentot," who had knocked down his bookseller with one of his own folios. He inveighed against the coarseness of his manners, the tyranny of his conversation, and the uncouthness of his appearance: had the present been his day, he would hardly be tolerated in good society. An author so ignorant of the "lesser morals" as to be capable of thrusting his fingers into a sugar-basin, of rolling about his huge frame in company, to the great peril of every thing around him, would certainly not be endured westward of Temple Bar; and none but Boswell could be mean enough to put up with his vulgar arrogance.

We listened with patience so long as the bard was disparaging his brother; but when the minnow of literature had the audacity to assail the Triton of erudition, to use an elegant Scotticism—our corruption rose, and though the memory of the doctor had been reviled no less by the bard than the gentleman just spoken of, we could not help expressing an opinion in an audible voice, that it was something after all to be torn to pieces by a lion, but to be gnawed to death by a rat, was too loathsome a fate for the worst malefactor.

That an author of the doctor's outward man and uncompromising manners would cut a very sorry figure in Holland house, is very possible. If Foscolo got into irretrievable disgrace for standing on a chair in the library to reach a volume, how surely would the doctor, by some unhappy exploit, some sturdy opinion or unfortunate disposition of his members, bring the vengeance of offended patronage, and outraged delicacy, on his head!

Nevertheless, Johnson was not behind the intelligence of his age, though his manners were uncompromising, his energy of character oftentimes offensive, his person ungainly, though his "local habitation" had been even eastward of Temple Bar, and though his "name" has become associated in some minds with the idea of a rcondite savage. There is something in the expression "uncouth appearance" which implies vulgarity, and therefore is it that one like Pope, with a distorted figure, or like Byron with a deformed foot, is less subject to disagreeable observations, than one so "unfashionably made up" as the great lexicographer. The uncouthness of Johnson's appearance, however, was the effect of disease, and arose from no natural imperfection: "His countenance," Boswell tells us, "was naturally well formed, till he unfortunately became afflicted with scrofula, which disfigured his features, and so injured his visual nerves, that he completely lost the sight of one of his eyes." Miss Seward says, that "when at the free school, he appeared a huge, over-grown, mis-shapen stripling, but still a stupendous stripling, who even at that early life maintained his opinions with sturdy and arrogant fierceness." But the picture is overcharged, and is probably painted in the colours of his subsequent character. At a very early age he was attacked with a nervous disorder which produced twitchings and convulsive motions of the limbs that continued during life, and which have been noticed and ridiculed as eccentric habits, and tricks of gesture, that he had accustomed himself to. Sir Joshua Reynolds says, "these tricks of Dr. Johnson proceeded from a habit which he had indulged himself in, of accompanying his thoughts with certain untoward actions, and those actions always appeared to me as if they were meant to reprobate some part of his past conduct." An odd way certainly of reprobating it; but there is no occasion to refer these motions to so mysterious an origin: the cause was unquestionably the disorder of his nervous system. The violence of his temper, and the gloom which overcast his religious feelings throughout his life, were no less evidently the effects of that morbid irritability which ultimately became a fixed and permanent hypochondria. "This malady," says his biographer, "was long lurking in his constitution, and to it may be ascribed many of his peculiarities in after life: they gathered such strength in his twentieth year as to afflict him dreadfully. Before he quitted Lichfield, he was overwhelmed with his disorder, with perpetual fretfulness, and mental despondency, which made existence miserable. From this malady he never perfectly recovered."

So great was the dejection of his spirits about this period, that he described himself at times as being unable to distinguish the hour upon the town-clock. As he advanced in life this depression increased in intensity, and diffused very little from the early symptoms of Cowper's malady: the only difference was in the quality of the minds which the disease had to prey upon; the different powers of resistance of a vigorous and a vacillating intellect. On one occasion Johnson was found by Dr. Adams in a deplorable condition, sighing, groaning, and talking to himself, and restlessly walking from room to room; and when questioned about his state, declaring "he would consent to have a limb amputated to recover his spirits."

The limits which separate melancholy from madness were brought to so narrow a compass, that had his malady advanced another step, it is lamentable to think that its mastery over the powerful mind of the sufferer would probably have been permanent and complete. The tortured instrument of reason was wound up to its highest pitch, and nothing was wanting to jangle the concord of its sweet sounds but another impulse of his disorder. His peace was wholly destroyed by doubts and terrors: he speaks of his past life as a barren waste of his time, with some disorders of body and disturbance of mind very near to madness. "His melancholy," says Murphy, "was a constitutional malady, derived, perhaps, from his father, who was at times overcast with a gloom that bordered on insanity." When to this is added, that "Johnson about the age of twenty, drew up a description of his infirmities for Dr. Swinfen, and received an answer to his letter, importing that the symptoms indicated a future privation of reason, who can doubt that an apprehension of the worst calamity that can befall humanity hung over his life, like the sword of the tyrant suspended over his head?" No one, indeed, can wonder that this terrible prognostic of insanity should cast its shadows before all his future hopes of worldly happiness: the only wonder is, that a physician could be found so ignorant of the moral duties of his calling, or so reckless of the feelings of a melancholy man, as to implant the very notion in his mind which it was his business to endeavour to eradicate if already fixed there; namely, that madness was to be the termination of his disease. Was this doctor simple enough to imagine, that there is any thing in genius which renders the intellect better able to support prospective evil, or the undisguised prognosis of a fearful malady, than the humble faculties of an ordinary mind? Simple indeed he would be to think so, and little acquainted with human nature.

But the error, we well know, is daily committed by the inexperienced, of supposing that literary men are possessed of strength of mind that may enable them to rise superior to the fears and apprehensions of the common invalid, and, consequently, that all reserve is to be laid aside, and the real condition of such patients freely and fearlessly exhibited to their view. This is a great mistake: the most powerful talents are generally united with the acutest sensibility, and in dealing with such cases the considerate physician has to encourage, and not to depress, the invalid: to temper candour with delicacy; and firmness above all things, with gentleness of manner, and even kindness of heart. If it be essential in one disease more than another for the physician to command the confidence of his patient, to engage his respect, and to convince him of the personal interest that is taken in his health and well-being—that disease is morbid melancholy.

Johnson was wont to tell his friends, that he inherited

"a vile melancholy" from his father, which made him "nrad all his life—or, at least, not sober." Insanity was the constant terror of his life; the opinion of Dr. Swinfen haunted him like a spirit of evil wherever he went; and at the very period, as Boswell observes, when he was giving the world proofs of no ordinary vigour of understanding, he actually fancied himself insane, or in a state as nearly as possible approaching to it.

Johnson's malady and Cowper's were precisely similar in the early period of each, as we have before remarked; the only difference was in the strength of mind of either sufferer. Cowper at once surrendered himself up to the tyranny of his disorder, and took a pleasure in parading the chains of his melancholy before the eyes of his correspondents, even when "immuring himself at home in the infected atmosphere of his own enthusiasm;" while Johnson struggled with his disease, sometimes indeed in a spirit of ferocious independence, and very seldom complained to his most intimate friends of his "humiliating malady." In no point was the vigour of his intellect shown in so strong a light as in this particular; for in no malady is there so great a disposition to complain of the sufferings that are endured, and to over-state their intensity, lest, by any possibility, they should be underrated by others.

CHAPTER XVIII.

JOHNSON CONTINUED.

Johnson's disorder (if we may be allowed the expression) had three phases, the character of each of which distinguished a particular period of his career, or rather predominated at a particular period, for it cannot be said that the hues of each were not occasionally blended. At twenty, however, his despondency was of a religious kind: about forty-five "his melancholy was at its meridian," and then had the shape of a fierce irritability, venting itself in irascibility of temper, and fits of capricious arrogance.

At the full period of "three-score years and ten," the leading symptom of his hypochondria was "the apprehension of death, and every day appeared to aggravate his terrors of the grave." This was "the black dog" that worried him to the last moment. Metastasio, we are told, never permitted the word death to be pronounced in his presence; and Johnson was so agitated by having the subject spoken of in his hearing, that on one occasion he insulted Boswell for introducing the topic; and in the words of the latter, he had put "his head into the lion's mouth a great many times with comparative safety, but at last had it bitten off."

"For many years before his death," says Arthur Murphy, "so terrible was the prospect of death, that when he was not disposed to enter into the conversation that was going forward, whoever sat near his chair might hear him repeating those lines of Shakespeare—

"To die and go we know not where."

He acknowledged to Boswell he never had a moment in which death was not terrible to him; and even at the age of sixty-nine he says he had made no approaches to a state in which he could look upon death without terror.

At seventy-five, we find him writing to his friends to consult all the eminent physicians of their acquaintance on his case. To his kind and excellent physician, Dr. Brocklesby, he writes, "I am loth to think that I grow worse, but cannot prove to my own partiality that I grow much better. Pray be so kind as to have me in your thoughts, and mention my case to others as you have opportunity." Boswell, at the same time, in Scotland, was employed in consulting the most eminent physicians of that country for him. In his last illness, when a friend of his told him he was glad to see him looking better, Johnson seized him by the hand, and exclaimed, "You are one of the kindest friends I ever had." It is curious to observe with what sophistry he sometimes endeavoured to persuade himself and others of the salutary nature of his excessive terrors on this head: he tells one friend that it is only the best men who tremble at the thoughts of futurity, because they are the most aware of the purity of that place which they hope to reach. To another, he writes that he never thought confidence with respect to futurity, any part of the character of a brave, a wise, or a good man. His executor, Sir John Hawkins, who lets no opportunity pass to blacken his character, speaks of his fear of death in terms which imply some crime of extraordinary magnitude weighing on his heart; it was with difficulty, he says, he could persuade him to execute a will, apparently as if he feared his doing so would hasten his dissolution. Three or four days before his death, he declared he would give one of his legs for a year more of life. When the Rev. Mr. Sastres called upon him, Johnson stretched forth his hand, and exclaimed in a melancholy tone, "Jam moriturus!" But the ruling passion of his disease was still strong in death; for at his own suggestion, when his surgeon was making slight incisions in his leg with the idea of relieving his dropsical disorder, Johnson cried out, "Deeper, deeper; I want length of life, and you are afraid of giving me pain, which I do not value."

"On the very last day of his existence," says Murphy, "the desire of life returned with all its former vehemence; he still imagined that by puncturing his legs relief might be obtained. At eight in the morning he tried the experiment, but no water followed." If Johnson's fear of death were not the effect of disease, it would be impossible to contemplate his conduct either in sickness or in sorrow, in his closet or in his death-bed, without feelings of absolute disgust. What other sentiment could be entertained "For him who crawls enamoured of decay, Clings to his couch, and sickens years away," and shudders at the breath of every word which reminds him of the grave? The bravest man that ever lived may not encounter death without fear, nor the best Christian envisage eternity with unconcern; but there is a difference between the feelings of either, and the slavish terrors of a coward in extremity. There is a distinction, moreover, which is still more worthy of observation—the wide distinction between the fear of death that springs from an inherent baseness of disposition, and that apprehension of it which arises from the depressing influence of a disease. Who can doubt that Johnson's morbid feelings on this point were occasioned by hypochondria? and what medical man, at least, is not aware that the fear of death is as inseparable a companion of hypochondria as preternatural heat is a symptom of fever?

We have now a few observations to make on the subject of Johnson's superstition; and we preface them with an observation of Melancthon, which deserves the attention of all literary men. "Melancholy" (says this amiable man, who had been himself its victim) "is so frequent and troublesome a disease, that it is necessary for every body to know its accidents, and a dangerous thing to be ignorant of them." One of these "accidents" is to confound the ideas of possible occurrences with those of probable events—a disposition to embody the phantoms of imagination, to clothe visions of enthusiasm in forms cognizable to the senses, and familiar to the sight; in short to give to "airy nothings a local habitation and a name."

This disposition was the secret of Rousseau's phantom, that scarcely ever quitted him for a day; of Luther's demons, with whom he communed in the solitude of his study; of Cowper's messenger, bearing the sentence of eternal reprobation; of Tasso's spirits gliding on a sun-beam; of Mozart's "man in black," the harbinger of death, who visited him dwelling a few days before his decease; and of Johnson's belief in the existence of ghosts, and the ministering agency of departed spirits. His sentiments on these subjects, though expressed in a work of fiction, are well known to have been his deliberate opinions. "That the dead are seen no more I will not undertake to maintain against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages and of all nations. There are no people, rude or learned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related or believed. This opinion, which perhaps prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth."

This is the language of the hypochondriac, not of the moralist, who in the exercise of a sober judgment must have known that the concurrent testimony of all experience and philosophy was opposed to the opinion that those who are once buried are seen again in this world.

There are many of what are called the peculiarities of Johnson's superstition, which excite surprise, but are not generally known to be the characteristic symptoms of hypochondria. "He had one peculiarity," says Boswell, "of which none of his friends ever ventured to ask an explanation. This was an anxious care to go out or in at a door, or passage, by a certain number of steps from a certain point, so as that either his right or left foot, I forget which, should constantly make the first actual movement. Thus, upon innumerable occasions, I have seen him suddenly stop, and then seem to count his steps with deep earnestness, and when he had neglected, or gone wrong, in this sort of magical movement, I have seen him go back again, put himself in a proper posture to begin the ceremony, and having gone through it, break from his abstraction, walk briskly on, and join his companion."—"Sir Joshua Reynolds has observed him go a long way about rather than cross a particular alley." His piety, we are told by Murphy, in some instances bordered on superstition, that he thought it not more strange that there should be evil spirits than evil men; and even that the question of second sight held him in suspense. He was likewise in the habit of imposing on himself voluntary penance for every little defect, going through the day with only one cup of tea without milk, and at other times abstaining from animal food.

He appears likewise to have had a superstitious notion of the efficacy of repeating a detached sentence of a prayer over and over, somewhat in the manner of a Turkish devotee, who limits himself daily to the repetition of a particular verse of the Koran. "His friend, Mr. Davies," says Boswell, "of whom Churchill says, 'that Davies hath a very pretty wife,' when Johnson began his repetition of 'lead us not into temptation,' used to whisper Mrs. Davies, 'you, my dear, are the cause of this.'" Many of these habits, however, if they were weaknesses, were the weaknesses of a pious and a good man, and were the result of early religious impressions, instilled into his mind by his mother "with assiduity," but, in his opinion, "not with judgment." Sunday, he said, was a heavy day to him: when he was a boy he was confined on that day to the perusal of the Whole Duty of Man, from a great part of which he could derive no instruction. "A boy," he says, "should be introduced to such books by having his attention directed to the arrangement, to the style, and other excellences of composition; that the mind being thus engaged by an amusing variety of objects, may not grow weary." Be this as it may, his superstitious notions and observances were encouraged, if not caused, by his disease.

CHAPTER XIX.

JOHNSON CONTINUED.

The indefatigable Burton has ransacked all medical authorities ancient and modern, for the symptoms of hypochondria; and amongst those he has enumerated, there is not one of Johnson's mis-called peculiarities, which is not to be found. "Many of these melancholy men," says Burton, "are sad, and not fearful—some fearful and not sad."—(Johnson, for instance, groaning in his chamber, as Dr. Adams found him, and at another period knocking down a bookseller in his own shop.) "Some fear death, and yet, in a contrary humour, make away with themselves." (Johnson, indeed, did not commit suicide, but his fear of death was never surpassed.) "Others are troubled with scruples of conscience, distrusting God's mercies, thinking the devil will have them, and making great lamentations." (Similar qualms and apprehensions harassed the doctor to his latest hour.) "One durst not walk alone from home for fear he should swoon or die." (The terror of such an occurrence probably contributed to confine the great moralist for so many years to his beloved Fleet Street.) "A second fears all old women as witches, and every black dog or cat he sees he suspecteth to be a devil." (Whether he believed in the witchery of old women, or young, we know not, but he was unwilling however to deny their power, and the black dog that worried him at home was the demon of hypochondria.) "A third dares not go over a bridge, or come near a pool, rock, or steep hill." (Johnson dared not pass a particular alley in Leicester Square.) "The terror of some particular death troubles others—they are troubled in mind as if they had committed a murder." (The constant dread of insanity we have already noticed, and the construction put on his expressions of remorse by Sir John Hawkins.) "Some look as if they had just come out of the den of Trophonius, and though they laugh many times, and look extraordinary merry, yet are they extremely lumpsy again in a minute; dull and heavy, semel et simul, sad and merry, but most part sad." (The den of Trophonius was his gloomy abode in Bolt Court, whence he sallied forth at night-fall, on his visit to the Mitre, and the gaiety and gloom have a parallel in the state of his spirits when at the university, such as extorted the melancholy denial to Dr. Adams of having been a "gay and frolicsome fellow" at college—"O, sir, I was mad, and violent, but it was bitterness which they mistook for frolic.") "Yet, for all this," continues Burton, summing up his account of the "madness of melancholy," in the words of an old author, "in all these things these people may be wise, staid, discreet, and do nothing unbecoming their dignity, place, or person—this foolish and ridiculous fear excepted, which continually tortures and crucifies their souls."

The habits of Dr. Johnson were most unfavourable to health—he was a late riser, a large eater, indolent and inactive. In the intervals of his disorder he laboured for a time to counteract the effects of these habits, and he so far succeeded in controlling his disease as to be able to divert those distressing thoughts, which it was a folly, he said, to combat with. To think these down, he told Boswell, was impossible, but to acquire the power of managing the mind he looked upon as an art, that might be attained in a great degree by experience and exercise. "Upon the first attack of his disorder," says Boswell, "he strove to overcome it by forcible exertion, and frequently walked to Birmingham and back again, and tried many other expedients, but all in vain; his expression to me was, 'I did not then know how to manage my disorder.'" One of the ways he proposed accomplishing this end was by continually occupying his mind, without fatiguing it, either by day, repeating certain words, in counting a certain number of steps; or at night, when wakefully disturbed, by burning a lamp in his bed-room, taking a book, and thus composing himself to rest. His grand precept was, "if you are idle be not solitary, if you are solitary be not idle." The great secret, however, of this management of mind appears to have been a periodical fit of abstinence, persevered in so long as the violence of any new attack of his malady was upon him. He was far from temperate in the pleasures of the table; he could drink his three bottles of wine, he says, and not be the worse for it; the capacity of his stomach we doubt not, but its insensibility is very questionable. The doctor, like the "great child of honour," was a "man of an unbounded stomach." Generally speaking, he fed grossly; he even boasted of his veneration for good living, and spoke of "an un-mindful of his belly as likely to be unmindful of every thing else." He sometimes talked with contempt of people gratifying their palate. Yet, when at table, Boswell says, "he was totally absorbed in the business of the moment; his looks were riveted to his plate, nor would he hardly speak a word, or pay any attention to what was said by others till he had satisfied his appetite, which was so fierce, and indulged with such intemperance, that while in the act of eating, the veins of his forehead swelled, and the perspiration on his features was visible." Nothing could induce him to go to an evening conversation, where there were no refreshments. "It will never do, sir; a man does not like to go to a place from which he comes out exactly as he went in." There can be very little doubt but that he aggravated his disorder by improper living, and drank more port wine than was likely to be of service to a man of sedentary habits—this was his favourite potation. "Bordeaux was a wine," he said, "in which a man might be drowned before it made him drunk; claret for me, sir—poor stuff—it is the liquor for boys. Port is the drink for men."

At fifty, however, his increasing ailments obliged him to give up wine altogether for near twenty years, but at the age of seventy-two he returned again to the use of it. "Still every thing about his character," says Boswell, "was forcible and violent, there never was any moderation; many a day did he fast, many a day did he refrain from wine; but when he did eat, he was voraciously—when he did drink, it was copiously." During the period that he abstained from wine, he took himself to the use of tea, but he was as intemperate a tea-drinker, as he had been formerly a wine-bibber. "The quantities," says Boswell, "which he drank of it at all hours was so great, that his nerves must have been uncommonly strong not to have been extremely relaxed by such an immoderate use of it." But, perhaps, one of the most injurious of his habits was the late hours, at all periods of his life, that he was in the habit of keeping. Like all hypochondriacs, he was a bad sleeper, and when sleepless he was accustomed, to use his own words, "to read in bed like a Turk"—not one of the doctor's happiest similes by the way—the Turk neither reads in bed nor out of it. In one of his letters, he says, "his life, from his earliest years, was wasted in a morning bed." "He has been often heard to relate," we are told by Murphy, "that he and Savage walked round Grosvenor Square till four in the morning; in the course of their conversation reforming the world, &c. until fatigued at length they began to feel the want of refreshment, but could not muster more than four-penny half-penny." There is a trifling inaccuracy in this account; St. James's, and not Grosvenor Square, was the scene of their nocturnal ramble. Poor Savage has been unjustly charged with being the cause of all the doctor's disorders, but at the age of forty-three we find him as disposed as ever for a ramble at unseasonable hours. On one occasion Beauclerk and Langton rapped him up at three in the morning, to prevail on him to accompany them. "The doctor," says Boswell, "made his appearance in his shirt, with his little black wig on the top of his head instead of a night-cap, and a poker in his hand, imagining that some ruffians had come to attack him; when he discovered who they were, and what their errand, he smiled with great good humour and agreed to their proposal. 'What! is it you, you dogs! I'll have a frisk with you.'" These habits, and the excesses they led to, were the fuel which fed his hypochondria; his occasional abstinence the damper which every now and then controlled its fury.

On his first arrival in London, abstemiousness was forced upon him by poverty, and in all probability it was his temperance at that critical period of his disorder, that enabled him to lay in a stock of bodily vigour which he might not have otherwise possessed. The man who could style himself Impransus, in his application to a publisher, or who was so reduced as to be arrested for a debt of five pounds, for the common necessities of life, could not have been very luxurious in his living. Yet this was one of "the sweet uses of adversity," he might then have little dreamt of, for the necessary abstemiousness he then practised, gave his constitution time to repair its shattered energies, and to invigorate him for a long and arduous campaign in the literary world. Subsequently, when the gloom of his disorder drove him into company to escape from the tyranny of his own sad thoughts, he contracted habits of conviviality, and to use one of his own grandiloquent terms, of gulosity, which rendered his vigils not only pleasing to the rosy god, but his taste for the good things of the table, a passion which "a whole synod of cooks" could hardly gratify. Poor Boswell complained that he was half killed with his irregularities in the doctor's company. Port, and late hours with Johnson, had ruined his nerves; but his friend consoled him with the assurance that it was better to be palsied at eighteen, than not keep company with such a man.

Quo ad vinum, Johnson loved his wine probably better than Burns did his whiskey; our great moralist loved it for its flavour, but the unfortunate bard liked it for its effects. The one flew to it for enjoyment, the other for relief; it was the difference between food and physic—between mirth and madness. The power of abstaining from "the inordinate cup that is unblest" contrasts the vigor of Johnson's mind with the lamentable weakness of Burns: the one could not abstain for a single day, while the other could give up his wine for twenty years, although he seemed to think not a little of the deprivation. It was a great deduction, he told Boswell, from the pleasures of life, not to drink wine.

CHAPTER XX.

JOHNSON CONTINUED.

His health began to break down about fifteen years before his death. "In 1766, his constitution," says Murphy, "seemed to be in a rapid decline, and that morbid melancholy which often clouded his understanding, came upon him with a deeper gloom than ever. Mr. and Mrs. Thrale paid him a visit in this situation, and found him on his knees with a clergyman, beseeching God to continue to him the use of his understanding." From this period to his seventy-third year his fits of melancholy were frequent and severe, though he continued to go into society as before; but lively as his conversation was at all times, his gaiety, he said, was all on the outside. "I may be cracking my jokes, and yet cursing the sun—sun, how I hate thy beams!"

In 1782, he complains of being "afflicted with a very irksome and severe disorder, that his respiration was impeded, and much blood had been taken away." His disorder was asthma: it appears that he was repeatedly bled for it, and subsequently the only relief he could obtain was by the daily use of opium to the extent of three or four grains. The propriety of this bleeding, at the age of seventy-three, for a spasmodic malady, which was capable of being relieved by opium, is more than questionable; there can, indeed, be very little doubt that it was fatal to the powers of his constitution, and that the palsy and dropsy which very soon ensued, were the effects of the debility so great a loss of blood occasioned. The diseases of old men whose vital energies have been expended in literary pursuits are seldom to be remedied by the lancet, and when employed in such cases, it is very often "the little instrument of mighty mischief," which Reid has termed it. About a year after his first attack of asthma, during which time he was frequently bled for the disorder, he was seized with paralysis, that malady which literary men more than any others have reason to guard against. The vigour of his great mind was manifested on this occasion in communicating the intelligence of his calamity to one of his friends. A few hours only after his attack, while he was deprived of speech, and of the power of moving from his bed, he so far triumphed over his infirmities as to write to Dr. Taylor the following account of his condition. "It has pleased God, by a paralytic stroke in the night, to deprive me of speech. I am very desirous of Dr. Heberden's assistance, as I think my case is not past remedy. Let me see you as soon as it is possible; bring Dr. Heberden with you, if you can; but come yourself at all events. I am glad you are so well, when I am so dreadfully attacked. I think that by a speedy application of stimulants, much may be done. I question if a vomit, vigorous and rough, would not rouse the organs of speech to action. As it is too early to send, I will try to recollect what I can that may be suspected to have brought on this dreadful disease. I have been accustomed to bleed frequently for an asthmatic complaint, but have forborne some time by Dr. Peppy's persuasion, who perceived my legs beginning to swell."

How strongly is the powerful intellect of Johnson, (yet unimpaired by his disorder,) shown in these few emphatic words! The urgency of the case, the necessity for prompt assistance, and the consciousness of the debility that had been brought on his constitution by so much depletion; and yet what extraordinary ignorance of the common principles of medicine is exhibited in the remedial plan he proposes for his relief! The merest tyro in the medical art would have seen nothing in the administration of the vomit vigorous and rough, but the prospect of aggravated danger, of increased determination to the head, and even of sudden death, though he might be aware that such a remedy had the sanction of some recent authorities.

The treatment of diseases is not, however, the subject we have to do with; we have only noticed a circumstance which proves how very ignorant of the principles of medicine, and of the nature of a disease which literary men are especially subject to, the most learned persons are frequently found to be.

Johnson survived his attack of paralysis a year and a half, during which time he laboured under a complication of disorders, gout, asthma, and dropsy, which rendered his life miserable, but yet did not prevent him from performing a journey to his native town, and from engaging on his return in his literary pursuits.

Johnson was one of those few fortunate children of genius who have not to complain of the tardy justice of their times: his great merit in his lifetime was universally acknowledged, and public as well as private admiration and gratitude were not limited to the justice that his memory was entitled to, but were displayed in acts of generosity that were calculated to reward the exertions of the living man, and to increase his comforts in sickness and distress. There was no subscription at his death for the purchase of his Bolt-court tenement, to be set on Mrs. Lucy Porter, of Lichfield, and her descendants—there was no appeal made to the pockets of the public for the erection of a pillar to perpetuate his fame; but the bounty of his sovereign was extended to him in his indigence, and in the hour of sickness the beneficent hand of private friendship and of public benevolence was held forth to him. When there was a question of enabling him to visit Italy for the recovery of his health, Lord Thurlow, we are told, offered five hundred pounds to meet the expenses of his journey: and his amiable physician, Dr. Brocklesby, signified his intention of adding a hundred a year to his income for life, in order that he might not want the means of giving to the remainder of his days tranquillity and comfort. The conduct of Brocklesby was worthy of the just and elegant compliment which Johnson paid to his profession, in his life of Garth. "I believe every man has found in physicians great liberality and dignity of sentiment, very prompt effusions of beneficence, and willingness to exert a lucrative art where there is no hope of lucre."

Johnson continued to struggle with his complaints till the latter part of 1784. His earnest and constant prayer, that he might be permitted to deliver up his soul unclouded to God, was granted: he died in his perfect senses, resigned to his situation, at peace with himself and in charity with all men, in his seventy-fifth year.

The circumstances that we have noticed, connected with the disorder of this great and good man, are amply sufficient to show that the many striking inconsistencies and eccentricities in his character and conduct, were occasioned by disease, or fostered by its influence. His original disorder, it is evident, was a scrofulous affection, which in early life debilitated his constitution, and gave that predisposition to hypochondria which dogged his whole career.

Hahneman, one of the best observers of disease (whatever his character as a pharmaceutical theorist may be) that medical science has to boast of, attributes half the disorders of humanity to a scrofulous or scorbutic taint in the constitution, and that such a taint is calculated to nurture and develop the seeds of an hereditary disease like that of Johnson's hypochondria, there can be little doubt. At all events, if proof were requisite, we trust sufficient has been adduced to show that Johnson's failings were largely influenced by the infirmities of disease, and were foreign to the original complexion of his disposition and the character of his noble nature.

CHAPTER XXI.

BURNS.

Every quarter of a century a revolution takes place in literary taste, the old idols of its worship are displaced for newer effigies, but the ancient altars are only overthrown to be re-established at some future time, and to receive the homage which they forfeited, on account of the fickleness of their votaries, and not in consequence of any demerits of their own.

It is not in the nature of Burns' productions that his fame should altogether set aside the remembrance of his follies; yet so ably and so philosophically has his biographer discharged his duty to the public and to the individual, whose genius he helped to immortalise, and so truly, in the spirit of a philosophical historian, has he traced the infirmities of Burns to their real origin, that were it only for the noble effort to vindicate the character of genius, Currie's Life of Burns would still deserve to be considered one of the best specimens of biography in the English language. And so long as its excellence had the freshness of a new performance to recommend it to the public, and to lay hold of its attention, the character of Burns was treated with indulgence, and his poetry was duly and justly appreciated.

But of late years there has been a tendency, in literary opinion, to underrate the merits of the Scottish bard, and even to exaggerate the failings of the man. The vulgarity of his errors and his unfortunate predilection for pipes and punch-bowls, it is incumbent on every sober critic to reprobate. Byron, who, in his aristocratic mood, had no notion of a poor man "holding the patent of his honours direct from God Almighty," could not tolerate the addiction of a bard to such ungentelemanly habits, and Burns was, therefore, in the eyes of the proud lord, a "strange compound of dirt and deity;" but his lordship, at the time of the observation, was in one of his fits of outrageous abstinence, and to use his own language, "had no more charity than a vinegar cruet."

Bulwer has also lately joined in depreciating the poor exciseman. It is the more to be regretted, as he has the credit of possessing more generosity of literary feelings, and less of the jealousy of genius, than most of his contemporaries.

Burns' fame has certainly declined in the fashionable world; but if it be any consolation to his spirit, his poetry continues as popular as ever with the poor. Its exquisite pathos has lost nothing of its original charm, but no volume is less the book of the boudoir—the fastidious imagination can hardly associate the idea of poetry with that of an atmosphere that is redolent of tobacco smoke and spirituous liquors.

The frailties of Burns are unfortunately too glaring to admit of palliation; but manifest as they are, much misapprehension we are persuaded prevails as to their character; a dog with a bad name is not in greater peril of a halter, than a poor man's errors are in danger of exciting unmitigated disgust.

In fashionable morality it is one thing to drink the "inordinate cup that is unblest" of claret or champagne, but quite another to "put an enemy in the mouth to steal away the senses" in the shape of whisky; similar effects may arise from both, but the odium is not a little in the quality, and not the quantity, of the potation. In the parlance of convivial gentlemen, to have a bout at the Clarendon is to exceed in the pleasures of the table; but to commit the same excess in a country ale-house, is to be in a state of disgusting intoxication. There is no question, however, but that wine is a "more gentlemanly tippie" than any kind of ardent spirits, and that its intoxicating effect is an "amabilis insaniam" of a milder character than the "rabis furibunda" which belongs to the latter. The excesses of the wine-bibber, moreover, are generally few and far between, while those of the dram-drinker are frequent, and infinitely more injurious to mind and body. In this country the poor man is debarred the use of wine; spirits are unfortunately the cheaper stimulant; but were it a matter of choice, he might prefer the former, as well as the French and Italian peasant.

There is one circumstance, however, which deserves consideration in forming any comparative estimate of intemperate habits. Different constitutions are differently effected by the same excitants. Johnson could boast of drinking his three bottles of port wine with impunity; but the doctor's was an "omni vorantia gula." Dr. Parr could master two without any inconvenience, but probably had Burns dined with either of them, he would have found the half of a Scotch pint might have caused him in the morning "to have remembered a mass of things, but nought distinctly," and to conclude he had been drinking the "vinum erroris ab ebriis doctoribus propinatum," as St. Austin denominates another inebriating agent. The sin of intemperance is certainly the same whether it be caused by one bottle or three, or whether the alcohol be concentrated in one form, or more largely diluted in another.

In Burns' time intemperance was much more common in his walk of life than it now is. In Pope's day we find not a few of his most celebrated contemporaries and immediate predecessors addicted to drunkenness. "Cowley's death (Pope says) was occasioned by a mean accident while his great friend Dean Pratt was on a visit with him at Chertsey. They had been together to see a neighbour of Cowley's, who (according to the fashion of the times) made them too welcome. They did not set out on their walk home till it was too late, and had drank so deep, that they lay out in the fields all night. This gave Cowley the fever that carried him off."

Dryden, like Burns, was remarkable for sobriety in early life, "but for the last ten years of his life, (says Dennis,) he was much acquainted with Addison, and drank with him even more than he ever used to do, probably so far as to hasten his end." Yet in his case, as Byron's, wine seems to have had no exhilarating influence. Speaking of his melancholy, he says, "Nor wine nor love could make me gay." And Byron speaks of wine making him "savage instead of mirthful."

Parnell, also, (on Pope's authority,) "was a great follower of drama, and strangely open and scandalous in his debaucheries, (his excesses, however, only commenced after the death of his wife, whom he tenderly loved,) and "those helps," he adds, that sorrow first called in for assistance, habit soon rendered necessary, and he died in his thirty-sixth year, in some measure a martyr to conjugal fidelity, somewhat we presume in the way

"Of Lord Mount-Coffee-house, the British peer,
Who died of love with wine last year."

But another account describes Parnell's taking to drunkenness on account of his prospect declining as a preacher at the queen's death, "and so he became a sot, and finished his existence."

Churchill was found drunk on a dunghill.

Prior, according to Spencer, "used to bury himself for whole days and nights together with a poor mean creature, his celebrated Chloe," who, unlike Ronsard's Cassandra, was the bar-maid of the house he frequented. And even Pope, we are told by Dr. King, hastened his end by drinking spirits.

Precedents, however, are no plea for crime, and to multiply them would be useless for any other purpose than to deprecate the infliction of an excessive penalty in a single instance, because the latest though not perhaps the most enormous.

If Burns' irregularity deserved the name of habitual intemperance, it was only during the latter years of his life. Till his three-and-twentieth year, he was remarkable for his sobriety, no less than for the modesty of his behaviour. Had he continued at the plough, in all probability he would have remained a stranger to the vices that his new career unfortunately led him into. It was only, (he tells us,) when he became an author, that he got accustomed to excess, and when his friends made him an exciseman, that his casual indulgence in convivial pleasures acquired the dominion of a settled habit.

In early life he laboured under a disorder of the stomach, accompanied by palpitations of the heart, depression of the spirits, and nervous pains in the head, the nature of which he never appears to have understood, but which evidently arose from dyspepsia. These sufferings, be it remembered, are complained of in his latter years before he had committed any excess; and so far from being the consequence of intemperance, as they are generally considered to have been, the exhaustion they produced was probably the cause which drove him in his moments of hypochondria, to the excitement of the bottle for a temporary palliation of his symptoms.

No one but a dyspeptic man, who is acquainted with the moral martyrdom of the disease, can understand the degree of exhaustion to which the mind is reduced, and the insupportable sense of sinking in every organ of the body which drives the sufferer to the use of stimulants of one kind or another. Whether wine, alcohol, ammonia, or the black drop, it is still the want of a remedy, and not the pleasure of the indulgence which sends the hypochondriac to that stimulant for relief.

In one of Burns' letters to Dr. Moore, he mentions being confined by some lingering complaints originating in the stomach, and his constitutional melancholy being increased to such a degree, that for three months he was in a state of mind scarcely to be envied by the hopeless wretches who had received their final mittimus. From the period of his first committing "the sin of rhyme," which was a little previous to his sixteenth year, to the age of three-and-twenty, the excitement of the tender passion, which he appears to have felt not unfrequently in the fits of his hypochondria, seem to have had the effect of soothing the dejection, which in later life he employed other means to alleviate.

His biographer has noticed, as a curious fact, that his melancholy was always banished in the presence of women. "In his youth," we are told by his brother Gilbert, "he was constantly the victim of some fair enslaver; but these connections were governed by the strictest rules of virtue and modesty, from which he never deviated till his twenty-third year. He was only anxious to be in a situation to marry: nor do I recollect," he says, "till towards the era of his commencing author, when his growing celebrity occasioned his being often in company, to have ever seen him intoxicated, nor was he at all given to drinking. No sooner, however, was he led into intemperance than his disorder became aggravated, and his dejection, from being a casual occurrence, became continual."

"The gaiety," says Currie, "of many of Burns' writings, and the lively and even cheerful colouring with which he has portrayed his own character, may lead some persons to suppose that the melancholy which hung over him toward the end of his days was not an original part of his constitution. It is not to be doubted, indeed, that this melancholy acquired a darker hue in the progress of his life; but independent of his own and his brother's testimony, evidence is to be found among his papers that he was subject very early to those depressions of mind which are, perhaps, not wholly separable from the sensibility of genius, but which in him arose to an extraordinary degree."

At the age of twenty-two he writes to his father, "that the weakness of his nerves has so debilitated his mind, that he dare not review past events, nor look forward into futurity, for the least anxiety or perturbation in his head produced most unhappy effects on his whole frame." This was previous to his intemperance.

In 1787 Dugald Stewart occasionally saw him in Ayrshire; "and notwithstanding," says the professor, "the various reports I heard during the preceding winter of Burns' predilection for convivial and not very select society, I should have concluded in favour of his habits of sobriety from all of him that ever fell under my own observation: he told me indeed himself, that the weakness of his stomach was such as to deprive him entirely of any merit in his temperance. I was, however, somewhat alarmed about the effects of his now sedentary and luxurious life, when he confessed to me, the first night he spent in my house, after his winter's campaign in town, that he had been disturbed, when in bed, by a palpitation of the heart, which he said was a complaint to which he had of late become subject."

His winter campaign in town had been injurious indeed to his habits, and he was so conscious of the perils he was daily encountering, as to be desirous of fleeing from the scene of temptation.

Having settled with his publisher, Burns found himself master of nearly five hundred pounds, two hundred of which he immediately lent to his brother, who had taken upon himself the support of their aged mother; with the remainder of his money he purchased the farm of Ellisland, on which he determined to settle himself for life. His first act was to legalise his union with the object of his early attachment, which union then imperatively called for a public declaration of marriage.

The natural fickleness of his disposition, however, was soon manifested in his new career; and he had hardly entered upon the peaceful enjoyment of country life before he pined after the distinction of a maiden author's brief reign in literary society. The state of his feelings may be gathered at the time from his common-place book. "This is now the third day that I have been in this country. Lord! what is man? What a bustling little bundle of passions, appetites, ideas and fancies!—and what a capricious kind of existence he has here! I am such a coward in life—so tired in the service, that I would almost at any time, with Milton's Adam,

"Gladly lay me in my mother's lap at ease."

"His application to the cares and labours of his farm, (says Currie,) was interrupted by several visits to his family in Ayrshire, and as the distance was too great for a single day's journey, he sometimes fell into company, and forgot the resolutions he had formed, and a little time temptation assailed him nearer home. He was not long before he began to view his farm with dislike and despondence."

He now applied to his friends to procure him some appointment; by the interest of one of them he procured the post of an exciseman, or gauger, in the district in which he lived.* It was an unfortunate employment for a man like Burns, and one which threw all the temptations in his path, which a judicious friend might have wished him removed from as far as possible. It must have been a sorry exhibition to have seen the poor poet, his mind probably communing with the rime, scampering over the country in pursuit of some paltry defaulter of the revenue, or travelling from ale-house to ale-house to grant permits, and do the other drudgery of his office: such business is rarely transacted without refreshment, and sometimes the refreshment of man and horse is the only business attended to.

It would have been difficult to have devised a more occupation for the poor poet, or to have found a man less fitted for its duties than Burns.

After occupying his farm for nearly three years and a half, he found it necessary to resign it, and depend on the miserable stipend of his office—about fifty pounds a year, and which ultimately rose to seventy.

"Hitherto," says Currie, "though he was addicted to excess in social parties, he had abstained from the

* In the Edinburgh Review some time since, we marked the following striking sentences in relation to Burns:—"And this was he for whom the world found no fitter business than quarrelling with smugglers and vintners, computing excise dues upon tallow, and gauging alebarrels! In such toils was that mighty spirit sorrowfully wasted; and a hundred years may pass on, before another such is given us to waste." The same writer, after summing up Burns' attainments, says, "He had as much scholarship, we imagine, as Shakespeare, and far better models to form his ear to harmony, and train his fancy to graceful invention."

Burns is undoubtedly entitled to the rank of a great and original genius. He has in all his compositions great force of conception; and great spirit and animation in its expression. He has taken a large range through the region of fancy, and naturalised himself in almost all her climates: He has great power, great powers of description, great pathos, and great discrimination of character. Almost every thing that he says has spirit and originality; and every thing that he says well is characterised by a charming facility, which gives a grace even to occasional rudeness, and communicates to the reader a delightful sympathy with the speculative soaring and conscious inspiration of the poet. He found himself originally in the deepest obscurity, without help, without instruction, without model, or with models only of the meanest sort. An educated man stands, as it were, in the midst of a boundless arsenal and magazine, filled with all the weapons and engines which man's skill has been able to devise from the earliest time; and he works, accordingly, with a strength borrowed from all past ages. How different is his state who stands on the outside of that storehouse, and feels that its gates must be stormed, or remain for ever shut against him! His means are the commonest and rudest: the mere work done is no measure of his strength. A dwarf believed a steam-engine may remove mountains; but no dwarf will hew them down with the pickaxe; and he must be a Titan that hurls them abroad with his arms.—Though a Titan, to the ill-starred Burns was given the power of making man's life more venerable, but that of wisely guiding his own was not given, and the world has rarely witnessed a sadder scene than this noble, generous, and great soul wasting itself away in hopeless struggle with base entanglements, which closed closer and closer around him, till only Death opened him an outlet.—Ed.

habitual use of strong liquors, and his constitution had not suffered any permanent injury from the irregularities of his conduct. But in Dumfries, temptations to the sin that so early beset him threw themselves in his way, and his irregularities grew by degrees into habit." In his own words, "he had dwindled into a paltry excise-man, and slunk out the rest of his insignificant existence in the meanest of pursuits, and among the lowest of mankind."

From this period poverty, and its attendant ills, were seldom from his door; the irritability of his temper increased, and, as is generally the case, the irregularity of his conduct. He became more reckless and inveterate in his disorders than ever: "He knew his own failings," says Currie, "he predicted their consequence; the melancholy foreboding was never absent from his mind, yet this passion carried him down the stream of error, and swept him over the precipice he saw directly in his course."

"The fatal defect in his character," adds his biographer, "lay in the comparative weakness of his volition—that superior faculty of the mind, which governs the conduct according to the dictates of the understanding, and alone entitles us to be denominated rational."

"The occupations of a poet," he continues, "are not calculated to strengthen the governing powers of the mind, or to weaken that sensibility which requires perpetual control, since it gives birth to the vehemence of passion, as well as the higher powers of imagination. Unfortunately, the favourite occupations of genius are calculated to increase all its peculiarities, to nourish that lofty pride which disdains the littleness of prudence, and the restrictions of order, and, by indulgence, to increase that sensibility which, in the present form of our existence, is scarcely compatible with peace and happiness, even when accompanied with the choicest gifts of fortune!"

This is worth all that has ever been said on the subject of "the poetic temperament," and no apology, we trust, is needed for the length of the quotation.

The rapid progress of his disorder, both bodily and mental, is exhibited in the desponding tenor of his letters, from the period of his relinquishing his agricultural pursuits. Indolence, the baneful attendant of morbid sensibility, aggravated his hypochondria. Indolence became preferable to a distasteful occupation; and idleness, as usual, was followed by miseries which rendered existence intolerable without excitement. There is no habit gains so imperceptibly on the hypochondriac as that of intemperance. The melancholy man flies to stimulating draughts for a momentary relief, but the remedy must be increased in proportion to the frequency of its repetition; and in proportion as the spirits are exalted by any stimulant the stomach is debilitated: in course of time the irritability of the latter organ, extending to the brain, the senses become tremblingly alive (if the expression may be used) to external impressions; in a word, the sensations are diseased, and the result is morbid sensibility. Burns' biographer has described the progress of this disorder in language which needs not our feeble praise to recommend it. "As the strength of the body decays, the volition fails; in proportion as the sensations are soothed and gratified, the sensibility increases; and morbid sensibility is the parent of indolence, because, while it impairs the regulating power of the mind, it exaggerates all the obstacles to exertion." And, in the preceding observation, in speaking of morbid sensibility, as being the temperament of general talents, and not of poetry exclusively, as some would have it, he deprecates the indulgence in indolence, which men of genius are generally prone to, as the immediate occasion of the infelicity of all their tribe. "The unbidden splendors of imagination," he says, "may indeed at times irradiate the gloom which inactivity produces; but such visions, though bright, are transient, and serve to cast the realities of life into deeper shade." Those who would trace the horrors of hypochondria, that symptom, or synonyme of indigestion, aggravated by indolence and intemperance, have only to peruse the letters of Burns; he will find in them the usual incongruous mixture of mirth and melancholy which generally prevails in the conversation and correspondence of dyspeptic men.

In one epistle he figures as the miserable wretch, described by Cicero, Ipse suum cor edens hominum vestigia vitans. And perhaps in the next

"His bosom's lord sits lightly on his throne,
And all the day an unaccustomed spirit
Lifts him above the ground with cheerful thoughts."
Hypochondria is the malady in which extreme passions meet. The most ludicrous lines Cowper ever wrote, to use his own words, were written in the saddest mood; and but for that saddest mood, had never perhaps been written at all. Such burst of vivacity are by no means incompatible with the deepest gloom. In one of his letters, Burns thus speaks of his dejection: "I have been for some time pining under secret wretchedness; the pang of disappointment, the sting of pride, and some wandering stabs of remorse, settle on my vitals like vultures, when my attention is not called away by the claims of society, or the vagaries of the muse. Even in the hour of social mirth my gaiety is the madness of an intoxicated criminal under the hands of the executioner." In another letter he speaks of "his constitution being blasted ab origine with a deep incurable taint of melancholy that poisoned his existence."

To Mr. Cunningham he writes, "Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased? Canst thou speak peace and rest to a soul lost on a sea of troubles, without one friendly star to guide her course, and dreading that the next surge may overwhelm her? Canst thou give to a frame tremblingly alive to the tortures of suspense, the stability and hardihood of the rock that braves the blast? If thou canst not do the least of these, why wouldst thou disturb me in my miseries with thy enquiries after me?" And to the same correspondent, about a fortnight before his death, he speaks of his sufferings in a sadder strain. "Alas! my friend, the voice of the bard will soon be heard among you no more!—You would not know me if you saw me—pale, emaciated, and so feeble as occasionally to need help from my chair.—My spirits fled! fled!—but I can no more on the subject." He finishes by alluding to the probable reduction in his salary, in consequence of his illness, to five and thirty pounds. He entreats his friend to move the commissioners of excise to grant the full salary. "If they do not," he continues, "I must lay my account with an exit truly en poete. If I die not of disease, I must perish of hunger!"

It is needless to extract more. It has been truly said, "there is not among all the martyrologies that ever were penned so rueful a narrative as the lives of the poets." Burns, we are told by his biographer, "though by nature of an athletic form, had in his constitution the peculiarities and the delicacies that belong to the temperament of genius. He was liable, from a very early period of life, to that interruption in the process of digestion which arises from deep and anxious thought, and which is sometimes the effect, sometimes the cause, of depression of spirits. Connected with this disorder of the stomach, there was a disposition to headache affecting more especially the temples and eye-halls, and frequently accompanied by violent and irregular movements of the heart. Endowed by nature with great sensibility of nerves, Burns was in corporeal, as well as in his mental system, liable to inordinate impressions—to fever of body as well as of mind. This predisposition to disease, which strict temperance and diet, regular exercise and sound sleep, might have subdued, habits of a very different nature strengthened and inflamed."

In this brief observation is concentrated all the knowledge that is to be gathered from books on the subject of the literary malady, as indigestion may be pre-eminently called. There is not a word of it which demands not the most serious attention from every individual who is employed in literary pursuits; he may gather from it that excess in wine is not the only intemperance; but that excessive application to studious habits is another kind of intemperance no less injurious to the constitution than the former.

Burns wrestled with his disorder in want and wretchedness till October 1795; about which time he was seized with his last illness—a rheumatic fever. The fever, it appears, was the effect of cold caught in returning from a tavern benumbed and intoxicated. His appetite from the first attack failed him, his hands shook, and his voice trembled on any exertion or emotion. His pulse became weaker and more rapid, and pain in the larger joints, and hands, and feet, deprived him of the enjoyment of refreshing sleep. Too much dejected in his spirits, and too well aware of his real situation to entertain hopes of recovery, he was ever musing on the approaching desolation of his family, and his spirits sunk into a uniform gloom. In June he was recommended to go into the country, "and impatient of medical advice," says his biographer, "as well as every species of control, he determined for himself to try the effects of bathing in the sea." Burns, however, distinctly says in two of his letters, this extraordinary remedy for rheumatism was prescribed by his physician; "The medical men," he wrote to Mr. Cunningham, "tell me that my last and only chance is bathing and country quarters, and riding."

For the sake of the faculty, I trust that Burns was mistaken in the matter, for no medical man of common sense could think that a patient sinking under rheumatism, and shattered in constitution, was a fit subject for so violent a remedy as the cold bath. No medical man can consider, without shuddering, the mischief it must have produced in the case of Burns. At first he imagined that the bathing was of service; the pains in his limbs were relieved, but this was immediately followed by a new attack of fever, as well might have been expected, and when he returned to his own house in Dumfries on the 18th of July he was no longer able to stand upright. At this time a tremour pervaded his frame; his tongue was parched, and his mind sunk into delirium, when not roused by conversation. On the 2d and 3d day the fever increased, and his strength diminished. On the 10th the sufferings of this great but ill-fated genius were terminated, and a life was closed in which virtue and passion had been at perpetual variance.

Thus perished Burns in his thirty-seventh year. Let those who are without follies cast the first stone at his infirmities, and thank their God they are not like the other poor children of genius, frail in health, feeble in resolution, in small matters improvident, and unfortunate in most things.*

CHAPTER XXII.

COWPER.

A few centuries ago, the clergy were entrusted with the care of the health of the community, either because the healing art was held in such respect, that it was derogatory to its dignity to suffer laymen to perform the high duties of so noble a profession, or because the lucrative nature of a medical monopoly was as well understood by the church in the dark ages, as it is by the college in those enlightened times. The faculty, however, flourished in the cloister, and the learned monk and the skillful leech were one and the same person. A great deal of good, and no doubt a certain quantity of evil resulted from the combination of the two vocations: of the good, it is sufficient to remember that the clergy acquired a two-fold claim to the gratitude, and also to the generosity, of the public; of the evil, we need only reflect on the extent of the influence conjoined—of the priest and the physician—to tremble at the power as well as at the result of their coalition. We know not, however, whether this evil may not have been counterbalanced, in some degree, by the advantage of the superior opportunities afforded the medical divine, of distinguishing the nature of moral maladies combined with physical, or confounded with them; and of discovering the source of those anomalies in both, which puzzle the separate consideration of the doctor and the divine. Plato, indeed, says that "all the diseases of the body proceed from the soul;" if such were the case, physic should prefer the service of theology to the ministry of nature. But the quaintest of authors, and at the same time most orthodox of churchmen, dissents from the opinion of the philosopher. "Surely," he says, "if the body brought an action against the soul, the soul would certainly be cast and convicted, that, by her supine negligence, had caused such inconvenience, having authority over the body." Be this as it may, Time, the oldest radical, who revolutionises all things, has remodeled the constitution of physic; the divine has ceased to be a doctor; and Taste, no less innovatory than Time, has divested the former of his cowl, and the latter of his wig: but science, it is to be hoped, has gained by the division of its labour, as well as by the change of its costume.

We had however, almost forgotten the point to which we meant our observations to apply.

Cowper's malady being connected with certain delusions on the subject of religion, the attention of serious people has been very much called to his history, and the result has been, that most of the biographical details and memoirs of him, have been written by clergymen. Hayley's "Life" is an exception, and a recent one by Taylor, which, in a religious point of view, is unexceptionable. But its fault, like that of all the others of its class, is, that while the character of Cowper is tried by all the tests that morality can apply to it, the specific malady which occasioned or influenced his hallucinations is left unno-

* Strikingly speaking, perhaps, no British man has so deeply affected the thoughts and feelings of so many men, as this solitary and altogether private individual, with means apparently the humblest.—Ed.

ticed; and the mystery of his religious despondency is still involved in the same obscurity in which they found it. They have looked upon his gloom as a supernatural visitation, and not a human infirmity, which was explicable on any known principle of medical science. One of them has even hinted at the impropriety of referring his religious gloom to any physical peculiarity. The consequence is, that Cowper's fate has not even the advantage of furnishing a salutary example of melancholy, exasperated into mania, partly by the concurrence of unpropitious circumstances, but still more by the indulgence of its victim in the errors of those "anatomists in piety who destroy all the freshness of religion by immuring themselves in the infected atmosphere of their own enthusiasm."

The object of the following observations is to point out the peculiar character of his malady, and to show how far his mental aberrations were caused or encouraged by religious enthusiasm. It will be necessary to take a brief view of his unhappy career, and to give a short transcript of those passages in his history which are wound up with the consideration of his infirmities. But previously it behoves us to be in a condition to be able to pronounce an opinion on the nature of his disorder; and for this purpose we need only refer to the summary character of the phenomena of mania. Our enquiry extends not beyond the general knowledge of the subject that is to be found in the common definitions of the disorder. In a medical point of view we have little to do with it; our business is with the character of Cowper, and not with the history of a disease.

Insanity, according to Locke, is a preternatural fervour of the imagination, not altogether destructive of the reasoning powers, but producing wrongly combined ideas, and making right deductions from wrong data: while idiocy can neither distinguish, compare, or abstract, general ideas. And "herein lies the difference between idiots and madmen—that madmen put wrong ideas together, and so make wrong propositions; while idiots make very few or no propositions, and reason scarce at all."

"Mental aberration," says Dr. Conolly, "is the impairment of one or more of the faculties of the mind, accompanied with, or inducing, a defect in the comparative faculty."

Dr. Battie's notion is more to the purpose. "Insanity," he says, "consists in the rising up in the mind of images not distinguishable by the patient from impressions on the senses." Or in the few and expressive words of Hiebert, of "Ideas rendered as vivid as actual impressions."

Cullen's idea of mania is, that its leading character is a false judgment of the relations of things, producing disproportionate emotions.

Dr. Pritchard's opinion is applicable to a wider range of mental derangements. The confounding the results of memory and imagination, and mistaking the reveries of the latter for the reflections of the former; these he considers the distinguishing feature of madness.

Dr. Hawkesworth calls lunacy a condition of the mind in which ideas are conceived, that material objects do not excite; and those which are excited, do not produce corresponding impressions on the senses.

In ancient times, insanity was looked upon as a sort of transmigration of the feelings and phantasies of evil spirits into the bodies of human beings; as in the case of those demons in the scripture, who wandered about naked, and roamed amongst sepulchres, making hideous noises.

The Greeks held the same opinion of its origin. Zenophon uses the word demon for frenzy; and Aristophanes calls madness kakodaimonian.

But the two definitions of this malady, which may be found to apply to the case of Cowper, are those of Locke and Mead. The former, after noticing the characteristics of general insanity, says: "A man who is very sober, and of a right way of thinking in all other things, may in one particular be as frantic as any man in Bedlam, if either by any sudden or very strong impression, or long fixing the fancy upon one sort of thoughts, incoherent ideas become cemented together so powerfully as to remain united." Dr. Mead regards madness as a particular malady of the imagination, which arises from intense and incessant application of the mind to any one object.

Such are the authorities we have thought it necessary to adduce; because a general notion of the character of mania is requisite to enable us to come to a just conclusion on the subject before us, and because it is the collective information of all we have quoted, rather than the particular opinions of any one of them, that is likely to lead us to a correct knowledge of the nature of Cowper's affliction.

But there is one thing to be considered in every inquiry into the insanity of an individual, which limits that inquiry to a very short and simple investigation of two obvious matters;—namely, what degree of eccentricity constitutes madness, and what amount of madness incapacitates the sufferer for the performance of the duties of his station, or for the management of his affairs?

CHAPTER XXIII.

COWPER CONTINUED.

We now proceed to the sad history of Cowper's mental affliction, with those sentiments of pain and even reluctance which all must feel who approach this subject, but disclaiming those feelings of false delicacy and morbid sensibility which are commonly paraded before similar inquiries.

Cowper was the son of a clergyman, of a family of some distinction; his early education appears to have been strictly religious, but it does not appear that his peculiar gentleness of disposition was duly observed and considerably treated by his father. In his sixth year he was deprived of an excellent mother, and left to the guidance of persons ill qualified for the difficult task of bringing up a youth of great delicacy of constitution, and extraordinary sensibility. Nevertheless, at the tender age of six years, this timid boy was taken from home, and placed at a public school, where he became the victim, real or imaginary, of juvenile persecution. He speaks in his letters of the tyranny of one boy in particular, as having been the terror of his existence; so much so, that he never had the courage to look him in the face all the time he was at school, such an impression did the savage treatment of this boy make upon him.

"The whole of his early life," says Stebbing, "appears to have been misdirected, by a most culpably erroneous judgment in those who had the superintendence of his education. Cowper, from his earliest youth, was a prey to ill health, and gave signs, it is said, in infancy, of that nervous sensibility which, as his years increased, gradually assumed the character of morbid melancholy."

After remaining two years at this school, he was removed from it in consequence of an inflammation in his eyes, which he remained subject to the whole of his life at intervals. This, combined with other circumstances in his medical history—the fairness of his complexion, and lightness of his hair—render it probable that there was either a scorbutic or scrofulous taint in his constitution, which his peculiar delicacy of habit might not have allowed to develop itself externally, but which, neglected or overlooked, might have made inroads or internal textures, even on those of the brain itself. Hayley corroborates this opinion when speaking of the suddenness of the attacks of his malady. "It tends," he says, "to confirm an opinion that his mental disorder rose from a scorbutic habit, which, when his perspiration was obstructed, occasioned an unsearchable obstruction in the finer parts of his frame."

Cowper was now sent to Westminster, where he remained till his sixteenth year; all that time his timid and inoffensive spirit totally unfitting him for the hardships of a public school. On leaving Westminster he was articulated to a solicitor. It would have been impossible to have chosen for him a more unsuitable profession than that of the law. At the expiration of his term he made his entry in the Temple, to qualify himself for the lucrative place of clerk to the house of lords—which post the interest of his friends had procured for him. During his early residence in the Temple, he associated with Churchill, Colman, and other persons of literary habits, and appears to have been gay and sociable in his intercourse with them. But this mode of life, his friend, Mr. Newton, told both him and the public at a later period, in a preface to the first edition of his poems, written at the request of Cowper, "was living without God in the world," albeit his conduct at this time appears to have been neither profligate nor depraved. It was in the Temple, however, he was seized with the first attack of his disorder; "with such a dejection of spirits," he himself says, "as none but those who have felt the same can have the least conception of. Day and night I was upon the rack, lying down in horror, and rising up in despair. I presently lost all relish for those studies to which I had before been closely attached. The classics had no longer any charm for me; I had need of something more salutary than amusement, but I had no one to direct me where to find it." A change of scene was now recommended to him; he accordingly proceeded to Southampton, where he spent several months; and here it was that the first shadow of insanity obscured his mind, and that the fervour of his enthusiasm on a single subject assumed the settled character of monomania. This is not the place to inquire into the nature of the malady; it is enough to know that monomania is a partial aberration of intellect, a delusion on a particular point, which has been dwelt on with such intensity that the mind magnifies its importance, till its ultimate aspect becomes distorted. The malady may continue for life without abatement, or it may disappear and return at various intervals. As "the variable atmosphere of the mind" may be affected by alterations in the general health of the individual, and the whole course of the disease is compatible with the exercise of a sound judgment in every other matter but that particular one, which has been over-rated in importance, magnified in form, and distorted in its appearance.

This brings us to two important questions. Did Cowper labour under monomania, or did he not? And was religious enthusiasm the point on which his reason was disordered? All other questions that have been mooted, concerning the mystery of his melancholy, are comprised in these two. And it is only to their solution that we can look for a satisfactory explanation of his extraordinary gloom.

With regard to the first question, it may be borne in mind that all his biographers admit their inability to account for his dejection, and that all of them reject the supposition that religious enthusiasm had any thing to do with its production. How far their opinion of its inexplicability is a just and necessary conclusion, remains to be shown; at this stage of the subject any judgment would be premature. From facts alone can any opinion be formed, and those which are of most importance in the life of this afflicted man, the reader will now find laid before him.

He had spent some time at Southampton, apparently little improved by the change, when in one of his paroxysms of melancholy, on a particular occasion, he imagined his indifference to the duties of religion was signally, yet mercifully, rebuked by the Almighty, in an almost miraculous manner.

"We were about a mile from the town, (as he himself describes it): the morning was clear and calm, the sun shone brightly on the sea, and the country on the borders of it was the most beautiful I had ever seen. We sat down upon an eminence, at that arm of the sea which runs between Southampton and the New Forest. Here it was, as if another sun had been created that instant in the heavens, on purpose to dispel sorrow and vexation of spirit. I felt the weight of my misery taken off, my heart became light and joyful in a moment; I could have wept with transport, had I been alone; I must needs believe the Almighty fiat, and nothing less could have filled me with such inexpressible delight, not by a gradual dawning of peace, but as it were with a flash of his life-giving countenance."

This strong impression, which obviously derives its colouring from the enthusiasm of a poetical imagination, excited by the beauty of splendid scenery and sudden sunshine, was unquestionably such a one as many individuals of devotional feelings might have experienced under similar circumstances; but the powerful hold it took on Cowper's imagination was such, as to confound the revelation of mercy with the terrors of inexorable justice; to make a transitory emotion of religious joy the precursor of a futurity of remorse and misery. In the reaction of enthusiasm, a feeling of unspeakable wretchedness succeeded the delightful emotion he had just described.

"Satan," he says, "and his own wicked heart, quickly persuaded him that he was indebted for his deliverance to nothing but a change of scene, and the amusing varieties of the place; and by this means had turned the blessing into a poison."

CHAPTER XXIV.

COWPER CONTINUED.

From this time his mind became distracted with religious doubts, and ultimately with remorse. He believed that he had committed "the unpardonable sin" and incurred the dreadful penalty of eternal reprobation, for neglecting to improve to his advantage in communion of his sinful spirit with the Almighty.

Southampton. In every future paroxysm of his disorder throughout his whole existence, the terrific notion, that, by his conduct on this occasion, he had forfeited every claim to the promised blessings of the gospel, became the constant, undeviating theme of his madness; but strange it is that his religious friends and biographers should consider it necessary to give these first symptoms of fervid enthusiasm the pure and unimpassioned character of religion, and to ascribe the emotions of the enthusiast to the manifestations of the spirit of truth and wisdom. The fact is, that Cowper's mind was early imbued with devotional feelings; at the particular period we are speaking of, and for some years previously to it, they might have been latent in his bosom, and the forms of religion have been unattended to at that season, when its duties too often are neglected. But Cowper was the least likely man in the world, so far as we can judge from the goodness of his nature, to have wanted the grace of ultimately recurring to those habits of morality and religion, which had been instilled into his early mind. Those who encouraged his first delusion, were greatly answerable for its melancholy consequences; but it was Cowper's misfortune to have ever been under the guidance of injudicious people, of friends exclusively serious; of people, on the whole, albeit the best and most amiable of mankind, the worst fitted to enliven the dejection, or to remove the delusion, of the melancholy poet.

In speaking of the period we are alluding to, the Rev. Mr. Stebbing says, "There is nothing in the correspondence of Cowper that should induce us to believe that either enthusiasm or melancholy had been the consequence of his deep and fervent piety." "Every thing," he continues, "that we know of the life of this amiable man, tends to convince us that no abstract opinions of any kind could reasonably be assigned as the cause of his gloom, either at the period of which we are speaking, or at any other. His melancholy, indeed, might strongly influence his religious belief, might embitter the waters of life, even as they were poured out fresh into his cup. It might make him think of God, as of man, with terror, and imagine the dark shadow of his earthly fate was thrown far as he could see over the abysses of futurity, but it could do no more; religion never clogs the veins, nor distempers the intellect; and when its revelations are made a subject of unnatural fear, it is when the sun and stars are as fraught with signs, as the scriptures with declarations of destruction."

Now this, if it means any thing, means that a state of previous excitement was necessary to the development of that disorder, which, if it did not combine the characters of enthusiasm and madness, certainly confounded the narrow limits which separate them. But divested of sophistry, the opinion that is meant to be established by the reverend author, and all his followers, is that Cowper's malady was neither caused nor aggravated by religious enthusiasm. But facts speak for themselves, and we appeal to them from partial views, if not from prejudiced opinions. The account of his own feelings proves them to have been those of an enthusiast. "So long," he says, "as I am pleased with an employment, I am capable of unwearied application, because my feelings are all of the intense kind; I never received a little pleasure from any thing in my life—if I am delighted it is in the extreme. The consequence of this temperament is that my attachment to my occupation seldom outlives the novelty of it. That nerve of my imagination that feels the touch of any particular amusement, twangs under the energy of the pressure with so much vehemence, that it soon becomes sensible of weariness and fatigue."

Cowper, after the death of his father, having but little fortune to inherit, found it necessary to augment his income by procuring a public appointment; accordingly the office of reading clerk in the house of lords, a place of considerable emolument, was procured for him. No sooner, however, was he fairly installed in it, than he became overpowered with terror at the necessity of making a public appearance at the bar of the house. The cause of his terror appears to have been totally inadequate to the effect produced upon him; he describes the agony of his apprehension in such extravagant terms as to render his conduct inexplicable on any other supposition but that of insanity. He threw up his appointment, and accepted the inferior one of clerk of the journals; but he had scarcely entered on the duties of his office when it occurred to him he might be subjected to a public examination, respecting his qualifications for the office, and all his former horrors and groundless apprehensions returned. The continual misery at length, he says, "brought on a nervous fever; quiet forsook me by day, and peace by night; even a finger raised against me seemed more than I could bear."

"To his disordered perception," says one of his biographers, "there appeared no possibility to escape from the horrors of his situation but by an escape from life itself. Death, which he had always shuddered at before, he began ardently to wish for now: he could see nothing before him but difficulties perfectly insurmountable, and he now meditated on the fatal expedient urged on his shattered intellect." A circumstance occurred at this time which evidently shows that he was labouring under insanity. His attention was called one day to a satirical letter in the newspaper, which he immediately imagined himself to be the subject of, although it had no reference whatever to him; he doubted not, however, but that the writer had darkly alluded to his weariness of life, his intention to end it, and had, in fact, only written the article in question, to hasten the execution of the deed he meditated. Taylor says, "that before the dreadful day approached he so greatly apprehended, he had made several attempts at the escape above alluded to; most mercifully for himself and for others, they were only attempts."

His disorder now presented so decided a character, that his friends were obliged to acquiesce in the propriety of his immediately relinquishing his situation. He was, at this period, visited by his brother, who employed every means to soothe and comfort him, but he had no success; he found him overwhelmed with despair, and tenaciously maintaining, in spite of all remonstrances to the contrary, that he had been guilty of the unpardonable sin, in not properly improving the mercy of God towards him at Southampton. If this is not mania, religious monomania, we know not what it is. It does not appear that any medical advice was had recourse to, but a learned divine was sent to him, who was to reason "his veins to health," and "with an argument new set a pulse."

Dr. Madan, we are told, had a long conference with him, in which he urged on him the necessity of a lively faith; but Cowper could only reply in these brief and melancholy words,—"most earnestly do I wish it would please God to bestow it on me." This and subsequent interviews with the doctor, in which various religious subjects were discussed, or rather expatiated upon, appears to have been attended with still more melancholy consequences to the invalid. In the words of Taylor, "about this time he seemed to feel a stronger alienation from God than ever. He was now again the subject of the deepest mental anguish; the sorrows of death seemed to encompass him, and the pains of hell to get hold of him; his ears rang with the sound of the torments that seemed to await him; his terrified imagination presented to him many horrible visions, and led him to conceive that he heard many dreadful sounds; his heart seemed at every pulse to beat its last, his conscience scared him, the avenger of blood seemed to pursue him, and he saw no city of refuge into which he could flee: every morning he expected the earth would open and swallow him up."

It is with no feeling of irreverence or distrust in the efficacy of religious means in moral infirmities, that we question the utility of the discussions that were forced on the attention of the dejected Cowper, at the very moment he was standing on the brink of madness, and that we doubt if the cares of the physician of the body might not have been better adapted to the sick man's state.

After vainly endeavouring to establish a lasting tranquillity in his mind, by friendly and religious conversation, it was found necessary to remove him to St. Albans; and this removal implies that he was placed in a private lunatic asylum, under the care of the celebrated Dr. Cullen. This was in 1763, and two years afterwards we find him so much improved in health and spirits, as to be able to remove to the town of Huntingdon, where he became acquainted with the family of a clergyman, his intimacy with whom led to one of the most singular friendships on record, the most lasting, and of the purest nature. "The attachment of Cowper to Mrs. Unwin," says Hayley, "the Mary of the poet, was an attachment perhaps unparalleled; their domestic union, though not sanctioned by the common forms of life, was supported with perfect innocence." Of such a friendship it may be indeed said, "L'amour n'est rien de si tendre, ni l'amitié de si doux."

CHAPTER XXV.

COWPER CONTINUED.

In a letter about this time he describes himself as perfectly recovered, and that his affliction has taught him a road to happiness which, without it, he should never have known. "How naturally," he says, "does affliction make us Christians! But it gives me some concern, though at the same time it increases my gratitude, to reflect, that a convert made in Bedlam is more likely to be a stumbling block to others, than to advance their faith."

On the evening of his arrival at Huntingdon he walked into the country, and finding his feelings powerfully affected by a sudden impulse of devotion, he knelt under a bank and prayed for a considerable time. The result was, a second impression of a miraculous manifestation of mercy, like the former at Southampton. A load of wretchedness was immediately removed from his mind, and on arising he looked upon himself as standing redeemed and regenerated in the presence of his Maker. Dr. Johnson, in speaking of the insanity of poor Smart, said to Boswell, "Madness often discovers itself by unnecessary deviations from the usual modes of the world; my poor friend Smart showed his by falling on his knees in the street and saying his prayers." The mystery of Smart's aberration is traced by Johnson to its proper source, and called by its plain name.

Cowper was now received into the house of the Rev. Mr. Unwin, an amiable and pious family, but living in complete seclusion from the world, and mixing entirely with persons of a serious cast: a state of society, it must be allowed, ill calculated to improve the dejected spirits of one in Cowper's condition, or to lead attention exclusively devoted to a single subject, to a more general acquaintance with the pleasing pursuits of literary people. But unfortunately his new friends completely debarred him from all intercourse with men of letters, and from all concerns except those too strictly of a spiritual nature. Surely the solitude of such society must have greatly tended to increase his melancholy, by constantly entertaining one particular train of ideas; "the reading," as Locke says, "of but one kind of books, the falling into the hearing of but one set of opinions, and constantly conversing on but one sort of subjects." This surely was a state of things which must have eventually tended to have concentrated the clouds of insanity that had hitherto been hovering over his mental horizon.

He had hardly been two years with these good people, for such they really were, when Mr. Unwin was unfortunately killed by a fall from his horse, and Cowper was deprived of an estimable friend. The widow retired to a small cottage at Olney, and Cowper became a permanent inmate of her house. About this time he formed an intimacy with Mr. Newton, the curate of the village, which had no little influence on his future life. With great worth and goodness of disposition, there was still a spirit of austere piety in this gentleman, and even of devotional enthusiasm, which failed not to gain a powerful ascendancy over Cowper's debilitated mind. We accordingly find him deferring to the opinion of this gentleman in all matters, even those of a literary kind; and on his becoming an author, of committing to him the singular task of writing the preface to his poems. In that preface, the public are informed, that the poet had "been long living without God in the world, till in a memorable hour the wisdom which is from above visited his heart."

The inference that is drawn from this change in his moral condition is, that an amendment in his physical one had been signal and complete, and that health and happiness had succeeded infirmity and misery; but nothing could be more erroneous than this reasoning. His subsequent wretchedness was greater than it ever had been, "owing to some cause," says Taylor, "for which we are unable to account." Cowper's correspondence with his friends became much less frequent after his settlement at Olney than it had been formerly. Probably it might be attributed to his intimacy with Mr. Newton, for we are told they were seldom seven waking hours apart from each other.

Shortly after the death of his brother, in 1769, notwithstanding he appears to have borne the loss with considerable fortitude, he became again depressed, and Mr. Newton thought that the composition of a book of hymns was the best means he could adopt to divert his dejected thoughts. "Mr. Newton," says Taylor, "had felt the want of a volume of evangelical hymns, on experimental subjects, suited for public and private worship; he mentioned the subject to Cowper, and pressed him to undertake it. Cowper did so; but he had only composed sixty-eight of these hymns, when he was seized by an alarming indisposition—a renewed attack of his former malady." The pleasure which we derive from the perusal of these beautiful compositions (far the most exquisite poetry that Cowper ever penned is to be found in some of these hymns) must be chequered with regret that so unseasonable a time should have been chosen for their composition, that he should have been occupied with so serious an employment while he was yet suffering from the first shock of his brother's death. One would have thought that literary employment of a lighter kind would have been just then better adapted for him; but Mr. Newton, neither in this, nor indeed in any other matter connected with his friend's health, appears to have acted a judicious part.

His second paroxysm of monomania occurred in 1773, and its symptoms very nearly resembled those under which he laboured at the time of his removal from London. After enduring unmitigated misery for the space of five years, his sufferings became gradually alleviated, and his reason was at length restored. During all his illness Mrs. Unwin watched over him with the kindness of a mother, and for fourteen months his friend, Mr. Newton, kept him at the vicarage, and bestowed on him indefatigable attention. In this case, as in his former illness, his biographers endeavour to prove his mania was not of a religious character. "Various causes have been assigned," says his biographer, "by different writers, for the melancholy aberration of mind to which Cowper was now, and at other seasons of his life, subject; but none are so irreconcilable to every thing like just, pure, and legitimate reasoning, as the attempt to ascribe it to religion." "His views," he continues, "so far from being visionary or enthusiastic, on the contrary were perfectly scriptural and evangelical." To this there is a plain and simple answer: if his views were not visionary or enthusiastic, their tendency unquestionably would help to support rather than depress his mind; but how comes it, if he had taken no visionary view of religion, that his opinion on a particular religious point was perverted, and that he believed himself doomed to eternal reprobation for an imaginary insult to religion? This, in common parlance, is religious madness; the term is undoubtedly a bad one, for rational views of religion can never produce insane ideas; but erroneous notions of its tenets, and exaggerated ideas of its penalties, may produce insanity, and does so every day, as the reports of our lunatic asylum but too evidently prove. A living poet, whose advocacy of any opinion he espouses is entitled to respect, even when the energy with which it is undertaken carries him beyond the bounds of sober judgment, has likewise spurned at the idea of Cowper's malady being occasioned by religious enthusiasm, because the error on which he stumbled was in direct contradiction to his creed. The argument is plausible, but the inference is erroneous; for even granting that his error was in direct opposition to his creed, that is yet no proof of the assertion, that religious enthusiasm did not exist.

There is a very common species of monomania which mercantile men are especially subject to—an inordinate apprehension of abject poverty without a cause. The victim of this kind of delusion may be a man of strong mind in all other matters, excepting those that concern his circumstances; he may be possessed of considerable wealth, and it may be invested in securities which nothing short of a national bankruptcy can endanger; yet may that man pine away in secret melancholy, under the impression that his property is in daily jeopardy, and every commercial view of his may terminate in the vista of the poor-house; yet the error on which he stumbles is in direct contradiction to his commercial creed, and to his former opinions.

His medical attendant might see plainly enough that excessive anxiety about a multiplicity of matters connected with his business, had harassed his mind to the extent of perverting his judgment on a single point of paramount importance. To one of the milder forms of a dyspeptic malady, Abernethy has given the term of the "city disease." Ceteris paribus, the term of religious mania, objectionable though it is, may be applied to Cowper's malady. But to return to the observation of the living poet we have alluded to. We find his following remarks no less inconclusive than the first, and his reasoning more characteristic of the nature of impassioned poetry, than of philosophical enquiry. "In spite," he continues, "of the self-evident impossibility of his faith affecting a sound mind with such hallucinations, though a mind previously diseased might as readily fall into that as any other; in spite of chronology, his first aberration having taken place before he had tasted the good word of God; in spite of geography, that calamity having befallen him in London, where he had no acquaintance with persons holding the reprobated doctrine of election and sovereign grace; and in spite of facts utterly undeniable, that the only effectual ameliorations which he experienced under his first or subsequent attacks of depression, arose from the blessed truths of the gospel.

"In spite of all these unanswerable confutations, of the ignorant and malignant falsehoods, the enemies of Christian truth persevere in repeating that too much religion made poor Cowper mad. If they be sincere, they are themselves under the strongest delusion, and it will be well if it prove not on their part a wilful one. It will be well if they have not reached that last perversity of human reason, that of falsehood of their own invention."

These are "words, mere words,"—strong words indeed, but not convincing ones. The invective is pointed, though not poetical, and some of the epithets are forcible, but not "familiar to ears polite." Ignorant and malignant falsehood, enemies of Christian truth, were once very good expressions to settle a difference of opinion, to confound an opponent, and stigmatise his character; but in these degenerate times dispassionate argument is made to do the violent business of abuse in literary discussions, and it is customary to encounter a literary opponent without setting up the war-whoop of infidelity at the onset of the engagement, or of using our pens as we would tomahawks, for the purpose of scalping the victim who has the temerity to differ from us in the complexion of his thoughts.

But there are assertions in the preceding observation to which the author has given the air of facts, and in the manner he has done so, there is an earnestness which is very likely to impose on many, and to render that which is plausible persuasive and convincing. Without a shadow of evidence to support his assertions, or to bear out his opinion, he jumps at the conclusion that it is a self-evident impossibility that religious enthusiasm could have affected Cowper's mind with any morbid hallucinations. The most eloquent of all modern orators has said, "Truth is to be sought only by slow and painful progress; but error is in its nature flippant and compendious: it hops with airy and fastidious levity over proofs and arguments, and perches upon assertion, which it calls conclusion."

Had Cowper's mind been sane, no rational views of religion could unquestionably have produced the hallucination; but when his mind was clouded with hypochondria, as in early life before it had taken any definite form, nothing was wanting to convert his melancholy into monomania, and to change the wandering reveries of the former into the settled gloom of the latter, but the exclusive application of enthusiasm to a single subject.

But then chronology and geography are triumphantly appealed to, in order to invalidate this supposition; the former, forsooth, because his first aberration was previously to his having devoted himself to religious meditation. The aberration here alluded to was that which occasioned his removal to the asylum at St. Alban's; but here the author falls into the prevalent error of dating a disease from the period of having recourse to medical assistance. He has lost sight of the aberration which long before that period he laboured under the temple, when the terrors of a possible contingency, a public appearance in the house of lords, completely overwhelmed his reason, and caused him to relinquish an appointment on which all his future hopes depended. So much for the appeal to chronology; let us see if the geographical argument is better grounded. Cowper's calamity "having befallen him in London, where he had no acquaintance with persons holding the reprobated doctrines of election and sovereign grace," it is inferred that the insane notion of his perpetual exclusion from divine favour which haunted him at intervals even to the end of his life, was taken up in London when he was supposed to be little, if at all religiously disposed. We have elsewhere said that Cowper was brought up in the very hot-bed of piety, and that early religious impressions are with difficulty ever wholly eradicated from the mind in after life, however little influence they may appear to have upon the conduct in the season of youthful levity. But the calamity, instead of befalling him in London, befell him in Southampton at the period (as he deemed) of his miraculous conversion; but while conversion was unfortunately coupled with the imaginary commission of "the unpardonable sin." Here then is geography likewise at fault: both time and place disprove the assertions they were called on to corroborate, and the simple fact remains irrefragable, that Cowper was a man of a melancholy temperament, whose mental gloom degenerated into monomania, and that religious enthusiasm was the source of his delusions.

And in taking leave of this painful subject, we close it with a very sensible observation of Mr. Hayley: "So wonderfully and fearfully are we made, that man perhaps in all conditions ought to pray that he may never be led to think of spiritual concerns either too little or too much, since human misery is often seen to arise equally from an utter neglect of religious duties, and from a wild extravagance of devotion."

CHAPTER XXVI.

COWPER CONTINUED.

During five years Cowper's dreadful depression continued without any abatement. During this period he was paid unremitting attention by Mrs. Unwin: but her kindness to him was, at length, repaid by a gradual improvement in his health.

Mr. Newton, at this time, was removed from the neighbourhood of Olney; before his departure, however, he triumphed over Cowper's extreme reluctance to see strangers, and succeeded in installing the Rev. Mr. Ball a dissenting clergyman, in the acquaintance of his friend.

It is to be regretted, the first use this gentleman made of his influence over the mind of the dejected invalid was to prevail upon him to translate a collection of spiritual songs from the religious poetry of Madame De Guyon. "If devotional excitement," says his biographer, "had been the cause of Cowper's malady, no recommendation could have been more injudicious."

Most injudicious it undoubtedly was. The French authoress in question was a complete enthusiast. Cowper himself speaks of the necessity he was under of guarding in his translation against the danger of error, "not feeling," he says, "to represent her as dealing familiarly with God, but foolishly, irreverently, and without due attention to his majesty, of which she is somewhat guilty."

He was fortunately induced, however, to employ his leisure in original compositions, and the result was the production of his three great poems.

From the time of his fierce attack in 1773 to his fifth year, his malady had the character of a mild melancholy, with occasional paroxysms of a graver nature. At the age of fifty he became an author; but no poem, it is observed, ever appeared before the public in that character with less anxiety. "As to the fame, and honour, and glory," he says in one of his letters, "that may be acquired by poetical feats of any kind, God knows, but I could lay me down in my grave, with hope at my side, or sit with this companion in a dungeon for the remainder of my days, I would cheerfully waive them all."

In 1782, his friend, Lady Austen, fixed her abode in his neighbourhood, and Cowper became delighted with her society; his dejection was banished in her company, and his health and spirits evidently improved. Lady Austen was precisely the companion he so much needed: her vivacity, affability, kindness of heart, and mental accomplishments, were the qualities that were best calculated to revive the spirits and soothe the morbid sensibility of the dejected bard.

During his short intercourse with this lady, his mind was in its healthiest state, we are told by Hayley; and her sprightly and captivating conversation was often the means of rousing him from his fits of melancholy. She was accustomed to play on the harpsichord, to distract his gloomy reveries, and to engage him in the composition of songs, suited to the airs she was in the habit of playing to him. On one occasion, when she found him in low spirits, she endeavoured to enliven him by reciting the ludicrous story of 'Johnny Gilpin,' which she had heard in childhood; and next morning he informed her that convulsions of laughter, brought on by the recollection of her story, had kept him awake during the greater part of the night, and that he had composed a poem on the subject.

At another time she solicited him to write a poem in blank verse, which he consented to undertake, if she would furnish him with a subject. "You can write upon any thing," said the lady; "why not write upon this one?" The command was obeyed, and the world is indebted to Lady Austen for Cowper's production of "The Task," the most pleasing perhaps of his poems. The translation of "Homer" was likewise undertaken at her suggestion, and partly at Mrs. Unwin's. Thus was he rescued from his misery for a time, by literary occupation, and the mischievous effects of his seclusion mitigated by the society of an amiable and accomplished woman.

Had he found such a companion at an earlier period, how different might have been his fate! and had he enjoyed the advantage of such an acquaintance for a longer period, how much wretchedness might he have not been spared! "The accounts," says Mr. Stebbing, "of his situation at this period afford a refreshing contrast to the details of his condition, both in the earlier and later periods of his existence. In the society of a few friends he now divided his time between the pleasures of conversation and the gentle exciting labour of composition. His mind thus gradually assumed a more cheerful cast."

How far Cowper's heart was engaged in the intimacy with Lady Austin is another matter. In his letters to his friends he speaks of her in very guarded terms; but still at times in terms of more than ordinary warmth. That the lady was not indifferent to his merits and amiability is more than probable, and that the tender interest she took in his welfare would have warmed into a stronger attachment, and led to a permanent union, there is reason to suspect, had not the feelings and the interests of a third person been opposed to a consummation, that was most devoutly to be wished by every other friend of Cowper.

She had taken a house, adjoining the Unwins, with the intention of making it a permanent abode; but unpleasant circumstances arose which ultimately led to her removal from Olney, and to a final separation from Cowper, after an uninterrupted intercourse of two years.

The part that Mrs. Unwin took in this affair is differently represented; that she was the cause of the separation there seems to be little doubt, but whether her interference was very blameable is questionable. In common fairness it must be admitted, that the relation in which Cowper stood to this lady, (strictly decorous as their intimacy might have been,) the feelings of Mrs. Unwin were concerned in the business, and had a right to be consulted. That they were consulted by her friend is proved by the result.

Albeit, it is allowed by his biographer, that "he could not entertain the idea of parting with Lady Austin without extreme disquietude; but that immediately on perceiving that separation became necessary for the maintenance of his own peace, and to ensure the tranquillity of his faithful and long-trying friend, he wisely and firmly, (the wisdom is very doubtful,) took the necessary steps, though at the cost of much mental anguish."

His anguish, however, seems to have been of a very transitory nature, for in a few days after the separation he writes to one of his friends—"We have lost, as you say, a lively and sensible neighbour in Lady Austin; but we have been so long accustomed to a state of retirement within one degree of solitude, and being naturally lovers of still life, we can relapse into our former duality without being unhappy in the change. To me, indeed, a third individual is unnecessary, while I can have the faithful companion I have had these twenty years."

This is certainly a frigid piece of philosophical penmanship. It exhibits a cool mode of parting with a kind friend, and somewhat of a selfish way of consoling one's self for the loss of an intimate acquaintance, which we can hardly contemplate with pleasure. But nothing throws a stronger light on the morbid state of Cowper's feelings than does this letter. The fact is, his sensibility was acute, but his individual sufferings were too great to enable him to employ it far from home. Had he the sensibility of ten poets, his own great misery was more than sufficient to occupy it all. Fear was in the right, "infirmary" truly "forgets all office," the sick man's affections are swallowed up in the sense of his own bodily afflictions, and pain protracted leads as insensibly to selfish feelings, as does old age. Cowper, more than any man, one would think, would have been affected by the loss of a bosom friend, or the death of a dear relative; yet the death of his father, we are told, preyed less on his spirits than any one could have imagined. We find him at the bed-side of his brother, performing the last duties of a Christian relative, but more in the character of a minister of religion, than of a man occupied by the feelings of fraternal solicitude. And even when the spirit of "his own Mary" is quivering on her lips, we hear of him wrapped up in his own wretchedness, inquiring if there is life still in her body; and when that life is extinct, paying one visit to the death-chamber, and never more uttering the name of his old companion.

His silence on this occasion, we are well aware, might have proceeded from the intensity of his sorrow; but it is from the general tenor of his feelings on other similar occasions, the inference is drawn, that Cowper's sensibility was barely sufficient for his own sufferings.

But even had he never laboured under hypochondria, there was a sort of catholicity in his benevolence which embraced mankind with innumerable tendrils, but there was no one branch of affection capable of clinging to a single object, of pressing it to the heart's core, and posseised of sufficient strength, even "in the grasp of death, to hold it fast."

CHAPTER XXVII.

COWPER CONTINUED.

It should be remembered by those who read the history of the errors of other men of genius by the light of Cowper's virtues, that if he had few vices he had likewise few strong passions; or if he had the merit of subduing such passions, that seclusion and almost solitude suffered few temptations to cross his path. But it is, nevertheless, questionable whether the qualifications for a monastic institution are essential requisites or advantageous acquirements for society in any Christian country. Hayley, indeed, says that "Nature had given Cowper a warm temperament, but a disappointment of the heart, arising from the cruelty of fortune, had thrown a cloud on his juvenile spirit; thwarted in love, the natural fire of his temperament turned impetuously into the kindred channel of devotion, and had been successful in early love, it is probable he might have enjoyed a more uniform and happy tenor of health, but that the smothered flames of passion, uniting with the vapours of constitutional melancholy in the fervour of religious zeal, produced altogether that irregularity in the performance of the bodily and mental functions which gave such extraordinary vicissitudes of splendour and of darkness to his mortal career, and made Cowper at times an idol of the purest admiration, and at times an object of the sincerest pity."

No sooner, however, was he deprived of the society of Lady Austin, than his spirits began to fail, and the loss of her cheerful conversation was followed by a return of his former dejection. He writes to Mr. Newton at this period, "My heart resembles not the heart of a Christian, mourning and yet rejoicing; pierced with thorns, yet wreathed about with roses: I have the thorn without the rose. My brier is a wintry one; the flowers are withered, but the thorn remains. My days are spent in vanity, and it is impossible for me to spend them otherwise."—"I should rejoice that the old year is over and gone, if I had not every reason to expect a new one similar to it; but even the new year is already old in my account. I am not as yet able to boast by anticipation an acquaintance with the events of it yet unborn, but rest assured, that be they what they may, not one of them comes the messenger of good to me. If even death itself should be of the number, he is no friend of mine; for loaded as my life is with despair, I have no such comfort as would result from a probability of better things to come, were life once ended."

The remainder of this letter puts the character of his mania in a clearer point of view than any other of his epistles. All the peculiarities of monomania are plainly exhibited. On one particular point his reason is clouded, his perceptions distorted, his inferences erroneous. On every other subject he thinks, talks, and acts, sanely and sensibly; he speaks of the certainty of his eternal misery calmly and collectedly. All the "method of madness" is in his language; in the words of Locke, he "argues rightly on a wrong principle," and endeavours to convince the clergyman to whom he writes, that the misery of his hypochondria is a mystery of divine ordination, which is physically inexplicable. It is greatly to be suspected that the mode in which this insane idea was combated by his correspondent, and by most of his religious friends, tended to fix the impression on his mind, and to produce the effect which they desired to avoid.

"Of Cowper's letters in general, we may safely assert, that we have rarely met with any similar collection, of superior interest or beauty. Though the incidents which they relate be of no public magnitude or moment, and the remarks which they contain be not uniformly profound or original, yet there is something in the sweetness and facility of the diction, and more perhaps in the glimpses they afford of a pure and benevolent mind, that diffuses a charm over the whole collection, and communicates an interest that cannot always be commanded by performances of greater dignity and pretension. Taylor's Life of Cowper, recently published, may be referred to with profit by all who admire the writings, and respect the character of Cowper. A good American edition of this work has been issued.—Ed.

"You will tell me," says poor Cowper, "that the cold gloom of winter will be succeeded by a cheerful spring, and endeavour to encourage me to hope for a spiritual change resembling it, but it will be lost labour. Nature revives again, but a soul once slain lives no more. The hedge that has been apparently dead is not so: it will burst into leaf and blossom at the appointed time—but no such time is appointed for the stake that stands in it. It is as dead as it seems, and will prove itself no dissembler. The latter end of next month will complete a period of eleven years, in which I have spoken no other language. It is a long time for a man, whose eyes were once opened, to spend in darkness; long enough to make despair an inveterate habit, and such it is in me. My friends, I know, suspect that I shall yet enjoy health again. They think it necessary for the existence of divine truth, that he who once had possession of it should never finally lose it. I admit the solidity of this reasoning in every case but my own; and why not in my own? For causes, which to them it appears madness to allege, but which rest upon my mind with a weight of immovable conviction. If I am recoverable, why am I thus?—why crippled and made useless in the church just at the time of life, when, my judgment and experience being matured, I might be most useful? Why cashiered and turned out of service, till, according to the course of years, there is not enough life left in me to make amends for the years I have lost—till there is no reasonable hope left that the fruit can ever pay the expense of the fallow? I forestall the answer,—God's ways are mysterious, and he giveth no account of his matters,—an answer that would serve my purpose as well as theirs who use it. There is a mystery in my destruction, and in time it will be explained."

Such was Cowper's melancholy frame of mind at this period; and yet immediately after the receipt of the letter we have just quoted, we find Mr. Newton soliciting him to favour the editor of the Theological Magazine with occasional essays, and rather reproaching him for not entering upon such subjects as may be inferred from the reply. "I converse," says poor Cowper, "as you say, upon other subjects than despair, and may therefore write upon others. Indeed, my dear friend, I am a man of very little conversation upon any subject. From that of despair I abstain as much as possible, for the sake of my company; but I will venture to say it is never out of my mind one minute in the whole day. I do not mean to say that I am never cheerful: I am often so—always indeed when my nights have been undisturbed for a season. You will easily perceive that a mind thus occupied is but indifferently qualified for the consideration of theological matters. The most useful and the most delightful topics of that kind are to me forbidden fruit; I tremble as I approach them. It has happened to me sometimes that I have found myself imperceptibly drawn in, and made a party to such discourse. The consequence has been dissatisfaction and self-reproach." It is difficult to conceive a more injudicious request than that of Mr. Newton. To set a man to write theological essays, who was sinking under the weight of religious despondency, was certainly not the way to alleviate his morbid enthusiasm.

In 1785 his prospects were enlivened by the expectation of a visit from his amiable relative, Lady Hesketh. From the moment Cowper heard of the intention of this lady to visit Olney, the delight he anticipated from the interview is expressed over and over in his letters, in the most joyful terms. "I shall see you again," he writes to her, "I shall hear your voice. We shall take walks together. I will show you my prospects—the hovel, the alcove, the Ouse, and its banks; every thing that I have described." He tells her about the reception he is making for her in his green-house. "I line it," he continues, "with nets, and spread the floor with mats, and there you shall sit, with a bed of mignonette at your side, and a hedge of honeysuckles, roses, and jasmine, and I will make you a bouquet of myrtle every day. We now talk of nobody but you. And now I have nothing to do but to wish for June—and June, my cousin, never was so wished for since June was made. I shall have a thousand things to hear, and a thousand things to say, and they will all rush into my mind together, till it will be so crowded with things impatient to be said, that for some time I shall say nothing. But no matter, sooner or later they will all come out. Confidently, and most comfortably, do I hope that, before the fifteenth of June shall present itself, we shall have seen each other. Is it not so? And will it not be one of the most extraordinary eras of my extraordinary life? Joy of heart, from whatever cause it may arise, is the best of all nervous medicines; and I should not wonder if such a turn given to my spirits should have even a lasting effect of the most advantageous kind upon them. You must not imagine, neither, that I am on the whole, in any great degree, subject to nervous affections; occasionally I am, and have been these many years, much liable to dejection, but at intervals, and sometimes for an interval of weeks, no creature would suspect it. When I am in the best health, my tide of animal sprightliness flows with great equality, so that I am never, at any time, exalted in proportion as I am sometimes depressed. My depression has a cause, and if that cause were to cease, I should be as cheerful, thenceforth, and perhaps for ever, as any man need be."

Who could imagine it was the same Cowper penned this cheerful letter to Lady Hesketh who had written the preceding gloomy epistle to Mr. Newton? but Cowper seems to have suited his spirits to his correspondents, not only on this but on most other occasions; and no greater proof is requisite to show what a powerful influence the habits, feelings, and dispositions of those with whom he was in communion, had upon his mind; and very little doubt can be entertained that the society of such persons as Lady Hesketh, and Lady Austin, and his later friend, Mr. Hayley, might have prevented half the evils which his sequestered way of life, in the solitude of Olney, was the means of bringing on him.

After a separation of twenty-three years, Cowper had the pleasure of beholding Lady Hesketh, and all the delight he anticipated from the renewal of their acquaintance was realised. "My dear cousin's arrival," he writes to one of his correspondents, "as it could not fail to do, has made us happier than we ever were at Olney. Her great kindness in giving us her company, is a cordial that I shall feel the effect of, not only while she is here, but while I live."

Lady Hesketh had not long been at Olney before she became dissatisfied with the poet's residence; she thought it a situation altogether unsuitable for a person subject to depression. Cowper himself had often entertained the same opinions regarding it. He speaks of it as a place built for the purposes of incarceration, and that it had served that purpose, through a long long period; that they had been prisoners there, but a jail delivery was at hand, and the bolts and bars were about to be loosed.

Lady Hesketh had taken a cottage at Weston, in a pleasant situation, and he expresses his delight at the prospect of removing to it. "Here," he says, "we have no neighbourhood—there we shall have much agreeable society. Here we have a bad air, impregnated with the fumes of marsh miasmas—there we shall breathe an untainted atmosphere. Here we are confined from September to March—there we shall be on the very verge of pleasure-grounds. Both Mrs. Unwin's constitution and mine have already suffered materially by such close and long confinement, and it is high time, unless we intend to retreat into the grave, that we should seek out a more wholesome residence. We are both, I believe, indebted for our respective maladies to an atmosphere encumbered with raw vapours, and we have, perhaps, fared the worse for sitting so often, and sometimes for several successive months, over a cellar filled with water. We have lived at Olney till mouldering walls and a tottering house warned us to depart; we have accordingly profited by the hint, and taken up our abode at Weston."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

COWPER CONTINUED.

In this wretched house at Olney, and unwholesome situation, was poor Cowper incarcerated, as he justly terms it, for nearly twenty years. What a situation for the abode of a hypochondriac! a gloomy house, and an atmosphere tainted with malaria. Little wonder, indeed, is it if the spirits of the sensitive poet sunk under the depressing influence of both: never were the infirmities of a mind like Cowper's fastened upon him all through life, by so many circumstances unfavourable to his well-being. No sooner had Lady Hesketh convinced him of the necessity of changing his abode, than his injudicious friends endeavoured to dissuade him from removing. Mr. Newton, among the rest, his biographer informs us, on being apprised of his intended removal from Olney, expressed apprehensions that it would introduce him to company uncongenial to his taste, if not detrimental to his piety. And poor Cowper had the humiliating necessity of writing a long letter to this gentleman, in reply, to his objections, that his correspondents and companions were only his near relatives, from whom he was unlikely to catch contamination.

"Your letter," he says, "to Mrs. Unwin, concerning our conduct, and the offence taken at it in our neighbourhood, gave us both a great deal of concern; if any of our serious neighbours have been astonished, they have been so without the slightest occasion. Poor people are never well employed when they are occupied in judging one another; but when they undertake to scan the motives of those whom Providence has raised a little above them, they are utterly out of their province and their depth. They often see us get into Lady Hesketh's carriage, and rather uncharitably suppose that it always carries us into a scene of dissipation, which in fact it never does."

The humiliating task of replying to such trivial accusations as those of Mr. Newton on this occasion, must have been irksome and annoying, even to so amiable a man as Cowper; but the futile charge, and the simple, though dignified, reply to it, are ample illustrations of the difference between a narrow and a noble mind.

In the beginning of 1787, Cowper was visited with another severe paroxysm of his mental disorder, which for more than six months suspended his translation of Homer, on which he had been for some time deeply occupied, and precluded the conversation of those with whom he was intimately associated. In his letters to his cousin he describes the first symptoms of his attack. "I have had a little nervous fever lately, that has somewhat abridged my sleep; and though I find myself better than I have been since it seized me, yet I feel my head lightish, and not in the best order for writing."

During this attack he continued shut up in the solitude of his chamber, refusing to see any human being but his kind attendant. In the autumn, however, his health and spirits were so far restored as to enable him to resume his correspondence. Speaking of his sufferings at this time, he says, "My head has been the worst part of me, and still continues so,—it is subject to giddiness and pain; maladies very unfavourable to poetical employment."

It is well worthy of observation, that in this and every other similar attack of his dreadful depression, head-ache and giddiness are spoken of as the premonitory symptoms of his disorder. But it does not appear that local depletion, or any other effective means, were ever resorted to, to obviate or prevent his sufferings, which were evidently the effects of determination of blood to the head, or probably the chronic effects of that determination—of effusion and pressure on the brain—the not unlikely source of all his miserable feelings. On one of those occasional attacks, the composition of theological essays are recommended to him; on another, the translation of spiritual songs; on another, the production of a volume of original hymns; but at any of these periods the service of a cupper, and the judicious care of a physician, might have proved of more advantage.

He had scarcely recovered from his late illness, before the Rev. Mr. Bull imitated the example of Mr. Newton, and importuned the unfortunate bard to compose a set of hymns for particular occasions. "Ask possibilities," replied poor Cowper, "and they shall be performed; but ask not hymns from a man suffering with despair as I do. I would not sing the Lord's song, were it to save my life, banished as I am, not to a strange land, but to a remoteness from his presence, in comparison to which, the distance from east to west is no distance, but vicinity and cohesion. I dare not, either in prose or verse, allow myself either to express a frame of mind, which I am conscious does not belong to me."

Lady Hesketh remained at Weston the greater part of two years, contributing greatly to revive the drooping spirits of Cowper, and to encourage him to complete the vast undertaking of Homer's translation. At the approach of January, 1790, he appears to have relapsed into his dejection: he had a superstitious terror of this month, and he never could get over the idea that some dreadful calamity in this month was always impending. On the whole, however, during the time he was occupied with his Homer he adverts less frequently in his letters to his gloomy feelings than he had formerly done. He speaks to one of his correspondents, of his sufferings, only as singularities which might surprise him if he knew them.

"I must say, however," he adds, "in justice to myself, that they would not lower me in your good opinion, though perhaps they might tempt you to question the soundness of my upper story."

In the beginning of 1791, he had another attack of what he calls his nervous fever, a disorder which he dreaded above all others, because it was invariably followed by a melancholy perfectly insupportable. Soon after the publication of his Homer, a literary correspondence with Mr. Hayley led to a personal acquaintance with that gentleman. He was then in his sixty-first year, and Hayley says he appeared to feel none of the infirmities of advanced life, but was active and vigorous both in mind and body. And speaking of the affectionate veneration and kindness of Mrs. Unwin for the poet, it was hardly possible, he says, to survey human nature in a more touching and a more satisfactory point of view.

In January, 1794, in that gloomy month which he always spoke of with such terror, his sad forebodings were at last realised. A severer attack of his malady than any he had yet experienced overwhelmed his spirits, and almost wholly paralysed his mental powers. His despair became permanent, and continued unmitigated through the remainder of his life. Nothing could be now more desolate than his situation. Mrs. Unwin had been reduced to a state of second childhood by a paralytic affection, and poor Cowper shunned the sight of every other person except the individual who was incapable of rendering him any assistance. For some time he had refused food of every kind, except now and then a very small piece of toasted bread, dipped generally in water, sometimes mixed with a little wine; at length, however, he was induced to sit down to his ordinary meals, but he persisted in refusing to take even the medicines that were indispensably required, and strongly urged upon him. At this period the famous Dr. Willis was consulted by Lady Hesketh on the subject of his malady, and at the instance of Lord Thurlow this eminent physician was induced to visit the invalid at Weston, but no amelioration ensued: his disorder at the time was beyond the reach of art. He continued in the same distressing state till the summer of 1795, when change of scene and air was recommended, both for him and Mrs. Unwin, and they were accordingly conducted by his kind relative, Mr. Johnson, to a village on the Norfolk coast, and from this place they were removed to his own residence, and subsequently to a cottage within a few miles of Swaffham. These little changes were somewhat beneficial to Cowper, though his depression continued unabated. He suffered Mr. Johnson to read to him several works of an amusing tendency, but nothing could induce him to resume his pen, not even for the revision of his favourite Homer. But a stratagem tried by Mr. Johnson to rouse his attention; he placed a volume of Wakefield's new edition of Pope's translation on a table in a room through which Cowper had to pass, and the plan was not without success. He discovered, the next day, that Cowper had not only found those passages in which there was a comparison between Pope's translation and his own, but had corrected several of his lines at the suggestion of the critic. From this time Cowper regularly engaged in a revival of his own version, and for some weeks produced almost sixty new lines a day. His friends began to entertain hopes of his recovery, but they were of short duration, for in a few weeks he relapsed into his former misery.

CHAPTER XXIX.

COWPER CONTINUED.

In the following December, his old and faithful companion, Mrs. Unwin, was taken from him. This most amiable and pious woman died, in the seventy-second year of her age, and was buried in Dereham Church, where a marble tablet was raised to the memory of Mary—the beloved Mary of Cowper. The day before she expired, he sat a considerable time in her apartment, and though he appeared to the attendants so absorbed in his own wretchedness as to take hardly any notice of her condition, it was evident he was aware of her approaching dissolution; for the next morning, when the servant was opening the window of his chamber, he said to her in a plaintive tone, "Sally, is there life above stairs?" He saw the dying woman for the last time about an hour before she expired. "In the dusk of the evening," says Hayley, "he attended Mr. Johnson to survey the corpse, and after looking at it for a few moments, he started suddenly away with a vehement but unfinished sentence of passionate sorrow. He spoke of her no more."

From the anguish he would have felt on this melancholy occasion, he was so far preserved, continues Hayley, by the marvellous state of his own disturbed health.

that instead of mourning the loss of a person, in whose life he had seemed to live, all perception of that loss was mercifully taken from him, and from the moment when he hurried away from the inanimate object of his filial attachment, he appeared to have no memory of her having existed, for he never asked a question concerning her funeral, nor even mentioned her name. Amongst other pious and learned individuals who charitably attempted, though personally unknown to him, to revive his dejected spirits, and to reason with him on the subject of the unfortunate notion which had taken possession of his mind, was the Bishop of Llandaff: he endeavoured, says his biographer, evangelically to cheer and invigorate the mind of Cowper; but the depression of that mind was the effect of bodily disease, so obstinate, that it received not the slightest relief.

By frequent change of scenery, and the incessant attentions of Mr. Johnson, he was sometimes roused to a little mental exertion—so much so as to write without solicitation to Lady Hesketh; and though his letter is the very essence of despair, yet is it apparently the production of a mind sane on every subject but the melancholy one that overwhelmed him.

In plain language, it was the letter of a monomaniac. "You describe," he says, "delightful scenes, but you describe them to one who, even if he saw them, could receive no delight from them—who has a faint recollection, and so faint as to be like an almost forgotten dream, that once he was susceptible of pleasure from such causes. The country that you have had in prospect has always been famed for its beauties; but the wretch who can derive no gratification from a view of nature, even under the disadvantage of her most ordinary dress, will have no eyes to admire her in any. In one day, in one minute, I should rather have said, nature became an universal blank to me; yet with an effect as difficult to remove as blindness itself."

The sudden attack of his malady, as it is described in this letter, which Hayley ascribes to a scorbutic affection, is immediately attributable to sudden determination to the brain, or pressure on that organ, and certainly might be remotely ascribed to the cause which his biographer has assigned. If there be any truth in Spurzheim's theory of the separate and distinct existence of the cerebral organs, which are supposed to be the seat of the individual faculties of the mind, how much light does that theory throw on the nature of monomania, which is certainly inexplicable on any other hypothesis, and how easy is it to conceive the injury that may be done to a particular organ without involving the whole apparatus of the mind in general confusion. In what narrow limits does it circumscribe the difference between monomania and madness, between the effects of a partial and a general disorder of the mental faculties! One of the strange circumstances in cases of mental aberration which not unfrequently occurs, is an improvement in the bodily health of the sufferer, when the infirmities of the mind become permanently confirmed. Cowper's general health, at this period, was not only improved, but his bodily vigour was greater than it had been for years. In the instance of Smart, Dr. Johnson observed the same phenomenon: after visiting him in Bedlam, he speaks of his incurable insanity; but poor Smart, he says, had grown fat upon it since he had last seen him. Cowper's disorder, however, had not so entirely overpowered his faculties, but that, in the midst of his deepest melancholy, he was able to employ himself at intervals in literary pursuits. His last original production was "The Cast-away," a poem of considerable merit, but too plainly illustrative of his own misery. "The only amusement that he appeared to have admitted, without reluctance," says Hayley, "was the reading of Mr. Johnson, who, indefatigable in the supply of such amusement, had exhausted an immense collection of novels, and at this time began reading to the poet his own works. To these he listened in silence, and heard all his pieces recited in order, till the reader arrived at the history of John Gilpin, which he begged him not to proceed with." At length, however, his strength began to break down—a complication of new maladies had set in. A dropsical appearance in his legs was observed: medical advice was now had recourse to, but it was with the greatest difficulty the sufferer could be persuaded to take the remedies that had been prescribed. His weakness rapidly increased. On the 19th of April, Mr. Johnson, apprehensive of his immediate dissolution, ventured to speak to him on the subject. He consoled, or endeavoured to console him with the prospect of an approaching eternity of peace and happiness, of the just grounds for his dependence on the merits of the Redeemer; but poor Cowper passionately entreated of him to desist from any further observations of a similar kind, clearly proving, says his biographer, that though he was on the eve of being invested with celestial light, the darkness of delusion still veiled his spirit. The three following days his debility continued to increase. The last words he uttered were addressed to his attendant, when pressed to put some refreshment to his lips—"What can it signify?" On the third of May, 1800, he calmly expired, in his sixty-ninth year, and was interred in the same church where the remains of his "Mary" were deposited.

Briefly as we have sketched the sad history of this most amiable, highly gifted, but most unhappy of the children of genius, enough has been said to render any commentary on the sufferings we have had to speak of unnecessary. We have endeavoured to divest his malady of the obscurity and mystery in which it has been involved; we have called it by its proper name, we have referred it to its true cause, and endeavoured to point out how far his symptoms were aggravated by the counsel and conversation of injudicious people, and how far his symptoms were suffered to develop themselves and to acquire strength, by an unfortunate and perpetual concurrence of most unfavourable circumstances. The leading events in the history of his sufferings, so far as they concerned his health and consequently his happiness, may be summed up in a very few words. Cowper, from his earliest years, was delicate in constitution, and timid in his disposition. Excessive application to professional studies in the Temple increased the delicacy of his health, the nervous system and the cerebral organs became disturbed or disordered in their functions, and his natural timidity merged into a morbid sensibility which wholly disqualified him for the active duties of that profession in which he had been so improperly placed. The derangement of his health obliged him to go to the sea-coast; he visited Southampton, and in one of his walks the unexpected spectacle of a magnificent prospect, and the sudden appearance of a burst of sunshine in all the "uncertain glories of an April day," overpowered his imagination, and filled his heart with a rapture of devotional enthusiasm. The splendour of the scene was taken for the effulgence of the Deity, and the wrapt spectator believed that the vision was expressly intended for a merciful warning to lead him to the remembrance of that Being, whom, in his friend's words, he had been living without in the world. He returned to town, the momentary excitement passed away, and the warning was forgotten—a public appointment was procured for him, but the terror of a public appearance at the bar of the house of lords completely overwhelmed him, and he was obliged to renounce his employment. His nervous disorder returned with increased strength; he became the victim of hypochondria, and his friends deemed it necessary to place him under the care of Dr. Cottin. During the time that he remained in this private asylum, his condition appears to have been similar to that of Dr. Johnson in his early life, his dejection as severe, but certainly not more so, and no indication, even in his worst moments, of general insanity. His improvement in health and spirits at length led to his removal to a country village, and here he became domiciled in the family of a clergyman, in which he continued for the remainder of his life. The character of the society into which he was thrown was exclusively serious, or what is called evangelical. The story of the miraculous vision at Southampton was told to his friends, and the importance which was attached, and the credit that was given to it, fixed the impression stronger than ever on his mind, that it was a divine warning, and that he had neglected it.

Repentance, indeed, ensued, and remorse followed so closely upon it, that the latter took possession of all the faculties of his mind, and permanently, though partially disordered it. The dreadful idea became fixed, that in rejecting that warning he had committed the unpardonable sin, and that there was no hope for him here or hereafter. This was the commencement of his monomania: the disorder of his nervous system which had previously been only the derangement of the functions of that system, now probably proceeded to the disease of the organ itself, and all the after circumstances of his life and the tenor of his conversation with those around him, with few exceptions, were unfortunately calculated to fix the idea which preponderated in his mind over every other thought. That, under happier circumstances, and with due attention to the digestive organs, Cowper might have been rescued from the misery he endured through life, there is every reason to believe, and that, like Johnson, he might have acquired the power of "managing his mind," and even of "mastering its ailments" to a great extent. But all through his disorder, the digestive organs were impaired and neglected; to use the words of his biographer, "the process of digestion never passed regularly in his frame during the years he resided in Norfolk"—and this little paragraph is the essence of the "history and mystery" of Cowper's malady. This was indeed the true source of his hypochondria; and to whatever gulf the torrent of his dejection might have flowed, whether of insanity or eccentricity, religious enthusiasm was but the tributary stream which found a ready channel to receive its troubled waters. The original current might indeed have swelled with their increase, till the banks of reason were broken down by its aggravated fury; but the source of the mischief must be traced to the fountain-head, not to the feeble stream that fed its violence.

CHAPTER XXX.

BYRON.

That tax of censure which is laid on the eminence of genius, has been pretty rigidly enforced in all ages, and in all countries; but of late years it has fallen more heavily than usual on literary men. The privilege of levying this odious impost on private habits, for the public entertainment, has become a vested right; and no man's memory is entitled to immortality till his character has been duly cudgelled, to extract the last particle of earthly dross, in order to qualify it, by this purgatorial process, for its future happiness; so that, even in these times, there is a species of killing which is no murder, and of taxation which is no tyranny. Whatever Lord Milton may think on the subject of other taxes, there is no withholding of this particular one on eminence—there is no stopping the public supplies of scandal, for there are no other means of satisfying the public creditor—curiosity. But, if ever there was a man's memory entitled to a discharge in full of all demands upon his character, that man's memory is Lord Byron's.

Eight years have hardly elapsed since his death, and year after year, with unprecedented avidity, the public have swallowed lives, last days, recollections, conversations, notices, and journals, professing to delineate his character; and the last effort of biography commands as much attention as the first. And yet, with all the lights those various volumes have shed upon his peculiarities, how is it that, with many, his character still remains a problem? No man's errors were ever more closely observed by his best friends, nor more carefully recorded by his worst enemies. No man's vices were ever less effectually palliated by the partiality of his biographers, nor his virtues, except in a single instance, more cautiously admitted by his soi-disant admirers. The fact is, Byron had few, if any friends, amongst his intimate acquaintances. It is only in domestic life that kindness of heart redeems unevenness of temper; but in literary friendship there is no love superior to the caprice of a sullen disposition, or the sallies of a satirical one. The greatest defect in Byron's character was a propensity to ridicule his absent friends; a biting jest was never lost, at any expense of violated friendship. Poor Parry's "love of brandy," Moore's "love of lords," Leigh Hunt's "rimini piminis," and even Galt, "the last person in the world on whom any one would commit literary larceny," are specimens of the railery which abound in his letters; and there are few, if any, of the friends who have become his biographers, who did not suffer from it. The easy and natural absurdity which he had the power of throwing over the subjects of his ridicule, is apparently free from any malevolent design; but who can doubt that the subjects of the best humoured railery are not pained by its infliction, and however they may affect to laugh at the annoyance, that they are not secretly chagrined, and that their affections are not insensibly estranged by such ridicule? It would be too much to suppose that Byron's conduct to his friends excited no soreness of feeling in his biographers, however incapable they might be of magnifying his errors. However desirous they might be to exaggerate nothing, or set down aught in malice, it is greatly to be suspected that the remembrance of these injuries had much to do with the recollection of his frailties, and that the latter would never have been so prominently set before the public eye, had their memories not been refreshed by their offended feelings. Byron might well say to Lady Blessington, when deploring the loss of some early friends, "But perhaps it is as well that they are gone; it is less bitter to mourn their death than to have to regret their alienation, and who knows that had they lived they might have become as faithless as those that I have known? Experience has taught me that the only friends we can call our own, who can know no change, are those over whom the grave has closed—the seal of death is the only seal of friendship." With such sad experience he might well anticipate the fate his memory had to suffer; for, like Pope, he had reason to apprehend the common fortune of extraordinary geniuses, "to be more admired by their friends than to be loved." This observation is, however, by no means applicable to the feelings of Moore for his noble friend. He seems to have set about the life of Byron with no other motive but a sincere desire to do justice to his memory; yet it is a matter of doubt, whether the character of the latter has suffered more from the open uncompromising hostility of Hunt, or from the fatal candour and the unsuccessful palliation of Moore. Few, we believe, rise from the perusal of the former gentleman's volume with a changed opinion of Byron's kind-hearted disposition; but very many, we believe, carry away a fixed impression from the work of the latter, of the inordinate vanity and egotism of the victim of the poetic temperament. Public opinion may be erroneous and prejudiced for a season, but ultimately the power of truth is certain to prevail over all its mistaken views of things and persons, and "even-handed justice is sure to commend the ingredients of the poisoned cup" of criticism back to its own envenomed lips. But there is more danger of prejudice taking root when the sincerity of the effort to remove it is beyond suspicion. The fidelity of Moore, as a biographer, and his affection for Lord Byron, no one questions; and therefore, any failure in the palliation of the errors he so minutely details, is attributed rather to the difficulty of the task, than to the injudiciousness of the mode of undertaking it. Byron may have been all that which Moore represents him to have been, (not indeed in so many specific words, but in the inference he has left his readers to draw from the documents he has set before them),—inconstant, vain, irascible, sarcastic, and dissolute, altogether an indifferent man, and a very aristocratic lord; but surely "the poetic temperament" is no sufficient shield to fling before the face of so many large defects; or, if there be any advantage in it as a protection to error against the censure of its assailants, the name at all events is an absurdity, for the "poetic temperament" means nothing more than a peculiar constitutional state, arising from a predominant passion for poetry, and implying certain evils peculiar to the cultivation of that particular art. But the evils in question are not peculiar to any branch of literary pursuits; they belong not exclusively to poetry, but to every species of intellectual labour, too long continued, or too intensely followed, and the result is a state of morbid sensibility, arising from bodily disease; but in the biography of Byron, the origin of his morbid sensibility is referred not to its true cause; we are simply told that his temperament was a poetic one, and that it was unfavourable to the due performance of his social and domestic duties. It is, however, only by tracing either physical or moral phenomena to their remotest origins, that any intelligible idea can be formed of them. Moore has indeed recorded, and seems to have delighted in recording, every thing that was good in Byron's character; but has he not given an immortality to his frailties which no other person had the means of giving them? Has he not made the anatomy of his melancholy a public demonstration of trivial errors—a minute dissection of all those infirmities which no one but a friend could have been familiar with? "He best can paint them who has felt the most."

The public has a right to expect such a general outline of his private history as might illustrate his character, and manifest its influence on his writings; but if literary curiosity demanded more, it deserved not the gratification of its morbid appetite. A fondness for literary gossip has grown up of late years; biographers must cater for it, and in their calling they may imagine they are honestly contributing to the public entertainment when they are pandering to its sickly taste. It is surprising how the moral public may suffer the severity of its decorum to be softened down by a delicate detail even of outrages on delicacy itself. Names, it is said, are not things, but it is a foolish saying; a liaison of Byron with an Italian countess is a very different thing from the profligacy of an actor, with the lady of an alderman; and may be illustrated by letters of no common tenderness, and yet be read without any impropriety.

The amours of Lord Byron, in royal quarto, are indeed very different from the exploits of Don Juan in duodecimo, and splendid sins are equally distinct from low-lived errors. Far be it from us to quarrel with the tolerating spirit of society; but the errors of Lord Byron, however they may be designated, and however diligently collected and recorded, are not likely to receive any general immunity from public charity, perhaps at least for half a century to come.

CHAPTER XXXI.

BYRON CONTINUED.

The biographer of a man like Byron is often little aware of the difficulty of the task he undertakes. It is one of the common eccentricities of genius to mystify its character for the capricious pleasure of bewildering the observation of those who are most familiar with its privacy. "It cannot be denied," says Galt, "that there was an innate predilection in the mind of Lord Byron to mystify every thing about himself." If such was the case, how difficult was it for those who imagined themselves in his confidence to form a just opinion of his character, and how likely was the superficial observer to estimate his sentiments by his mode of conversing on any subject that he was wont to play with! If a literary man of celebrity converses without any restraint or affectation of singularity, even with his intimate acquaintances, he is fearful of endangering his confidence and diminishing the respect of his private circle. If Johnson had not been in the habit of perplexing Boswell by the paradoxical opinions he so gravely and sententiously maintained, the veneration of the latter might have declined in a ratio with the facility of comprehending the oracles of his idol.

Burns, long before intemperance disordered his sensibility, was accustomed to astonish his correspondents at the expense of his character, by affecting remorse for imaginary errors, and by magnifying common cares into overwhelming troubles.

Pope, we are told by Johnson, in the prime of life courted notoriety, by playing the fictitious part of a misanthrope before it became him; and even Swift was constrained to tell him he had not yet suffered or acted enough in the world to become weary of it.

"The melancholy Cowley" had a similar propensity for visionary persecutions, and imaginary amours. "No man," says his biographer, "need squander his life in voluntary dreams or fictitious occurrences; the man that sits down to suppose himself charged with treason or peculation, and beats his mind to an elaborate purgation of his character from crimes which he was never within the possibility of committing, differs only in the unfrequency of his folly, from him who praises beauty which he never saw, and complains of jealousy which he never felt."

Byron, in his early eagerness for notoriety, affected singularity so strongly, that by dint of deceiving others he actually became the dupe of his own delusions. Day after day he alludes in his journal to the recurrence of a dream, whose horrors would seem to be the fitting companions of the terrors of a murderer. "I awoke from a dream—well, have not others dreamed? Such a dream—but she did not overtake me! I wish the dead would rest for ever. Ugh! how my blood chilled—I do not like this dream! I hate its foregone conclusion!"

In another page:—"No dreams last night of the dead or the living. So I am 'firm as the marble founded on the rock, till the next earthquake.'"

Elsewhere, speaking of the "Bride of Abydos," he says, "It was written in four days to distract my dreams from * * * ; were it not thus it had never been composed: and had I not done something at the time, I must have gone mad by eating my own heart—bitter diet."

In another place, speaking of the most tragical of his poems,—"Had it not been for Murray it would never have been published, though the circumstances which are the groundwork of it—beigh ho!"

Alluding to his state of mind at this period, he says, "My ostensible temper is certainly improved, but I must shudder, and must to my latest hour regret the consequences of it, and my passions combined. One event—but no matter; there are others not much better to think of also—to them I give the preference. But I hate dwelling upon incidents; my temper is now under management, rarely loud, and when loud, never deadly."

Even at seventeen the rage for fictitious misery was upon him.

"Oh memory, torture me no more,
The present's all o'ercast;
My hopes of future bliss are o'er,
In mercy veil the past."

Such are the lines of a boy at seventeen.

In Stendhal's account of Byron in the "Foreign Literary Gazette," in speaking of the poet's fictitious remorse, he asks, "Is it possible that Byron might have had some guilty stain upon his conscience, similar to that which wrecked Othello's fame? Can it be, have we sometimes exclaimed, that in a frenzy of pride or jealousy he had shortened the days of some fair Grecian slave faithful to her vows? Be this as it may, (he adds,) a great man once known, may be said to have opened an account with posterity.—Such questions can no longer be injurious but to them who have given them birth. After all is it not possible that his conscience might have only exaggerated some youthful error?"

The just and charitable conclusion of the foreigner will be admitted by most people; some there may be who have a character for malignant consistency to preserve, and may therefore withhold that charity from the memory which they denied to the living man. It may not be wondered at if those who have exhausted a world of common crimes should now "imagine new," or still invest the character of Byron with every sombre hue which he gave to his own heroes.

The recklessness, however, of his capricious nature furnished his enemies with this weapon against him, in seeking to impersonate his own errors, or the crimes which others attributed to him, and affecting to stand before the world in all the dark Murillo-tints of his own fancy—

"Himself the dark original he drew."

This weakness of endeavouring to appear to others worse than we really are, is a species of simulation, but practised for its singularity, but which ultimately becomes so fixed a habit as almost to border on insanity. Poets and religious enthusiasts are peculiarly prone to this apparent self-abasement; the fervid zeal of Cooper, the inspiration of Byron, tended to the same exaltation of imagination, the same exaggerated views of their own errors. The fanatic feels a spiritual pride in humiliating humanity and himself, before an admiring multitude; the poet recreates his fancy in bewildering the world with the marvellous anomalies in his character. But even while he affects to immolate his vanity, self is ever his god of his idolatry; and whatever obliquity he may pretend to cast upon the idol, he still adores it with a certain loving respect, and even in his anxiety to be thought sincere, though he flings the censor at the base of the effigy he repudiates, it is only in order that the incense may ascend the higher. In a word, Byron's nature had no more to do with the misanthropy his glowing mind delighted to depict, than Milton's humanity had to do with the malignity of the devils which it was the place of his leisure so sublimely to describe. We doubt if the personal dispositions of an author are much less discernible in the productions of his imagination, than the qualities of an actor are discoverable in the characters he assumes.

"Is the moralist," says D'Israeli, "a moral man's is the malignant who publishes satires? Is he a liberator who composes loose poems? And is he, whose imagination delights in terrors and in blood, the very monster he paints?" A reference to the dissimilar character of men and authors, furnishes a reply to each question. "La Fontaine," he tells us, "wrote tales fertile in intrigues, yet has not left a single amour on record. Many of Smollet's descriptions were not only pure but delicate, yet his character was immaculate. Cowley loved to boast of the variety of his mistresses, but wanted the courage to address one." A living poet has left Catullus in the shade, and yet proved the most constant of husbands; and yet, on the other hand, behold "Sardan," an usurer of seven millions, writing on moderate desires. Sallust declaiming against the licentiousness of his age, yet accused in the senate of habitual debaucheries. Demosthenes, recommending the virtues of his ancestors, yet incapable, says Plutarch, of imitating them. St. Thomas More preaching toleration, yet in practice a fierce persecutor. Young constantly condemning profligacy, and yet all his life pining after it, the most sombrous of poets, yet a most trivial punster." For the vagaries of the tragic and comic muse, we have but to glance at Rowe, stalking solemnly in sock and buskin, and yet, according to Spence, laughing all day long, and doing nothing else but laugh. And Moliere, the first of comedians, setting the theatre in a roar, yet decorous, even in gravity, in private life. These instances may serve to throw a little light on the dissimilar character of the author, as he presents himself before us in his literary role, and the private individual in the every-day dress of common life. And they may also serve to show the fictitious nature of Byron's misanthropic self-drawn character.

It now remains to show how far the character of Byron was influenced by disease, and what the nature of that disease was. That he laboured under a specific malady, which gravely affected the mental faculties, and influenced, if it did not determine, his conduct on very many occasions, is a fact as obvious as his defects; yet, strange to say, the existence of such a malady is very little known, and has never been distinctly pointed out. His symptoms have indeed been noticed under various names, when productive of any extraordinary and palpable effect, but they have been so indefinitely described, that nothing but medical investigation is competent to a solution of the difficulties they present. In one place we read of his being subject to an hysterical affection, in another of his being carried out of a theatre in a convulsive swoon; elsewhere, of an apoplectic tendency, attended with temporary deprivation of sense and motion; at another time, of nervous twitches of the features, and the limbs following any emotion of anger, and from trivial excitement, and slight indisposition, of temporary aberrations of intellect, and delirium; but no where do we find the cause of these phenomena plainly and intelligibly pointed out, nor the real name given to his disorder, till his last and fatal attack. The simple fact is, he laboured under an epileptic diathesis, and on several occasions of mental emotion, even in his early years, he had slight attacks of this disease. If feelings of delicacy induced his biographers to conceal a truth they were aware of, or deemed it better to withhold, their motive was unquestionably a good one; but it was nevertheless a mistaken delicacy; for there are no infirmities so humiliating to humanity as those irregularities of conduct in eminent individuals; and the only palliation they admit of is often precluded by our ignorance of the bodily disorders under which they may have laboured.

Epilepsy (so called from the suddenness of its seizure) was termed by the ancients "the sacred disease," "from its affecting the noblest part of the rational creature." Aræteus says, because it was imagined, that some demon had entered into the man; and this is the doctrine and the prevailing opinion of the vulgar, in many countries, even to the present day. This disorder is sometimes symptomatic of irritation in some other part of the body: more especially in the stomach, inducing a temporary plethoric state of the bloodvessels of the head, and by pressure on that organ producing sudden deprivation of sense, attended with convulsions.

It is called idiopathic when regarded as a primary disease arising from some specific injury to the brain, caused by some internal irritation, a spicula of bone, a tumor, or effusion, the consequence of which is, a recurrence of the paroxysms at certain intervals. In both forms the presence of convulsions is the circumstance which distinguishes epilepsy from apoplexy—and this merits attention, for both maladies in their milder shapes are frequently confounded: (this was the case in Byron's instance, more than once.)

The symptomatic form of epilepsy was that which Byron most probably laboured under: it is often hereditary, and the predisposition to it renders the two extremes of a plethoric and a debilitated habit equally productive of its attacks. There is much reason to suspect that Byron's was an hereditary taint, and was derived from his unhappy-tempered mother. An epileptic tendency is very frequently associated with partial mania. Dr. Mead says, that "after an epilepsy often comes on madness of a long standing, for these diseases are very nearly related." Little is known of the early history of Mrs. Byron, but quite enough of the extraordinary violence of her temper, and its effects upon her health after any sudden explosion of cholera, to warrant the belief that some cerebral disease occasioned that degree of excitability which is quite unparalleled in the history of any lady of sane mind.

With such a temperament, if we hear of her falling into fits after the occurrence of any violent emotion, although nothing of their nature may be told, there is great cause to suspect that an epileptic diathesis might have tended to their production.

On one occasion we are told by Moore, that at the Edinburgh theatre she was so affected by the performance, that she fell into violent fits, and was carried out of the theatre screaming loudly. At all events, whether Byron's epileptic diathesis was hereditary or not, the question of its existence is beyond dispute; he had no regular recurrence of its paroxysms like those that belong to a confirmed case of the primary form of this disease; his seizures were generally slight, occasioned by mental emotion or constitutional debility, induced by the alternate extremes of intemperance and abstemiousness. In boyhood, the most trivial accident was capable of producing sudden deprivation of sense and motion. On one occasion, a cut on the head produced what he calls a

"downright swoon;" a similar effect was the consequence of a tumble in the snow at another time. In later life, the same constitutional tendency is to be observed. One evening, on the lake of Geneva with Mr. Hobbouse, an oar striking his shin caused another of those "downright swoons;" he calls the sensation "a very odd one, a sort of gray giddiness first, then nothingness and total loss of memory." At Bologna, in 1819, he describes one of his attacks in one of his letters in these terms: "Last night I went to the representation of Alfieri's Mirra, the last two acts of which threw me into convulsions; I do not mean by that word a lady's hysterics, but an agony of reluctant tears, and the choking shudder which I do not often undergo for fiction." This attack appears to have been of a graver nature than the description of it implies, for a fortnight after we find him complaining of its effects. He was seized with a similar fit at witnessing Keane in Sir Giles Overreach, and was carried out of the theatre in strong convulsions. At Ravenna, in 1821, on some occasion of annoyance, he says he flew into a paroxysm of rage which had all but caused him to faint. And the same year, complaining of the effects of indigestion, he says, "I remarked in my illness a complete inaction and destruction of my chief mental faculties; I tried to rouse them, but could not—and this is the soul. I should believe that it was married to the body, if they did not sympathise so much with each other."

Ellis, the American artist, alludes to a convulsive and tremulous manner of drawing in a long breath as one of his peculiarities; and we are informed by Lady Blessington, whose accurate observation of Byron's character we have reason to place great dependence upon, that any casual annoyance gave not only his face, but his whole frame, a convulsive epileptic character. In 1823, in speaking of an indisposition of his daughter, caused by a determination of blood to the head, he told Dr. Kennedy it was a complaint to which he himself was subject; and Moore justly observes, that there was in Byron's state of health at that time, the seeds of the disorder of which he afterwards died. The details of the last attack of epilepsy which preceded his dissolution are more minutely described than any former illness. "He was sitting," says Galt, "in Colonel Stanhope's room, talking jestingly with Captain Parry, according to his wonted manner, when his eyes and forehead discovered that he was agitated by strong feelings, and on a sudden he complained of weakness in one of his legs, then rose, but finding himself unable to walk, he called for aid, and immediately fell into a violent convulsion, and was placed on a bed. While the fit lasted, his face was hideously distorted, but in a few minutes the convulsion ceased, and he began to recover his senses; his speech returned, and he soon rose apparently well. During this struggle his strength was preternaturally augmented, and when it was over, he behaved with his usual firmness." This was on the 19th of February, and on the 19th of April he was a corpse.

Here are all the symptoms of epilepsy regularly detailed; the nature of the attack is not to be mistaken, and it leaves the character of the preceding ones, however slightly manifested, in little doubt. It has been already stated that the seat of this disorder is in the brain, while the source of the excitement which leads to it is frequently in the stomach. The injury done to the latter by violent transitions from intemperate habits to rigid abstemiousness, by an ill-judged regimen and excessive mental exertion, could not fail to call into activity the dormant malady to which he was predisposed, and when so eliminated to aggravate its symptoms.

CHAPTER XXXII.

BYRON CONTINUED.

Of all these symptoms, the earliest, the most constant, and yet, generally, the most misunderstood, is melancholy. This is not the place to treat of its anatomy; every one who has lived sibi et musis, whose days for any length of time have been spent in study, whose vigils have been devoted to books, sooner or later must be acquainted with it. There is something in literature of a sacred, yet sombre character, which diffuses a pleasing melancholy over the mind, so insensibly progressive, that one is scarcely aware of its effects before he becomes its victim. If a predisposition to any cerebral disease is latent in his constitution, how insidiously his spirits are undermined, and how surely does melancholy degenerate into the morbid sensibility of confirmed hypochondria! For such a man society has no charms; he makes a merit of his aversion from social intercourse, he prides himself on being independent of the frivolous amusements of the world. His self-concentration causes him to think his mind is all-sufficient for his individual felicity, and a refined selfishness becomes the most prominent feature of his isolated feelings. He persuades himself, like Thomson, that "a serene melancholy is the most noble and the most agreeable situation of the mind." It is in vain to argue with him on the danger of indulging this depressing passion. He will tell you perhaps, in the language of Rogers,

"You may call it madness, folly;
You cannot chase my gloom away;
There's such a charm in melancholy,
I would not, if I could, be gay."

Of all writers, old Burton has given the most graphic description of this "amabilis insania," as he is pleased to call it. "Melancholy," says our quaint author, "is that irrevocable gulf to which voluntary solitariness gently leads us, like a syren; it is most pleasant at first, to those who are given to this passion, to keep their chamber, or to walk alone in some secluded grove, meditating upon whatever may affect them most. Amabilis insania, a most incomparable delight is it to such persons so to melancholise and build castles in the air, and go smiling to themselves, acting an infinite variety of parts, which they strongly imagine represented in reality. In such fantastical meditations, and ever-musing melancholising, they are carried along like one that is led—like a Puck about a heath. They run on indulging their humours, until at last the scene is turned upon a sudden; they can endure no company, they can ruminate only on distasteful subjects. Fear, sorrow, and weariness of life, surprise them at last—they can think of nothing else; no sooner are their eyes open than this infernal plague of melancholy seizes on them, and terrifies their souls, representing some dismal object, which by no persuasion can they avoid—the arrow sticks in their flesh, they cannot get rid of it." In no very gentle terms he goes on deprecating the indulgence of literary men in seclusion and loneliness—"va soli!" He continues, "We be to him that is long alone! As the saying is, 'homo solus aut deus, aut demon.' These wretched creatures degenerate from social beings, into moody misanthropes; they do even loathe themselves, and hate the company of others; and we may say to them, as Mercurialis said to his melancholy patient, 'Nature may justly complain of thee, that, whereas she gave thee a wholesome temperament, and a sound body, and, above all, the noble gift of a reasonable soul, thou hast perverted those gifts by solitariness, by idleness, and excess; thou art a traitor to God and nature, and thou thyself art the efficient cause of thine own misery.'" This was rather harsh language for a doctor to hold to his melancholy patient, or for Burton to apply to his fellow-sufferers, for he acknowledges himself to have been a victim to melancholy; and, indeed, it was impossible to have made the acquisition of his wonderful erudition without the sacrifice of his health and spirits. In the succeeding chapter, however, he somewhat mitigates the severity of his censure, and admits that these melancholy feelings are often born and bred with us by habit, and that we often have them from our parents by inheritance; but religion, education, and philosophy, can mitigate and restrain them "in some few men at some times," but for the most part that they overwhelm reason, and bear down all before them, like a torrent; and that their disorder oftentimes degenerates into epilepsy, apoplexy, convulsions, or blindness, if once it possess the ventricles of the brain.

Byron's temperament resembled that of the great majority of the genus irritabilium. But, whether it was that he took too much pleasure in parading his melancholy before the public eye, or that public attention was more directed to it than it ever had been to the infirmities of any of his predecessors, from the greater interest he excited by his superior genius, certain it is that his mental gloom was more observed and less charitably considered than it ought to have been. There was indeed nothing extraordinary in its nature but its intensity, and nothing more of malignity in its character than is to be found in the dejection of thousands of other literary men of similar habits. The only wonder is, that it should ever have grown into such importance, even under the magnifying lens of public observation.

Byron was "the observed of all observers," and it was the wayward pleasure of his misery to expose it unnecessarily to the public gaze. It is impossible to peruse his biography without carrying away a conviction of his egotism; and the reason is, that no man's privacy would bear the scrutiny which his had been so minutely subjected to. The self-esteem of authors is proverbial; even mediocre talents are seldom without vanity; but there never was a great poet who was not an egotist. Tully said to Atticus "that a true poet never thought any other better than himself. Ovid and Horace afford specimens of this sort of self-complacency, 'exegi monumentum æri perennius.'" Jamque opus exegi quod nec Jovis ira," &c. But, we need not travel out of our own times for instances of this besetting sin of vain-glory: among the best and most amiable of our bards there probably exists but one splendid and solitary exception to the rule,—a man of genius without passions, and consequently without vices, without fervid enthusiasm, the calm and even current of whose life for half a century had hardly an impediment to its tranquillity. But this was not the lot of Byron—the child of passion—born in bitterness,

"And nurtured in convulsion, all the elements of domestic discord were let loose upon his youth—a home without a tie to bind his affections to its hearth—a mother disqualified, by the frenzied violence of her temper, for the offices of a parent; and if he would escape from the recollection of that violence, no father's fondness to fall back upon, and no virtue coupled with his memory to make its contemplation a pleasure to his child, for he "Had spoiled his goodly lands to gild his waste, Nor calm domestic peace had ever dignified to taste."

It is difficult to conceive more unfavourable circumstances for the development of a mind like Byron's; the only wonder is, that any of the noble qualities of his nature escaped perversion. These circumstances are alluded to with exquisite pathos in Childe Harold,

"I have thought
Too long and darkly, till my brain became
In its own eddy boiling and o'erwrought,
A whirling gulf of phantasy and flame,
And thus untaught in youth my heart to tame,
My springs of life were poisoned."

Many, however, imagined that Byron's melancholy was purely fictitious, and that the poet put on the vesture and garb of woe, as poor Maturin, after the battle of Waterloo, would one day put his arm in a sling, and another day wrap a silk handkerchief round his knee, and parade the town, to excite the sympathies of the gentle passengers. But it was not the "windy suspiration of forced breath, nor the dejected 'haviour of his visage," that constituted his gloom. His misanthropy, at all events, was only in his pen, but his melancholy was in his heart.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

BYRON CONTINUED.

The intensity of Byron's hostility to a fellow-creature, on any occasion, could never have entitled him to the love of our great moralist—he was a bad hater! So genuine was his gloom, that Burton himself might have revelled in its anatomy, for it was the very epitome of melancholy. The first time Moore saw him, he was struck with the spiritual paleness of his features, and the habitual melancholy of their expression. To ordinary observers there is nothing more inexplicable than the mirth of melancholy; the good people of Abdera would have it that Democritus was merry even to madness, because in the bitterness of his heart he could not choose but laugh at the follies of his time; but Hippocrates told them that they were fools, for the man was neither mad nor mirthful. Goethe's "capricious temper," to use his own words, "was ever fluctuating between the extremes of sadness and petulance;" Byron's capricious humour was ever alternating between the extremes of excitement and exhaustion.

"Though I feel tolerably miserable," he says, in his journal, "yet am I subject to a kind of hysterical merriment, which I can neither account for nor control; and yet I am not relieved by it, but an indifferent person would think me in excellent spirits."

On one occasion, we hear of his asking Lady Byron, with an attempt at light-heartedness, if he was not after all a very good-humoured man, and of the damper to his spirits in the shape of a reply; "No, Byron, you are the most melancholy man I ever knew."

Wilkie has taken subjects less ludicrously pathetic for his pictures, than the melancholy poet attempting to be jocose, and enquiring of his wife, if he is not mirthful; and the lady with a rueful countenance, in the serious act of expressing her dissent.

In one of his letters to Moore, he says, he feels as Curran said he felt before his death, a mountain of lead upon his heart; and when Moore rallies him for his dejection, and tells him he could not have written the "Vision of Judgment" under the depression of much melancholy, "There," replied Byron, "you are mistaken; a man's poetry is a distinct faculty or soul, and has no more to do with the every-day individual than the inspiration of the Pythoness, when removed from her tripod."

Byron was in the right; the author and the man are seldom one and the same being in the complexion of their humour; the vapours of the bard, and the vagaries of the muse have very little in common. What more dissimilar identities is it possible to imagine than Don Quixote wandering over Spain in quest of ridiculous adventures, and Cervantes pining in a dungeon; or John Gilpin performing antics on his diverting expedition to Edmonton, and Cowper wrapped up in his own miseries at Olney? What can be more contradictory in the nature of the same individual than Sterne, in the words of Byron, whining over a dead ass and neglecting to relieve a living mother; or Prior addressing the most romantic sonnets to his Chloe, and indulging a most unsentimental passion for a bar-maid; or Swift, breaking the heart of Vanessa, by his cold-hearted behaviour, while he was filling the world with the praises of her wit and beauty; or Petrarch, abandoning his family, while directing his labours to purify the poetry and refine the feelings of his countrymen, having the honours of paternity twice conferred upon him, and each time the distinction the reward of a different attachment; or Zimmerman, inculcating lessons of beautiful benevolence, while his tyranny was driving his son into madness, and leaving his daughter an outcast from her home; "his harshness," says Goethe, "towards his children was the effect of hypochondria, a sort of madness or moral assassination, to which he himself fell a victim after sacrificing his offspring. But, be it remembered," continues Goethe, "that this man, who appeared to have so vigorous a constitution, was an invalid during the greatest part of his life; that this skilful physician, who had saved so many lives, was himself afflicted with an incurable disorder."

Would that every biographer, in a similar spirit, scrutinised the infirmities of genius, and decided not on their errors before they enquired into the ailments which may have clouded reason, or weakened the powers of volition! We need not have recourse to the stars, like the amiable Melancthon, for the origin of melancholy; we are infinitely more likely to find it in the stomach; but wherever it be, the distaste of life, which is one of its most obvious symptoms, we are told by Goethe, is "always the effect of physical and moral causes combined; and while the former claims the attention of the physician, the latter demands the attention of the moralist." To investigate the phenomena of both is the province of the medical philosopher; and if the object of his enquiry be to preserve the character of genius from the obloquy which ignorance and uncharitableness too frequently cast upon it, however imperfectly he execute the task, the motive which led him to it should at least disarm censure, though it fail to procure him commendation.

The question of Byron's hypochondria no one can dispute, who has perused his journals. Its various Protean forms are there set forth in language which affectation could not forge, nor fiction mimic. "What can be the reason," he says in his journal, "I awake every morning in actual despair and despondence? In England, five years ago, I had the same kind of hypochondria, but accompanied with so violent a thirst, that I have drank as many as fifteen bottles of soda-water in a night, after going to bed." This unaccountable dejection without a cause, this constant waking in low spirits, he frequently alludes to, and expresses an apprehension of insanity; in his own words, of "dying like Swift, at the top first."

In one of his letters from Italy, after speaking of a slight intermittent, he again recurs to his melancholy. "What I find worst, and cannot get rid of, is the growing depression of my spirits, without sufficient cause. I ride, I am not intemperate in eating or drinking, my general health is as usual, except a slight ague, which rather does good than not. It must be constitutional, for I know nothing more than usual to depress me to that degree."

In another, with some truth, he attributes his hypochondria to an hereditary taint. His mother was its victim in its most furious form, her father "was strongly suspected of suicide;" and another very near relative, of the same branch, swallowed poison, but was saved by antidotes. And Byron was said to have more resembled his maternal grandfather than any of his father's family. In fact, all the symptoms of hypochondria, the effect of some cerebral disorder, were his; the restlessness of disposition, which renders every change a momentary relief, the aversion from the world which drives the sufferer into solitude, and yet makes solitude insupportable without the excitement of mental occupation, or such employment of the imagination as may divert the individual's attention from his own sad thoughts; without such employment, Byron was the most miserable of men. It was for this relief that one of his poems was produced in a single night, and to one of these paroxysms of melancholy the public are indebted for one of the most memorable of his productions. "I must write," he says in his journal, "to empty my mind, or I shall go mad."

CHAPTER XXXV.

BYRON CONTINUED.

There is no question that Byron's disorder was grievously aggravated by ill-regulated habits; on the subject of regimen he held most ridiculous opinions; he believed the rigid abstemiousness of an anchorite to be compatible with the most profuse expenditure of nervous energy, and that the exhaustion of the mind was only to be balanced by a corresponding depression of the corporeal powers, so as to preserve a wholesome equilibrium. In very early life, by carrying this absurd opinion into practice, he so weakened the digestive organs, that without the strongest stimulants the stomach was unequal to the retention of food except of the very simplest kind and in the smallest quantity. In a word, dyspepsia was induced, and the original, and probably hereditary disease which was latent in his constitution, was developed. We believe it was much less for the sake of his personal appearance that Byron was so rigidly abstemious, than most people imagine. In early youth it might have been vanity inspired him with such a dread of obesity, but in his maturer years it was the sufferings from indigestion that followed every occasional excess which drove him to abstemiousness. But there was no moderation in his regimen; he was extreme in all things: the reason he gave Lady Blessington for the austerity of his diet was, "that when the body is fat the mind becomes fat also." In his early letters he dwells with great complacency on his rigid regimen and its lowering effects: but much as his anxiety for his personal appearance might have been with his abstemiousness, it is highly probable it was his suffering in his head whenever his habit became phthoric that drove him to the other extreme of an insufficient diet. In 1807, he boasts of having reduced himself by violent exercise, much physic, and blood-letting, twenty-seven pounds. In 1808, he lost two stone more; and on another occasion he writes exultingly to Dr. Keble that he has reduced himself from fourteen stone seven pounds to ten stone and a half. Poor Lord Byron was little aware that by these violent measures he was sapping his constitution, and slowly and surely undermining his strength and spirits. At the time, so far from suffering any inconvenience, he describes his agreeable sensations, and seems to have furnished himself with the idea of augmenting his happiness. But like Hesiod he hold! for felicity he had bitter grief. After writing in his journal, his diet for a week, tea and dry biscuits six per diem, "I wish to God," he says, "I had not done now, it kills me with heaviness, and yet it was but a pint of Buncellas and fish. O my head! how it aches! the horrors of indigestion!" And elsewhere, "This head, I believe, was given me to ache with." In the last part of his journal, after a fit of indigestion, he says, "I've no more charity than a vinegar cruet; would that I were an ostrich, and dieted on fire-irons!" And the melancholy diary finishes with these words—"O fat! I shall go mad!"

In Venice, in 1816, his system of diet was regulated by an abstinence almost incredible: "A thin slice of bread," says Moore, "with tea, was his breakfast; a light vegetable dinner, with a bottle or two of Seltzer-water, tinged with vin de grise, and in the evening a cup of green tea, without milk or sugar, formed the whole of his sustenance; the pangs of hunger he appeased by chewing tobacco, and smoking cigars."

In 1819, he complains of being in a state of great exhaustion, attended by such debility of stomach that nothing remained upon it. When Shelley visited him in Ravenna, in 1821, his health was improved by better living; "but he had almost destroyed himself in Venice," continues Shelley, "and such was his state of debility that he was unable to digest any food."

Even in his last journey to Greece he carried the same absurd notion of starving himself into practice; his diet at Missolonghi was sparing in the extreme; a few pounds worth of bread, fish, and olives, was the daily allowance for his table. Such a regimen might have suited the rectory of La Trappe, but it was ill-adapted for the board of one who had assumed the casque and not the cowl, and who had the toil and peril of an opening campaign to provide strength and spirits for. It is unnecessary to add, that the physical debility occasioned by this mode of living, from time to time produced such extreme exhaustion that he was obliged to have recourse to stimulants which afforded a temporary excitement, and, by reaction, in their turn augmented the sufferings they were taken to assuage. Ardent spirits, wine, and laudanum, were had recourse to, often in excess, and as often laid aside for an opposite mode of living equally pernicious. Byron, like Johnson, could practise abstinence, but not temperance. He describes the effects of these stimulants on his spirits in one of his letters. "Wine," he says, "exhilarates me to that degree that it makes me savage, and suspicious, and even quarrelsome; laudanum has a similar effect, but I can take much of it without any effect at all. 'The thing that gives me the highest spirits, it seems absurd but true, is a dose of salts.'" It was early in life that he appears to have become addicted to the use of opium. In 1821, after speaking of exhilarating spirits and strong liquors, he says, he no longer takes laudanum as he used to do. At a later period, informing his friend of some slight indisposition, he tells him he has again lowered his diet, and taken to Epsom salts.

It would be useless to produce further proofs of the irreparable injury done to the constitution of Lord Byron by his injudicious regimen and ill-regulated habits; and when we find him, in the course of his travels, frequently attacked by local fevers and at various intervals suffering from their recurrence, we may fairly conclude that his constitution had been predisposed to the reception of their miasma by his debilitating regimen. In those countries where intermittents most prevail, low living is thought to be most unfavourable to health, and there can be very little question but that Byron's constitution was shattered by the frequency of those attacks of fever. In 1810, he was seized with a severe fever in the Morea, and like most of the cures he attributes to the absence of physicians, he says his life was saved in this instance by his Albanian followers frightening away the doctors.

On another occasion he had a similar fever at Patros, and speaking of his doctors, he says, he protested against both the assassins when he was seized with the disorder. On his second visit to Greece he was attacked by a similar local fever, and when he swam across the Hellespont he contracted an ague from which he appears to have suffered long afterwards. In 1817, he complains of the recurrence of a fever in Venice which he caught some years before in the marshes of Elis. In 1819, he writes from Venice, "I have been ill these eight days with a tertian fever caught in a thunder-storm. Yesterday I had the fourth attack; it is the fever of the place and the season." The Countess Guiccioli says he was delirious the whole time; he fancied his mother-in-law haunted his bed-side; yet in his ravings he composed some excellent verses which he subsequently burnt. In 1821, he had another intermittent fever when setting off for Pisa, and he describes it as "bowing to him every two or three days, but not upon intimate terms" with him; he finishes by saying, "I have an intermittent generally every two years," and when the climate is favourable, as it is here, he speaks of his ague as doing him positive good. His last illness was the suite of another fever, of remittent rheumatic character, caught only the day previous to his arrival at Missolonghi. On the vessel coming to an anchor among some little islands on the coast, he bathed in the open sea, on a cold night in January, and continued in the water for a considerable time, although the storm had hardly subsided in which the vessel had been nearly wrecked only a few hours before. Speaking of the circumstance, Fletcher says, "I am fully persuaded it injured my lord's health; he certainly was not taken ill at the time, but in the course of two or three days he complained of pains in his bones, which continued more or less to the time of his death." And let us take this opportunity of doing justice to the good sense and good feeling that is to be found in every observation of this faithful servant. Fletcher's fidelity to his master survived his loss, while that of his historians has been fatal to his memory.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

BYRON CONTINUED.

In the foregoing account there are fevers enough recorded to have shattered the vigour of half a dozen constitutions; and Byron's constitution, indifferent at the best, and debilitated by an ill-judged regimen, was so enervated by these various intermittents, as to have rendered the treatment of any serious disorder that might befall him, perplexing, in the extreme, to a young physician, and even difficult enough to the best experienced: this must be allowed in justice, as well as in charity, to the medical attendants of Lord Byron in his last illness.

Whenever death is the termination of disease, the world is too apt to call the nature of the medical treatment into question, and in many cases, to judge the inevitable issue of life and death as a matter between man and man, with little reference to an overruling agent. When one mode of treatment has been unsuccessful, we naturally suppose that another might have answered better, and, reasoning from antecedent facts, nothing is easier than to say, the result has been unfortunate, but another course might have produced a different effect. God is the only judge of this, and the judgment of man is always partial, and oftentimes presumptuous. It is with a full conviction of this truth, with an eager desire to avoid the assumption of arrogant pretension, and the suspicion of professional animosity, that we venture to speak on the subject of Byron's last illness, and of the manner in which he was treated. There are circumstances, however, connected with his last illness, which render an enquiry into its nature and result a matter of more than temporary interest, or of idle curiosity. It is not a simple question of skill or inability, of a disease mistaken or understood, but one of climate and constitution, and the modifying influence of both over disease.

The medical attendants of Byron were young practitioners; they had little experience in the treatment of the disorders of the Levant, and they had little, if any, previous acquaintance with the constitution and peculiarities of their patient. The best informed European physician who commences practice in the East, finds his knowledge at fault when he trusts to the same remedies in the latter, which he has found efficient in the former, in similar diseases. He will find those which he was accustomed to consider inflammatory in the one, characterised in the other by symptoms of irritability, or of general disturbance of the nervous system, contradistinguished from inflammation by the inefficacy of antiphlogistic measures. If any general observation holds good in that science, to which general rules are seldom, if ever, applicable, the assertion may be hazarded, that nine tenths of the maladies of hot climates are to be remedied without the lancet. The nervous energy suddenly depressed is with difficulty raised, and in a shattered constitution with still more difficulty repaired. The ignorance of this fact may have subjected Byron to injudicious treatment, for that his disorder was maltreated there appears much reason to apprehend.

From the effects of the bathing on "the cold night in January" he appears never to have recovered. By Fletcher's account, he was subsequently "one day well, another day ailing, though still able to go abroad." His symptoms were those of a febrile remittent and rheumatic character for some weeks, till at length, harassed in mind by continual vexations, tormented by the turbulence of the Suliote barbarians who were in his pay, and thwarted in all his endeavours to serve Greece by the rapacious chiefs, and the jealous Franks who were about him, his irritability increased, and concurred, as Moore has well expressed it, "with whatever predisposing tendencies were already in his constitution, to bring on that convulsive fit which was the forerunner of his death." The fit he alludes to was that epileptic seizure which we have elsewhere noticed, and which, after depriving him of sense and speech, and violently convulsing his whole frame, left him in a state of such excessive weakness, that his strength never again rallied. The morning succeeding it he was found to be better, but still pale and weak: he complained of a sensation of weight in his head; leeches were applied to his temples, but a much larger quantity of blood was abstracted than his physicians had intended, for all their efforts to check the bleeding were completely baffled. We are told that blood continued to flow so copiously, that from exhaustion he fainted; and it appears to have been on this very day, in the midst of his sufferings, that his life was threatened by his own soldiers. Colonel Stanhope has well described the scene. "Soon after his dreadful paroxysm, when faint with over-bleeding, he was lying on his sick bed, with his whole nervous system completely shaken; the mutinous Suliotes, their splendid attire covered with dirt, broke into his apartment, brandishing their costly arms, and loudly demanding their wild rights. Lord Byron, electrified by this sudden act, seemed to recover from his sickness, and the more the Suliotes raged, the more his calm courage triumphed. The scene was truly sublime."

The excessive bleeding above noticed, under all the circumstances of the case, was unquestionably fatal to Lord Byron; the death-blow was given to his shattered constitution, and the little strength that he had left to combat with the slow insidious malady which had been lurking in his frame for many days, was totally and irretrievably destroyed.

Captain Parry was the only person about him who seems to have been aware of the nature of his attack, and understood the treatment that ought to have been adopted. "His lordship," he says, "had not eaten any thing but cheese, fish, vegetables, and bread, for several days. His disease was epileptic, and arose from debility and bad diet." The language of this rough soldier is that of a man of common sense: he understood the constitution of Byron probably better than any of his attendants; and when Byron still spoke to him of the necessity of low living, he said to him, "You must not live too low, my lord; in this swampy place some stimulus is necessary; but your physicians should know best."—"I considered," he continues, "there was some difference between his constitution and those of the persons whom Dr. Bruno was accustomed to treat;" (and with less courtesy than might have been desired, he adds,) "had he turned his doctors out of doors, and returned to the habits of an English gentleman as to his diet, he would probably have survived many years." With the latter part of this opinion we entirely agree.

Alluding to his state of health in the middle of March, Moore observes, "from the period of his attack in February he had been from time to time indisposed, and more than once had complained of vertigoes which made him feel as if intoxicated. He was also frequently affected with nervous sensations, with shiverings and tremors which were apparently the effects of excessive debility, and proceeding upon this notion," continues Moore, "he abstained almost wholly from animal food, and ate little else but dry toast, vegetables, and cheese."

The grievous error of attributing to a plethoric state of the constitution such symptoms as have been just described, no one acquainted with the simplest principles of medicine could possibly have fallen into; but of these Byron, with all his various knowledge, was lamentably ignorant.

Plutarch has well advised all literary men to study the science of health. It is one of the anomalies in modern education, that total ignorance on so important a subject as the preservation of health, or the prevention of disease, should be compatible with a reputation for general erudition; it is strange, indeed, that while the science soars above the clouds in quest of the knowledge of the heavens, or seeks in the lower strata of the earth an elucidation of the mystery of its formation, that the wonders of the animal economy should attract no portion of its attention, and that while the elements of every other art are acquired in our colleges, not even a superficial knowledge of the first principles of medicine is a necessary part of a gentleman's education. Students may come from Cambridge and Oxford with all "the blushing honours of the university thick upon them." They may come forth "decked with the spoils of every art, and the wreath of every muse;" champions of theology, prodigies of erudition, masters of the wisdom of former times, and yet be actually ignorant of the theory of the circulation of the blood. They may have wasted the best years of youth, and the first of life's blessings, in the acquisition of unspoken tongues, and yet not know how to obviate the evil effects of studious habits on their health, to check disease,

"Prevent the danger, or prescribe the cure."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

BYRON CONTINUED.

We are now arrived at the last illness of Lord Byron. Its immediate cause appears to have been long exposure to rain on the 19th of April. It is well to bear in mind that the night bath we have elsewhere alluded to was on the 4th of January; the 15th of February he was seized with the epileptic fit, and on the 9th of April commenced the illness which terminated in death on the 19th.

Immediately after his return home on the 9th, he was seized with shivering; he complained of fever and much head-ache. Dr. Bruno proposed bleeding; to this he objected, and Parry seconded his remonstrance. "I was confident," says Parry, "from the mode in which he had lately lived, and had been lately tormented, that to bleed him would be to kill him. He was fairly worn out, and the momentary heat and symptoms of fever were little more, I believe, than the expiring struggles, or the last shakings, of an ardent spirit."

Parry's opinion is not couched in medical phraseology, but it is the language of common sense—and common sense at the bedside of the sick is more valuable than technical absurdity, or theoretical erudition without experience.

The following day he was thought to be so much better, as to be allowed to go abroad, but on his return he had perpetual shuddering, and was unusually dejected in his spirits. On the 11th he was very unwell, had shivering fits continually, pains over every part of his body, particularly in his head; he talked a great deal, and rather in a wandering manner. Dr. Bruno saw no danger, but Parry became alarmed for his safety, and wrung his unwilling consent to go immediately to Zante for change of air.

The two following days the fever rather decreased; he rose during the day, and even left his bed-room. In the meantime a vessel was prepared for his departure, but a hurricane ensued, and it was impossible to leave the port; "and it seems," says Parry, "as if the elements had combined with man to ensure Lord Byron's death."

On the 14th Dr. Bruno, having exhibited soporifics without advantage, again urged the necessity of bleeding, but his patient would not hear of it; he arose and left his bed-room for a short time, but returned to it exhausted, and he came out no more; he was occasionally delirious in the evening; "but his delirium," says Parry, "arose not from inflammation. It was that alienation of mind which is so frequently the consequence of excessive debility."

"There was no symptom of violence in the early period of his disease, such as I have seen in other young men attacked with fever—such as I believe would have been most severe in Lord Byron's case; the delirium," he continues, "at every stage arose from extreme debility." Had he said from nervous irritability, he might have spoken more technically; but the substance of his opinion could not have been more correct.

Byron's delirium was no more to be removed by anti-inflammatory means, than the raving arising from exhaustion in typhus fever, or from excessive irritability in delirium tremens. Dr. Bruno, having for the last two days endeavoured in vain to persuade him to submit to bleeding, Mr. Milingen, a young surgeon, was sent for, to prevail on the patient to undergo the operation. Mr. Milingen says he tried every means that reasoning could suggest towards attaining his object, but his efforts were fruitless.

"Is it not," said Byron, "asserted by Dr. Reid, that less slaughter is effected by the lance than the lancet, that minute instrument of mighty mischief? And do not those other words of his apply to my case?" he continued, "where he says, 'the drawing of blood from a nervous patient is like loosening the chords of a musical instrument whose tones already fail for want of sufficient tension?' Who is nervous if I am not? do with me whatever else you like, but bleed me you shall not. I have had several inflammatory fevers in my time, when more robust and plethoric, yet I got through them without bleeding; this time also will I take my chance."

After much entreaty, however, Mr. Milingen extorted a promise, that if his symptoms increased he would submit to the remedy.

On the 16th he was alarmingly ill, and almost constantly delirious. "He spoke," says Parry, "English and Italian, and very wildly. I implored the doctors not to bleed him, and to keep his extremities warm, for in them there was already the coldness of coming death. I was told there was no doubt of his recovery, and I might attend to my business without apprehension."

Mr. Milingen now pressed on him the necessity of submitting to be bled, and he certainly employed the argument that was most likely to weigh with Byron; he gave him plainly to understand that utter and permanent deprivation of reason might be the consequence of his refusal. "I had now," says Mr. Milingen, "hit on the sensible chord, and, partly annoyed by our importunities, partly persuaded, he cast at us both the fiercest glance of vexation, and, throwing out his arm, said in an angry tone, 'There; you are, I see, a damned set of butchers—take away as much blood as you like, but have done with it!'"

"We seized the moment," continues Mr. Milingen, "and drew about twenty ounces; on coagulating, the blood presented a strong buffy coat, yet the relief obtained did not correspond to the hopes we had formed. The restlessness and agitation increased, and the patient spoke several times in an incoherent manner."

No doubt his symptoms were increased; and as little doubt is there that the inference that was drawn from the buffiness of the blood was fallacious, inasmuch as any appearance of coagulated blood in a hot climate is an imperfect criterion of febrile action; and even in this country, few physicians, we apprehend, would consider the buffiness of the blood an indication for further depletion without other concomitant phenomena in the temperature, the appearance and the temperament of the patient, to corroborate the proof of inflammation.

On the 17th the bleeding was twice repeated, "and the appearance of inflammation on the brain," says Moore, "were now hourly increasing." If there was any inflammation in the case, it is strange that the cerebral symptoms should on every occasion have been aggravated after the bleeding. "Each time after the depletion," says Parry, "he fainted; his debility became so excessive that his delirium assumed the appearance of a wild rambling manner, and he complained bitterly of want of sleep. Blisters were applied to the lower extremities, but their application was too late to have proved beneficial."

It appears that there was neither order nor quiet in his apartment: that all the comforts of the sick chamber were wanting; that his attendants were so bewildered as to be totally disqualified for their painful duty, and that Parry, the only one of them whose attendance might have been beneficial to his friend, was either otherwise employed, or his presence little desired, except by the invalid. But in Parry's occasional visits the two or three last days of his life, he speaks of "such confusion and discomfort in the sick man's chamber as he never wished to see again."

On the 18th, in the afternoon, he rose, and supported by his servant, was able to walk across the chamber, and when seated, asked for a book, read for a few minutes, and found himself exhausted: he then took Tita's arm and tottered to his bed. A consultation was proposed; Byron on being told that Mavrocordato advised it, unwillingly gave his consent. Dr. Frieber, Mr. Milingen's assistant, and Luca Vaya, a Greek physician, were accordingly admitted, on condition of asking no questions. They promised to be silent: the business of the finishing ceremony was gravely performed; one of the doctors was about to speak, but Byron reproved him. "Recollect," said he, "your promise, and go away."

The following is Mr. Milingen's account of the consultation. "Doctors Bruno and Luca proposed having recourse to anti-spasmodics and other remedies, employed in the last stage of typhus; Frieber and I maintained that they would hasten the fatal termination; that nothing could be more empirical than flying from one extreme to the other; that if we all thought the complaint was owing to the metastasis of rheumatic inflammation, the existing symptoms only depended on the rapid and extensive progress it had made in an organ previously so weakened and irritable. Antiphlogistic means could never prove hurtful in this case; they would become useless only if disorganisation were already operated; but then, since all hopes were gone, what means would not prove superfluous? We recommended the application of several leeches behind the ears and along the course of the jugular veins; a large blister between the shoulders, and sinapisms to the feet, as affording the last hope of success. Dr. Bruno being the patient's physician, had the casting vote, and prepared the anti-spasmodic potion which Dr. Luca and he had agreed upon: it was a strong infusion of valerian and ether. After its administration, the convulsive movement, the delirium increased, but notwithstanding my representations, a second dose was given, and after articulating confusedly a few broken phrases, the patient sunk shortly after into a comatose sleep, which the next day terminated in death. He expired on the 19th of April, at six o'clock in the afternoon."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

BYRON CONTINUED.

Now in Parry's account, Dr. Frieber, so far from coinciding in opinion with Mr. Milingen, had warmly condemned the mode in which Lord Byron had been treated. "It was by his recommendation and advice," says Parry, "I believe that it was now resolved to administer the bark. I was sent for to persuade Lord Byron to take it." From an intimate acquaintance of several years with Dr. Frieber, as he is termed, but whose true name was Schrieber, we are enabled to corroborate the observation of Captain Parry. Parry may have been mistaken about the medicine, but at the peried of its administration, whatever it might have been, it was too late to have produced any effect: when Parry was inducing him to swallow a few mouthfuls of it he found his hands were deadly cold. It was now evident Byron knew he was dying. Tita, his affectionate servant, stood weeping by his bed, holding his hand, and turning away his face from his master, while Byron, looking at him steadily, exclaimed, "O questa è un bella scena!" When Fletcher came to him he endeavoured to express his last wishes, and between his anxiety, says Moore, to make his servant understand him, and the rapid failure of his powers of utterance, a most painful scene ensued. On Fletcher asking him whether he should bring pen and paper to take down his words, "O no!" he replied, "there is no time;" his voice became hardly audible: for a considerable time he continued muttering to himself a few names of the friends who were most dear to him. After a feeble effort to explain his wishes, he exclaimed, "Now I have told you all!"

"My lord," replied Fletcher, "I have not understood a word!"

"Not understood me!" said the dying man, with a look of the utmost distress, "what a pity—then it is too late—all is over."

"I hope not," said Fletcher; "but the Lord's will be done."

"Yes, not mine," replied Byron! He then tried to utter a few words, of which none were intelligible except "My sister! my child!" When Parry loosened the bandage that was tied round his head, he appeared to revive a little; he shed tears after it was loosened, he took Parry's hand, uttered a faint good night, and then sank into a slumber.

"It is plain," says Moore, "that this person had, by his blunt practical good sense, acquired far more influence over his lordship's mind than was possessed by any of the other persons about him." During the evening he occasionally slumbered, and when he awoke he returned to himself rapidly and incoherently. For the next twenty-four hours he lay in a comatose state, incapable of sense or motion; life was only indicated for some hours by the rattling in his throat; at length it ceased, and Byron was a corpse at sunset!!!

The autopsy of his remains was conducted by his medical attendants; their prognosis was borne out by the appearances they discovered or described—indubitable appearances of inflammatory action on the brain were stated to have been observed. They might have been deceitful—they may have been imaginary; the attention of the examiners was pre-eminently directed to the brain, and with all their anxiety to look for facts, the forms of preconceived opinions might have presented themselves to the senses, with all the vivid force of actual impressions. Anatomists well know that in the most violent disorders death is very frequently unaccompanied by the visible lesion of any organ, and that even where actual disorganisation is discovered, the cause of death may have been elsewhere. The spine may be gorged with blood—the vessels of the brain may be likewise torpid. The agony of death, and not the disease, may have occasioned these appearances, or the position of the body after death may account for them. From the post-mortem examination, in this case, the existence of inflammation has been generally inferred, and the treatment has been censured only for the tardy employment of the lancet. The writer of an elaborate article in the Westminster Review has adopted the notion, that Byron died in consequence of an inflammation of the brain; at least, he adds, "if the appearances really were as described, that he might have been saved by early and copious bleeding is certain. That his medical attendants had

* With feelings of regret, we have to add that this unfortunate gentleman, whose goodness of heart and straight forward conduct Byron was wont to speak of in the highest terms, is now the inmate of a lunatic asylum. A long series of misfortunes, the cause or consequence, we know not which, of intemperate habits, had "steeped him in poverty to the very lips," and ultimately deprived him of reason. A friend of ours, who had known him in better days, when lately visiting the wards of Bethlem, heard his name pronounced as he passed one of the cells, and when he turned to the speaker and tried to recognise his features, the wretched man exclaimed, "Do you forget poor Parry?" If this note should fall under the eye of any friend of Byron, who would willingly do that which, if Byron were within the influence of earthly feelings, could not fail to be pleasing to his spirit, he may probably be induced to enquire into the fate of this poor gentleman, and have the charity, if it be practicable, to relieve his misery.

ot, until it was too late to do any thing, any suspicion of the true nature of his disease, we are fully satisfied." So less fully satisfied are we that the writer of this article is as ignorant of the true nature of the disease of Byron, as he presumes his physicians to have been, and not bleeding at any period of the disorder would not only have been ineffectual, but injurious. The indication, we take it, from the commencement of the disorder, was the levitation of excessive nervous irritability, arising from local remittent fever, slowly developed, and indistinctly marked in all its symptoms. Mild aperients, antimonial andorifics, the occasional exhibition of camphor and ammonia, and even more direct stimulants than the diffusible, when the exhaustion was extreme; the use of anodynes when the nervous symptoms were increased, and even of opiates when irritability was such as to produce insomnolency, and that kind of cerebral excitement which resembles delirium tremens.

This is the treatment in similar disorders of the Levant we have seen successfully adopted, and which we believe was far better adapted to the case before us than the opposite plan that was practised. At this distance of time, from the event to which it refers, were the question mooted with the unworthy motive of calling professional ability into question, for the purpose of cavilling with its conduct, because its efforts were unsuccessful, these observations would merit any obloquy that might befall them. But, they have been written with other views, and we trust, at least, that the younger part of our professional brethren, who visit climes dissimilar to their own, may profit by the experience which others may have reached by the road of error, and may be instrumental to the preservation of lives of perhaps greater value to the world than their own.*

CHAPTER XXXIX.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The celebrated John Bell has said in one of his works, that the sight of an unskilful operation was more serviceable to the spectators than that of the

* The following passage from Miss Berry's admirable work, entitled "Social Life in England and France from the restoration of Charles the Second, to the French Revolution," contains the opinion of a lady of great attainments, and of nice discrimination on the character of Lord Byron's female portraits:

"If Joanna Baillie, in her exquisitely portrayed characters of excellence and of virtuous feeling, sometimes trays an unwillingness to step into the dominion of vice, and to encounter the storm of violent and degrading passions, Lord Byron, by choice, and perhaps by his long reference for eastern subjects, has also given a sameness to many of his heroes, and reduced all his heroines to one model. They are all fond females, clinging to a protector, without the smallest discrimination, or opinion, or even vivacity, as to the character or situation of the man to whom they are attached; and this with a boldness of sexual passion, which not all the author's delicate and admirable descriptions of their personal beauty can at all conceal. He never calls on the associations, sentiments and feelings, founded on individual choice, admiration, excellence, and comparative merit. He equally neglects the combats between duty and love, in minds capable of appreciating the one, and of exalting the other in desire to passion; to say nothing of parental affection, and the yet more sublime, because more perfectly interested, sacrifices of friendship. He confines himself to paint women as the mere females of the human species, who, except that they share with man, 'that portion of animals,' superior personal beauty, are described little distinguished from the females of any other animals; inspire the same sort of blind and furious passion those of the other sex; are treated with little more comeliness while together; and are left as easily, in quest of sympathy or revenge.

"Who but must regret to find Lord Byron's muse thus tattered, instead of having taken advantage of subjects it would have opened an inexhaustible field to her various powers? for who can doubt the variety of those powers, when reading the exquisite and exalted descriptive poetry scattered over all his works—always associated; the scene he describes with the most invigorating tinctures of the human kind?"

We shall have occasion hereafter to refer to this work, Miss B's, which has not been published in America, is very popular in England. The modesty of the authoress concealed her name, but as Mrs. Jameson refers to in her last work, "The Beauties of Charles the Second," it can be no secret at home.—Ed.

most successful and expert one, inasmuch as those who witnessed the defects of the operator had the opportunity afforded them of profiting by his errors. The principle of the observation applies to the followers of literary pursuits; there is more evil to be avoided by an acquaintance with the infirmities of genius, than by the observation of the manifold advantages of the best regulated habits, and happily constituted temperaments. Nevertheless, the history of a well-ordered mind, like that of Scott, is not without its lesson; and perhaps, by the encouragement of the example it offers for imitation, exhibits the advantage and the reward of mental management, of moderated enthusiasm, and of the government of imagination, as powerfully as the calamities of Cowper and the errors of Lord Byron tend to persuade their followers to avoid their errors. In our notice of Scott, it will be unnecessary to enter into such minute, or biographical details, as the nature of our enquiry into the infirmities of Cowper and Byron led us into. In these instances the sufferings and the faults of the individuals were wound up with all the circumstances of their lives; but in the case of Sir Walter Scott, his career had the tranquillity of a summer stream, pursuing the even tenor of its way in one undeviating course. It was Sir Walter's good fortune to be born in that country, whose genius, in the language of the Irish Demosthenes, "is cast in the happy medium between the spiritless acquiescence of submissive poverty, and the sturdy credulity of pampered wealth: cool and ardent—adventurous and persevering—which wings its eagle flight against the blaze of every science, with an eye that never winks, and a wing that never tires." It was his still happier lot from his earliest years to "have known the luscious sweets of plenty, to have slept with full content about his bed, and never waked but to a joyful morning"; to have had no difficulties to struggle with in his early career, no privations to endure, no extraordinary adventures to encounter, and few disappointments, for a great portion of his life, to sear his feelings, to irritate his temper, or to sour his affections. The rare combination of splendid genius and sober judgment, whether the occasion or the consequence of his fortunate position in social life, must have unquestionably been influenced not a little by the favourable circumstances which attended his career for so long a period; but one thing is certain—the result of his temperament, however constituted, or by whatever circumstances confirmed, was the diffusion of an exuberant benevolence over his feelings, which communicated a spirit of general philanthropy to every composition that issued from his pen. This was the great charm, not only of his writings, but of his conversation—the spell by which the mighty magician of romance worked on the feelings of mankind, and bound up the faculties in wonder and enchantment.

The peculiarities of temperament, in no small degree, depend upon the health of the individual; irritability of temper, and placidity of disposition, much oftener than people imagine, are questions of bodily ailments, or the absence of them; peevishness and good humour are but too frequently matters that are relative to physical peculiarities, and timidity and resolution are qualities which are determined to a great extent by the condition of the nervous system. This doctrine, like that of phrenology, has been impugned, not because it is untrue, but because its tendency is considered to be dangerous. We, however, believe it to be otherwise; and in asserting it, we war but with the malignity which "tracks the errors of genius to the tomb," not with the morality which visits the depravity of the heart with legitimate censure. Who can peruse the biography of Pope without feeling that the irritability of his temper was the consequence of bodily infirmities, which rendered his life "a long disease?" Who can doubt, but that the moroseness of Johnson's humour, was the result of a "fierce hypochondria," and that Byron's errors and eccentricities were largely influenced by an hereditary disease, aggravated by alternate extremes of irregular and abstemious habits? And who indeed can doubt but that Scott's happy temperament was mainly indebted for its felicity to long continued health?

If ailing people were to argue from such a doctrine, that the conduct of their tempers, and the government of their passions, (being at certain intervals under the dominion of disease,) had wholly ceased to be under the control of reason—if they imagined that as invalids they were privileged to be as irritable as Pope, as morose as Johnson, as wayward as Byron, as intemperate as Burns, or as melancholy as Cowper, not only without reproach, but with impunity; then indeed there would be danger in the doctrine, and truth itself would not justify its promulgation. But the objection is an idle one, for neither peevishness, nor moroseness, nor morbid sensibility, nor melancholy, can be indulged in with impunity; each carries with it its own punishment, and its votary (if such it could have) would soon become its victim. But even if his health suffered not from the indulgence of his capricious humours, how simple would he be, how little acquainted with the history of genius or the calamities of its children, if he expected that the world would privilege his peevishness, make allowance for his petulance, or pity his infirmities? Fool that he would be to expect its charity; what consideration do the errors or eccentricities of genius ever meet with from it?

Scott and Goethe are two of the most remarkable instances in modern times of genius so divested of its ordinary errors, that the admiration it called forth was scarcely mingled with a sound of literary hostilities. In both, the poetic temperament was seen to greater advantage than we have been accustomed to behold it. It disqualified them for no duties, public or private; it unfitted them not for the tender offices of friendship or affection, and the world for once enjoyed the rare exhibition of two great poets who were good husbands, good fathers, and good citizens. Their works were imbued with a spirit of philosophical philanthropy, which the public taste was luckily in the vein to appreciate; and if their competitors joined in their applause, it was because they had no injuries to complain of at their hands, no bitter asperity to apprehend from their criticisms, no injustice from their strictures, no ungenerous treatment from the pride of their exalted stations. In each instance a happy temperament enabled its possessor to preserve that station which his genius had attained, and in either the management of that temperament was commensurate with the enjoyment of health and vigour. It required, indeed, no ordinary stock of health to enable an author to resist the wear and tear of mind and body, which the incessant application to literary pursuits is productive of; no little vigour, both bodily and mental, to render an individual capable of the immense amount of literary labour which Scott had the courage to encounter, and the persevering industry to get through without seclusion from the world, and apparently without fatigue. By what happy means was he enabled to accomplish so much? Were his days and nights devoted to these labours? Was the midnight oil expended in their performance? Were the hours of composition stolen from his slumbers, and the freshness of the morning devoted to the reparation of exhausted strength? Was the "pale and melancholy cast of thought" spread over his features? Was the fountain of inspiration dried up for a season after his imagination had poured forth a living flood of truth or fiction? Did the enthusiasm of the poet prevail over the sober sentiments of the man? or were they so exalted by the chivalrous exploits he described, that the excitement of his feelings was followed by lassitude and depression? In short, was the enthusiasm of his page so faithful a transcript of the ardour of his breast, that in giving breath to the sweet music of romance, the sound of every striking passage was so much in unison with the tone of dearly cherished thoughts, that the vibration of every well-remembered note extended to the heart? In sooth, we believe that no such fervid emanations were called forth by "the ideal presence" of the scenery, or the heroes he called into existence. That he contemplated them with pleasure, and even with pride, is very probable; but that he suffered his raptures, either at the moment of composition, or subsequently to it, to disturb the serenity of his feelings, we greatly doubt.

Scott's enthusiasm was in his fancy, not in his feelings; his benevolence was heart-born, and his imagination was subservient to its impulses, but both were under the dominion of a sober judgment. His nervous energies, we apprehend, were seldom called on to answer the sudden demand of any inordinate or irregular affection—a demand, often repeated, which, more than any amount of literary labour, exhausts the spirits, and makes inroads on the strength of the constitution. The means by which he was enabled to accomplish so much in so wonderfully short a period were simply these: he rose early, he lived temperately, he retired to rest at seasonable hours; the forenoon was devoted to his studies, and those studies debarred neither recreation nor exercise; he entered on proper pursuits at proper times, and the result of the well-regulated employment of less than the fourth part of the four-and-twenty hours, was, that he was enabled to perform a multiplicity of labours which we can hardly imagine the incessant employment of a whole life sufficient for the execution of. His time for composition was usually in the morning, from seven till twelve or one o'clock. The ordinary amount of a day's production was fifteen or sixteen pages, and for many years the number of his publications was from three to eight volumes a year. But, what extraordinary fertility of imagination was necessary for the series of compositions that issued from his pen with such astonishing rapidity!

CHAPTER XL.

SIR WALTER SCOTT CONTINUED.

These volumes carried with them the internal evidence of the healthy feelings of the author; they were evidently the productions of a man who was at peace with himself, "in love with his nativity," and in charity with all mankind. They smelt not of the midnight lamp, but of the rosy morning air, whose freshness was diffused as well over the feelings as the features of their author; no sickly pallor, no sentimental gloom, no morbid sensibility overclouded either, and whether we conversed with him in person or communed with him in print, our hearts acknowledged,

"A merrier man,
Within the limit of becoming mirth,
We never spent an hour's talk withal;
— For aged years played truant at his tales,
And younger hearings were quite ravished,
So sweet and voluble was his discourse."

But there was nothing, we repeat it, of the feverish fervour of enthusiasm in the feelings of Scott, and no traces of that passion in his countenance. There was indeed as little of the celestial inspiration of the bard in the ruddy aspect of the author as can be well imagined; and but little in his regard to give the observer an idea of "The poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling, Glancing from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven."

There might be evidences indeed of deep and even painful thinking in the lines of his prominent forehead and overhanging brows; but there was more of the vigorous-minded country gentleman in the general expression of his countenance, than of the "poet of imagination all compact."

Scott's sensibility, fortunately for his felicity, was not of that intense description that its tranquillity was staked on the hazard of his literary success, or that the labour of composition was coupled with the anxieties of authorship, the ardour of enthusiasm, or the ecstasies of successful genius. In this respect Scott had the decided advantage over the majority of the genus irritabile of authors, whether the works of prose or poetry. Pope could not proceed with certain passages of his translation of Homer without shedding tears. Metastasio was found weeping over his Olympiad. Alfieri speaks of a whole act in one of his plays written under a paroxysm of enthusiasm, weeping while he wrote it. Dryden was seized with violent tremors after the composition of his celebrated ode. Rousseau, in conceiving the first idea of his Essay on the Arts, felt the disturbance of his nervous system approaching to delirium. Buffon could not enter on a work which absorbed his faculties, without feeling his head burn, and his features becoming flushed. Beattie, after the completion of a volume of metaphysics, never had the courage to look into the book when it was printed, so great was the horror of his undertaking. Goldoni says he never recovered from the exhaustion of his spirits after the production of sixteen comedies in one year. Smollet by over-excitement disordered his brain, and laboured for six months under a coma vigil. These and many other instances have been enumerated by D'Israeli in his admirable work. Scott, however, was luckily exempt from the excitement of such morbid feelings, and from the delusions which are the consequences of them. It is but a step, it is said, which separates the fervour of enthusiasm from the frenzy of insanity, and not unfrequently are the children of genius found tottering on the verge of that calamity. Tasso held a conversation with a spirit gliding on a sunbeam, and we are told by Thuanus, he was frequently seized with fits of distraction which did not prevent him writing excellent verses. Malebranche heard the voice of God distinctly within him. Lord Herbert interrogated the Deity about the publication of his book, and in a kneeling posture calmly awaited the reply. Pascal often started from his chair at the appearance of a fiery gulf opening by his side. Luther conversed with demons, and on one occasion threw an inkstand at the Devil's head, an action which his German commentator greatly applauds, because there is nothing the devil hates so much as ink. Descartes, after long seclusion, was followed by an invisible person calling on him to pursue the search of truth. Swedenburgh not only walked over Paradise, but has given a description of the fashion of the houses; but the glorious egotism of Benvenuto Cellini, says D'Israeli, outstripped the visions of all his predecessors, for he was accustomed to behold a resplendent light hovering over his own shadow.

In short, that literary boundary of which we have spoken, which separates enthusiasm from insanity, is like the narrow bridge of Al Sirat, which leads the followers of Mahomet from earth to heaven, but by so narrow a path, that the passenger is in momentary danger of falling into the dismal gulf of hell, which yawns beneath him. But Scott was in little peril of falling into the purgatory of enthusiasm: if he ever advanced towards the boundary in question, it was with a steady step and an air of self-possession, which showed he was prepared for the dangers he approached.

But independently of the well-regulated habits by which he was enabled to accomplish so vast a number of literary performances, nature appears to have endowed his constitution with a robustness, proportioned to the vigour of his mind, which was capable of overcoming mental labour without fatigue, which would have been not only wearisome but overwhelming to another. There is something in the vigour of the higher order of genius, which contributes not only to longevity, but renders the individual equal to labours which one can hardly imagine the powers of one man capable of accomplishing.

"Those," says Tissot, "who would undertake the defence of long-continued studies, which I am far from wishing to under-rate the importance of, in pointing out the dangers to which literary men expose themselves by excessive application, may cite many instances of studious men who have attained old age, in the full enjoyment of health, bodily and mental. I am not ignorant of the history of such persons. I have even known some few, but the generality have not the same good fortune to boast of; there are few men, however happily constituted, strong enough to support with impunity such excessive toil; and if they did support it, who knows what sufferings they may not have endured, and if they might have added to their length of days, had they attached themselves to another sort of life? It is true, we must admit, that the greater portion of those great men that the human race acknowledge for its masters, had arrived to an advanced age: Homer, Democritus, Parmenides, Pythagoras, Hippocrates, Plato, Plutarch, Bacon, Galileo, Harvey, Boyle, Locke, Leibnitz, Newton, all lived to be old men,—but from this must we infer that excessive mental application is not injurious? Let us beware of drawing so false a conclusion. We may only presume that there are men born for those sorts of excursions, and perhaps that a happy disposition of the fibres which form great men, is the same as that which conduces to longevity. Mens sana in corpore sano. Besides it is much more by the strength of their genius, than by the assiduity of their labour, that literary men make to themselves an immortal name. Moments of delightful leisure, distractions which celebrity necessarily brings with it, exercise which the duties of their high station in the world obliges them to take,—these in a great measure tend to repair the evil which literary employment occasions."

Tissot proceeds to eulogise the well-regulated habits of an eminent professor of Oriental literature, who had just died, and had he been speaking of the author of Waverley, he could not have used language more suitable, or more characteristic of the subject of his notice.

"Every body remembers at this moment," he continues, "and recalls even before I name him, that great man who for more than fifty years was the ornament, and the delight of this city and its academies: he had cultivated the sciences from his earliest youth even to his last days; he was profoundly versed in all those studies which were more immediately the business of his vocation, and of which the domain is so extensive;

there was no subject on which he was not instructed; so much knowledge implied immense labour, yet his health was not injured by it; we have seen him enter on his eighteenth lustum, without having lost a particle of his genius, or of the vivacity of his senses; and will this example be adduced as an objection to my argument? It cannot be, for the recollection of the details of his life that are given here, fulfil the purposes of presenting him as a model for the contemplation of all men of genius. He knew how to be a scholar without ceasing to be a man; he knew how to acquire the profoundest knowledge, and the most various attainments, without sacrificing his duties to erudition, in performing those of a citizen, a father, a friend, a member of society, and a professor of learning, as if he had been only a simple citizen, a domestic being, and a man of the world. When wearied by his mental labours it was his custom to repair his strength and spirits by exercising his body in the cultivation of his grounds, and he supported both by that gaiety of heart, that amenity of manners, which is killed in the study, and which is only maintained by commencing with our fellow-men for our mutual advantage."

CHAPTER XLI.

The health of Scott derived no little advantage from such exercise and intercourse as Tissot speaks of. We are told by Allan Cunningham, "it was his pleasure to walk out frequently among his plantations, with a small hatchet and hand saw, with which he lopped off superfluous boughs, or removed an entire tree when it was marring the growth of others. He loved also to ride over the country, on a little stout gallop, and the steepest hill did not stop him, nor the deepest water daunt him." His passion for field sports furnished him likewise with a recreation, which was no less conducive to his well-being; his taste for such pastime is, indeed, a singularity which is not often to be met with in men of studious habits. Literature, they think, is the noblest pleasure that can be chased, and it is unfortunately the only one they pursue. There are so few instances on record of literary men indulging in the pleasures of the field, that it seems almost incongruous to speak in the warm breath of a scholar and a sportsman. But Scott was an exception; when his imagination was wearied with babbling of green fields," he betook himself to them with a right good appetite, for the wholesome recreation they afforded. With his "veteran favourite," Maids, "the fleetest of highland deer-hounds," it was his delight to sally forth, and to make the pleasures of the come to object or the excuse for many a delightful ramble over the romantic hills of his native country. Perhaps it was the frequency of such rambles which induced the Edric Shepherd to believe that "he had a little of the old country blood in him, and if he had been able would have been a desperate poacher and black fisher." But with all the poaching propensities of the author of Waverley, as Sir Thomas Lacy of his neighbourhood suffered from them; he only hunted deer, but we are not informed by the worthy Shepherd that he ever stole them.

The fact is, that exercise was essential to his health, and in combining it with field-sports, he gave the charm of a manly and wholesome recreation to what might be considered a duty to his constitution. If there be an antidote to the toil of composition it is exercise; and if there be a preventive of the ills which literary flesh is heir to it is regimen. Scott well knew the advantages of both, but most sadly are they overlooked by authors in general. An hour or two in the afternoon devoted to a few calls on their friends is deemed sufficient for the repatriation of nervous energy, exhausted by the unintermitting labours of six or seven hours; they feel they are unequal to fatigue, for muscular strength is the barometer of the vital powers, and therefore the employment of the locomotive organs is wholly neglected. If the night is devoted to mental application, the morning makes amends for the hours which have been stolen from the natural period of repose, and what matters it whether the noonday sun presides over their slumbers? It is unfortunately matters much more than they imagine: they devote their nervous energies to the greatest of all labours at a period when all nature is deprived of the vivifying principle which animates every object in the animal or vegetable kingdom, and "steep their senses in forgetfulness," when every thing that has life around them is receiving a new and more lively stimulus of existence, from the influence of those beams whose electrical phenomena are more analogous to those of the han any that we are acquainted with. If the employment of the pen of such persons is dignified by the name of an elegant pursuit, which is supposed to soften the manners, and to refine the taste of the votaries of science, they deem it better to become its martyrs, than to share with the illiterate or the vulgar the blessing of rude health.

If the spirits at length become wearied by incessant application, if even during their meals the nervous energy is summoned to the brain from every other organ, especially from those where its influence is most requisite for the due performance of the process of digestion; if the appetite begins to fail, the temper to be soured, the sensibility to be morbidly increased, and that the labour of the closet, in the words of Rousseau, "les rends délicats, affaiblit leur tempérament, et quo l'âme garde difficilement sa vigueur, quand le corps a perdu la sienne; que l'étude use la machine, épuise les esprits, détruit les forces, énerve le courage, rend pusillanime, incapable de résister également à la peine et aux passions;" nothing is to be added to the demonstration of the dangers that surround their health and happiness. Yet are these premonitory symptoms of disease, of morbid irritability of the organs of digestion, of hypochondria, and all its horrors, wholly neglected and overlooked. If they have only strength enough to pursue the avocation which insidiously undermines their constitution, they dream not that disease is a possible occurrence so long as bodily pain is not endured: they know not that the fiercest paroxysm of hypochondria, the severest attacks of dyspepsia, are seldom accompanied by physical sufferings. But if they are reminded by the dejection of their spirits, or the diminution of bodily strength, of the injury their health has sustained, and is daily sustaining, from the over-exertion of one organ, and the total inactivity of every other, then indeed they have recourse to the physician, or rather to the faculty, for they commonly travel through every sign in the zodiac of privileged empiricism, from the balance, the sign in which the daily allowance of bread and meat is doled out to the invalid, to Aquarius, the sign of the water-gruel system, where the advantages of thin potatoes are magnified, and extolled "to the very echo that doth applaud again." If they go still further, and knock at the door of Ursa Major, they will probably find the Great Bear of the profession hugging his own doctrine to death, and in the midst of many unparaly gambols, extending his great paw over an ample sofa me, and dismissing his visitors with a good-natured growl—the customary intimation to go about their business, and read his book. And accordingly, they go at the first growl and read "the book," and swallow blue pills every night, and black draughts every morning, till some new star in the medical constellation out-twinkles the old bear, and it becomes the fashion to consult the last discovered luminary.

But, in sober seriousness, the use of powerful remedies in disorders of the stomach, is seldom followed by a more than temporary relief: eventually their effects are injurious; how can they be otherwise, when injudiciously employed, or the principle mistaken on which they are recommended, or that principle too general in its application to meet every peculiarity of age, condition, and constitution? "Alitem aham, aliud factum sanemur," says Plautus, but not so the fashionable dietetic doctor; there is but one mode of treatment for the numerous and dissimilar symptoms of a disease; no matter whether the patient is young or old, male or female, of a sanguine or a saturnine temperament, of a vigorous or a debilitated constitution—no matter where the seat of the disorder be, the head, the stomach, or the liver, he is doomed to go through the same undeviating routine either of blue pill and black draught, of carbonate of soda, or subcarbonate of iron; and if the remedies, like the torture of Procrustes, are not fitted to the sufferer, the sufferer is fitted to the remedies—that is to say, the feeble powers of his constitution are habituated to them. But verily and truly, we believe that more injury is done by medicine to dyspeptic patients, than would arise to the constitution from its total non-employment. The celebrated Hufeland carries this notion to a far greater extent, and applies it to the whole range of chronic maladies, without impugning the character of that profession of which he is one of the brightest ornaments in Germany.

CHAPTER XLII.

The fault in a great measure lies in the victims of the malady we are speaking of—the literary malady;

they are generally heedless enough of present health, but anxious in the extreme about prospective and imaginary ills. Forthcoming evils are continually casting their shadows before them, and every feeling of malaise is magnified by fear into a symptom of some serious disorder. The consequence is, on trivial occasions they are continually having recourse to unnecessary and even injurious medicines; either, volatile ammonia, spirituous tinctures, carminatives, and ultimately laudanum,—are the remedies which "nervous people" constantly have recourse to; but again and again do we repeat it, there is no antidote but exercise for the disorders of the studious, and no preventive but regimen. By these only may the effects of excessive study be obviated and new vigour infused into the constitution, so as to enable it to sustain for any length of time the daily toil of mental labour. Sydenham has given a very imposing and somewhat scholastic account of his regimen, which appears certainly not to have been remarkably abstemious; but to its regularity the good effects are due which Sydenham ascribes to it. "In the morning when I arise, I drink a dish or two of tea, and then ride in my coach till noon; when I return home I immediately refresh myself with any sort of meat, of easy digestion, that I like, (for moderation is necessary above all things.) I drink somewhat more than a quarter of a pint of Canary wine immediately before dinner every day, to promote my digestion, and to drive the gout from my bowels. When I have dined, I betake myself to my coach again, and when business will permit, I ride into the country for good air. A draught of small beer is to me instead of a supper, and I take another draught when I am in bed, and about to compose myself to sleep."

"There is a wisdom," says Bacon, "in regimen, beyond the rules of physic. A man's own observation of what he finds good, and what he finds hurtful, is the best medicine to preserve health. Celsus could never have spoken it as a physician had he not been a wise man, when he gives it as one of the great precepts of health, that a man do vary and interchange contraries, but with an inclination to the more benign extreme; to use fasting and full eating, but rather full eating; watching and sleep, but rather sleep; sitting and exercise, but rather exercise; so shall nature be cherished, and yet taught mysteries."

"Beyond the general rules of low moderate diet," says Heberden, "which every practitioner must be acquainted with, all people best know what agrees with them, and can ascertain it as well, if not better, than the doctor."

Every man, indeed, of common sense is the best judge of his own digestion, and every thing that agrees with it he may safely conclude is good for him; he has no need of diet books to regulate his mode of living. To make general laws for the diet of individuals, to legislate for the stomach, and for each legislator to lay down particular rules and ordinances at variance with his neighbours, for one to issue his fiat against farinaceous food in every instance, and another to preach up a medical crusade against all vegetable substances: for a third to obtest mankind by the love they bear their lives to abstain from wine; and a fourth to sing peans (not perhaps quite so poetical as "O fons Blandusie") in praise of water; this is, indeed, to suppose that one set of rules is applicable to every form of a disease, or that the same organ at all times is in the same condition, and similarly affected at different periods, and under different circumstances, by the same agents.

In a word, a popular diet-book, based on such a presumption, is the mere impertinence of physic. We may conclude with old Burton, that in what regards our regimen, "our own experience is the best physician; so great is the variety of palates, humours, and temperaments, that every man should observe, and be a law unto himself. Tiberius, we are told by Tacitus, did laugh at all those who, after thirty years of age, asked counsel of others concerning matters of diet."

At forty, says the adage, a man is either a fool or a physician; but at any age the individual is likely to become a valetudinarian for life, who lives by medicine, and not by regimen.

We have been carried away from our subject, but our observations are not perhaps altogether irrelevant to it, nor wholly unimportant to our readers. The unbroken vigour of Scott's constitution throughout the greater portion of a life of literary labour, was unquestionably owing to the regularity and temperance of his habits, and to wholesome exercise. But without that exercise, even the "ventrem bene moratum," which Seneca proclaims the advantages of, would not have been sufficient for the preservation of his health, or the reparation of the vigour that was exhausted in his study.

The common error of the studious was not his, of devoting day after day, or night after night to some literary pursuit, and of wearying out the body in the constant service of the "indefatigable mind": "of compelling (as Plutarch observes) that which is mortal to do as much as that which is immortal; that which is earthly, as that which is ethereal." Scott's regular recreations, on the contrary, put the body in a state to obey the suggestions of the stronger and the nobler part. Not an hour did he occupy himself in planting or embellishing his grounds, not a morning did he allot to the pleasures of the chase, nor set apart a portion of his leisure for a joyous ramble in the country, that he did not return from the "deambulatio per amana loca," with recruited spirits, for the encounter of new toil, and invigorated powers that had shaken off the temporary senectitude of study.

In many points the habits of Milton resembled those of Scott; he was no less temperate, no less sober-minded, but unfortunately the acrimony of party strife sometimes steeped his pen in bitterness approaching to malevolence. The sufferings, however, of a painful malady, might have had not a little to do with the asperity of his politics. The labour moreover of composition, as might be expected from the nature of his productions, was intense, and frequently deprived him of repose. "He would oftentimes," says Richardson, "lie awake whole nights together, but not a verse could he make; at other times he would dictate perhaps forty lines in a breath, and then reduce them to half the number. He held an absurd opinion that his poetic vein never flowed happily, but from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, and that the coldness of this climate was unfavourable to the flights of his imagination. Till his infirmities confined him to the house, he was in the daily habit of taking exercise in his garden, but in the intervals of his gouty pain, being unable to leave his room, he used to swing in a chair, and sometimes play on an organ; and even this mode of exercise most people will deem preferable to that of Lord Monboddo, who for the sake of his health was accustomed to rise every morning at four o'clock, and then walk about his room, divested of his habiliments, with the window open, for the purpose of enjoying what he called his air bath. But Johnson's idea of exercise was certainly a more agreeable one than either Milton's or Monboddo's; he told Boswell with becoming gravity, "that if he had no duties here, and no reference to futurity, he would spend his life in driving briskly in a post-chaise with a pretty woman." But, much as we admire the doctor's taste, we rather believe that Scott's mode of taking exercise was the more salubrious of the two.

Those "labores hilares venandi," (as Camden terms the field sports of Staffordshire,) which Scott took delight in, were more likely to produce the effect which Galen has so strongly pointed out the beneficial results of: the promotion of pleasurable excitement by the general diffusion of the animal spirits, as it were, over the whole frame; by the use of exercise, till the whole body tingles with the glow of incipient perspiration—"usque ad ruborem, sed non ad sudorem." This is indeed the grand point that is to be observed in taking exercise—to take as much as the individual is capable of bearing without fatigue.

It is a folly to think that the necessity for bodily activity may be superseded by means of medicine, or regimen, or habits, in other respects the best regulated in the world. Exercise is, indeed, indispensable to health; and without health ask the sick man where is happiness, and he may tell you, at least, where it is not, when he points to his own bosom.

But how is exercise to be taken by those who dwell in the busy haunts of the literary world—who are confined to their closets by their pursuits the greater part of the day, or without necessity indulge their literary indolence in the immurement of their study, with the same feelings of veneration for its imprisonment which King James gave such eloquent words to, when he visited the library of Sir Thomas Bodley: "If I were doomed to be a prisoner, and the choice were given me of my prison, this library should be my dungeon; I would desire to be chained by no other bonds than the clasps which incarcerate these pages, and to have no other companions in my captivity than these volumes!" How then are the studious to escape from their fascinating pursuits, to devote even an hour to bodily exercise? The first law of nature is said to be self-preservation—the first law of life is motion—its most essential requisite, activity. "Do not be inactive," says the Arab poet, El Wardi, "for water becomes putrid by stagnation, and the moon, by changing, becomes bright and perfect."

CHAPTER XLIII.

The same idea, but somewhat amplified, is found in "the Anatomy of Melancholy," in an argument for the necessity of exercise: "The heavens themselves run continually round; the world is never still; the sun travels to the east and to the west; the moon is ever changing in its course; the stars and the planets have their constant motions; the air we breathe is continually agitated by the wind, and the waters never cease to ebb and flow: doubtless, for the purpose of their conservation, to teach us that we should ever be in action." The ancients had so much faith in the good effects of exercise, that many of their disorders were treated solely by medical gymnastics. Germanicus was cured of an atrophy by riding, Cicero of a grievous infirmity by travelling. The Roman physicians sent their consumptive patients to Alexandria, and the Greeks shipped their nervous ones to Anticyra—nominally for change of air, but really for the advantages of exercise and recreation. The father of physic was the first who introduced medical gymnastics into practice; he described various sorts of these exercises, but those on which he placed most dependence were friction of the whole frame—somewhat similar to the process of shampooing, and a swinging motion of the hands and arms. The advantages of both modes of promoting the insensible secretion of the skin, and of maintaining the bodily vigour, by the activity of almost every muscle, are but too little known, and consequently but little practised. And not the least advantage of such modes of exercise is, that every one may employ them, whatever be his occupation, or however constantly confined to the house.

The literary man, who has a horror of the feral amusements of the field, or who thinks a ride on horseback, or a ramble on foot, more fatiguing than the weariness of the soft-cushioned elbow-chair, in which the worst weariness of life is often felt, will find in these employments a salubrious occupation, an invigorating exercise, even in his closet. No in-door activity is indeed comparable to that which is taken in the open air; but unquestionably health may be preserved, and strength maintained for a very long period, by devoting ten minutes, night and morning, to those frictions Hippocrates so strongly recommends, and which are to this day in such general use in those eastern countries, where they are not half so essential to health, as they are in colder climates; and likewise by the occasional use, at least every fourth or fifth hour, of that other mode of exercise which has been described, or what perhaps is still better, of employing it in that manner in which sailors are accustomed to exercise their arms in cold weather.

The chest, which has been contracted and compressed by a hurtful posture, is expanded by the vigorous action of the muscles; in fact the whole of them are called into active exercise by it.

This form of medical gymnastics, with the windows of the apartments thrown open while it is employed, and a few brisk turns in the chamber, if unfortunately no garden is at hand, is, indeed, the only substitute for those recreations which combine the advantages of wholesome air with the charms of delightful scenery.

The thews and sinews of the brawny blacksmith, who stirs not more than one day in seven from the precincts of his forge, to a certain extent illustrates the invigorating effects of this sort of exercise; and we are persuaded that the exemption of the people of the East from many European disorders, from gout, dyspepsia, and phthisis, is not wholly due to the peculiarity of climate, or to temperate habits, but in a great measure to the process of shampooing, either in the bath, to which the latter is subservient, or in their private houses, in which it is every day in use.

In all probability the mode of applying friction by means of the flesh-brush in this country, has caused it to fall into such general disuse—it is neither efficient nor agreeable; a simple glove, made of common white druggot, without divisions at the fingers except for the thumb, as the woollen mittens of children are commonly made, is the best thing that can be used for the extremities; and a common flesh-brush, covered with the same material, with a handle about fifteen inches in length, is by far the most convenient and effectual mode of applying friction to the body. We are so thoroughly convinced of the utility of the chafing glove, that however misplaced the mention of its advantages may seem to be in these pages, we still most strenuously venture to recommend its employment to those who have most need of exercise, and least inclination, or perhaps opportunity, to take it; to those who are deprived, by their pursuits, of that insensible secretion of the skin, which is essential to health, and the obstruction of which, (as we have seen in the case of the unfortunate Cowper,) is frequently the cause of the gravest maladies which afflict humanity.

So few of the infirmities of genius were the portion of Sir Walter Scott, that if we have wandered from our subject, it is because there is hardly an untoward circumstance in the fortunate career of this great man up to a late period of his life, which is calculated to illustrate the argument which it was the aim of the preceding pages to establish. But though there are few errors of conduct to be noticed, and still fewer physical infirmities to be connected with them, no indulgence to be demanded for the one, and no charitable feelings to be appealed to for the other, there is still a moral in the secret of his happiness to be found in the record of his virtues, his moderated passions, and well regulated habits, which has the strong persuasion of an admirable example to recommend it in lieu of the awful lesson of a life of error, and of suffering for the enforcement of a warning.

The period, however, arrived when fortune began to weary of her smiles, and the long unclouded horizon of Sir Walter became darkened by adversity. He had unfortunately connected himself with the house of Constable, and the failure of that house was the means of involving his affairs in what might have been considered irretrievable ruin. This disastrous circumstance is plainly and succinctly described in the notice that is prefixed to the Abbotsford subscription, but with, perhaps, a pardonable leaning to the imprudence which led to the calamity.

"The crisis which took place in commercial affairs generally, and which particularly affected every person engaged in literary undertakings, involved Sir Walter Scott in losses alike unexpected and unprepared for, to the amount of 120,000*l*. Ruinous as this demand must have been, it is yet obvious, that after surrendering, to its payment, the whole of his property, he might have secured to himself and his family the fruits of his subsequent exertions, and realised from his later works not less than 70,000*l*. The whole of this sum, with whatever more a lengthened life might have enabled him to obtain, he with manly and conscientious feeling appropriated to the benefit of his creditors. In thus devoting his talents to the acquittal of obligations not originally, though legally his own, he laboured with a degree of assiduity, and an intenseness of anxiety, which shortened his existence by overstrained intellectual exertion."

It is only to be wondered at, how a sober-minded man (which Scott unquestionably was) could have been so incautious as to have entangled his fortune in the speculations of his publishers; but in all probability, the mania of building, embellishing, planting, and collecting objects of antiquity, (which led to an expense exceeding fifty thousand pounds,) was the cause of his embarrassment, by compelling him to have recourse to other plausible means of increasing his income than those of literary emoluments, immense as his were.

In the five years that succeeded the bankruptcy of Constable, from 1826 to 1831, he produced no less than one and thirty volumes, the profits of which, and of the new edition of his novels, which amount to the surprising number of seventy-four volumes, were devoted to the diminution of his debt, and by his indefatigable literary labours, (almost exclusively,) he was enabled to pay off fifty-four thousand pounds. His life had been ensured in favour of his creditors, for twenty-two thousand pounds. Further payments out of his personal property still further reduced that debt, so that the whole does not now exceed twenty thousand pounds. From the period of his embarrassments it was evident Sir Walter was writing less for the public than for his creditors, but unfortunately more for either than for his fame. From the publication of his last novel in 1826, every succeeding work was a fainter emanation of his extraordinary genius, and perhaps the last of his productions was the feeblest gleam of its departing glory.

"The prodigious labours," says the author of the admirable sketch of his life in the Penny Magazine, "which these numerous and voluminous works necessarily required, was too much, however, even for the most ready intellect and robust frame. The present writer, when he saw Sir Walter for the last time, in 1830, was struck by the change which a comparatively short period had produced in his personal appearance. A few years previously he looked a hale and active man in middle life—now at the age of sixty, he appeared at least ten or twelve years older. When told of the death of a gentleman of his acquaintance, by paralysis, a few days previously, he appeared much struck, and made a remark which seemed to indicate some secret apprehension in his own mind, of the fatal malady that was then lurking in his own over-wrought mind." At length the springs of life, so long over-taxed, began to give way. During the ensuing winter, (1831,) symptoms of gradual paralysis, (a disease, it seems of which his father had also died, but at an advanced age,) began to be manifested. His lameness became more distressing, and his utterance began to be obviously affected. Yet even in this afflicting and ominous condition he continued to work with undiminished diligence. During the summer of 1831, he grew gradually worse; his medical attendants strictly forbade mental exertion, yet he could not be restrained from composition. In the autumn, a visit to Italy was recommended; he was with difficulty prevailed on to leave Scotland, but at length he yielded to the entreaties of his friends, and sailed in the following October. His health seemed improved by the voyage, but after visiting Naples and Rome, at both of which cities he was received with almost regal honours, his desire to return to his native land became irrepresible, and he hurried homeward with a rapidity, which in his state of health was highly injurious, and doubtless accelerated the catastrophe which perhaps no degree of skill or caution could have long delayed. He experienced a further severe attack (a second paralytic seizure) in passing down the Rhine, and reached London in nearly the last stage of physical and mental prostration. Medical aid could only, it was found, for a short period prove a solution; and to gratify his most ardent dying wish he was conveyed by the steam packet to Leith, and more reached his favourite house at Abbotsford—but in such a pitiable condition that he no longer recognised his nearest and dearest relations. After lingering in this deplorable state till, in the progress of this melancholy malady—this living death—mortification had been some time proceeding in different parts of the mental frame—he expired without a struggle, on the 21st of September 1832, in his sixty-second year."

We have a few observations to make on the nature of the malady which terminated the existence of this great and good man, without entering into any medical disquisition on the subject, but simply for the purpose of directing the attention of the general reader to a malady which literary men are more subject to than persons of any other avocation.

How many instances are recorded in the obituary of genius of the fatal visitation of this humiliating disease! How many awful examples of its power and its tyranny, not only over life but over all the ennobling attributes of humanity! The angel of death hovers not over the head of a man in so terrible a form; the blow is struck, and he who was but yesterday the master-spirit of his age, "the foremost man of all the world," is to-day the object of its pity, the living emblem of life and death, a melancholy spectacle of the light of intellect fading into darkness—of vitality and death,—or at least, the semblance of each in the corresponding members of the same body. Who can contemplate the fearful phenomena of power and immobility, of animation and the extinction of its attributes in the same form, and the sad exhibition of a great man's mind, tottering on the ruins of its lofty throne, and eventually brought down, "quite, quite down, to the level of the lowest capacity, without feeling the pride of reason confounded at the sight, and the softer feelings of nature utterly overpowered?"

It is indeed "a sorry sight," but yet is it one which the friends of the martyrs to literary glory but too frequently have to witness. Copernicus, Petrarck, Linnaeus, Lord Clarendon, Rousseau, Marmontel, Richardson, Steele, Phillips, Harvey, Reid, Johnson, Forster, Dr. Wollaston and Scott, are a few of the many eminent names of those who have fallen victims to excessive mental application, by paralysis or apoplexy. Are the generality of literary men sufficiently acquainted with the nature of this disorder to be able to discern its premonitory symptoms, and to obviate or diminish those predisposing causes which lead to it? We believe they are not; or if they are acquainted with its characteristics, the frequency of such attacks, unattended as they are by immediate dissolution, causes them to under-rate the importance of familiar facts, to extenuate the peril of an evil of too common occurrence, but which it is very possible to avoid, though it may not be so to remove the effects of, if once they have occurred.

Those maladies which arise from a disturbance of the nervous functions of the brain, have not only a common character, but in a great measure an intimate connection. Apoplexy and palsy, epilepsy and hysteria, hypochondria and mania, though they stand not in the relation of cause or effect, are at least modifications of disease, arising from a morbid condition of the nervous system, and generally connected with functional disorder in the digestive organs. The three distinguishing characters of epilepsy, apoplexy, and palsy, are convulsion, coma, and loss of voluntary motion.

But all of these disorders are referred by medical writers to one common source, namely, pressure on the delicate substance of the brain, arising either from a fulness of the vessels of the head, or a rupture of them; but at all events, to a plethoric state of the brain, either chronic or acute and accidental. But we are strongly inclined to believe that this doctrine with respect to palsy, in the great majority of cases in which paralysis is the consequence of excessive mental application, is not only erroneous, but the treatment which is founded on it worse than ineffectual—even highly injurious.

The paralytic seizure in the cases we allude to, supervenes on the exhaustion of mind and body, and its conquest is over the ruins of a broken-down constitution; and so far from originating in a plethoric condition of the circulating system, its origin, we believe, and every day's experience confirms the conviction, is an imperfect supply of blood to the brain, and an irregular distribution of it. Under such circumstances, general blood-letting would certainly be an objectionable remedy—under all circumstances we fear that it is resorted to, at least on the onset, without discrimination, and without advantage. No matter whether the patient is of a sanguineous or a saturnine temperament; of a vigorous or an enervated constitution; blood-letting, even to the abstraction of pounds of this vital fluid, is fearlessly recommended to be adopted in cases wherein the principle of vitality is already half extinguished.

There may be, indeed, few cases of paralysis in which any mode of treatment has the power of preventing the recurrence of an attack eventually fatal. But we have seen many instances in which its recurrence has been prevented for a period of many years, and the patient, in the interval between the first and second seizure, left in the enjoyment of tolerable health, where the very opposite mode of treatment has been used: where the diffusible stimulants, and aromatic tonics, and aperients, had been exhibited from the commencement, combined with the strictest regularity of regimen without abstemiousness, for even generous living is compatible with the rules of a well-ordered regimen.

From Mr. Savory, formerly of Bond-street, we remember to have heard an account, eight or nine years ago, of a friend of his, a baronet, well-known in the gay world, having been seized with paralysis, and finding himself, on his return from a convivial party, suddenly deprived of speech, and the power of moving one side of his body. Either from feelings of desperation, or an impulse of mental aberration, the gentleman had a bottle of port wine brought to his bed-side, and having finished it, he turned with great composure on his side and went to sleep. That gentleman is now living, his intellect wholly unimpaired, his speech restored, and his general health as good as it ever was; and he still daily discusses his bottle or two of port wine with apparent impunity.

Few, we imagine, would have the folly, or the recklessness of life which this gentleman exhibited, to think, under similar circumstances, of following his example; we would not recommend them: our only wonder is, that in this instance it was not fatal. But nevertheless, how can we reconcile the impunity with which this powerful stimulant was taken at such a moment, with the notion of the malady arising from a plethoric condition of the cerebral vessels?

Dr. Powell, in an elaborate paper in the College Transactions, has brought forward a mass of evidence, to prove that paralytic affections, both partial and general, do frequently originate in a peculiar condition of the nerves alone: that they are independent of any morbid affection of the blood-vessels of the head, and that they are produced either by sympathy with irritability of the stomach, or the sudden impression of cold on the surface of the body. If this hypothesis be correct, which there is great reason to believe—namely, that it is a nervous, and not a vascular disorder—the inutilty of treating it on the principle of an inflammatory or plethoric state of the latter system is obvious, and the necessity of considering it as a disturbance of the nervous system, occasioned by the depression of its energies, and followed by an imperfect supply of blood to the brain, and an unequal distribution of it, is no less evident; and these observations will not be without advantage if one medical man is induced to pause, before he has recourse to the lancet, in the treatment of a malady which is incidental to the exhausted vigour of a shattered constitution.

Palsy and apoplexy are so closely connected, that they stand in the relation of cause and effect; still is it difficult to say which is the precursor and which the consequence. Palsy, however, is generally looked upon as a minor degree of apoplexy, and its attacks, says Dr. Gregory, in his most admirable work on the practice of physic, is commonly preceded for several days, or even weeks, by some of the symptoms which are the forerunners of apoplexy, such as giddiness, drowsiness, numbness, dimness of sight, failure of the powers of mind, forgetfulness, and indistinctness of articulation.

But the facts which have perplexed physicians for ages remain in the same condition as they were left by Hippocrates twenty-one centuries ago. The reason why the power of sensation should remain perfect while that of voluntary motion is wholly lost is still a mystery; why the loss of that motion should be on the right-hand side of the body, while the injury in the brain, either from effusion or hæmorrhage, is on the left; and vice versa, on the left of the body when the pressure is on the right, we know not; we surmise, it may arise from the decussation of the nervous fibres, but we are unable to trace it. Why the senses should be hardly affected, while the mental faculties are invariably impaired, we cannot tell; we only know, that the mind which was once powerful and resolute, becomes weak and timid. The post mortem examination of those who have died of paralysis, has thrown no additional light on our knowledge of its nature. When paralysis quickly terminates in apoplexy, the ordinary appearances of the latter disorder are met with, the rupture of a vessel and serous or sanguineous extravasation; but in palsy of long standing the morbid appearance in the brain may be a discolouration of the striated portion, and a corresponding softness of its substance, serous effusions in the ventricles: but in a vast number of cases no preternatural appearance whatever is to be observed, except a flaccidity of the substance of the brain.

This was the appearance which the brain of Sir Walter Scott presented on the post mortem examination: the whole left side of the medullary substance was found in a soft and flaccid state, and globules of water were found distributed over the surface of the same side. In all probability his excessive application went on slowly producing this mischief in the brain during the last five or six years of his existence, when he was driven by his pecuniary embarrassments to literary labour, which was too much for the strength of any human being.

CHAPTER XLV.

CONCLUSION.

With the last of the preceding notices we conclude these pages. In glancing at such parts of the biography of Pope, Johnson, Burns, Cowper, Byron, and Scott, as seemed to be connected with the history of their health, we endeavoured to point out its influence on the mind of each, and to show how far the power of disease had controlled the conduct, or chequered the career, of most of them.

The object we had in view was to rescue the character of men of genius from the unmerited severity which it daily encounters at the hands of shallow criticism, and also from the unmitigated censure which is bestowed upon its imperfections by the enmity of invidious ignorance.

How far we may have succeeded in the attempt, will be determined by the fate of this little work; but whatever that may be, the least partial of our judges cannot deem more humbly of the ability displayed in these pages to do justice to such a subject than we do. And we are well aware, that we have barely touched on many an important topic connected with that subject, which in abler hands might have afforded sufficient matter for its ample illustration.

But, however briefly and imperfectly our task has been accomplished, we have at least the consolation of feeling that no other but a laudable motive induced us to undertake it, and we have the greatest of all literary authorities for the opinion that great enterprises are laudable, even when they are above the strength that undertakes them.

Had we known of any other English work of a similar tendency, the present one would probably have never seen the light. Tisot's admirable treatise, "Avis aux Gens des Lettres," so far as it goes, leaves nothing to be desired on the subject of the health of studious people. But of all who have written on the subject of the literary character, Currie, to our mind, in his brief life of Burns, has evinced the best knowledge of his subject. After Currie, and only not before him, because the light of medical philosophy was wanting to the "Anatomy of Melancholy," Burton deserves to rank. And next to these, the author of the "Curiosities of Literature" would probably have ranked, had the advantages, which both the others derived from their professions, been his; had he the same opportunity of tracing the analogies of mental and physical infirmities—or of speculating like Burton, daily and hourly on the effects of the latter, and of the influence of the literary malady in his own person, on the chief mental faculties. Our opinion, however, of the excellence of these authors, is to be gathered in the preceding pages from the frequent reference we have made to their works, and which, if we have failed in any instance to have acknowledged, we have done so from inadvertency.

But there is one motive we have had in view, which we did not think it necessary to parade before the reader at the outset of his perusal of these pages—namely, the opportunity which a literary subject of general interest afforded, of introducing here and there some medical observations, of sufficient importance to every literary person to deserve attention, though unfortunately of too little interest, in the form of a dry disquisition on a medical topic at any length, to engage it.

It was, therefore, our object to convey information of a medical kind, on many subjects connected with the infirmities of genius, without seeming so to do, or at least without wearying the attention of the general reader with details on any subject of a professional character. This we trust we have accomplished, and in making the lives of those eminent persons we have made choice of, the vehicle of opinions respecting the health of literary men, and its influence on their happiness: we humbly hope the delicacy of that subject has not been forgotten, and that in endeavouring to vindicate the literary character, there is nothing to be found in "The Infirmities of Genius" which the moralist at least may have to censure.

EXTRACTS

FROM

JAMES MONTGOMERY'S LECTURES ON POETRY.

Poetry is the eldest, the rarest, and the most excellent of the fine arts. It was the first fixed form of language; the earliest perpetuation of thought: it existed before prose in history, before music in melody, before painting in description, and before sculpture in imagery. Anterior to the discovery of letters, it was employed to communicate the lessons of wisdom, to celebrate the achievements of valour, and to promulgate the sanctions of law. Music was invented to accompany, and painting and sculpture to illustrate it.

The art of constructing easy, elegant, and even spirited verse, may be acquired by any mind of moderate capacity, and enriched with liberal knowledge; and those who cultivate this talent may occasionally hit upon some happy theme, and handle it with such unaccustomed delicacy or force, that for a while they outdo themselves, and produce that which adds to the public stock of permanent poetry. But habitually to frame the lay that quickens the pulse, flushes the cheek, warms the heart, and expands the soul of the hearer,—playing upon his passions as upon a lyre, and making him to feel as though he were holding converse with a spirit; this is the art of Nature herself, invariably and perpetually pleasing, by a secret and undefinable charm, which lives through all her works, and causes the very stones, as well as the stars, to cry out—

"The hand that made us is divine."

Poetry transcends music in the passion, pathos, and meaning of its movements; for its harmonies are ever united with distinct feelings and emotions of the rational soul; their associations are always clear and easily comprehensible: whereas music, when it is not allied to language, or does not appeal to memory, is simply a sensual and vague, though an innocent and highly exhilarating delight, conveying no direct improvement to the heart, and leaving little permanent impression upon the mind.

Sculpture is the noblest, but the most limited of the manual fine arts; it produces the fewest, but the greatest effects; it approaches nearest to nature, and yet can present little beside models of her living forms, and those principally in repose.

FROM

FRAGMENTS OF VOYAGES AND TRAVELS,

SECOND AND THIRD SERIES.

BY CAPTAIN BASIL HALL.

INTRODUCTION.

Captain Hall, since his work of Travels in America, has been, we dare say, very little more of a favourite with our readers than with ourselves; but his prejudices apart, he is a very pleasant writer, as will be seen from the following chapters selected from the second and third series of his Fragments of Voyages and Travels, the latter of which has just been issued from the British press. Too much stress is probably laid upon the name an author has acquired, when selecting a book to read. A writer sometimes woefully mistakes his own powers, while his next effort on a subject where he is at home may be entirely successful. Such is the case in the present instance; the captain got among the breakers, if we may so speak, when he wrote upon our social institutions; but fairly at sea, he is in his element, and exceedingly lively and entertaining.

The first series of his "Fragments" has been published some time in this country; those sketches were rather addressed to the youthful mind; the present two series are better in every respect, and are now for the first time printed here. The scenes in India, on ship board, and in company with Sir Walter Scott, are characterised by intelligence, and extensive information. It is scarcely necessary to remark that the chapters omitted relate to matters respecting which no interest is felt by our countrymen—discussing the relative duties of the various officers of the British navy, and other dry details, which the volumes would be better without for the general reader. In his descriptions of incidents the captain is surely very happy though not laconic; his pictures are almost tangible, and few will rise from their perusal without the acknowledgment of their being better informed, and in better humour with an author whom they have had previous cause to think of but slightly. Captain Hall has furnished many texts for criticism—he has not yet atoned for his wholesale aspersions, but we hope his previous malversations may not deter any one from the gratification to be derived from the following exciting details.

The London New Monthly Magazine thus characterises the second series:

"With Captain Hall's well known political opinions we have no desire to meddle in reviewing one of the most agreeable and instructive books it has ever been our fortune to peruse. Few have a more enviable tact at communicating knowledge. He has not alone skimmed the surface of things, but he has entered deeply into their nature, although it would at first appear that he satisfies himself, and seeks to satisfy others by detailing only such circumstances as are amusing and possess interest. He is thus a very profitable acquaintance, from whose long experience and eventful life rational enjoyment and useful information may be derived. There is perhaps no writer who tells an anecdote more pleasantly, or with more graphic power."

CHAPTER I.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S EMBARKATION AT PORTSMOUTH IN THE AUTUMN OF 1831.

Of all the voyages and travels I ever made in my life, the most interesting by far was a trip to Portsmouth, when I had the honour of attending Sir Walter Scott, to assist him in his embarkation for Italy. The circumstances were quite accidental which led to my being employed in so delightful a manner, as rendering even the slightest services to an author who has laid the whole world under such deep obligations.

The extraordinary interest which the public feel in every thing relating to this wonderful man induces me to believe that a simple narrative of the mere fact connected with his embarkation may to many prove acceptable. In due season, it is to be hoped, his accomplished son-in-law will favour the world with a complete life of Sir Walter Scott; and as it is impossible to suppose that any person can have enjoyed such ample means of studying his character, and making himself acquainted with his unedited writings, as Mr. Lockhart, we may reasonably expect a work of the highest description of literary and philosophical interest, from opportunities so favourable in the hands of a writer of taste, genius, and cultivated talents.

In the summer of 1831, it became but too well known to the public that Sir Walter Scott had suffered greatly from more than one severe attack of illness; and towards the autumn of that year it was generally understood that his medical attendants in the north strongly recommended his going abroad. There occurred much difficulty, however, in arranging this matter. In the first place, Sir Walter himself, it appears, felt extremely unwilling to move from home. Perhaps he knew quite as well as his doctors, that he had not long to live; and it is certain that he experienced a strong wish not to breathe his last away from his beloved Abbotsford—which, like one of his romantic novels, might be called the creation of his own hands! In the next place, the state of his bodily health rendered a long journey by land inexpedient, especially over the rough roads of France and Italy; and still further to add to the difficulty, great doubts arose if any of the ordinary sea conveyances would be likely to prove more suitable. The most favourable resource, and one which seemed obvious to every person but the Great Unknown himself, was a passage in a ship of war; but as he felt the strongest reluctance to making any application for such a favour, his friends in Scotland were reduced to an exceedingly awkward dilemma. The physicians, however, continued positively to declare, that Sir Walter must, by some means or other, be removed from Abbotsford, if he were to have the smallest chance of recovery. So long as he remained at home, it was clear to them, and to every one else, that his incessant literary exertions were only augmenting the alarming disease under which he was suffering.

At last, one of his most intimate friends, Mr. Robert Cadell, the publisher of his works, wrote to consult me confidentially on the occasion, entreating me to discover in what way a passage in a ship of war going to the Mediterranean might be obtained. Owing to some accident, it was late in the day before this letter was delivered to me; but, although it was long past office hours, I thought it would be wrong to stand upon etiquettes when the health of such a man was at stake. As the shortest way, therefore, of settling this pressing matter, I walked straight to the Admiralty, where I was told that the first lord, Sir James Graham, had gone to his room to dress for dinner, and could not be seen. Nevertheless I took the liberty of writing him a short note, stating that I had just received a communication from a friend of Sir Walter Scott's, the contents of which I felt extremely desirous of communicating to him without delay, from a belief that his assistance on this occasion might essentially contribute to preserve one of the most valuable lives in the country.

As I anticipated, Sir James received me instantly; and even before I had time to read half through the letter from Scotland, he assured me, that whatever was considered likely to promote Sir Walter Scott's recovery, should undoubtedly be granted by government. On my stating the afflicting details of the case, he mentioned that, as a ship was shortly to sail from for Malta a passage in her might be considered certain.

"How the details are to be arranged," added Sir James, "is of no great consequence. Leave all that to me. I am personally well acquainted with Captain Pigot of the Barham, which is the frigate going to the Mediterranean, and therefore, at all events, I can manage it as a private favour, should any unexpected official difficulties occur. In the meantime, as it seems to be important that Sir Walter should have as much leisure to prepare as possible, and as the ship is actually under sailing orders, I beg you will write to him at once; and pray make an effort to save to-night's post. Say to Sir Walter that his passage shall be arranged in the manner most agreeable to his wishes, and that he may set out on his journey south as soon as he can make it convenient to do so, certain that all things shall be got in readiness for him."

I wrote a letter to Sir Walter accordingly, which, by help of a swift cab, I succeeded in getting into the General Post-office at half-past seven. This was on the 13th of September.

Next day, it appears to have occurred to Sir James Graham, that although Captain Pigot, or any other officer in the Navy, would, of course, have been delighted to give Sir Walter Scott a passage in his ship, it might not be altogether agreeable to Sir Walter himself to be under such extensive personal obligations to a perfect stranger. At least, I infer, from the following note to me, that such were Sir James Graham's reflections.

(Private.)

"Admiralty, Sept. 15, 1831.

"DEAR SIR,—I have received the commands of his majesty to order a free passage in the Barham to Malta for Sir Walter Scott and his daughter; and I have had the greatest pleasure in communicating to Sir Walter himself, the gracious terms in which his majesty was pleased to convey his consent on this occasion.

"I have been sincerely glad of an opportunity of evincing my respect for Sir Walter on this occasion; and I thank you for giving me the information which has enabled me to prove the sincerity of these feelings.

Very faithfully yours,

(Signed)

J. R. G. GRAHAM.

"CAPTAIN BASIL HALL."

If it afforded so much pleasure to the first lord of the admiralty and others, who were merely the channels of communication through which the royal favour circulated from the throne to the most distinguished of its subjects, we may conceive the satisfaction with which our kind-hearted monarch himself exercised his power. And, probably, there never was an act of condescension more universally or more justly applauded throughout the country.

Had a similar fate befallen Shakspeare, and had his health in his latter years required the removing of a sea voyage, with what gratitude would not all posterity have looked back to the kindness and sagacity of a good Queen Bess? Had she, like our present gracious sovereign, anticipated the wishes of her subjects and their descendants, by placing a ship of war at the great poet's command! That the Author of Waverley will be viewed by our posterity in no small degree as we now view Shakspeare, there can be little doubt; and, probably, there will be handed down to future times no circumstance better calculated to afford lasting gratification, than the graceful conduct of his majesty upon this occasion. We might the following lines of Lord Byron, forming part of his beautiful sonnet to George IV. be addressed to his successor:

"Dismiss thy guard, and trust thee to such trails!

For who would raise a hand except to bless?

Were it not easy, sir, and isn't sweet,

To make thyself beloved?"

Who can forget the sensation produced at the time, by the delicacy and good taste with which the interests and convenience of a private individual were thus gracefully converted into a public concern? Every one, indeed, appeared really to feel as if a personal favour had been done to himself; and, certainly, no monarch ever gained more genuine popularity than was accorded to William IV. for this well-timed attention to the wishes of the country.

Sir Walter, from the first, had been very averse to any application being made from him to government, so that he was much relieved by understanding that the whole affair was the spontaneous and hearty act of the highest authorities, the instant it was suggested to them that his health might be benefited by the proposed change of air. At bottom, it is probable that this diffidence on his part arose more from his secret reluctance to root himself up from his house and home, his dearly beloved black-letter library, his musty papers, and his cherished plantations, in which he took infinitely more delight than in all the society and scenery of the rest of the world besides. If indeed, he would have consented to desist from overworking his mind, and could have been prevailed upon to agree for a time to pass his days in rambling about the rising woods of Abbotsford, every tree of which was planted by himself, it would have been the most gratifying thing imaginable to have sought to move him from home. But, in the fervour of his manly anxiety to fulfil his pecuniary engagements, he considered each hour mispent which did not directly contribute to the accomplishment of that noble end.

At last, the eager desire to work himself out of debt seemed to have become a sort of fascination which he could not resist. One day, Dr. Abercrombie of Edinburgh, (than whom none can more ably 'minister to the mind diseased,') urged upon him the necessity of greater moderation in his mental labours :

"Sir Walter," said the kind physician, "you must not write so constantly; really, sir, you must not work."

"I tell you what it is, doctor," said the Author of Waverley,—"Molly, when she puts the kettle on, might just as well say, 'Kettle—kettle, don't boil!'"

What the result might have proved had no change of residence taken place, it is perhaps idle now to consider. It is sufficient to know, that the reiterated and earnest recommendations of the ablest medical men in the country were fully acted upon; and that Sir Walter, with many a sigh, but, I suspect, no great hopes of amendment, set out from Abbotsford, and, after an easy journey, reached London.

As I had been in some degree the proximate cause of his coming to town, I instantly waited on him, and offered my services to accompany the party to Portsmouth to assist in the embarkation. A free passage, indeed, had been ordered; and I knew Captain Pigot of the Barham to be, of all the officers of the navy, one of the very best suited to do the honours to such a guest; yet experience had shown me, that on such occasions there are many little odds and ends relating to the outfit of passengers which cannot be fully understood by a perfect stranger to ship matters, but which minute details it was scarcely fair to expect the captain to attend to at the busiest of all busy moments, when preparing his ship for sea.

Sir Walter at first declined my offer, saying that he had already given me and all his other friends a great deal too much trouble. It was impossible to make him understand that what might have been considered indifferent or even troublesome in any other case, must become a high honour as well as a pleasure in his. Nor do I think he would even at the last have accepted my services, had it not been for an accidental difficulty that arose in London, for the solution of which he called me in. Some friend who, with the best intentions, no doubt, must have been totally ignorant of the state of feeling in the navy, had, it appears, suggested to Sir Walter the propriety of his making the captain of the ship some present at the end of the voyage.

"Now," said he, in some perplexity, "is this right? Is it usual in such cases? and, if so, what am I to give? It looks odd, I confess," he added, "but I wish to do all that is proper."

I of course informed him that such a thing was not only unusual and improper, but that the effect would inevitably be the very reverse of what was intended, and, so far from gratifying his host, would inevitably offend him. He looked mightily puzzled, and at last said,

"But may I not give the captain a copy of the Waverly Novels, for instance, with an autograph inscription?"

I assured him he might do this with great propriety and safety, but repeated my advice to him to keep clear of all such presents as a pipe of Madeira, or a hogshhead of sherry, which had been suggested to him. This communication appeared to relieve him so much, that, thinking I might again be useful to him, I took advantage of the opportunity to repeat my offer to accompany him to Portsmouth, adding, that I thought he ought to take me at my word, were it only to give convoy back again to those ladies of his family who did not accompany him further. This he accordingly agreed to, and on Sunday morning, the 23d of October, 1831, the party left town, in as rainy, windy, and melancholy a day as ever was seen.

No particular adventures occurred on the way, except that at one of the stages, Guildford, I think, where a short halt was made, a blind horse, when turning suddenly into the stable-yard, pushed right against Sir Walter, threw him violently to the ground, and had well-nigh killed him on the spot! What a fate would this have been, had the author of Waverley—perhaps the foremost man of all the world—been trodden to death by a decayed post-horse! And yet who shall say that, upon the whole, even such a catastrophe might not have proved a blessed exemption from much subsequent suffering and sorrow, at which the nations wept?

The mysterious influences of disease strike at the mind not less surely, though often more slowly, than those which destroy the body. Of this fatal progress he was himself probably aware, for when he related this incident to me next morning, though his account was touched with his wonted humour, I saw, or almost fancied I saw, in his tone and manner, a trace of regret that he had escaped a swifter destruction than that which, I verily believe, he even then fully knew was darkly overtaking him.

In order to have all things ready for Sir Walter's reception, I hastened forward to Portsmouth in the Rocket coach, and having found the principal inn, the George, quite full, engaged rooms for him at the Fountain. Mr. Nance, the landlord, and the other worthy folks there, who had little expected such an honour, were so enchanted, that they prevailed on one whole family to turn out of their rooms, in order the better to accommodate Sir Walter's party.

Next morning, Captain Pigot waited on him, as he said, to receive orders, and to beg him to consider that every officer, man, and boy in the Barham, was solicitous, above all things, to render his passage agreeable. Sir Walter was much pleased with the frankness of these offers, but declared he knew nothing at all about a ship, and must trust to those of his friends who did. Upon which Captain Pigot asked the ladies if they would like to go on board the frigate to see the accommodations. But as the weather was rather rough, this was declined, and I undertook the first visit on their account.

I found that on each side of the ship a most commodious set of cabins had been put up by order of the Admiralty. Although these apartments had been very handsomely furnished by Captain Pigot, and were nearly ready for the party, he begged me again and again to look over every thing, and point out what was still wanted, stating that he would reckon it the greatest favour if I would consider him completely at Sir Walter's service. As, however he was then exceedingly busy, he requested I would take every opportunity of discovering Sir Walter's wishes, and put them in train, without consulting him.

"This," said he, "will answer the same end, and perhaps it will even be more agreeable to my illustrious guest. Do, therefore, oblige me," continued this considerate and kind-hearted officer, "by finding out either from himself or from the ladies of his family, any thing and every thing that will add to his comfort on the voyage, and let me know it; or if I be not in the way, apply to the first lieutenant, who will attend implicitly to all your suggestions. By the way, cannot you see any thing now," said he, "to remark upon? Is there nothing in these arrangements which Sir Walter might find inconvenient?"

As Captain Pigot seemed so desirous that I should remark something to add or to alter, I cast my eyes about to discover defects where every thing seemed perfect. At last I said, "It strikes me that these little gratings which form the steps of your quarter-deck ladder will bother Sir Walter, who is so dependent upon his stick, that if the point of it goes into one of these holes, he may tumble down head foremost on the main deck."

Captain Pigot merely turned to the first lieutenant and said "Mr. Walker, will you attend to that?" But before I left the ship, and indeed almost before I could have supposed the planks planed, I found the gratings gone, and solid boards substituted in their stead.

It was the same with every thing else, and a sort of magical celerity appeared to belong to the execution of Sir Walter's slightest wish, or supposition of a wish.

Many people may not be aware that there are certain things which it is usual for passengers to provide themselves with, even though ordered a free passage in a ship of war; such as beds, sheeting, and various other minor articles of furniture. These, with the captain's permission, I took care to send on board without troubling Sir Walter. When all was completed, Captain Pigot prevailed on the ladies to take a final survey of the accommodations, in order to discover whether, by possibility, any thing had been omitted which seemed calculated to be useful or agreeable to them on their passage. The orders of the admiralty, however, had been so precise; the dock-yard people had worked so well; and the captain and officers of the ship had taken so much pains with all the details; that not the smallest omission could be spied out. We had only therefore to corroborate the captain's report to Sir Walter, that all was ready for him to embark whenever the wind should shift.

While these things were going on afloat, every person on shore seemed to vie with his neighbour in doing honour to the illustrious stranger. The lieutenant-governor, Sir Colin Campbell, and the other local authorities, called upon him almost as if he had been a royal personage, to place at his disposal all the means in their power to render his stay at Portsmouth pleasant. The port-admiral, Sir Thomas Foley, waited on him to say, that his yacht, the Sylph, and the flag-ship's barge, were at his orders, should he or his family wish to sail about. The commissioner, also, Sir Michael Seymour, offered his services, and begged to know if there was any thing in the dock-yard which he wished to see.

"I am so weak myself," said Sir Walter, "that I cannot hope to visit your establishment; but I believe some of my family are anxious to see an anchor made."

Nothing more passed, but next day a message was received to say that a large anchor was to be forged, if the ladies would name the hour.

The lords of the admiralty happened to be at Portsmouth on a tour of inspection, and they too waited upon Sir Walter to learn if any thing further could be done to meet his wishes. An idea at that time prevailed that an armament was about to be fitted out against Holland, or, at all events, it was supposed the ships at Spithead and Plymouth might be called away to rendezvous at the Downs. When this news came, I remember thinking that I had detected a lurking sort of hope on Sir Walter's part, that the frigate prepared for his reception would be one of those ordered away, and that he might thus have an excuse for not leaving the country. To the measure of removing him from home, indeed, as far as I could see, he never gave his hearty concurrence, though he submitted to the positive dictation of his physicians, and the earnest entreaties of his friends. This glimpse of hope of an interruption to his banishment, as I heard him call it once, and only once, was demolished by a demi-official notification from the high authorities charged with the regulation of such affairs, who happened to be still present, that the Barham should not be diverted from her original destination except in the last extremity, for while there could be found another available ship in England, Sir Walter Scott might reckon on nothing interfering with his plans.

I observed a very slight shrug of the shoulders, and a transient expression of provocation in his countenance, as this flattering message was delivered to him; but it instantly passed off, and he expressed himself in the highest degree flattered by such attention. It is pleasing and instructive to recollect, that from the hour of this communication to the moment of his sailing, his spirits appeared to recover their wonted elasticity. The evil—so he had viewed the necessity of leaving home—was now inevitable, and he made up his mind to meet it; though I am persuaded he had not the slightest hope of deriving any benefit from the voyage. I one day heard him mention how curious it was that two of our greatest novelists had gone abroad only to die—Fielding and Smollet. And the same evening he asked me to step over to Mr. Harrison's, the bookseller, to get for him Fielding's Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon. "That little book," said he, "the last he wrote, is one of the most entertaining and wittiest of all Fielding's productions, though written during a period of great pain and sickness. Indeed," he continued, "I hardly know any more amusing book of travels than Fielding has contrived to compose out of a subject apparently so scanty and threadbare as a voyage down the Thames, through the Downs to St. Helen's Roads, and then across the Bay of Biscay."

One day, speaking of the knights of Malta, he begged me to send for a history of that island; and as the waiter was going off to the bookseller's some one called out, "Tell Mr. Harrison to send over also any amusing works he has at hand."

"If we do not take care," said another, "they will send us a pile of the Waverly Novels."

"Ay!" cried out the author himself, "that would be sending coals to Newcastle indeed!"

Nothing could be more good-natured than the manner in which he allowed himself to be made the lion. The Portsmouth Philosophical Society, feeling naturally desirous to enrol such a name on their list of members, wrote to request that honour. By some accident, however, the deputation charged with this communication arrived at the Fountain Inn when Sir Walter was in the middle of dinner.

"Shall I say that you will receive them by and by, sir?" I asked, "or to-morrow morning?"

"Oh no," said he, "they may feel disappointed—or perhaps they may have a meeting to-night—show them in, I pray."

In they came accordingly; and as the opportunity was too good to be omitted of getting a sight of Sir Walter Scott, the deputation of philosophers was by no means a small one. He talked, however, to each of these gentlemen, appeared to take the greatest interest in the history of their town and its curiosities; and having drank a glass of wine with them, and shaken hands with each, he dismissed them, enchanted with his urbanity and good-nature.

One day, when the ladies were setting out to return the visit of Lady and the Miss Seymours in the dock-yard, he said,

"Some of you write my name on a card, and leave it with Sir Michael Seymour for me, as I cannot conveniently go so far. No—stay," cried he, with one of his sly looks of good humour at his own ingenuity, "give me the pen—I'll write it myself—the young ladies may wish to have it as an autograph."

Though Sir Walter walked but little, and with some difficulty, he appeared to have no objection to seeing company. The Fountain accordingly overflowed all day long. Every mortal that could by any means get an introduction, and some even without, paid their respects; and during the last three days, when his spirits revived, he had something to say to every visiter. He declined seeing no one, and never showed any thing but the most cordial good will, even to those who came professedly to see the show. One day an old acquaintance of mine, a seaman of the name of Bailey, the admiral's messenger, after much humming and hawing, and excuse-making, asked whether it were possible for him to get a sight of Sir Walter Scott, "in order to hear him speak." Nothing, I told him, was more easy; for when, as usual, he brought the letters from the post-office, he had only to send up word to say, that he wished to deliver them in person. Next morning, accordingly, the waiter said to me at the breakfast-table, "Bailey, sir, says he must deliver Sir Walter's letters to himself, and that you told him so." Sir Walter looked towards me and laughed; but when the honest fellow's wishes were explained, he desired him to be sent up, and, shaking hands with him, said, "I hope you are satisfied now you have heard me speak."

"I sent three men off yesterday, sir," said Bailey, "to enter for the Barham—all because you are going in her."

"They'll at all events find a good ship and a good captain, that I am very sure of," replied Sir Walter.

"That's something of a compliment, certainly," he continued, when the door was shut; but I hold that the greatest honour yet which has been paid to my celebrity was by a fishmonger in London last week, who was applied to by the servant of the house in which I was living for some cod, I believe, for dinner; but it being rather late in the day, there was none left. On the servant's mentioning who it was wanted for, the fishmonger said that altered the matter, and that if a bit was to be had in London for love or money, it should be at my disposal. Accordingly, the man himself actually walked up with the fish all the way from Billingsgate to Sussex Place, in the Regent's Park. Now, if that is not substantial literary reputation, I know not what is!"

Sir Walter's health was such that he could take but little exercise. He complained chiefly of weakness in his legs; but he managed generally once a day to walk for about half an hour on the ramparts between the platform and the southeast bastion, that on which the flag-staff is planted. He used generally to rise between six and seven, and then to come to the drawing-room, where he commenced writing his diary in a thick quarto book bound in calf-skin. I took care always to be up and dressed before he left his room, ready to give him my arm, without which assistance he found it difficult at times to get along. I saw him once attempt to walk, without even his stick, from the breakfast table to that on which his writing-desk stood; but he made poor work of it, and I heard him say, as he crept along, with more bitterness of tone than usually entered into his expressions, "It is hard enough (or odd enough) that I should now be just beginning again, at sixty years of age, what I left off, after my severe illness, at ten."

He said to me one morning, pointing to his MS. book, "Do you keep a diary? I suppose, of course, you have kept one all your life?" I mentioned what my practice had been in that respect, and added something about the difficulty of writing any thing while engaged with the printer's devils.

"Ay! ay! that's true," he ejaculated, with a sigh—"too true. For I fear that a great part of my present illness has been brought on by too much working. Let me warn you, captain, it is a very dangerous thing to over-work."

He then began a conversation about his affairs; and upon my accidentally mentioning the name of his publisher, Mr. Robert Cadell of Edinburgh, he said, with another sigh, "Ah! if I had been in our excellent friend Cadell's hands during all the course of my writing for the public, I should now undoubtedly have been worth a couple of hundred thousand pounds, instead of having to work myself to pieces to get out of debt."

I ventured to remark, that, but for the illness of which he spoke, it was perhaps all the better; for, ever since the period of his difficulties, he had been influenced by a more generous and disinterested motive for exertion than any which a mere wish to make money could supply.

"Perhaps so," he answered; "no writer should ever make money his sole object, or even his chief object. Money-making is not the proper business of a man of letters. Yet, on the other hand, the professed money-making gentlemen (my creditors I mean) must admit, that although I have been working in their line lately, it has been for their benefit, not my own. In fact, as I said before, I think I have overdone the thing, and may have brought on some of this illness by excess of mental exertion. Where it will all end, I know not. I am giving myself a chance, I understand, by making this journey—and one can die any where."

"It occurs to me," I observed, "that people are apt to make too much fuss about the loss of fortune, which is one of the smallest of the great evils of life, and ought to be amongst the most tolerable."

"Do you call it a small misfortune to be ruined in money matters?" he asked.

"It is not so painful, at all events, as the loss of friends."

"I grant that," he said.

"As the loss of character."

"True again."

"As the loss of health."

"Ay, there you have me," he muttered to himself, in a tone so melancholy that I wished I had not spoken.

"What is the loss of fortune to the loss of peace of mind?" I continued.

"In short," said he playfully, "you will make it out that there is no harm in a man's being plunged over head and ears in a debt he cannot remove."

"Much depends, I think, on how it was incurred, and what efforts are made to redeem it—at least, if the sufferer be a right-minded man."

"I hope it does," he said, cheerfully and firmly.

In order to give the subject a bend towards something less serious, I observed, that I thought a whilow on the tip of an author's fore-finger on the right hand (which was my case at the moment) was no small misfortune.

"Yes," remarked Sir Walter; "for it certainly is any thing but an amusement to write with the left hand."

It may be interesting to persons engaged in literary pursuits to mention, that several years before the period of which I am now speaking, when Sir Walter Scott dined with me in Edinburgh, I took an opportunity of asking him how many hours a-day he could write for the press with effect.

"I reckon," he answered, "five hours and a half a-day as very good work for the mind, when it is engaged in original composition. I can very seldom reach six hours; and I suspect that what is written after five or six hours' hard mental labour is not worth much."

I asked him how he divided these hours.

"I try to get two or three of them before breakfast," he said, "and the remainder as soon after as may be, so as to leave the afternoon free to walk, or ride, or read, or be idle."

This conversation, it is material to observe, took place in Edinburgh, before Sir Walter gave up his office as clerk of session, and his answers, I suspect, referred chiefly to those holiday portions of the year which he spent at Abbotsford when the court was not sitting. But, from something he said at the time, I was led to infer that he adopted the same limitations on his mental labours even when fixed in Edinburgh by the law courts. The duties of his office being of a light or mechanical nature, which required no great effort of thought, were probably not taken into the calculation.

But after he quitted the court of session, and was left completely free, I have reason to believe that his intense and chivalrous anxiety to disentangle himself from debts, which would have driven most other men to despair, led him greatly to exceed the judicious limits he formerly considered necessary, not only to his health, but, according to his own showing, to the good quality of his writings. I have even heard, that, latterly, with the same noble spirit, he sometimes actually worked for ten, twelve, and even fourteen hours a-day, instead of five or six! And from many expressions he let fall at Portsmouth, I am satisfied that he ascribed the demolition of his health mainly to this cause.

I have already mentioned, that during the last three days of his detention at Portsmouth by contrary winds, Sir Walter rallied or plucked up, as it is called, amazingly; looked and talked with cheerfulness, cracked his jokes, and told his old stories, with almost as much brilliancy as I ever remember to have witnessed before. He began about that time also to speak of the voyage with interest, and his eye sparkled as in old times, when he mentioned the probability of his visiting the pyramids of Egypt, and perhaps Athens and Constantinople. At such moments, and while he was sitting down, a stranger might have imagined there was nothing the matter with him; but when he rose, or attempted to rise, his weakness became distressingly manifest. One evening, after he had been chatting for an hour with the greatest vivacity, he expressed a wish to retire; but although I gave him my arm, and did all I could to assist him, it was not till the third attempt that he gained his feet. While endeavouring to rise, he muttered, "This weakness increases me, confound it!" And after a pause, he added, "It is rather hard, that just at the moment—at the very first moment of my whole life, that I could call myself free to go any where or do any thing I pleased, I should be knocked up in this style, and prevented from even crossing the street, were the greatest curiosity in the world placed there."

Next morning, however, the 28th of October, when I was sitting in the drawing-room, about half-past six or seven o'clock, in he stepped stoutly enough; and waving his stick, he called to me to give him my arm, as the morning was fine, that he might take a walk on the ramparts. On reaching the platform, he turned round and said,

"Now show me the exact spot where Jack the painter was hanged."

I pointed out the locality, now occupied by a post or pilot-beacon on the inner part of Blackhouse Point, in which I remembered having seen Jack's bones hanging in chains more than nine-and-twenty years before, when I first went to sea as a wee middy. He seemed so familiar with all Jack the painter's exploits, and especially his setting fire to the dock-yard, that I asked if he had been reading about him lately. "Not for these last thirty or forty years, certainly," he answered.

As we strolled along the ramparts, he looked often towards Spithead, and at last he stopped, and desired me to show him where the celebrated Royal William used to lie during the war.

"Where did the Royal George go down?" he next asked.

I pointed out to him the buoy; upon which, as I was telling his memory, he murmured, in a voice scarcely audible, a line or so of Cowper's verses on that melancholy catastrophe;—

"His fingers held the pen, his sword"—

"No!" said he correcting himself, "that won't do!"

"His sword was in its sheath—

His fingers held the pen,

When Kempenfelt went down

With twice four hundred men."

He was in great glee during the whole of this walk, and told some five or six of his best stories, and all in a very best manner. Most of these, indeed, I had heard before; but their dress was new, and their points were as sharp as ever. One, however, he told about himself, which I had not heard till then, though I think it has since been published in one of the volumes of the new edition of the Waverley novels. At the age of two years, it seems, he was placed under the charge of a nursery-maid, and sent to his grand-uncle's in the country, for the benefit of his health, he being then in a very feeble and rickety state. "My ailments, however," he went on to relate, "were nearly being brought to a speedy conclusion, for my nurse, whose head appears to have been turned by some love craze or another, resolved to put me to death. In this view, she carried me to the moor, and having laid me on the heather, pulled out her scissors, and made the necessary preparations for cutting my throat."

"Well, sir," said I, astonished at the cool manner in which he described the process, "what deterred her?"

"I believe," replied he, "that the infant smiled in her face, and she could not go on."

"Would not this moment in the history of the author of Waverley form a good subject for a picture?" said some one to whom I related the story. Which question, by the way, reminds me, that Sir Walter, most good-naturedly, allowed me one morning to make a set of camera lucida sketches of him standing, as he said, "all his imperfections on his feet." My brother, Mr. James Hall, a young artist in London, having conceived the novel and bold idea of representing Sir Walter exactly as he appeared in company, without any of the triviances by which other painters have studiously concealed the defect of his right foot, he begged me to secure some careful jottings with the camera for this purpose. I told Sir Walter the reason why I wished sketch him, leg and all; at which he laughed repeatedly, and said his young friend's idea was not a bad one. While I was putting the apparatus in order, he said to himself, "I wonder what sort of a defect it was that old Æsop had?" I asked if his lameness had ever given him any inconvenience as a boy? "No, scarcely any," he replied; "I used to climb up and down all the most difficult parts of the Castle Rock of Edinburgh with any boy at the school."

Upon another occasion I heard him say,

"An illness, when I was not above two years old, brought on this disagreeable lameness of mine," touching his foot with his stick as he spoke; "and I remember quite well, that there was an idea that I might be cured by having my whole body wrapped up in a raw sheep's skin. The unpleasant sensation caused by the contact of the sin, just taken from the animal's back and applied to my body, I shall never forget. I don't fancy it did me much good."

Immediately after breakfast, on the morning of the 29th of October, Captain Pigot landed from the Barham, to mention to Sir Walter Scott, that although the wind was not, strictly speaking, fair—inasmuch as it was a dead calm—yet he thought the opportunity should be taken to embark. Sir Walter was all compliance, and appeared, indeed, rejoiced to get away. "We have been kept here as prisoners at large during the last week, and I long to get into what you call blue water, Captain Pigot. Pray give my compliments to the commissioner, and say I shall feel obliged to him to send the barge which he offered, to take us on board."

But while he spoke, Mr. Gayton, the flag-lieutenant, came in with Admiral Sir Thomas Foley's compliments, to say, that on his hearing that the Barham was ready, and that Captain Pigot had gone to announce that it was time to embark, the signal had been made to the Britannia to send her barge, to convey Sir Walter Scott and his family to Spithead.

He himself was soon ready; but the rest of the party, who had trunks to pack, and other dispositions to make, necessarily took longer time. Meanwhile, the author of Waverley sat in the drawing-room in the highest spirits I ever remember to have seen him—chatting with every one who came in about his voyage, the beauty of the day, and the kindness of the king, the admiralty, the admiral, the captain of his ship, and, in short, he exclaimed, laughing, "It is really quite ridiculous the fuss you are all making about one person." Ever and anon, as any one came into the room to pick up things, he was sure to fire off some good-humoured scold about the sin of tardiness, and the proverbial length of time it took to get ladies under-weigh, with their endless bonnets and band-boxes. No one of us escaped, indeed, male or female. But there ran through all his observations such an air of humour and drollery, mixed occasionally with a slight dash of caustic sarcasm, in the funny style of his own dear Antiquary, that the resemblance was at times complete. I never remember to have seen Sir Walter more cheerful, and even animated, than he was on the morning of his embarkation; and in fact, there appeared so little trace of illness, that the hopes of his ultimate and full recovery seemed, for the hour, to rest on surer foundations than ever.

At a little after eleven in the forenoon he stepped into the barge at the Sally Port, and was rowed off to Spithead on a most beautiful morning. The surface of the sea appeared to have tranquillised itself for the occasion—for I scarcely ever before saw Spithead, even in summer, so smooth or so completely without swell. The whole surface of the immense anchorage lay as polished in appearance as the speculum of a telescope, while the only ripple visible in any direction was that which glanced far off to the right and left from the oars, and from the barge's cutwater, as she glided, with a faint hissing noise, faster than I remember to have known a boat rowed before. For the men, who seemed well aware of the honour done them, gave way together in such style, that their oars bent like bows, while Sir Walter pointed to the beauties of the Isle of Wight, looked long at Haslar Hospital, asked minutely about the pilotage round the different buoys on the shoals, and made us explain the distinction between the anchorages of St. Helen's, Spithead, and the Mother Bank. Nothing escaped him, and it was really quite satisfactory to see our venerable friend, at the hour of parting, apparently so light-hearted and contented.

On reaching the Barham, we found, that although an accommodation ladder had been fitted, the officers, with the ready consideration of men of business, had slung an arm-chair, that Sir Walter might have the option of walking up or being hoisted in. He preferred the chair as less fatiguing; and as we adjusted the apparatus, I observed that a new and stouter rope than usual had been rove for the occasion. This precaution may have been accidental, but it was quite in keeping with the incessant and eager desire manifested by every person on board to do honour to their illustrious guest.

After he had looked over the cabins intended for his accommodation, with which he expressed himself very much pleased, he came again on deck, and sat abaft the mizen-mast in conversation with his family till it was time to take leave, as a breeze had sprung up, and the ship was getting quickly under-weigh.

I shall not soon forget the great man's last look, while he held his friends successively by the hand, as he sat on the deck of the frigate, and wished us good-bye one after another, in a tone which showed that he at least knew all hope was over!

During the week, when I was in attendance upon Sir Walter Scott at Portsmouth, I had frequent opportunities of speaking to him about his different novels, a subject upon which I was glad to find he had no objection to converse. I mentioned to him one day, that I considered myself very fortunate in having become the possessor of his original manuscript of the Antiquary. His observation was very remarkable. "I am glad of that, for it is the one I like best myself, and if you will let me have it for a few minutes, I shall be glad to write a word or two upon it to that effect."

I told him it was in town, but that I should write off for it express, and hoped to receive it in time. Meanwhile, I asked him one or two questions about the Antiquary, and begged to know if it had cost much trouble in the composition.

"None whatever," was his reply; "I wrote it 'currente calamo' from beginning to end."

I asked him if he had ever actually witnessed or known of any scene resembling that of the baronet and his daughter going round the headland, and nearly being swept away by the tide coming in?

"O no!" he said, rather impatiently, I thought, as if the whole were obviously imaginative.

I next asked him if ever he had been present at such a scene as that in the hut of the fisherman, whose son is represented as lying dead in his coffin?

"No," he replied; "not exactly as there described; not exactly in all respects. I have, however, been in cottages upon similar occasions."

"Is Rab Tull, sir, the parish clerk, a real name; for, I observe at page 65 of the first volume of the MS. that this person's name was originally written Rab Dozend?"

"No," he said, "it is not a real name. Tull is a common name in that part of the country—Dundee."

He laughed when he repeated the word Dozend, but said he could not recollect why he had changed it to Tull. I did not like to tease him with further questions.

By the mail early next morning I received the precious MS. and having taken my station in the drawing-room, an hour before the usual time of Sir Walter's appearance, in order to secure the fulfilment of his promise, I waited impatiently till he came in. I was delighted to see him looking hearty and cheerful, as if he had passed a good night; and as soon as he had taken his station at the writing-desk, I placed the autograph manuscript of the Antiquary before him, and reminded him of his offer to state in it the reasons of his preference of that novel.

He at once took his pen, and, in the course of somewhat less than an hour, wrote two pages. When he had finished, I said,

"You would add great value to this writing, Sir Walter, if you would be so kind as to put your name to it." He instantly wrote his signature.

"The date also," I added, "would give it still further value."

"True," he replied; "I had forgotten that." And, resuming his pen, he wrote, "Portsmouth, 27th October, 1831."

The following is a copy, word for word, of this very curious document, which possesses a high degree of interest, not only from its being the very last thing he wrote on the shores of England, but from its containing a pleasing glimpse of that matchless vigour of thought, linked with bewitching playfulness of humour, which, in the opinion of many people, distinguish the Antiquary above all his other works.

"MY DEAR CAPTAIN HALL,

"As the wind seems determinately inflexible, I cannot employ my spare time better than in making a remark or two on this novel, which, as you are kind enough to set an ideal value upon [it] will perhaps be enhanced in that respect, by receiving any trifling explanations and particulars, (and by your learning) that among the numerous creatures of my imagination, the author has had a particular partiality for the Antiquary. It is one of the very few of my works of fiction which contains a portrait from life, and it is the likeness of a friend of my infancy, boyhood, and youth—a fact detected at the time by the acuteness of Mr. James Chalmers, solicitor at law in London. This gentleman, remarkable for the integrity of his conduct in business, and the modesty of his charges, had been an old friend and correspondent of my father's, in his more early and busy days; and he continued to take an interest in literary matters to the end of a life prolonged beyond the ordinary limits. He took, accordingly, some trouble to discover the author; and when he read the Antiquary, told my friend, William Erskine, that he was now perfectly satisfied that Walter Scott, of whom personally he knew really nothing, was the author of these mysterious works of fiction; for that the character of Jonathan Oldbuck of Monkbarrow, was drawn from the late George Constable of Wallace Craigie of Dundee, who dined, when in Edinburgh, twice or thrice with my father every week, and used to speak of my sayings and doings as [those of] a clever boy. I was extremely surprised at this detection, for I thought I had taken the utmost care to destroy every trace of personal resemblance. I had no reason to suspect that any one in London could have recollected my friend, who had been long dead, and [who had] lived in strict retirement during the last years of his life. I took an opportunity to enquire after the general recollection which survived of my old friend, on an occasion when I chanced to be 'o'er the water,' as we say. His house was in ruins, his property feued for some commercial [purpose,] and I found him described less as a humourist—which was his real character—than as a miser and a misanthrope, qualities which merely tinged his character. I owed him much for the kindness with which he treated me. I remember particularly, when I resided for a time at Prestonpans with my aunt, Miss Janet Scott—one of those excellent persons who devote their ease and leisure to the care of some sick relation—George Constable chose to fix his residence [in the neighbourhood]—I have always thought from some sneaking kindness for my aunt, who, though not in the van of youth, had been a most beautiful woman. At least, we three walked together every day in the world, and the Antiquary was my familiar companion. He taught me to read and understand Shakespeare. He explained the field of battle of Prestonpans, of which he had witnessed the horrors from a safe distance. Many other books he read to us, and showed a great deal of dramatic humour, [I have mentioned [this] in the recent, or author's edition [of the Waverley Novels,] but less particularly than I would wish you to know.

"The sort of preference which I gave, and still give, this work, is from its connection with the early scenes of my life.—And here am I seeking health at the expense of travel, just as was the case with me in my tenth year. Well! I am not the first who has ended life as he began, and is bound to remember with gratitude those who have been willing to assist him in his voyage, whether in youth or age, amongst whom I must include old George Constable and yourself—

"WALTER SCOTT"

"Portsmouth, 27th October, 1831."

CHAPTER II.

EXCURSION TO CANDELAIR LAKE IN Ceylon.

The fervid activity of our excellent admiral, Sir Samuel Hood, in whose flag-ship I served as lieutenant from 1812 to 1815 on the Indian station, furnished abundant materials for journal-writing, had we only known how to profit by them. There was ever observable a boyish hilarity about this great officer which made it equally delightful to serve officially under him, and to enjoy his friendly companionship; in either case, we always felt certain of making the most of our opportunities.

Scarcely, had we returned from alligator hunt, near Trincomalee, when Sir Samuel applied himself to the collector of the district, who was chief civilian of the place, and begged to know what he would recommend us to see next.

"Do you care about antiquities?" said the collector.

"Of course," replied the admiral, "provided they be genuine and worth seeing. What have you got to show us in that way? I thought this part of the country had been a wild jungle from all time, and that the English were only now bringing it into cultivation."

"On the contrary," observed our intelligent friend, "there are manifest traces, not very far off, of a dense and wealthy population. At all events, the inhabitants appear to have understood some of the arts of life, for they formed a huge tank or pond for the purpose of irrigation; so large, indeed, that there still exists, in one corner of it, a sheet of water extensive enough to deserve the name of a lake."

"Let us go and see it," exclaimed the admiral. "Can we ride? Order the horses; who minds the heat of the sun?" For, like almost all new comers, Sir Samuel cared nothing for exposure, and laughed at the precautions of more experienced residents. It was this habitual indifference which, I believe, two years after the period I am now speaking of, cost him his life. When travelling in the interior of India, near Seringapatam, he reached a station at which a fresh set of palankeen-bearers were to have met him, but where, owing to some accident, they had not been posted. "It matters not," cried the energetic chief, "let us walk." And sure enough he set off, to perform on foot a stage which even on horseback it might have been dangerous to undertake; for the sun had risen nearly to the meridian, and there was hardly a breath of wind. Possibly no mischief might have ensued from this fatal march, had not the admiral been previously residing for some days in Tipoo Sultan's palace on the island of Seringapatam, the most unhealthy spot in Mysore; and it appears to be a curious circumstance connected with the malaria of that noxious district, that its effects frequently lie dormant till some time after the traveller has quitted the region in which he breathed it. Sir Samuel Hood did not escape; but he felt no inconvenience till after he descended the Ghauts and entered the Carnatic. At Madras, the jungle fever, of which the fatal seeds had been sown at Seringapatam, and quickened into growth by subsequent exposure, attacked our noble friend, and in a few days carried him off.

The collector of Trincomalee soon satisfied the admiral that an expedition to Candela Lake, as the ancient tank of the natives was called, could not be undertaken quite so speedily. Boats and horses indeed were all ready, and tents could easily be procured; but it was likewise necessary to prepare provisions, to pack up clothes, and to send forward a set of native pioneers to clear the way through brushwood otherwise impenetrable. The admiral was in such ecstasies at the prospect of an adventure which was to cost some trouble, that he allowed nobody rest till every thing had been put in train. Early in the morning of the next day but one, we accordingly set out in several of the flag-ship's boats, accompanied by a mosquito fleet of native canoes to pilot and assist us. Lady Hood, whom no difficulties could daunt, accompanied Sir Samuel; the captain of his ship, and his flag-lieutenant, with the collector as pilot, and one or two others, made up the party; and our excursion, though nearly destitute of adventures vulgarly so called, proved one of the most interesting possible.

The early part of our course lay over the smooth and beautiful harbour of Trincomalee, after which we passed through a series of coves forming what is called the lake of Tamblegam, a connecting bay or arm of the sea, though far out of sight of the main ocean. We soon lost ourselves amid innumerable little islands clad thickly in the richest mantles of tropical foliage down to the water's edge, and at many places even into the water; so that, as not a stone or the least bit of ground could be seen, these fairy islets appeared actually to float on the surface. This kind of scenery was not altogether new to many of our party, who had been in the West Indies and at Bermuda; but it belonged to that class which the eye of a traveller never becomes tired of. The scene which followed, however, proved new enough to us all. We had to row our boats through a dense aquatic forest of mangroves for nearly a mile, along a narrow lane cut through the wood expressly for us the day before by the natives. These fantastical trees, which grow actually in the water, often recall to the imagination those villages one sees in countries liable to frequent inundation, where each house is perched on the top of piles. We saw with astonishment clusters of oysters and other shell-fish clinging to the trunk and branches, as well as to the roots of these trees, which proves that the early voyagers were not such inventors of facts as folks suppose them, nor far wrong in reporting that they had seen fish growing, like fruit, on trees!

Shortly before entering this watery wilderness, we encountered a party of native pearl-divers; and the admiral, who was at all times most provokingly sceptical as to reported wonderful exploits, pulled out his watch, and insisted on timing the best diver amongst them, to see how long he could remain under water. In no case did the poor fellow make out a minute complete; upon which the admiral held up his watch exultingly in his triumph, and laughing to scorn the assurances that at other parts of the island divers might be found who could remain five minutes at the bottom. "Show me them! show me them!" cried he, "and then, but not till then—begging your pardon—I shall believe it."

This challenge, I am sorry to say, was never answered. The method used by these divers is to place between their feet a basket loaded with one or two large lumps of coral, the weight of which carries them rapidly to the bottom. The oysters being then substituted for the stones, the diver disengages his feet, and shoots up to the surface again, either bringing the full basket with him, or leaving it to be drawn up by a line.

Nothing could be imagined more wild and Arabian-Night-like than the mangrove avenue through which we rowed, or rather paddled, for the strait was so narrow that there was no room for the oars when pushed out to their full length. The sailors, therefore, were often obliged to catch hold of the branches and roots of the trees, to draw the boats along. The foliage, as may be supposed where perennial heat and moisture occur in abundance, spread overhead in such extraordinary luxuriance, that few of the sun's rays could penetrate the massy net-work of leaves and branches forming the roof of our fairy passage. Not a single bird could be seen, either seated or on the wing; nor was even a chirp distinguishable above the dreamy hum of millions of mosquitoes floating about in a calm so profound, that it seemed as if the surface of the water had never been disturbed since the creation. The air, though cool, felt so heavy and choky, that by the time we had scrambled to the end of this strange tunnel or watery lane, we could scarcely breathe, and were rejoiced to enter the open air again,—although, when we came out, the sun "flamed in the forehead of the morning sky," and beat fiercely and hotly upon the parched ground, from which every blade of grass had been scorched away.

The village of Tamblegam, to which we soon came, is inhabited by a colony of Hindoo emigrants from the coast of Malabar. It is a neat little place, of which the huts, formed chiefly of branches of the tamarind-tree and leaves of the plantain, standing under prodigiously high cocoa-nuts, are so very diminutive, that the whole looks more like a child's toybox village than the residence of grown people. The principal edifice, which we failed not to visit forthwith, is a pagoda built of stone, exactly ten feet square. Not fancying there could be any harm in taking such a liberty, we entered the pagoda unceremoniously, and one of our artists set to work sketching the bronze image which the natives worship as a deity. This strange figure is in pretty good keeping with the rest of the establishment, being not quite three inches in height. But the Hindoos were shocked at our impiety, and soon ousted the admiral and his party, who then turned towards a little tank or pool of water, beautifully spangled over with the leaves and flowers of the water-lily, or lotus, so celebrated in Persian poetry. In the midst of these, several elegant groups of Indian girls had assembled themselves, and appeared to be enjoying the coolness of the water in a style which we envied not a little.

The eastern fashion of bathing differs much from ours. Instead of plunging in and swimming about, one person sits down, while others pour pitchers of water over the head. We took notice also of one particularly interesting party of young and most beautifully formed damsels, who waded in till the water reached nearly to their breasts. Each of these girls held in her hands a clay or water-pot, shaped somewhat like an Etruscan vase, the top of which barely showed itself above the level of the pool. Upon a signal being given by one of the party, all the girls ducked out of sight, and at the same time raised their water-jars high in the air. In the next instant, just as their heads began to reappear above the surface, the vessels were simultaneously inclined so that the water might pour out gradually, and in such measure that by the time the bathers again stood erect, the inverted jars might be quite empty. Nothing could be more graceful than the whole proceedings; and we sat in the shade of the pagoda looking at these nymphs for half an hour in great admiration, and thinking what a fine subject such beautiful figures would have formed for sculpture.

In the mean time a slender pole, forty feet in height, had been erected by a set of native tumblers, who presently exhibited before us various feats of extraordinary agility and strength—some of these are almost too curious to be believed by those who are not aware of the flexibility and dexterity of the Hindoos. We were most surprised and amused by the exploits of a lady of forty, which is considered a very old age in that climate, who ran up the pole more like a monkey than a human being, and then sticking herself on the top horizontally like a weathercock, whirled herself round to the great astonishment of the European beholders. What tickled us particularly on this occasion was the good lady accompanying her strange movements with a noise so easily like that of our old and respected friend Punch, who drubbed by his faithful wife Judy, that we all burst out laughing. Our shout occasioned a momentary embarrassment to the tumbler, who little guessed, poor old soul, how far off the point of the joke lay. Every traveller, I am sure, must have remarked, that it is these chance touches of home interest which most strongly excite his feelings when wandering in distant countries, and where he least expects to have his national sympathies awakened.

As the sun had by this time fallen past that particular angle in the sky above which it is considered by its bearers inexpedient to travel, we nestled ourselves into our respective palankeens, and proceeded on the journey through what seemed to us a very respectable forest growing on lands which had once been under the plough, but apparently very long ago. To our inexperienced eyes and European associations, it seemed as if a century at least must have elapsed from the time such a mass of wood first supplanted the labours of the husbandman; but our friend the collector soon explained to us, that any spot of ground in that rich district were neglected for a very few years, natural trees, as tall as those we now admired so much, would soon shoot up spontaneously and occupy all the soil. We shook our heads at this with the confident scepticism of ignorance, and exchanged glances amongst ourselves at the expense of our official companion; but in the course of a few hours we were compelled, by the evidence of our own eyes, to alter our note of disbelief. On coming to the real untouched virgin forest of the climate, we beheld a most noble spectacle indeed, in the way of scenery, such as I at least had never seen before, and have but rarely met with since. I do not recollect the names of the principal trees, though they were mentioned to us over and over again; nor does it matter much, for these would not help the description. The grand Banyan, however, with which European eyes have become so correctly familiar through the pencil of Daniell, (which is quite matchless in the representation of the scenery, people, and animals of India,) rose on every side, and made us feel, even more decidedly than the cocoa-nut trees had done in the morning, that we were indeed in another world. I may remark, that the cocoa-nut, as far as I know, flourishes only near the shore. It seems, indeed, to delight in holding out its slender and feathery arms to embrace the sea-breeze as it passes. All my associations, at least, connected with the appearance of the graceful tree, are mingled up with the cheerful sound of the surf breaking along interminable lines of snow-white beaches, formed of coral sand and pebbles torn by the waves from the ledges almost every where fringing the coasts of the ever-delicious islands of the east.

Shortly after we had left the Indian village, the night fell, and while we were threading the gigantic forest by the light of torches, the only thing at all like an atmosphere promised to occur to us: but it ended in nothing. The party consisted of six palankeens, each attended by eight bearers, though only four at a time, or at most six, supported the poles; there trotted along by the side of the bearers between two and three dozen coolies or porters, carrying provisions and torches.

With a mixture of vague alarm and curiosity we now listened to the accounts of wild elephants in these woods, though in the morning we had heard the same stories with indifference and incredulity; while the old hands of the party, who had felt rather piqued at our distrust of their marvellous narrations, pointed out with malicious satisfaction the recent foot-marks of these undisputed and formidable lords of the manor.

Sir Samuel and Lady Hood, with some of their staff, had left their palankeens and walked forward on the path, which barely admitted two people abreast, in order to enjoy the exceeding beauty of the Indian jungle, lighted up with the blaze of our torches. Suddenly the headmost musalgies or torch-bearer paused, listened, and then retreated precipitately upon the hinder ranks. Nothing was said by them, and nothing could we hear in the woods to explain the cause of this panic, which, however, soon became general amongst the natives. The bearers set down the palankeens, and in an instant they, as well as all the coolies, took to their heels, while the torches flitted about in the forest in a style which, had there been no apprehension, might have been acknowledged as very picturesque. Sir Samuel not only stood fast himself, but ordered all of us to do so likewise—remarking, that until we knew what to fly from, we might only be making matters worse by moving. Presently the loud crashing of the underwood of the forest, and a heavy thumping on the ground, gave abundant evidence that a wild elephant was close to us.

Some of the natives told us afterwards, that they had seen the monster; but although we peered into the forest with all our eyes, none of us could honestly take upon us to say we actually saw him—though assuredly we heard his footsteps as he broke his way through the jungle. Robinson Crusoe and his wolves in Tartary came to our recollection; and upon our asking the natives what effect fires really had on wild beasts, they all assured us that hardly any animal, however ferocious, would come up to a light, and that we were safe so long as we kept near a torch. This might be consolatory reasoning for the musalgies, each of whom carried a light, but it afforded little security to us, who, it was evident, would again be left in the dark should an elephant cross our path a second time. The admiral, therefore, and by his desire all of us, made an attempt to carry the torches ourselves. But we were soon so plagiarily smoked and scorched for our pains, that we rested content with the risk, and the bearers having gradually crept back to the palankeens, we once more moved on. In spite of all that had passed, some of the party remained so doggedly sceptical, from being habitually distrustful of all things wonderful, that they declared the whole affair a mere matter of panic, and dared to swear there could not be found an elephant within fifty miles of us. Scarcely had this opinion, so injurious to the honours and glories of our late adventure, been uttered, when the commander-in-chief, who, as usual, was leading the way, snatched a light from one of the men's hands, and waved it over what the geologists call a "recent deposit."

"There!" exclaimed the admiral, better pleased than if he had found a pile of rupees. "Will that evidence satisfy you? How many hundred yards off do you think can the fellow be who left this trace of his proximity?"

It was past ten o'clock when we reached our tents, which had been pitched in the morning on the borders of the celebrated lake we came to visit. All the party were well fagged, and so ravenously hungry, that we shouted for joy on seeing supper enter just as we came to the ground. It is the greatest mistake possible to suppose that people, when they are very hungry, are indifferent or insensible to the merits of good cookery. It is true they will then eat, and even relish things which at other seasons they might not choose to touch; but I have invariably observed, that it is when the appetite is keenest that the perception of choice viands becomes the most acute—exactly as a really good bed is most enjoyed when we are most fatigued.

"This," said our excellent caterer, the collector, "is the dish upon which we pride ourselves most at Trincomalee. It is the true Malay curry—rich, as you perceive, in flavour, and more than half of it gravy—which gravy, I beg you particularly to take notice, is full of minced vegetables, while the whole is softened with some of the youngest kind of cocoanut, plucked this very evening since the sun went down. The capital 'artiste,' as I suppose they would call him at Paris, who dressed this superb mess, served many years as master-cook to the sultan of Djocjocatra, in the interior of Java. The rogue was captured with a stew-pan in his hand when the brave General Gillespie stormed the lines round the palace. That rice, which fills the dishes flanking the curry, comes from India—one kind from Patna, the other from Pilibet."

These praises fell far short of the merits of this glorious supper; nor can I remember any thing in the way of gourmandise in any part of the world comparable to this exquisite midnight feast.

While we are on the subject of curry, a word or two on the history of this most delicious of all the varieties of the family of stews may prove acceptable to true lovers of good eating. In the first place, I dare say it will surprise most people—old Indians inclusive—to learn that the dish we call curry—pronounced kari by the natives—is not of Indian, nor, indeed, of Asiatic origin at all. It is not known to the Persians, Arabs, Chinese, Burmese, Siamese, or to any of the Indian islanders. Neither is it known, even at this day, to the inhabitants of Hindustan itself, except to such as are in frequent communication with Europeans. Even the word curry, or kari, is not supposed to be of genuine Indian origin—in short, there is reason to believe that curries were first introduced into India by the Portuguese, and this view is in some degree supported by the consideration that chilies or capsicums, so invariably one of the most important ingredients, are known to be natives not of Asia, but of America.

I have so often watched the palankeen-bearers and other natives preparing their supper, which, after the fashion of the Romans, is their great meal, that I think, upon a pinch, I could make a tolerable curry myself. I would set about it thus: I would first pound together twelve parts of coriander seed, two of black pepper, one of cayenne, three of cummin, and five of pale turmeric; then add a few cloves, a bit of cinnamon, half a nutmeg, and two or three onions. In India—I mean on the continent of Hindustan—the liquid or gravy which is added to these spices, before the fish or meat is put in, consists generally of ghee, which is boiled or clarified butter. This ghee, which is a considerable article of commerce in India, is preferred to butter in making curries, and that which is formed from the milk of the buffalo is considered superior to that made from cow's milk. In the northern provinces of India it is common to add a little milk or cream, and still more frequently a little curdled and acidulated milk, called dhye. The Malays generally make the gravy of their curries of the ground kernel of the fresh cocoanut, instead of using butter or ghee.

As to the kinds of rice which are eaten with curry, they are innumerable. They differ in almost every province of India, in each of which, also, there are upwards of a dozen varieties. What is curious enough, the inhabitants are so attached to the particular kinds of rice produced amongst themselves, that it is with extreme difficulty they can be made to eat any other kind. Thus, at the first establishment of our new settlement of Singapore—at the extreme or southern end of the Malay peninsula—the native troops or sepoy would not touch a grain of the beautiful rice of Java, Siam, and Cochin China, although the Europeans preferred it greatly to that of Bengal. Mr. Crawford, the governor of Singapore, from whom I have procured most of these details, had the greatest difficulty in prevailing on the Bengal convicts to eat the fine rice of China—just as if the superintendent of the hulks in the Thames were to find coercive measures necessary to induce the Pats and Sanderses of their gangs to eat the wheaten bread of Kent, instead of the potatoes and oaten cakes of their native land!

The finest rice in Hindustan, in the opinion of many persons, is produced in the province of Bahar, commonly called, from the capital, Patna rice. This is cultivated in about the latitude of twenty-six degrees north. But the finest of all is grown considerably further north in the province of Rohileund, and called, from its principal market, Pilibet, a town lying between the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth degree of north latitude. And it is a singular fact that these, which are undoubtedly the two best kinds of rice, should be produced in countries and in latitudes where it is only an occasional object of culture. Rice is not the staple corn in any country lying beyond the tropic.

At the door and windows of our supper tent were hung up by the neck sundry well-bowed goglets of spring water, cheek by jowl with a jolly string of long-necked bottles of Lafitte and Chateau Margaux, joyously fanning themselves in the thorough draught of the cool night-breeze, breathing so gently along, that we could just hear it whispering through the leaves of the damp forest, and sweeping towards the lake past the tents, the curtains of which it scarcely stirred.

The wine perhaps was almost more chilled than a fastidious wine-fancier might have directed; nevertheless, it flowed over our parched palates with an intensity of zest which I do not believe it is in mortals to be conscious of enjoying, till they have toiled a whole day in the sun within half a dozen degrees of the equator. Bottle after bottle—each one more rich and racy than its valued and lamented predecessor—vanished so fast, that, ere an hour had elapsed, we felt as if a hundred wild elephants would have stood no chance with us!

As we straggled off to our respective beds, made up in the palankeens, according to the custom of the country, we became sensible of a serious annoyance, of which we had taken but little notice while baling in the hot curries and cool clarets within the tent. A most potent and offensive smell was brought to us by the land wind; and the admiral, who was not a man to submit to any evil capable of remedy, insisted on an immediate investigation into the cause of this annoyance.

After hunting about in the wind's eye for a short time in the jungle, with torches in our hands, we came upon a huge dead buffalo, swollen almost to double his natural size. Upon seeing this, the bearers and servants shrugged their shoulders, as if the case had been hopeless. Not so the gallant admiral, who, in his usual style of prompt resource, called out, "Let us bury this monster before we go to bed." And, sure enough, under his directions, and by his assistance (for, though he had but one hand, he plied it better than most other men's two,) we contrived, in a quarter of an hour, to throw sand, earth, and leaves enough over the huge carcase to cover it completely. "There's a cairn for you!" exclaimed the admiral, throwing down his spade, "and now let us turn in; for by the first peep of the morning we must have a touch at the wild ducks and peacocks on the side of the lake, and perhaps we may contrive to have a shot at a buffalo or a stray elephant."

Accordingly, next morning, actually before it was light, I felt the indefatigable admiral tugging at my ear, and bidding me get up, to accompany him on a shooting excursion, and as he said, "mayhap we shall get sight of some of those elephants, the existence of which you presumed to doubt last night. Come, Mr. Officer, show a leg! I know you are a bit of a philosopher, and curious in natural history; so rouse up and come along with me."

Most cordially did I then anathematise all philosophy, and wish I had never expressed any curiosity on the score of wild beasts, peacocks, or ancient tanks; but as the admiral was not a person to be trifled with, I made a most reluctant move, and exchanged the delightful dream of hot curries and cool sherbet for the raw reality of a shooting match, up to the knees in water, at five in the morning. At one place, such was his excellency's anxiety to secure a good shot at some ducks, that he literally crawled for a couple of hundred yards along the muddy shore of the lake on his knees, and at the end expressing himself fully repaid by getting a single capital shot at a wild peacock! He was also gratified by bringing down a magnificent jungle-cock—a bird which resembles our barn-door fowl in form, but its plumage is vastly more brilliant, and its flight more lofty and sustained, than any of which the bird can boast in its tame state. Our scramble in the mud brought us within sight of a drove of several hundred buffaloes. We saw also several troops of wild deer; but, to our great disappointment, not a single elephant could we catch even a glimpse of. We counted, at one time, several dozens of peacocks—some perched on the trees, some high in the air; we fired at them repeatedly, but, conscientiously, I do not believe any came within shot. Their plumage exceeded that of our tame peacocks less in the brilliancy of the colour than in the wonderful fineness of the gloss—a characteristic of animals of all kinds in their native state. We scarcely saw one small bird during our whole excursion, or heard a single note but the hideous screams of the peacock and parrot—tones which dame Nature, in her evenhanded style of doing things, has probably bestowed upon these dandies of the woods, to counterbalance the magnificence of their apparel.

Perhaps this absence of smaller birds may be accounted for at the time of our visit by the unusually long drought which had occurred, with the consequent failure in the paddy, or rice-crop. While discussing this point, the collector took occasion to point out to us the great importance of such artificial means of irrigating a country as the ancient lake of Candelay, by the side of which we were now encamped, must have furnished to agriculturists of those forgotten days, when its precious waters were not allowed to run to waste, but were husbanded and drawn off by careful means to fertilise the surrounding country.

This stupendous monument of the wealth and industry of some former race, is placed on ground slightly elevated above the districts lying between it and the sea, which, in a direct line, may be distant about twelve or fourteen miles. We could not ascertain exactly what was the precise elevation, but, from the remains of trenches, sluices, and other contrivances for drawing off and distributing the water, it appeared that the fall in the ground must have been sufficient to enable the husbandmen to irrigate the fields at pleasure; though, to our eyes, no inclination could be perceived. The lake itself is now greatly diminished in extent, from the dilapidations in its "bund," or retaining embankment, but still it stretches over many square miles of area. On three sides it is confined by the swelling nature of the ground, and it is only on the fourth that any extensive artificial means have been resorted to for confining the water. At this place, across a flat broad valley, there has been thrown a huge embankment, constructed chiefly of oblong stones, many of them as big as a sofa, extending in a zig-zag line for several miles. At some places it rises to the height of thirty or forty feet, and the courses of stone being laid above one another with considerable regularity, this great retaining wall assumes the appearance of a gigantic flight of steps, and being crowned at top by an irregular line of tall trees, it breaks the sky-line beyond the lake in a manner extremely picturesque. Here and there lateral gaps between the hills occur in the other sides, all of which are filled up with similar embankments.

Near one end of the principal wall we could distinctly trace the ruins of a considerable tower, beneath which the great tunnel or outlet used for tapping the lake most probably passed. It is said that some early European settlers, a century or two ago, impressed with an idea that treasure was hid in this building, had torn it down to get at the gold beneath. I remember believing this at the time, and abusing the Dutch accordingly, although nothing like evidence had been adduced to substantiate the charge.

I found afterwards, in travelling over India, and other countries which had changed hands repeatedly, that the poor predecessors of the existing rulers were very convenient persons upon whose shoulders to rest the extra blame of deeds which would not bear the light. It is possible enough, that the early Dutch settlers may have demolished the tower in question, but they could hardly be so silly as to expect to find treasure in the foundation. The true treasure at that spot—and hence, probably, the report and the misconception—consisted in the enriching property of the water, judiciously saved and applied to the grounds on a lower level. All this appears so obvious, that one is lost in conjecturing what motives could induce any people to take the trouble to destroy so noble a work.

Nothing appears to be known of the age in which the work in question was raised; and, indeed, the course of vegetation is there so rapid, that, without considerable care and many allowances, no safe inference can be drawn from external appearances. The exposed faces of the stones seemed greatly weathered; but on turning one of them round by means of poles, we could distinguish the marks of a sharp-pointed chisel—a sight which, while it really told nothing of dates, was enough to carry the imagination far back into the depths of time lying beyond tradition, and respecting which we know nothing except what these feeble, but distinct evidences, afford us of the hand of man having actually been there.

On beholding these ancient chisel marks at Candelay in Ceylon, at Pæstum in Italy, or at Stonehenge in England, of whose origin and history all trace is lost, we experience a sensation akin to what we feel on examining the fossil remains of animals in the strata of the earth. There is no need of further evidence than that of our senses to satisfy us that the birds, beasts, and fishes which we see imbedded in the rocks, must once have been alive and merry; but when, and where, and under what circumstances, are questions which baffle the boldest fancy. It may have been a million years ago, or ten hundred millions of years—that is to say, we know nothing precisely about the matter! Such, no doubt, is the case at present. We know well, that the date of these phenomena must lie beyond certain periods, as we know that the fixed stars lie beyond certain distances from the earth. But I am willing to believe, that both in geology and in astronomy, the investigating powers of man will eventually penetrate many secrets which are now hid even deeper than these; and that the time may possibly one day come, when the rise, progress, and relative dates and intervals between the remotest and the most recent geological phenomena shall be ascertained with as much precision as the velocity of light, or the complicated motions of the moon. The precise epochs of these occurrences may, indeed, like the actual distance of the fixed stars, very long continue to baffle human investigation; but even these will probably yield at last to the researches of laborious man, and become as simple, and as easy of practical application, as the law of gravitation, or the perplexing theory of the tides.

CHAPTER III.

GRIFFINS IN INDIA—SINBAD'S VALLEY OF DIAMONDS—A MOSQUITO HUNT.

On the evening of the 18th of November, 1812, we sailed, in his majesty's ship Illustrius, from the magnificent harbour of Trincomalee. In attempting to get out we were sadly baffled by light shifting winds, which knocked us about from side to side of the entrance, in which, unfortunately, no good anchorage is to be found, owing to the great depth of water and the rocky nature of the ground. This serious evil of a rocky bottom is now almost entirely obviated by the admirable invention of iron cables, when the water is not too deep. The links of the chain merely acquire a polish by their friction against the coral reefs and other sharp ledges, by which the best hempen cables of past times would be cut through in ten minutes.

The chain cable, however, is difficult of management in deep water, that is to say, when the soundings are more than twenty or twenty-five fathoms. Nothing is so easy as getting the anchor to the bottom in such cases: it is the "facilis descensus," with a vengeance! But when the anchor is to be pulled up again, then comes the tug. I once let go my anchor with a chain cable bent to it in forty-five fathoms, without having calculated on the probable effects of the momentum. Though the cable was bitten, all the stoppers snapped like pack-thread; and the anchor, not content with shooting to the bottom with an accelerated velocity, drew after it more than a hundred fathoms of chain, in such fearful style that we thought the poor ship must have been shaken to pieces. The noise was like that of rattling thunder, and so loud that it was impossible to hear a word; indeed it was even difficult to speak, from the excessive tremour caused by the rapid and violent passage of the links, as the chain leaped or rather flew, up the hatchway, flashing round the bits, and giving out sparks like a fire-work. Finally, it tore its way out at the hause-hole, till the whole cable had probably piled itself on the anchor in a pyramid of iron at the bottom of the sea. The inner end of the cable had of course been securely shackled round the heel of the mainmast, but the jerk with which it was brought up, made the ship shake from end to end as if she had bumped on a rock, and every one fully expected to see the links fly in pieces about the deck, like chain-shot fired from a cannon. It cost not many seconds of time for the cable to run out, but it occupied several hours hard labour to heave it in again. The ordinary power of the capstan, full manned, scarcely stirred it; and at the last, when to the weight of chain hanging from the bows there came to be added that of the anchor, it was necessary to apply purchase upon purchase, in order to drag the ponderous mass once more to the bows.

When we got fairly clear of the harbour of Trincomalee, and caught the monsoon, we dashed along shore briskly enough; and having rounded the south point of Ceylon, well named or called Dondra Head, or thunder cape, we paid a visit to Point de Galle, celebrated for its breadfruit and cocoa-nuts. We then passed on to Colombo, the capital or seat of government of the island. Ceylon, I may take occasion to mention, is not considered by our countrymen of the East to be in India. We stared with all our eyes when this unexpected information was first given us, and fancied our merry friends were quizzing us. But we soon learned that in the technical language of that country, Ceylon does not form a part of India; still less does Sumatra, Java, or any, indeed, of the islands in the great tropical Archipelago; and far less still is China talked of as constituting a part of India. Newcomers are, of course, a good deal perplexed by these and sundry other local peculiarities in language and manners, which they at first laugh at as a good joke, then ridicule as affected, and lastly conform to as quite natural and proper, because universally understood amongst those whom it most concerns.

The same thing takes place, I believe, in the technicalities of every profession as much contradistinguished from ordinary life as that of the British in India. I have seen a party of tourists from the inland counties of England prodigiously tickled at Portsmouth, on going ashore to find a rope called a sheet, to see gigs moving about without wheels, and to hear the people on board ship talking of saddles, bridles, bits and martingales! But to return to the East: I may mention that the term India is confined, amongst the English residents there, to the peninsula of Hindustan, and does not include Ceylon, probably from that island being immediately under the king's government, and not a part of the company's possessions. The straits of Malacca, Sunda, and so on, together with the China sea, and those magnificent groups of islands, the Philippines and Moluccas, are all included in the sweeping term—"To the eastward."

At almost every part of this immense range I found further local distinctions, of greater or less peculiarity and extent according to circumstances. At one place I was puzzled by hearing the name of a whole country appropriated to a single spot. At Bombay, for example, I remember it was the custom, at a certain season of the year, to talk of going to the Deccan, which word properly includes an immense region consisting of many provinces; whereas those who used this expression meant, and were understood to express, only one point in it—a little watering place. Mere local words, in like manner, come to have a much more expanded signification. The word Ghaut, I believe, means, in strictness, a pass between hills—and hence, some bold etymologists pretend, comes our word gate! The term, however, is now applied to the whole range of mountains which fringe the western coast of India, just as the more gigantic Andes of the Andes guard the shores of the Pacific.

I remember well, that one of the most striking peculiarities to a stranger's ear on landing in India, was the appropriation of all Europe when speaking of the country of England—as if in England we were to speak of Asia when we meant only Calcutta or Madras. If you ask a man whether that is a "Europe" newspaper which he is reading, he may reply, "No—it is the Frankfort Journal." The word England, or English, is hardly ever used. Were any one inadvertently to talk of having a pair of English shoes, in contradistinction, we should suppose, to "country shoes," or those made in India, to mistake in language would at once betray his being a griffin. He ought to say "Europe shoes." The use of the word "employment," I remember also thinking quite strange for a time. In other countries it signifies occupation or actual work; but in India it means exclusively being in office under government. I have seen men very busy fellows, overwhelmed with business from morning till night, but complaining all the while that they had "no employment."

But whether Ceylon be in India or not, all the world knows that this island is celebrated for precious stones; indeed, there are writers who believe that Mount Ophir of the Scripture is Adam's Peak of Ceylon. Be this, also, as it may, our ever-enterprising and active-minded admiral, Sir Samuel Hood, determined to bring this reputation to the proof, and, one day at dinner at the governor's table, actually announced his intention of having a hunt for the sapphires, rubies, tourmalines, chrysoberyls, corundums, and so on, for which the island has been long celebrated. His excellency, with the suavity of a courteous host, smiled, and wished the admiral success. Her excellency, the governor's lady, smiled, too, at this vain fancy of the admiral's, and created a promise of a ring set with the stones which the proposed expedition was to yield. Even the well-bred aides-de-camp and the knowing secretaries exchanged quizzical glances at the admiral's expense. The company at large scarcely knew, as yet, whether to treat the quiver as a proposal as a joke or as a serious affair. Sir Samuel, however, was not a man to be quizzed out of his purposes; and he therefore begged to have a party of workmen sent to him next morning to accompany him to a river not far off, along the banks of which, he had somewhere heard it reported, most of the finest stones in Ceylon had been found. He begged also that each of the men might be furnished with a basket, a request which naturally produced a second titter; for it was made in such a tone as led us to fancy the worthy admiral expected to collect the rubies and garnets in as great confusion as his far-famed predecessor, Sinbad the Sailor, found them in the Valley of Diamonds.

His precise plan he kept to himself till he reached the river, the alluvial strip of ground bordering which was formed chiefly of fine gravel, mixed with sand, loam, and mud. He then desired the men to fill their baskets, and to carry the whole mass, just as they picked it up, to one of the ship's boats, which he had directed to meet him at the landing place. This cargo of dirt and rubbish, on its reaching the ship, was put into a large sack, and carefully stowed away, as the admiral's poulterer reported, and the whole ship's company believed, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the hencoops—an idea not unnaturally conceived, for it is precisely with such gravel that fowls, as every one knows, are supplied at sea, as regularly as with food.

Not a word more was said on the subject at Government-house, nor on board the ship, till a couple of days after we had left Colombo, when the admiral ordered the bag of gravel into his cabin, along with a great tub of water and half a dozen wash-deck buckets. The whole stuff collected on shore was now thoroughly cleaned, and when only the gravel remained, it was divided into a number of small portions, and laid on plates and dishes on the table of the fore-cabin. As soon as all was arranged, the admiral, who superintended the operation, called out—

"Send for all the young gentlemen in the ship, and let every one take a plateful of gravel before him, to catch what jewels he can."

Before the party had time to assemble, the delighted admiral had himself discovered in his own dish three or four small garnets, one ruby, and several small crystals of corundum. By the aid of his young friends, to the astonishment of every one, a collection was soon made, which afterwards not only furnished the promised ring to the governor's lady, but made half a dozen others of equal beauty and perfect purity of materials. These precious stones were certainly not of the largest dimensions; but, for all that, the admiral, as he was wont in every thing he attempted, completely established his point.

It was the fashion at Colombo to dine early, say at half-past three or four, in order to command the whole evening for riding or lounging about in the open air. The grand place of resort in those days was a sort of esplanade looking to the south, and called, if I recollect right, the "Galle Face," from being turned towards Point de Galle. The collection of people in the evenings at this spot afforded pleasing studies for every eye. All ranks and parties, from the governor to the lowest cooly, appeared to be assembled to see the sun go down upon the western waters, at an hour, when the sea breeze having died away, the surface scarcely showed a ripple. Multitudes of the natives, too, not only of the island, but of many parts of India and of the eastern archipelago, drove about in their peculiar conveyances, hackeries and bandies, or chose to be carried in palankeens. Later in the night came the governor's parties and balls, where only the Europeans were assembled, and where, contrary to expectation, we generally found the coolest and most airy apartments. Indeed, it is only in cold countries that one meets with overheated ball-rooms. In India, every door and window being thrown open, a thorough draught sweeps through the house; or, if it be calm, an artificial breeze is produced by the waving of a dozen punkahs overhead, and every thing is kept fresh and agreeable. Instead, therefore, of the ball-rooms in that country being choky and unwholesome, as they almost invariably are in cold climates, they are as airy as if they were erected on the open esplanade.

It is a curious fact, that this admirable contrivance of the punkah, which is merely a large fan suspended to the roof, and extending nearly the whole length of the rooms in India, is not only a purely English invention, but is very modern. It was first devised and introduced by the Bengal officers who served with Lord Cornwallis in the war of Mysore against Tippoo in 1791-92. The punkah afterwards became general under the Madras and Bombay presidencies, but not for some time; and it was only in 1811 they were introduced by the English into Java, on the conquest of that island. I believe the natives of India have not, as yet, any where adopted the fashion. But in truth the Hindoos are wretchedly behind the Europeans in every article of real luxury, for which all their noisy pomp and tinselly show is but a poor substitute.

This and many other devices which have been fallen upon by the ingenious, wealthy, and luxurious Europeans, to counteract the heat of the climate, are so successful, that, with a very few exceptions, I have hardly ever felt the temperature of India seriously oppressive. It is true that some people delight in hot weather, and suffer so much from cold, that they consider it almost a point of honour and conscience not to complain, however high the thermometer rises. I cordially sympathise with these chilly folks, so that my testimony on this matter is not the best. I do own, indeed, that I have very often experienced a most disagreeable allowance of heat when exposed to the sun's rays on duty, either in a boat, or when keeping watch in a calm on the burning quarter-deck of a line-of-battle ship. In spite of the awnings spread fore and aft, the fierce sun of those climates will make his power felt. But as the evil effects of such exposure are very great, every discreet commanding officer will take the utmost pains to avoid employing his officers or people unnecessarily during the heat of the day, a period when the hardest are the most apt to suffer, and the most experienced (paradoxical as it may appear) generally among the least fitted to stand the sun with impunity.

It is very strange, that during the first year, and in some cases longer, most new comers are hardly conscious of any ill effects arising from the influence of the sun's direct rays; and accordingly they walk and ride about, go to the marshes for snipe-shooting, bathe in the surf, and commit all sort of folly, not only without inconvenience, but with much real enjoyment; while the older hands make themselves hoarse with preaching to these griffins that they are guilty of suicide. The ruddy-cheeked griffin, in his turn, laughs and quizzes the yellow-visaged old Indian, and having trudged off to the swamps, passes the whole morning up to the knees in water so industriously, after a snipe, that he is brought home at three or four o'clock with a coup de soleil! Even if he escapes this sudden fate, he is pretty sure to feel, about a year and a day after his arrival, a severe twinge in his right shoulder, a pain in his side, and all the horrid symptoms of the fatal liver complaint.

"I tell you what it is, young fellows," said a venerable sun-dried officer to some of those gay Johnny Newcomes, "you shoot all day, you walk, and ride about in the sun; you poke along the streets without your palankeens; you play cricket on the esplanade at noon; you swell Hodgson's pale ale, claret, and sangaree, till you drive yourselves into the liver complaint, of which you die; and then, forsooth, we have the trouble of writing home to your friends that the climate did not agree with you!"

The fact is simply this: the climate of India will certainly not agree with those who are utterly careless about it, as too many are, and will give it no fair play: or who, from peculiar temperament, are predisposed to diseases incident to great heat; or, lastly, whose duties are of such a nature, that whether they will or not, they must be exposed to the sun, without having the power of changing their place of residence frequently. The constant shifting about is, I believe, one of the chief causes of the superior healthiness of seamen in India over fixed residents on shore, though apparently of equal constitutional strength. This idea seems to be confirmed by the fact of most European troops employed in the wars of India being comparatively healthy, however much exposed to the sun, when in active service, and constantly moving from one encampment to another.

But whether on shore or afloat, it seems admitted to be of the greatest importance not to employ soldiers or sailors in the sun more than is absolutely necessary for the public service. It is a most painful thing, therefore, and exceedingly destructive to the health of a ship's crew, who have been for some time in that country, when she falls under the command of an inexperienced officer, just arrived from Europe, and who, from being himself at first almost entirely insensible to the disagreeable effect of the heat, considers the objections which other people make to exposure as mere fancies. Under this impression, he admits of no difference being made in the hours of work, but employs his people aloft, and in the boats, when sailing through the Straits of Sunda, or moored in Madras Roads, with as much unconcern as if he were navigating the British Channel, or lying snug at Spithead. The officers, and especially the surgeon remonstrating in vain; poor Jack of course can say nothing; but in a few months, or it may be, in a few weeks or days, half the ship's company find themselves in the doctor's list. Many die of dysentery, others sink under the liver complaint, and the slightest cuts often produce locked jaw; while many more, broken down by the climate, are invalided and sent home, having become useless to the service and to themselves for life! A judicious captain, under exactly similar circumstances, will not, perhaps, lose a man, nor need his crew be broken up and his ship rendered unserviceable.

From half past nine or ten, till two or three o'clock, an officer of experience and consideration, if he can help it, will never allow a seaman's head to appear above the hammock-railing, but will discover some employment for the men on the main and lower decks. If the ship be at anchor, he will lay out a line, and warp the ship broadside to the sea breeze, that the cool air may sweep freely through all parts of the decks, and render every thing fresh, sweet, and wholesome. No boats will be sent away from the ship during that fiery interval; or if any duty absolutely requires exposure, it will be got over with the utmost expedition. In the event of the men getting wet by a shower of rain, it is always right to make them shift their clothes instantly, and to muster them afterwards to see that their things are dry and clean. These, and a hundred other little precautions, all of which are well known to old stagers, ought to be industriously sought after by new comers, and adopted implicitly and at once with scrupulous attention. At all events, the officer who has the means of enforcing these precautions, and yet does not choose to adopt them, has much to answer for if any of his crew die in consequence of needless exposure. He may rely upon it, that the fatal effects of a hot climate on the European constitution, unless very carefully watched, are inevitable. When I have seen regiments reduced to mere skeletons, and ships so weakened in their crews that they could scarcely weigh the anchor, I have often thought of Dr. Johnson's graphic description, in his paper on the Falkland Islands, of those unseen evils of war in uncongenial regions, of which so few people in high latitudes take any account: "By which," says he "fleets are silently dispeopled, and armies sluggishly melted away!"

Persons living on shore, however, and who possess the means of purchasing the ordinary luxuries of an oriental life, need scarcely ever suffer much inconvenience from the heat. The dress of Europeans, which consists of the lightest and whitest materials, reflects a great part of the heat. The rooms are always large and airy, without carpets, and stuck so full of open doors and windows, that when there comes the slightest breath of wind from the sea it is sure to be felt; but all these are carefully closed up when the air is hot. The sun is excluded by various contrivances, chiefly by a shady verandah, ten or twelve feet wide, which generally runs quite round the house, so that no direct rays can strike into the apartments. And the painful glare of the lower sky, or, which is nearly as distressing to the eyes, the dazzling reflection from bright objects on the ground, is cut off by painted mats made of split rattan imported from China. These devices, which scarcely intercept the wind, effectually prevent the admission of more light than is absolutely required. In some parts of India, a large open frame-work is placed in a sloping position against the top of the verandah, and resting on the ground on the windward side of the house. This frame being covered over thickly, but loosely, with a layer of a peculiar kind of sweet-scented grass, called I think, "cuscus," is kept well drenched with water. The process of evaporation caused by the hot and arid wind passing through the wet matting produces a more considerable degree of cold than any one who has not enjoyed the surpassing luxury of these coolers, or tatties, can form any conception of. I have heard it said, indeed, that the damp cool air which streams through this wall of grass, though the most delightful thing in the world at the time, is apt to give colds, stiff necks, and the whole family of rheumatic twitches, to those who are in the habit of catching cold readily. But I will believe none of these stories against the exquisite tatties, under the lee of which I have seen people so often sitting, gasping for breath and praying for a breeze; for I need not remark, that during a calm they are useless.

Persons long accustomed to watch those periodical changes in the wind, which occur in hot climates with such wonderful regularity every day, can often tell, by some intuitive consciousness, not capable of communication to inexperienced senses, almost the very moment when the long looked-for sea breeze is coming. I remember, at Madras, sitting one day in the inner room of a friend's house, who had been my school-fellow a dozen years before—now, alas! nearly twenty years in his grave. He was telling me of his quickness of perception in this matter, as we sat baking and stewing in what is called a garden-house on the far-famed Choultry Plain. My friend's quickness of sight beat that of the pig's, (who, every one knows, can see the wind,) for he declared he could see the calm, and, calling me to the verandah, pointed out this wonderful sight. The whole landscape appeared to have given way, like molten silver, under the heat, and to be moving past more like a troubled stream than the solid ground. The trees and shrubs seen under a variety of refractions, through differently heated strata of air, seemed all in violent motion, though probably not one leaf of the highest coconut tree, nor a single blade of the lowest grass, stirred in reality. The buildings in the distance looked as if their foundations had been removed, while the shattered and broken walls danced to and fro, as if under the influence of some magical principles of attraction and repulsion; whilst many patches of imaginary water—the celebrated “mirage” of the desert—floating where no water could have existed, mocked our sight in this fantastic landscape.

Not a human being was then to be seen. The blue-skinned buffaloes, and the queer looking Indian bullocks with humps on their shoulders, squeezed themselves under the skirts of the aloe and bamboo hedges. Others, pre-eminently happy, poor beasts! in order to escape the intolerable misery of the mosquitoes, immersed themselves in the muddy tanks or ponds, beneath the surface of which they contrived to hide every part of their bodies except the top of their nostrils, with just as much of their eyes as they could keep clear by the brush of their eye-lids. Even our native bearers, who in general seem marvelously indifferent to the sun, had lifted the palankeens into the shade, and with their wrappers over their heads, lay sleeping about the steps of the verandah in the coolest corners they could find. I tried first one chair then another; then flung myself on a cane-bottomed sofa, seeking for rest, but all in vain. I next stretched myself flat on my back on the polished chunam floor, directly under the punkah, with my white jacket thrown open, neck-cloth cast away, and collar unbuttoned. It was still to no purpose! The more moves I made, the worse became the oppression of the heat; and, for once in my life, I had very nearly confessed that it might possibly be rather too hot—when, just in time to save my credit for consistency my friend clapped his hands and exclaimed, “Here comes the sea-breeze! I see it! I feel it! I hear it! Huzza for your life!” I, however, could see nothing, nor feel any thing; yet it was evident that all the experienced men of the party did. The bearers stationed to cast water on the tatties had already commenced their operations, and a slight touch of the aromatic perfume of the delicious cuscus began to pervade the room. On walking towards the opening between two of the tatties, and looking towards the sea, I could distinctly perceive the intermediate scenery settling into its natural position by the more uniform arrangement of the various strata of air forming the medium through which the objects were viewed.

I believe all the curious phenomena of the mirage are easily explained, upon the supposition, that under certain circumstances, the lower stratum of air may become actually lighter than those which are next above it. The effect of this will be obvious to those who have attended to the subject of atmospherical refraction, the usual effect of which, as every one knows, is to elevate objects, or make them seem higher than they really are. But the unusual effect, or that caused by the contact of hot ground rendering the lowest portion of the air specifically lighter than the superincumbent layers, is to make high objects seem to the eye lower than they really are. Thus, what we fancy to be water between two ridges of sand highly heated, is nothing more than a portion of the clear sky, the rays from which, in passing through the intermediate atmosphere, having entered the warm and rarefied stratum in contact with the sand, are refracted to the eye in a manner which impresses on the sense of vision an image of the sky; and this so closely resembles the surface of still water, that the deception becomes at times quite complete. The tendency of the colder and heavier air above to mix with that which is hotter and lighter beneath it, is of course very considerable: the consequence is, that near the line of contact of the two media, there occurs an intermixture of air differing in density, and therefore in refractive power. Hence every object viewed through this troubled or heterogeneous part of the atmosphere must inevitably seem broken, distorted, and in motion.

Dr. Wollaston, who was, I conceive, the first to explain all these, and many other attendant phenomena, has also, with his usual ingenuity, suggested several popular experiments to prove the truth of his theory. (See the Philosophical Transactions for 1800.) One is, to place some water, or clear syrup, in a square phial, and then add spirits of wine, or any other fluid of a different specific gravity, taking care not to allow them to intermix too suddenly, but to arrange matters so that the adjustment may take place gradually. Objects viewed through the phial, as the intermixture takes place, will undergo inversions and other variations in form and position similar to those of the mirage.

In the sleeping apartments of India, great care is taken to secure coolness. The beds, which are always large and hard, are generally placed as nearly as may be in the very middle of the apartment, in the line of the freest thorough draught which open doors and open windows can command. I speak now, of course, of the beds of men who live in single blessedness. In other cases a simple contrivance has been devised, which, if it does render the sleeping-room a little less airy than that of the free and solitary bachelor, nevertheless accomplishes a good deal, and secures all the properties. The door, which is shut, has its upper half cut away, so that the air enters freely above; and the windows, also, being high, are always left open.

Round each bed is suspended a gauze curtain, without which sleep would be as effectually murdered as ever it was by any tragedy king. For if even one villainous mosquito contrives to gain admission into your fortress, you may, for that night, bid good-bye not only to sleep, but to temper, and almost to health. I defy the most resolute, the most serene, or the most robust person that ever lived between the tropics, to pass a whole night in bed, within the curtain of which a single invader has entered, and not to be found, when the morning comes, in a high fever, with every atom of his patience exhausted. Temper, under such circumstances, is really out of the question; the most placid creature on earth, even old Uncle Toby himself, would be driven into a rage!

The process of getting into bed in India is one requiring great dexterity, and not a little scientific engineering. As the curtains are carefully tucked in close under the mattress, all round, you must decide at what part of the bed you choose to make your entry. Having surveyed the ground, and clearly made up your mind on this point, you take in your right hand a kind of brush or switch, generally made of a horse's tail; or, if you be tolerably expert, a towel may answer the purpose. With your left hand you then seize that part of the skirt of the curtain which is thrust under the bedding at the place you intend to enter, and, by the light of the cooco-nut-oil lamp (which burns on the floor of every bed-room in Hindustan) you first drive away the mosquitoes from your immediate neighbourhood, by whisking round your horse-tail; and, before proceeding further, you must be sure you have effectually driven the enemy back. If you fail in this matter, your repose is effectually dashed for that night; for these confounded animals—it is really difficult to keep from swearing, even at the recollection of the villains, though at the distance of ten thousand miles from them—these well-cursed animals, then, appear to know perfectly well what is going to happen, and assemble with the vigour and bravery of the flank companies appointed to head a storming party, ready in one instant to rush into the breach, careless alike of horse-tails and towels. Let it be supposed, however, that you have successfully beaten back the enemy. You next promptly form an opening, not a hair's breadth larger than your own person, into which you leap, like harlequin through a hoop, or, to borrow Jack's phrase, “as if the devil kicked you on end!” Of course, with all the speed of intense fear, you close up the gap through which you have shot yourself into your sleeping quarters.

If all these arrangements have been well managed, you may amuse yourself for a while by scoffing at, and triumphing over the clouds of baffled mosquitoes outside, who dash themselves against the meshes of the net, in vain attempts to enter your sanctum. If, however, for your sins, any one of their number has succeeded in entering the place along with yourself, he is not such an ass as to betray his presence while you are flushed with victory, wide awake, and armed with the means of his destruction. Far from this, the scoundrel allows you to chuckle over your fancied great doings, and to lie down with all the complacency and fallacious security of your conquest, and under the entire assurance of enjoying a tranquil night's rest. Alas for such presumptuous hopes! Scarcely have you dropped gradually from these visions of the day to the yet more blessed visions of the night, and the last faint effort of your eye-lids has been quite overcome by the gentle pressure of sleep, when in deceitful slumber you hear something like the sound of trumpets.

Straightway your imagination is kindled, and you fancy yourself in the midst of a fierce fight, and struggling, not against petty insects, but against armed men and thundering cannon! In the excitement of the mortal conflict of your dream, you awake not displeased, mayhap, to find that you are safe and snug in bed. But in the next instant what is your dismay, when you are again saluted by the odious notes of a mosquito close at your ear! The perilous fight of the previous dream, in which your honour had become pledged, and your life at hazard, is all forgotten in the pressing reality of this waking calamity. You resolve to do or die, and not to sleep, or even attempt to sleep, till you have finally overcome the enemy. Just as you have made this manly resolve, and in order to deceive the foe, have pretended to be fast asleep, the wary mosquito is again heard, circling over you at a distance, but gradually coming nearer and nearer in a spiral descent, and at each time gaining upon you one inch, till, at length, he almost touches your ear, and, as you suppose, is just about to settle upon it. With a sudden jerk, and full of wrath, you bring up your hand, and give yourself such a box on the ear as would have staggered the best friend you have in the world, and might have crushed twenty thousand mosquitoes, had they been there congregated. Being convinced that you have now done for him, you mutter between your teeth one of those satisfactory little apologies for an oath which indicate gratified revenge, and down you lie again.

In less than ten seconds, however, the very same flea whom you fondly hoped you had executed, is again within hail of you, and you can almost fancy there is scorn in the tone of his abominable hum. You, of course, watch his motions still more intently than before, but only by the ear, for you can never see him. We shall suppose that you fancy he is aiming at your left hand; indeed, as you are almost sure of it, you wait till he has ceased his song, and then you give yourself another smack, which, I need not say, proves quite as fruitless as the first. About this stage of the action you discover, to your horror, that you have been steadily bit in one ear and in both heels, but when or how you cannot tell. These wounds, of course, put you into a fine rage, partly from the pain, and partly from the insolent manner in which they have been inflicted. You spring on your knees—not to pray, heaven knows—but to fight. You seize your horse's tail with spasmodic rage, and after whisking it round and round, and ending it in every corner of the bed, you feel pretty certain you must at last have demolished your friend.

In this unequal warfare you pass the live-long night, alternately scratching and cuffing yourself—frustrating and fuming to no purpose—feverish, angry, sleepy, provoked, and wounded in twenty different places!

At last, just as the long-expected day begins to dawn, you drop off, quite exhausted, into an unsatisfactory, heavy slumber, during which your triumphant enemy banquets upon your carcass at his convenient leisure. As the sun is rising, the barber enters the room to remove your beard before you step into the bath, and you awaken only to discover the bloated and satisfied monster clinging to the top of your bed—an easy, but useless, and inglorious prey!

CHAPTER IV.

CETLONIAN CANOES—PERUVIAN BALSAS—THE PHANTOM WINDLASS OF THE COROMANDEL FISHERMEN.

The canoes of Ceylon, as far as I remember, are not described by any writer; nor have I met with many professional men who are aware of their peculiar construction, and of the advantages of the extremely elegant principle upon which they are contrived, though capable, I am persuaded, of being applied to various purposes of navigation.

Among the lesser circumstances which appear to form characteristic points of distinction between country and country, may be mentioned the head-dress of the men, and the form and rig of their boats. An endless variety of turbans, sheepskin caps, and conical bonnets, distinguish the Asiatics from the “Topce Wallas” or hat-wearers of Europe; and a still greater variety exists amongst the boats of different nations. My purpose just now, however, is to speak of boats and canoes alone; and it is really most curious to observe, that their size, form, cut of sails, description of oar and rudder, length of mast, and so on, are not always exactly regulated by the peculiar climate of the locality, but made to depend on a caprice which it is difficult to account for. The boats of some countries are so extremely ticklish or unstable, and altogether without bearings, that the smallest weight on one side more than sets the other upsets them. This applies to the canoes of the North American Indian, which require considerable practice, even in the smoothest water, to keep them upright; and yet the Indians cross immense lakes in them, although the surface of those vast sheets of fresh water is often as rough as that of any salt sea. The waves, it is true, are not so long and high; but they are very awkward to deal with, from their abruptness and the rapidity with which they get up when a breeze sets in.

On those parts of the coast of the United States where the seasons are alternately very fine and very rough, our ingenious friends, the Americans, have contrived a set of pilot boats, which are the delight of every sailor. This description of vessel, as the name implies, must always be at sea, as it is impossible to tell when her services may be required by ships steering in for the harbour's mouth. Accordingly, the Baltimore clipper and the New York pilots defy the elements in a style which it requires a long apprenticeship to the difficulties and discomforts of a wintry navigation in a stormy latitude, duly to appreciate. In the fine weather, smooth water, and light winds of summer, these pilot-boats skim over the surface with the ease and swiftness of a swallow, apparently just touching the water with their prettily formed hulls, which seem too small to bear the immense load of snow-white canvass swelling above them, and shooting them along as if by magic, when every other vessel is lost in the calm, and when even taunt-masted ships can barely catch a breath of air to fill their sky-sails and royal studding-sails. They are truly "water witches;" for, while they look so delicate and fragile that one feels at first as if the most moderate breeze must brush them from the face of the ocean, and scatter to the winds all their gay drapery—they can and do defy, as a matter of habit and choice, the most furious gales with which the rugged "sea-board" of America is visited in February and March.

I have seen a pilot-boat off New York, in the morning, in a calm, with all her sails set, lying asleep on the water, which had subsided into such perfect stillness that we could count the seam of each cloth in the mirror beneath her, and it became difficult to tell which was the reflected image—which the true vessel. And yet, within a few hours, I have observed the same boat, with only her close-reefed foresail set—no one visible on her decks—and the sea running mountains high, threatening to swallow her up. Nevertheless, the beautiful craft rose as buoyantly on the back of the waves as any duck, and, moreover, glanced along their surface, and kept so good a wind, that, ere long, she shot ahead and weathered our ship. Before the day was done, she could scarcely be distinguished from the mast-head to windward, though we had been labouring, in the interval, under every sail we could possibly carry without risk of the masts.

The balsas of Peru, the catamarans and masullah boats of the Coromandel coast, and the flying proas of the South Sea Islands, have all been described before, and their respective merits dwelt upon by Cook, Vancouver, Ulloa, and others. Each in its way, and on its proper spot, seems to possess qualities which it is difficult to communicate to vessels similarly constructed at a distance. The boats of each country, indeed, may be said to possess a peculiar language, understood only by the natives of the countries to which they belong; and, truly, the manner in which the vessels of some regions behave, under the guidance of their respective masters, seems almost to imply that the boats themselves are gifted with animal intelligence. At all events, their performance never fails to excite the highest professional admiration of those whom experience has rendered familiar with the difficulties to be overcome.

Long acquaintance with the local tides, winds, currents, and other circumstances of the pilotage, and the constant pressure of necessity, enable the inhabitants of each particular spot to acquire such masterly command over their machinery, that no new comer, however well provided, or however skilful generally, can expect to cope with them. Hence it arises, that boats of a man-of-war are found almost invariably inferior, in some respects, to those of the port at which she touches. The effect of seeking to adapt our boats to any one particular place, would be to render them less serviceable upon the whole. After remaining some time at a place we might succeed in occasionally outsailing or outrowing the natives; but what sort of a figure would our boats cut at the next point to which the ship might be ordered—say a thousand miles farther from, or nearer to, the equator, where all the circumstances would inevitably be found totally different from what they were at the last port? We should have to change again and again, losing time at each place, and probably not gaining, after all, any of the real advantages which the natives, long resident on the spot, alone know the art of applying to practice.

It has been somewhere remarked, that when the human frame is compared with that of the inferior animals, it is found that, while in swiftness it is beaten by one, in ascent by another, in strength by a third, yet does it contain by far the most admirable and varied combination of all those qualities severally possessed by the unintellectual animals. Thus man, upon the whole, is far better fitted than any of them for enduring the boundless varieties of climate which distinguish the different quarters of the globe, and for bringing into useful effort those inherent energies, both of body and mind, with which he is gifted, and which in the end render him the undisputed master of all other living things. So it is (to compare great things with small) in the case of the boats of ships of war which are most ingeniously contrived to be useful in all climates, in all seas, on every coast, and at all times and seasons. It is true they seldom, if ever, match the boats of the ports at which they anchor, either in sailing or in rowing. But they are invariably found to accomplish these purposes well enough for real service, besides securing many other advantages which the local boats cannot command. They are likewise sufficiently well adapted to all seas and all weathers, and can either carry heavy loads or sail quite light. They are so strongly built that they can take the ground without injury, and yet are not so heavy as to be troublesome in handling. While they are strong enough to bear the firing of a cannon in their bow, they are capacious enough to carry water casks or provisions, or to disembark troops, without being inconveniently cumbersome when stowed on the booms, or suspended from the quarters. Like the hardy sailors who man them, they are rough and ready for any service, in any part of the world, at any moment they may be required.

It is not likely that we shall ever essentially improve the build or equipment of our boats; but it must always be useful to seafaring men to become acquainted with such practical devices in seamanship as have been found to answer well, especially if they seem capable of being appropriated upon occasions which may possibly arise in the course of a service so infinitely varied as that of the navy. It is partly on this account, and partly as a matter of general curiosity, that I think some mention of the canoes of Ceylon, and the balsas of Peru, may interest many persons for whom ordinary technicalities possess no charm. At least there appears to be an originality and neatness about both these contrivances, and a correctness of principle, which we are surprised to find in connection with perfect simplicity, and an absence of that collateral knowledge which we are so apt to fancy belongs only to more advanced stages of civilization and philosophical instruction.

The hull or body of the Ceylonese canoe is formed, like that of Robinson Crusoe's, out of the trunk of a single tree, wrought in its middle part into a perfectly smooth cylinder, but slightly flattened and turned up at both ends, which are made exactly alike. It is hollowed out in the usual way, but not cut so much open at top as we see in other canoes, for considerably more than half of the outside part of the cylinder or barrel is left entire, with only a narrow slit, eight or ten inches wide, above. If such a vessel were placed in the water it would possess very little stability, even when not loaded with any weight on its upper edges. But there is built upon it a set of wooden upper works, in the shape of a long trough, extending from end to end; and the top-heaviness of this addition to the hull would instantly overturn the vessel, unless some device were applied to preserve its upright position. This purpose is accomplished by means of an out-rigger on one side, consisting of two curved poles, or slender but tough spars, laid across the canoe at right angles to its length, and extending to the distance of twelve, fifteen, or even twenty feet, where they join a small log of buoyant wood, about half as long as the canoe, and lying parallel to it, with both its ends turned up like the toe of a slipper, to prevent its dipping into the waves. The inner ends of these transverse poles are securely bound by thongs to the raised gunwales of the canoe. The out-rigger—which, it may be useful to bear in mind, is always kept to windward—acting by its weight at the end of so long a lever, prevents the vessel from turning over by the pressure of the sail; or, should the wind shift suddenly, so as to bring the sail a-back, the buoyancy of the floating log would prevent the canoe from upsetting on that side by retaining the out-rigger horizontally.

So far the ordinary purpose of an out-rigger is answered; but there are other ingenious things about these most graceful of all boats, which seem worthy of the attention of professional men. The mast, which is very taunt, or lofty, supports a lug-sail of immense size, and is stepped exactly in midships, that is, at the same distance from both ends of the canoe. The yard, also, is slung precisely in the middle; and while the tack of the sail is made fast at one extremity of the hull, the opposite corner, or clew, to which the sheet is attached, hauls aft to the other end. Shrouds extend from the mast-head to the gunwale of the canoe; besides which, slender backstays are carried to the extremity of the out-rigger; and these ropes, by reason of their great spread, give such powerful support to the mast, though loaded with a prodigious sail, that a very slender spar is sufficient. If I am not mistaken, some of these canoes are fitted with two slender masts, between which the sail is triced up, without a yard.

The method of working the sails of these canoes is as follows. They proceed in one direction as far as may be deemed convenient, and then, without going about, or turning completely round as we do, they merely change the stern of the canoe into the head, by shifting the tack of the sail over to leeward, and so converting it into the sheet—while the other clew, being shifted up to windward, becomes the tack. As soon as these changes have been made, away spins the little fairy bark on her new course, but always keeping the same side, or that on which the out-rigger is placed to windward. It will be easily understood that the pressure of the sail has a tendency to lift the weight at the extremity of the out-rigger above the surface of the water. In sailing along, therefore, the log just skims the tops of the waves, but scarcely ever buries itself in them, so that little or no interruption to the velocity of the canoe is caused by the out-rigger. When the breeze freshens so much as to lift the weight higher than the natives like, one, and sometimes two of them, walk out on the horizontal spars, so as to add their weight to that of the out-rigger. In order to enable them to accomplish this purpose in safety, a "man rope," about breast high, extends over each of the spars from the mast to the backstays.

Of all the ingenious native contrivances for turning small means to good account, one of the most curious, and, under certain circumstances, perhaps the most useful, is the Balsa, or raft of South America, or, as it is called on some parts of the coast, the catamaran. This singular vessel is not only very curious in the eyes of persons who have attended at all to such things as amateurs, but is calculated also to furnish some useful hints to professional seamen. The simplest form of the raft, or balsa, is that of five, seven, or nine large beams of a very light wood—say from fifty to sixty feet long—arranged side by side, with the longest spar placed in the centre. These logs are firmly held together by cross bars, lashings, and stout planking near the ends. They vary from fifteen to twenty, and even thirty feet in width. I have seen some at Guayaquil of an immense size, formed of logs as large as a frigate's fore-mast. These are intended for conveying goods to Païta, and other places along shore. The balsa generally carries only one large sail, which is hoisted to what we call a pair of sheers, formed by two poles crossing at the top, where they are lashed together. It is obvious, that it would be difficult to step a mast securely to a raft in the manner it is done in a ship. It is truly astonishing to see how fast these singular vessels go through the water; but it is still more curious to observe how accurately they can be steered, and how effectively they may be handled in all respects like any ordinary vessel.

The method by which the balsas are directed in their course is extremely ingenious, and is that to which I should wish to call the attention of sailors, not merely as a matter of curiosity (although on this score, too, it certainly has great interest,) but chiefly from its practical utility in seamanship. No officer can tell how soon he may be called upon to place his crew on a raft, should his ship be wrecked; and yet, unless he has been previously made aware of some method of steering it, no purpose may be answered but that of protracting the misery of the people under his charge. We all recollect the horrid scenes which took place on the raft which left the French frigate Méduse, on the coast of Africa, in 1816; and yet it is perfectly obvious, from the state of the wind and weather, that if any one of that ill-fated party had been aware of the principle upon which the South American balsas are steered, they might easily have reached the land in a few hours, and all the lives, so horribly sacrificed, might have been saved.

Nothing can be conceived more simple, or more easy of application, than the South American contrivance. Near both ends of the centre spar there is cut a perpendicular slit, about a couple of inches wide by one or two feet in length. Into each of these holes is a broad plank, called Guaras by the natives, inserted in such a way that it may be thrust down to the depth of ten or twelve feet; or, at pleasure, it may be drawn up entirely. The slits are so cut, that, when the raft is in motion the edges of these planks shall meet the water; or, in mathematical language, their planes are parallel with the length of the spars. It is clear, that if both the guaras be thrust quite down, and there held fast in a perpendicular direction, they will offer a broad surface towards the side, and thus, by acting like the leeboards of a river barge, or the keel of a ship, prevent the balsa from drifting sidewise or dead to leeward. But while these guaras serve the purpose of a keel, they also perform the important duty of a rudder, the rationale of which every sailor will understand, upon considering the effect which must follow upon pulling up either the guara in the bow or that in the stern. Suppose, when the wind is on the beam, the foremost one drawn up; that end of the raft will instantly have a tendency to drift to leeward from the absence of the lateral support it previously received from its guara or keel at the bow; or, in sea language, the balsa will immediately "fall off," and in time she will come right before the wind. On the other hand, if the foremost guara be kept down while the sternmost one is drawn up, the balsa's head, or bow, will gradually come up towards the wind, in consequence of that end retaining its hold of the water by reason of its guara, while the stern end, being relieved from its lateral support, drifts to leeward. Thus, by judiciously raising or lowering one or both the guaras, the raft may not only be steered with the greatest nicety, but may be tacked or wore, or otherwise directed, with a degree of precision which appears truly wonderful to those who see it for the first time; nor is this contrivance less a subject of admiration after the principles have been studied.

I never shall forget the sensation produced in a ship I commanded, one evening on the coast of Peru, as we steered towards the roadstead of Payta, so celebrated in Anson's voyage, and beheld an immense balsa dashing out before the land wind, and sending a snowy wreath of foam before her like that which curls up before the bow of a frigate in chase. As long as she was kept before the wind, we could understand this in some degree; but when she hauled up in order to round the point, and having made a stretch along shore, proceeded to tack, we could scarcely believe our eyes. Had the celebrated Flying Dutchman sailed past us, our wonder could hardly have been excited more.

In Ulloa's interesting voyage to South America, a minute account is given of the balsa, which I recommend to the attention of professional men. He winds up in these words:—

"Had this method of steering been sooner known in Europe, it might have alleviated the distress of many a shipwreck, by saving numbers of lives; as in 1730, the Genoea, one of his majesty's frigates, being lost on the Vibora, the ship's company made a raft; but committing themselves to the waves without any means of directing their course, they only added some melancholy minutes to their existence."—Ulloa, book iv. chap. 9.

I have lately seen a model of a raft devised some years ago, expressly in imitation of the South American balsa, by Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Maitland, K. C. B., to be made out of the spare spars with which every ship of war is supplied. He proposes to form each of the guaras, or steering boards, of two of the ship's company's mess tables joined together by gratings and planks. But he sees no reason why these should be limited in number, and thinks that they might perhaps be usefully distributed along the entire length of the centre spar, so as effectually to prevent leeway or drift. In this manner, Sir Frederick is of opinion that a raft, capable of carrying a whole ship's crew, might be navigated for a considerable distance with ease and security. And I am glad to find myself anticipated by an authority deservedly so high with the profession, in this practical illustration of an idea that has appeared to me extremely feasible, from the first moment I saw the Peruvian balsas.

It will generally be found well worth an officer's attention to remark in what manner the natives of any coast, however rude they may be, contrive to perform difficult tasks. Such things may be very simple and easy for us to execute, when we have all the appliances and means of our full equipment at command; but as circumstances may often occur to deprive us of many of those means, and thus, virtually, to reduce us to the condition of the natives, it becomes of consequence to ascertain how necessity, the venerable mother of invention, has taught people so situated to do the required work.

For example, it is generally easy for a ship of war to pick up her anchor with her own boats; but it will sometimes happen that the launch and other large boats may be stove, and then it may prove of consequence to know how a heavy anchor can be weighed without a boat at all.

We happened, in his majesty's ship Minden, to run upon the Coleroon shoal, off the mouth of the great river of that name, about a hundred miles south of Madras. After laying out a bower anchor, and hauling the ship off, we set about preparing the boats to weigh it in the usual way. But the master-attendant of Porto Novo, who had come off to our assistance with a fleet of canoes and rafts, suggested to Sir Samuel Hood, that it might be a good opportunity to try the skill of the natives, who were celebrated for their expertness in raising great weights from the bottom. The proposal was one which delighted the admiral, who enjoyed every thing that was new. He posted himself accordingly in his barge near the spot, but he allowed the task to be turned over entirely to the black fellows, whom he ordered to be supplied with ropes, spars, and any thing else they required from the ship. The officers and sailors, in imitation of their chief, clustered themselves in wondering groups in the rigging, in the chains, and in the boats, to witness the strange spectacle of a huge bower anchor, weighing nearly four tons, raised off the ground by a set of native fishermen, possessed of no canoe larger than the smallest gig on board.

The master-attendant stood interpreter, and passed backwards and forwards between the ship and the scene of operations—not to direct, but merely to signify what things the natives required for their purpose. They first begged us to have a couple of spare topmasts and topail-yards, with a number of smaller spars, such as top-gallant-masts and studding-sail booms. Out of these they formed, with wonderful speed, an exceedingly neat cylindrical raft, between two and three feet in diameter. They next bound the whole closely together by lashings, and filled up all its inequalities with capstan-bars, handspikes, and other small spars, so as to make it a compact, smooth, and uniform cylinder from end to end. Nothing could be more dextrous or seaman-like than the style in which these fellows swam about and passed the lashings; in fact, they appeared to be as much at home in the water as our sailors were in the boats or in the rigging.

A stout seven-inch hawser was now sent down by the buoy-rope, and the running clinch or noose formed on its end, placed over the flue of the anchor in the usual way. A couple of round turns were then taken with the hawser at the middle part of the cylindrical raft, after it had been drawn up as tight as possible from the anchor. A number of slow ropes, I think about sixty or seventy in all, were next passed round the cylinder several times, in the opposite direction to the round turns taken with the hawser.

Upwards of a hundred of the natives now mounted the raft, and, after dividing themselves into pairs, and taking hold of the slow ropes in their hands, pulled them up as tight as they could. By this effort they caused the cylinder to turn round till its further revolutions were stopped by the increasing tightness of the hawser, which was wound on the cylinder as fast as the slow ropes were wound off it. When all the ropes had been drawn equally tight, and the whole party of men had been ranged along the top in an erect posture, with their faces all turned one way, a signal was given by one of the principal natives. At this moment the men, one and all, still grasping their respective slow ropes firmly in their hands, and without bending a joint in their whole bodies, fell simultaneously on their backs, flat on the water! The effect of this sudden movement was to turn the cylinder a full quadrant, or one quarter of a revolution. This, of course, brought a considerable strain on the hawser fixed to the anchor. On a second signal being given, every alternate pair of men gradually crept up the spars by means of their slow ropes, till one half of the number stood once more along the top of the cylinder, while the other half of the party still lay flat on the water, and by their weight prevented the cylinder rolling back again.

When the next signal was given, those natives, who had regained their original position on the top of the cylinder, threw themselves down once more, while those who already lay prostrate gathered in the slack of their slow ropes with the utmost eagerness as the cylinder revolved another quarter of a turn. It soon became evident that the anchor had fairly begun to rise off the ground, for the buoy-rope, which at first had been bowsed taught over the stern of our launch, became quite slack. But Sir Samuel would not allow his people in the launch to assist the natives, as he felt anxious to see whether or not they could accomplish single-handed what they had undertaken. Accordingly, the slack of the buoy-rope merely was taken in by the launch's crew.

I forget how many successive efforts were made by the natives before the anchor was lifted; but in the end it certainly was raised completely off the ground by their exertions alone. The natives, however, complained of the difficulty being much greater than they had expected or had ever encountered before, in consequence of the great size of our anchor. In fact, when at length they had wound the hawser on the cylinder so far that it carried the full weight, the whole number of the natives lay stretched on the water in a horizontal position, apparently afraid to move, lest the weight, if not uniformly distributed amongst them, might prove too great, and the anchor drop again to the bottom by the returning revolutions of the cylinder.

When this was explained to Sir Samuel Hood, he ordered the people in the launch to bowse away at the buoy-rope. This proved a most seasonable relief to the poor natives, who, however, declared, that if it were required, they would go on, and bring up the anchor fairly to the water's edge. As the good-natured admiral would not permit this, the huge anchor, cylinder, natives, launch, and all, were drawn into deep water where the ship lay. The master attendant now explained to the natives that they had nothing more to do than to continue lying flat and still on the water, till the people on board the ship, by heaving in the cable, should bring the anchor to the bows, and thus relieve them of their burden. The officer of the launch also was instructed not to slack the buoy-rope till the cable had got the full weight of the anchor, and the natives required no farther help.

Nothing could be more distinctly given than these orders, so that I cannot account for the panic which seized some of the natives when close to the ship. What ever was the cause, its effect was such that many of them let go their slow-ropes, and thus cast a disproportionate share of burden on the others, whose strength, a rather weight, proving unequal to counterpoise the load, the cylinder began to turn back again. This soon brought the whole strain, or nearly the whole, on the stern of the launch, and had not the tackle been smartly let go, it must have been drawn under water and swamped. The terrified natives now lost all self-possession, as the mighty anchor shot rapidly to the bottom. The cylinder of course whirled round with prodigious velocity as the hawser unwound itself, and so suddenly had the catastrophe occurred, that many of the natives, not having presence of mind to let go their slow-ropes, held fast and were of course whirled round and round several times alternately under water beneath the cylinder and on the top of it, not unlike the spokes of a coach-wheel warring the rim.

The admiral was in the greatest alarm, lest some of these poor fellows should get entangled with the rope and be drowned, or be dashed against one another, and beaten to pieces against the cylinder. It was a great relief, therefore, to find that no one was in the least degree hurt, though some of the natives had been noised most soundly, or, as the Jacks said, who grinned at the whole affair, "keel-hauled in proper style."

In a certain sense, then, this experiment may be said to have failed; but enough was done to show the feasibility of the method, which, under the following modifications proposed by our great commander—who was one of the best sailors that ever swam the ocean—I have no doubt might be rendered exceedingly effective on many occasions.

"In the first place," said Sir Samuel, "you must observe, youngsters, that this device of the natives is neither more nor less than a floating windlass, where the buoyant power of the timber serves the purpose of a support to the axis. The men fixed by the slow-ropes to the cylinder represent the handspikes or bars by which the windlass is turned round, and the hawser takes the place of the cable. But," continued he, "there appears to be no reason why the cylinder should be made equally large along its whole length; and were I to repeat this experiment, I would make the middle part, round which the hawser was to be passed, of a single topmast, while I would swell out the ends of my cylinder or raft to three or four feet in diameter. In this way a great increase of power would evidently be gained by those who worked the slow-ropes. In the next place," said the admiral, "it is clear that either the buoy-rope, or another hawser also fastened to the anchor, as a 'preventer,' ought to be carried round the middle part of the cylinder, but in the opposite direction to that of the weighing hawser. The second hawser should be hauled tight at the end of each successive quarter turn gained by the men. If this were done, all tendency in the cylinder to turn one way more than the other would be prevented; for each of the hawsers would bear an equal share of the weight of the anchor, and being wound upon the raft in opposite directions, would of course counteract each other's tendency to slew it round. The whole party of men, instead of only one half of them, might then mount the spars; and thus their united strength could be exerted at each effort, and in perfect security, against the formidable danger of the cylinder whirling back by the anchor gaining the mastery over them, and dropping again to the bottom. But without using their clumsy, though certainly very ingenious, machinery of turning men into handspikes, I think," said he, "we might construct our floating windlass in such a way that a set of small spars, standing-sail booms, for instance, might be inserted at right angles to its length, like the bars of a capstan, and these, if swifted together, could be worked from the boats, without the necessity of any one going into the water."

While speaking of the dexterity of the natives of India, I may mention a feat which interested us very much. A strong party of hands from the ship was sent one day to remove an anchor, weighing seventy-five hundred-weight, from one part of Bombay dock-yard to another, but, from the want of some place to attach their tackle to, they could not readily transport it along the wharf. Various devices were tried in vain by the sailors, whose strength, if it could have been brought to bear, would have proved much more than enough for the task. In process of time, no doubt, they would have fallen upon some method of accomplishing their purpose; but while they were discussing various projects, one of the superintendents said, he thought his party of native coolies or labourers could lift the anchor and carry it to any part of the yard. This proposal was received by our Johnnies with a loud laugh; for the numbers of the natives did not much exceed their own, and the least powerful of the seamen could readily, at least in his own estimation, have demolished half-a-dozen of the strongest of these slender-limbed Hindoos.

To work they went, however, while Jack looked on with great attention. Their first operation was to lay a jib-boom horizontally, and nearly along the shank of the anchor. This being securely lashed to the shank and also to the stock, the whole length of the spar was crossed at right angles by capstan bars, to the ends of which as many handspikes as there was room for were lashed also at right angles. In this way, every cooly of the party could obtain a good hold, and exert his strength to the greatest purpose. I forget how many natives were applied to this service; but in the course of a very few minutes their preparations being completed, the ponderous anchor was lifted a few inches from the ground, to the wonder and admiration of the British seamen, who cheered the black fellows, and patted them on the back as they trotted along the wharf with their load, which appeared to oppress them no more than if it had been the jolly-boat's grapnel!

CHAPTER V.

THE SURF AT MADRAS.

From Ceylon we proceeded after a time to Madras roads, where we soon became well acquainted with all the outs and ins of the celebrated surf of that place. This surf, after all, is not really higher than many which one meets with in other countries; but certainly it is the highest and most troublesome which exists as a permanent obstruction in front of a great commercial city. The restless ingenuity and perseverance of man, however, have gone far to surmount this difficulty; and now the passage to and from the beach at Madras offers hardly any serious interruption to the intercourse. Still, it is by no means an agreeable operation to pass through the surf under any circumstances; and occasionally, during the northeast monsoon, it is attended with some degree of danger. For the first two or three times, I remember thinking it very good sport to cross the surf, and sympathised but little with the anxious expressions of some older hands who accompanied me. The boat, the boatmen, their curious oars, the strange noises they made, and the attendant catamarans to pick up the passengers if the boat upsets, being all new to my eyes, and particularly odd in themselves, so strongly engaged my attention, that I had no leisure to think of the danger till the boat was cast violently on the beach. The very first time I landed, the whole party were pitched out heels over head on the shore. I thought it a mighty odd way of landing; but supposing it to be all regular and proper, I merely muttered with the sailor whom the raree showman blew into the air,—“What the devil will the fellows do next?” and scrambled up the wet sand as best I might.

The nature of this risk, and the methods adopted by the natives to prevent accidents, are easily described. The surf at Madras consists of two distinct lines of breakers on the beach, running parallel to each other and to the shore. These foaming ridges are caused by a succession of waves curling over and breaking upon bars or banks, formed probably by the reflux action of the sea carrying the sand outwards. The surf itself, unquestionably, owes its origin to the long swell of the ocean-swell coming across the Bay of Bengal, a sweep of nearly five hundred miles, from the coasts of Arracan, the Malay peninsula, and the island of Sumatra—itsself a continent. This huge swell is scarcely perceptible far off in the fathomless Indian sea; but when the mighty oscillation—for it is nothing more—reaches the shelving shores of Coromandel, its vibrations are checked by the bottom. The mass of waters, which up to this point had merely sunk and risen, that is, vibrated without any real progressive motion, is then driven forwards to the land, where, from the increasing shallowness, it finds less and less room for its “wild waves’ play,” and finally rises above the general level of the sea in threatening ridges. I know few things more alarming to nautical nerves than the sudden and mysterious “lift of the swell,” which hurries a ship upwards when she has chanced to get too near the shore, and when, in consequence of the deadness of the calm, she can make no way to seaward, but is gradually hove nearer and nearer to the roaring surge.

At last, when the great ocean wave approaches the beach, and the depth of water is much diminished, the velocity of so vast a mass sweeping along the bottom, though greatly accelerated, becomes inadequate to fulfil the conditions of the oscillation; and it has no resource but to curl into a high and toppling wave. So that this moving ridge of waters, after careering forwards with a front high in proportion to the impulse behind, and, for a length of time regulated by the degree of abruptness in the rise of the shore, at last dashes its monstrous head with a noise extremely like thunder along the endless coast.

Often, indeed, when on shore at Madras, have I lain in bed awake, with open windows, for hours together, listening, at the distance of many a league, to the sound of these waves, and almost fancying I could still feel the tremor of the ground, always distinctly perceptible near the beach. When the distance is great, and the actual moment at which the sea breaks ceases to be distinguishable, and when a long range of coast is within hearing, the unceasing roar of the surf in a serene night, heard over the level plains of the Carnatic shore, is wonderfully interesting.

Long afterwards, when within about five miles in a direct line from the Falls of Niagara, I remember thinking the continuous sound of the cataract not unlike that produced by the surf at Madras. What rendered the similarity greater, was the occasional variation in the depth of the note, caused by the fitful nature of the intervening flaws of wind, just as the occasional coincidence in the dash of a number of waves, or their discordance as to the time of their occurrence, or finally, some variation in the strength of the land-breeze, broke the continuity of sound from the shore.

But it must fairly be owned, that there is nothing either picturesque or beautiful—though there may be a touch of the sublime—in the surf when viewed from a boat tossing about in the middle of its deafening clamour, and when the spectator is threatened every instant to be sent sprawling and helpless amongst the expectant sharks which accompany the masallah boats with as much regularity, though for a very different purpose, as the catamarans. These primitive little life-preservers, which are a sort of satellites attending upon the great masallah or passage-boat, consist of two or three small logs of light wood fastened together, and capable of supporting several persons. In general, however, there is but one man upon each, though on many there are two. Although the professed purpose of these rafts is to pick up the passengers of such boats as may be unfortunate enough to get upset in the surf, new comers from Europe are by no means comforted in their alarm on passing through the foam, to be assured that, in the possible event of their boat being capsized, the catamaran men may probably succeed in picking them up before the sharks can find time to nip off their legs! I grievously suspect that it is the cue both of the boatmen and of these wreckers to augment the fears of all Johnny Raws; and possibly the sly rogues occasionally produce slight accidents, in order to enhance the value of their services, and thereby to strengthen their claim to the two or three fanams which they are enchanted to receive from you as a toll.

Any attempt to pass the surf in an ordinary boat is seldom thought of. I remember hearing of a naval officer who crossed in his jolly-boat once in safety, but on a second trial he was swamped, and both he and his crew well-nigh drowned. The masallah boats of the country resemble nothing to be seen elsewhere.

They are distinguished by flat bottoms, perpendicular sides, and abruptly pointed ends, being twelve or fourteen feet long by five or six broad, and four or five feet high. Not a single nail enters into their construction, all the planks being held together by cords or laces, which are applied in the following manner. Along the planks, at a short distance from the edge, are bored a set of holes through which the lacing or cord is to pass. A layer of cotton is then interposed between the planks, and along the seam is laid a flat narrow strip of a fibry and tough kind of wood. The cord is next rove through the holes and passed over the strip, so that when it is pulled tight the planks are not only drawn into as close contact as the interposed cotton will allow of, but the long strip is pressed against the seam so effectually as to exclude the water. The wood of which these boats are constructed is so elastic and tough, that when they take the ground, either by accident or in the regular course of service, the part which touches yields to the pressure without breaking, and bulges inwards almost as readily as if it were made of shoe leather. Under similar circumstances, an ordinary boat, fitted with a keel, timbers, and planks, nailed together, not being pliable, would be shattered to pieces.

At the after or sternmost end, a sort of high poop-deck, passes from side to side, on which the steersman takes his post. He holds in his hand an oar or paddle, which consists of a pole ten or twelve feet long, carrying at its extremity a circular disc of wood about a foot or a foot and a half in diameter. The oars used by the six hands who pull the masallah boat are similar to that held by the steersman, who is always a person of long experience and known skill, as well as courage and coolness—qualities indispensable to the safety of the passage when the surf is high. The rowers sit upon high thwarts, and their oars are held, by grumets or rings made of rope, to pins inserted in the gunwale, so that they can be let go and resumed at pleasure, without risk of being lost. The passengers, wretched victims! seat themselves on a cross bench, about a foot lower than the seats of the rowers, and close in front of the raised poop or steersman's deck, which is nearly on a level with the gunwale.

The whole process of landing, from the moment of leaving the ship till you feel yourself safe on the crown of the beach, is as disagreeable as can be; and I can only say for myself, that every time I crossed the surf it rose in my respect. At the eighth or tenth transit I began really to feel uncomfortable; at the twentieth, I felt considerable apprehension of being well ducked; and at about the thirtieth time of crossing, I almost fancied there was but little chance of escaping a watery grave, with sharks for sextons, and the wild surf for a dirge! The truth is, that at each successive time of passing this formidable barrier of surf, we become better and better acquainted with the dangers and the possibilities of accident—somewhat on the principle, I suppose, that a veteran soldier is said to be by means so indifferent as a raw recruit is to the whizzing of a shot about his ears.

However this may be, as all persons intending to go ashore at Madras must pass through the surf, they step with what courage they can muster into their boat alongside the ship, anchored in the roads a couple of miles off, in consequence of the water being too shallow for large vessels. The boat then shoves off, and rows to the “back of the surf,” where it is usual to let go a grapnel, or to lie on the oars till the masallah boat comes out. The back of the surf is that part of the roadstead lying immediately beyond the place where the first indication is given of the tendency in the swell to rise into a wave; and no boat not expressly fitted for the purpose ever goes nearer to the shore, but lies off till the “bar-boat” makes her way through the surf, and lays herself alongside the ship's boat. A scrambling kind of boarding operation now takes place, to the last degree inconvenient to ladies and other shore-going persons not accustomed to climbing. As the gunwale of the masallah boat rises three or four feet above the water, the step is a long and troublesome one to make, even by those who are not encumbered with petticoats—those sad impediments to locomotion—devised by the men, as I heard a Chinaman remark, expressly to check the rambling propensities of the softer sex, always too prone, he alleged, to yield to wandering impulses!

Be this, also, as it is ordained, I know to my cost, in the shape of many a broken shin, that even gentlemen bred afloat may contrive to slip in removing from one boat to the other, especially if the breeze be fresh, and there be what mariners call a "bubble of a sea"—a term redolent in most imaginations with squeamishness and instability of stomach and footing. In a little while, however, all the party are tumbled, or hoisted into the masallah boat, where they seat themselves on the cross bench, marvelously like so many culprits on a hurdle on their way to execution! Ahead of them roars and boils a furious ridge of terrific breakers, while close at their ears behind, stamps and bawls, or rather yells, the steersman, who takes this method of communicating his wishes to his fellow-boatmen, not in the calm language of an officer intrusted with the lives of so many harmless and helpless individuals, but in the most extravagant variety of screams that ever startled the timorous ear of ignorance. In truth, no length of experience can ever reconcile any man, woman, or child, to these most alarming noises, which, if they do not really augment the danger, certainly aggravate the alarm, and add grievously to their feeling of insecurity on the part of the devoted passengers.

I need scarcely say, that the steersman is the absolute master for the time being, as every skipper ought to be, whether he wear a coat and epaulettes, or be limited in his vestments, as these poor masallah boatmen are, to the very minimum allowance of inexpressibles. This not absolutely naked steersman, then, as I have before mentioned, stands on his poop, or quarter-deck, just behind the miserable passengers, whose heads reach not quite so high as his knees. His oar rests in a crutch on the top of the stern-post, and not only serves as a rudder, but gives him the power to slew or twist the boat round with considerable rapidity, when aided by the efforts of the rowers. It is necessary for the steersman to wait for a favourable moment to enter the surf, otherwise the chances are that the boat will be upset, in the manner I shall describe presently. People are frequently kept waiting in this way for ten or twenty minutes, at the back of the surf, before a proper opportunity presents itself.

During all this while the experienced eye of the veteran skipper abaft glances backwards and forwards from the open sea, to the surf which is breaking close to him. From time to time he utters a half word to his crew, with that kind of faint interrogative tone in which a commanding officer indulges when he is sure of acquiescence on the part of those under him, and is careless whether they answer or not. In general, however, he remains quite silent during this first stage of the passage, as do also the rowers, who either rest the paddles horizontally, or allow their circular blades to float on the surface of the water. Meanwhile the boat rolls from side to side, or is heaved smartly upwards as the swell, just on the eve of breaking, lifts her into the air, and then drops her again into the hollow with the most sea-sickening velocity. I should state, that during this wofully unpleasant interval, the masallah boat is placed sideways to the line of surf, parallel to the shore, and, of course, exactly in the trough of the sea.

I have often watched with the closest attention to discover what were the technical indications by which these experienced boatmen inferred that the true moment was arrived when it was safe to enter the surf, but I could never make out enough to be of much professional utility. It was clear, indeed, that the proper instant for making the grand push occurred when one of the highest waves was about to break—for the greater the dash, the greater the lull after it. But how these fellows managed to discover, before-hand, that the wave, upon the back of which they chose to ride in, was of that exact description, I could never discover. On the approach of a swell which he knows will answer his purpose, the steersman, suddenly changing his quiet and almost contemplative air for a look of intense anxiety, grasps his oar with double firmness, and exerting his utmost strength of muscle, forces the boat's stern round, so that her head may point to the shore. At the same time he urges his crew to exert themselves, partly by violent stampings with his feet, partly by loud and vehement exhortations, and partly by a succession of horrid yells, in which the sounds Yarry! Yarry!! Yarry!!! predominate—indicating to the ears of a stranger the very reverse of self-confidence, and filling the soul of a nervous passenger with infinite alarm.

These fearful noises are loudly re-echoed, in notes of the most ominous import, by all the other men, who strain themselves so vigorously at the oars, that the boat, flying forwards, almost keeps way with the wave, on the back of which it is the object of the steersman to keep her. As she is swept impetuously towards the bar, a person seated in the boat can distinctly feel the sea under him gradually rising into a sheer wave, and lifting the boat up—and up—and up, in a manner exceedingly startling. At length the ridge, near the summit of which the boat is placed, begins to curl, and its edge just breaks into a line of white fringe along the upper edge of the perpendicular face presented to the shore, towards which it is advancing, with vast rapidity. The grand object of the boatmen now appears to consist in maintaining their position not on the very crown of the wave, but a little further to seaward, down the slope, so as to ride upon its shoulders, as it were. The importance of this precaution becomes apparent, when the curling surge, no longer able to maintain its elevation, is dashed furiously forwards, and dispersed into an immense sheet of foam, broken by innumerable eddies and whirlpools into a confused sea of irregular waves rushing tumultuously together, and casting the spray high into the air by impinging one against the other. This furious turmoil often whirls the masallah boat round and round, in spite of the despairing outcries of the steersman, and the redoubled exertions of his screaming crew, half of whom back their oars, while the other half tug away in vain endeavours to keep her head in the right direction.

I have endeavoured to describe the correct and safe method of riding over the surf on the outer bar upon the back of a wave, a feat in all conscience sufficiently ticklish; but wo betide the poor masallah boat which shall be a little too far in advance of her proper place, so that, when the wave curls over and breaks, she may be pitched head foremost over the brink of the watery precipice, and strike her nose on the sand-bank. Even then, if there happen, by good luck, to be depth of water over the bar sufficient to float her, she may still escape; but should the sand be left bare, or nearly so, as happens sometimes, the boat is almost sure to strike, if, instead of keeping on the back or shoulder of the wave, she incautiously precedes it. In that unhappy case, she is instantly tumbled forwards, heels over head, while the crew and passengers are sent sprawling amongst the foam.

Between the sharks and the catamaran men a race then takes place—the one to save, the other to destroy—the very Brahmas and Shivas of the surf! It is right, however, to mention, that these accidents are so very rare, that during all the time I was in India I never witnessed one.

There is still a second surf to pass, which breaks on the inner bar, about forty or fifty yards nearer to the shore. I forget, however, exactly the method by which this is encountered. All I recollect is, that the boatmen try to cross it, and to approach so near the beach, that, when the next wave breaks, they shall be so far a-head of it that it may not dash into the boat and swamp her, and yet not so far out as to prevent their profiting by its impulse to drive them up the steep face of sand forming the long-wished for shore. The rapidity with which the masallah boat is at last cast on the beach is sometimes quite fearful, and the moment she thumps on the ground, as the wave recedes, most startling. I have frequently seen persons pitched completely off their seats, and more than once I have myself been fairly turned over, and with all the party, like a parcel of fish cast out of a basket! In general no such untoward events take place, and the boat at length rests on the sand, with her stern to the sea. But as yet she is by no means far enough up the beach to enable the passengers to get out with comfort or safety. Before the next wave breaks, the bow and sides of the boat have been seized by numbers of the natives on the shore, who greatly assist the impulse when the wave comes, both by keeping her in a straight course, and likewise by preventing her upsetting. These last stages of the process are sometimes very disagreeable, for every time the surf reaches the boat, it raises her up and lets her fall again, plump on the ground, with a violent jerk.

When at last she is high enough to remain beyond the wash of the surf, you either jump out, or more frequently descend by means of a ladder, as you would get off the top of a stage-coach; and turning about, you look with astonishment at what you have gone through, and thank heaven you are safe!

The return passage from the shore to a ship, in a masallah boat, is more tedious, but less dangerous than the process of landing. This difference will easily be understood, when it is recollected that in one case the boat is carried impetuously forward by the waves, and that all power of retarding her progress on the part of the boatmen ceases after a particular moment. In going from the shore, however, the boat is kept continually under management, and the talents and experience of the steersman regulate the affair throughout. He watches, just inside the surf, till a smooth moment occurs, generally after a high sea has broken, and then he endeavours, by great exertions, to avail himself of the moment of comparative tranquillity which follows, to force his way across the bar before another sea comes. If he detects, as he is supposed to have it always in his power to do, that another sea is on the rise, which will, in all probability, curl up and break over him before he can row over its crest and slide down its back, his duty is, to order his men to back their oars with their utmost speed and strength. This retrograde movement withdraws her from the blow, or, at all events, allows the wave to strike her with diminished violence at the safest point, and in water of sufficient depth to prevent the boat taking the ground injuriously, to the risk of her being turned turturvy. I have, in fact, often been in these masallah boats when they have struck violently on the bar, and have seen their flat and elastic bottoms bulge inwards in the most alarming manner, but I never saw any of the planks break or the seams open so as to admit the water.

It is very interesting to watch the progress of these honest catamaran-fellows, who live almost entirely in the surf, and who, independently of their chief purpose of attending the masallah boats, are much employed as messengers to the ships in the roads, even in the worst weather. Strange as it may seem, they continue, in all seasons, to carry letters off quite dry, though in getting across the surf, they may be overwhelmed by the waves a dozen times. I know of nothing to be compared to their industry and perseverance, except the pertinacity with which an ant carries a grain of corn up a wall, though tumbled down again and again.

I remember one day being sent with a note for the commanding officer of the flag-ship, which Sir Samuel Hood was very desirous should be sent on board; but as the weather was too tempestuous to allow even a masallah boat to pass the surf, I was obliged to give it to a catamaran-man. The poor fellow drew off his head a small skull-cap made apparently of some kind of skin, or cloth, or bladder, and having deposited his despatches therein, proceeded to execute his task.

We really thought, at first, that our messenger must have been drowned even in crossing the inner bar, for we well nigh lost sight of him in the hissing yeast of waves in which he and his catamaran appeared only at intervals, tossing about like a cork in a pot of boiling water. But by far the most difficult part of his task remained after he had reached the comparatively smooth space between the two lines of surf, where we could observe him paddling to and fro as if in search of an opening in the moving wall of water raging between him and the roadstead. In fact, he was watching for a favourable moment, when, after the dash of some high wave, he might hope to make good his transit in safety.

After allowing a great many seas to break before he attempted to cross the outer bar, he at length seized the proper moment, and turning his little bark to seaward, paddled out as fast as he could. Just as the gallant fellow, however, reached the shallowest part of the bar, and we fancied him safely across, a huge wave, which had risen with unusual quickness, elevated its foaming crest right before him, curling upwards many feet higher than his shoulders. In a moment he cast away his paddle, and leaping on his feet, he stood erect on his catamaran, watching with a bold front the advancing bank of water. He kept his position, quite undaunted, till the steep face of the breaker came within a couple of yards of him, and then leaping head foremost, he pierced the wave in a horizontal direction with the agility and confidence of a dolphin. We had scarcely lost sight of his feet, as he shot through the heart of the wave, when such a dash took place as must have crushed him to pieces had he been by his catamaran, which was whisked, instantly afterwards, by a kind of somersault, completely out of the water by its rebounding off the sand bank. On casting our eyes beyond the surf, we felt much relieved by seeing our shipwrecked friend merrily dancing on the waves at the back of the surf, leaping more than breast-high above the surface, and looking in all directions, first for his paddle, and then for his catamaran. Having recovered his oar, he next swam, as he best could, through the broken surf, to his raft, mounted it like a hero, and once more addressed himself to his task.

By this time, as the current always runs fast along the shore, he had drifted several hundred yards to the northward farther from his point. At the second attempt to penetrate the surf, he seemed to have made a small miscalculation, for the sea broke so very nearly over him, before he had time to quit his catamaran and dive into still water, that we thought he must certainly have been drowned. Not a whit, however, did he appear to have suffered, for we soon saw him again swimming to his rude vessel. Many times in succession was he thus washed off and sent whirling towards the beach, and as often obliged to dive head foremost through the waves. But at last, after very nearly an hour of incessant struggling, and the loss of more than a mile of distance, he succeeded, for the first time, in reaching the back of the surf, without having parted company either with his paddle or with his catamaran. After this it became all plain sailing; he soon paddled off to the Roads, and placed the admiral's letter in the first lieutenant's hands as dry as if it had been borne in a despatch-box across the court-yard of the admiralty, in the careful custody of my worthy friend Mr. Nudland.

I remember, one day, when on board the Minden, receiving a note from the shore by a catamaran lad, whom I told to wait for an answer. Upon this he asked for a rope, with which, as soon as it was given him, he made his little vessel fast, and lay down to sleep in the full blaze of a July sun. One of his arms and one of his feet hung in the water, though a dozen sharks had been seen cruising round the ship. A tacit contract, indeed, appears to exist between the sharks and these people, for I never saw, nor can I remember ever having heard of any injury done by one to the other. By the time my answer was written, the sun had dried up the spray on the poor fellow's body, leaving such a coating of salt, that he looked as if he had been dusted with flour. A few fanams—a small copper coin—were all his charge, and three or four broken biscuits in addition, sent him away the happiest of mortals.

It has sometimes occurred to me, that professional men, both in the army and in the navy, ought to study all the tactics of these masallah boats, and to make themselves acquainted with the principle of their construction. Of what infinite importance to the army, for instance, might not fifty or a hundred of these boats have proved, when our troops were landed, through the surf, at the mouth of the Adour in 1814?

It is matter of considerable surprise to every one who has seen how well the chain pier at Brighton stands the worst weather, that no similar work has been devised at Madras. The water is shallow, the surf does not extend very far from the beach, and there seems really no reason why a chain pier should not be erected, which might answer not only for the accommodation of passengers, but for the transit of goods to and from the shore.

Before quitting this subject, I think it may be useful to mention, that by far the best representation of this celebrated surf which I have ever seen, is given in the noble Panorama of Madras, painted by Mr. W. Daniell, and exhibited last year. I rejoice to learn that this highly characteristic work will again be open to the public, in a more accessible situation than that in which it formerly stood.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SUNNYASSES.

If by means of any contrivance, a man were to visit the moon, and afterwards, on returning to the earth, to set about giving us an account of his trip, the chances are, if he adhered to strict truth, that his narrative would prove a mighty dull one. A similar fate, and probably for the same reason, but too often attends those books about India which have nothing but bald and naked matter of fact to recommend them. It is not that in the East there are no objects of eminent curiosity in themselves, and well worthy of observation and record; but, unfortunately, they are generally not such as we in England can sympathise with. From wanting this link in the chain, the topic is deprived of that familiarity which alone can render distant descriptions either amusing or instructive; for we all know, that the nearer we approach to our own firesides, the more vivid the interest of any narrative becomes.

We read, for example, with the utmost avidity, the account of a riot in Piccadilly, in which a policeman of the C division is killed, while we skip carelessly over the adjacent paragraph in the same newspaper giving the details of a battle in Syria between the pacha of Egypt and the grand seignor, in which five thousand men on each side have left their bones to whiten in the wilderness. The solitary death of the poor constable affects us not only from its proximity, but from all its localities being familiar to us. We can readily imagine ourselves on the identical spot, and can even fancy the angle of the brick-bat which did the mischief coming in contact with our own scone. Those prime ministers to our curiosity, the reporters, have merely to touch in a light, or a shade, or a tint of exaggeration here and there, and the picture of all that passed stands as palpably before our mind's eye, as if Teniers, or Ostade, or, better still, our own inimitable Wilkie, had drawn the whole affray from the life.

In short, it matters not much whether recorded incidents be great or small—their interest in our eyes will ever be measured either by their actual geographical distance, or by that moral approximation in the sentiment belonging to them which at once brings home to our feelings the workings of the most remote relations between man and man. Nothing, indeed, can so effectually awaken our attention, or keep it permanently alive, as that which engages our familiar sympathies.

Of these truths we have a striking example in the case of Bishop Heber, who, evidently without study, but merely by giving the reins to his own exquisite taste, fancy, and learning, describes to us Indian scenery and manners, in a way of which we possess no other example. He wastes none of our thoughts by claiming attention to dry descriptions of fact, but trusting unconsciously, to that artless simplicity both of thought and expression, and to that entire singleness of purpose which distinguished this most benevolent of men, he touches those chords only which are in unison with our most habitual and domestic feelings. It will be recollected that the unceasing object of this accomplished writer's labours was to fulfil the solemn injunctions of his Divine Master, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." And as Bishop Heber probably considered that he possessed far higher opportunities for the accomplishment of this glorious end than perhaps any other man has enjoyed since the days of the apostles, so we at home feel our brightest hopes kindle under the inspiration of such an example. Without much exaggeration, we may be said to follow his footsteps with almost as much confidence in his truth as we should do those of an angel sent to administer peace on earth and good will towards men. Every thing which he touches partakes of the brilliant colouring of his own glowing but well-regulated imagination; and, what is still more important and useful, every thing he says is modified into practical application by the business-like sagacity of his most ordinary reflections upon what he describes. At the same time, the heartiest and most devout zeal may be traced in every line he writes; and as there never occurs any thing wild or over-enthusiastic, we go along with him cheerfully and unreservedly, and travel in his company not only without fatigue, but with perpetual and varying delight in the companionship. Thus, step by step, we are taught to take a new and unexpected interest in things from which heretofore we have often turned with indifference or distaste.

It certainly is very fortunate that we possess Bishop Heber's journal, fresh and entire as it was written on the spot; for had the press been corrected by himself, though we might have obtained something very good, we should hardly have been allowed to peruse the unpremeditated expression of those sentiments and opinions which appear to have crowded to the surface in the unbounded fullness of his topic. Many of these must have been irretrievably chilled by the sober touch of subsequent reflection.

I remember, even on the spot itself, at Madras, being frequently made sensible how exceedingly small the interest of some of the most extraordinary of the native customs appeared, in comparison to that of the commonplace usages in the Bungaloes of my own countrymen. A game at brag; a very moderate flirtation; even a sober cup of tea with an old friend; an evening drive along the Mount road, or a glance at the stars from Mr. Goldingham's observatory, generally proved an overmatch for the most curious ceremonies of the Hindoo population. With the whole Black Town at command as a field of local enquiry, I never entered it but twice. The first time I was obliged to sound a hasty retreat, in consequence of the crowd, heat, and the most villanous compound of smells that ever offended nostril. On the second occasion, I merely passed through it hastily, and not at all in quest of adventures, but in order to take tiffin or luncheon with a friend, who resided to the northward of the town.

After riding for some distance, I half repented of my purpose, for it was raging hot, and the first airs of the young sea breeze had scarcely begun to fan the surface of the water along a narrow strip of the sea parallel to the beach. Only those native boats, called pattyamars, and one or two other small coasters, whose shallow draught of water enabled them to approach the shore, could avail themselves of these fitful swirls, which swept from time to time towards the land, and then died away again, for a full hour before the regular sea breeze blew in from the offing. As yet, however, not a leaf of any tree was put in motion, and not a bird could be seen; all nature, indeed, seemed to have fallen asleep—not a sound was to be heard except the ceaseless dash of the restless surf.

I rode slowly along, well-nigh suffocated for want of air, scarcely shaded from the direct rays of the sun by my old friends, the cocoa-nuts, and tormented by the dazzling reflection from the coral sand, almost as white as snow, which seemed to burn the horse's feet. So entire was the solitude, that I had not the least expectation of meeting a single soul, native or European; and I might reasonably enough have recorded the fact, that at such a season not only every kind of work was discontinued in India, but even their religious ceremonies were intermitted.

Just as I had made this reflection in the generalising spirit which is so very tempting, my ear caught the sight of a set of tom-toms, or native drums, sounding at a distance in the wood; and after advancing a few hundred yards farther, I came to an opening facing the sea, in which were assembled at least a thousand natives. In the centre of the area stood a pole or mast, some thirty or forty feet high, bearing across its top a long yard of beam, slung nearly in the middle, and stretching both ways to the distance of forty or fifty feet. One end of the yard was held down by several men, so low as nearly to touch the ground, while the other rose proportionably high into the air. Near the upper extremity of this yard, underneath a canopy gaudily ornamented with flowers and loose festoons of drapery, I was astonished to observe a human being suspended, as it seemed, by two slender chords. He was not hanging perpendicularly, like a criminal, by the neck, but floated, as it were, horizontally in the air, as a bird flies, with his arms and legs moving freely about. Round his waste there was slung a bag, or basket, filled with fruits and flowers, which he scattered from time to time amongst the delighted crowd beneath, who rent the forest with shouts of admiration.

On approaching nearer to the ring, I discovered, with no small astonishment and horror, that the native who was swinging about the air, though apparently enjoying his elevation, was actually bung upon hooks passing through his flesh! There was nothing, however, in his appearance or manner indicating pain, though he must have been in no small suffering, I should suppose; for no rope or strap passed round him to take off the weight, and the only means of suspension consisted in two bright hooks, inserted in his back. At first I felt unwilling to advance, but the natives, who appeared to be enchanted with the ceremony, begged me to come on.

The man, who was sailing about in the air at the time of my arrival, having been lowered down and unhooked, another fanatic was summoned. He was not dragged along reluctantly and with fear, but advanced briskly and cheerfully from the pagoda, in front of which he had prostrated himself flat on his face. A native priest then came forward, and with the tip of his finger marked out the spot where the hooks were to be inserted. Another officiating priest now began to thump the victim's back with his hand, and to pinch it violently, while a third dexterously inserted the hooks under the skin and cellular membrane, just below the shoulder-blade. As soon as this was effected, the devotee leaped gaily on his feet, and, as he rose, a basin of water, which had previously been dedicated to Shiva, was dashed in his face. He was then marched in procession from the pagoda towards a little platform on one side of the area in which the mast and yard were placed. Numerous drums and shrill-sounding pipes, mixed with the sound of many voices, gave token of his approach.

On mounting the platform, he tore away a number of chaplets and coronals of flowers by which he had been ornamented, scattering the fragments amongst the eager crowd. His dress, if such it can be called, besides the usual langooti or slight band round the waist, consisted of nothing but a very short jacket, covering the shoulders and half of the arm, and a pair of drawers, reaching nearly to the knee, both being made of an open net-work, the meshes of which were an inch wide.

As the natives, so far from objecting to my being present, encouraged me to come forward, I mounted the scaffold, and stood close by to make sure there was no deception practised. The hooks, which were formed of highly polished steel, might be about the size of a small shark-hook, but without any barb; the thickness being rather less than a man's little finger. The points of the hooks being extremely sharp, they were inserted without lacerating the parts, and so adroitly, that not a drop of blood flowed from the orifices; in fact, the native, who appeared to suffer no pain, conversed easily with those about him. I may add, as the contrary has often been reported, that there was not, on this occasion at least, the slightest appearance of intoxication. To each hook was attached a strong cotton line, which, after certain ceremonies, was tied to the extremity of the yard-arm, drawn to the scaffold by ropes. As soon as the lines had been made fast, the opposite end of the yard was again gradually pulled down by men on the other side of the ring, and thus the Sunnyass was raised fifty or sixty feet over the heads of the admiring multitude, who all shouted as he ascended.

To show his perfect self-possession, he took from the pouch tied round his waist handfuls of flowers, and, occasionally, a single lime, which, with a merry countenance and a cheerful voice, he jerked amidst the crowd. Nothing could exceed the eagerness of the natives to catch these holy relics; and, in order to give all of them an equal chance, the men stationed at the lower end of the yard walked with it round the ring, so as to bring the swinger successively over the different parts of the circle. To enable them to make this circuit, the centre of the yard was made to traverse on a double pivot, which allowed it not only to be lowered down at the ends, but to be carried round horizontally. In this way the suspended fanatic, who really appeared to enjoy it as a sport, was wheeled round three times, each circuit occupying about two minutes; after which he was lowered down to the platform, and the lines being cast off, he walked back to the pagoda, accompanied, as before, by the tom-toms and squeaking pipes. The hooks were then removed from his back, and he joined the crowd who accompanied the next man from the pagoda to the platform—exactly as if he had not himself been exposed only the minute before to a trial which, let people say what they like of it, must have been very severe.

I remained near the spot for about an hour, during which four other men were hooked up in the same manner, and swung round, not one of them exhibiting the slightest symptom of uneasiness. During the whole time, I never detected any thing even like impatience, except once, when one of the men in the air appeared to fancy that the persons who were walking along with the lower end of the yard moved too slowly. He called out to them to quicken their pace, but with nothing angry in his tone, or any tremour in his voice, indicating suffering.

About four years after this time I had another opportunity of witnessing, near Calcutta, a number of these swingings, and a great variety of other tortures, to which these Sunnyasses exposed themselves, either in honour of their gods, or in pursuance of some idle vow.

The effect of such exhibitions as that just described, at Madras, when witnessed for the first time by a stranger from Europe, is that of unmixed wonder, and of curiosity highly gratified; but when he sees the same things repeated on an extensive scale, together with many hundreds of other examples of voluntary bodily exposure to sword, scourge, and even to fire, the degree of melancholy which it inspires in the traveller is very great. If it were possible to suppose that many thousands of persons of all ages could be subjected, by the agency of tyrannical force, to these severe sufferings, such a scene would be inconceivably horrible; but when the people themselves not only invite these tortures, but press eagerly forward to claim the honour of being first cut to pieces, or pierced with irons, or burned with hot spikes, or swung round in the air by hooks, or, in the extremity of their zeal, leap from scaffolds upon the points of naked swords—the sentiment of indignation is changed into commiseration. For it is impossible not to feel grieved upon seeing a population so deplorably degraded; and surely there must mingle with this feeling a strong desire to ameliorate the condition of people sunk so low in the scale of human nature.

These reflections naturally give rise to the two important questions—What harm do these exhibitions really produce? And in what manner are they to be checked? For we must recollect, that it is not always by official mandates that the habits of a nation can be suddenly changed; and even the East India Company, though exercising infinitely greater authority, both military and moral, over those countries than ever Zengis Khan or Tamerlane possessed, cannot effectively interfere to change, on the instant, the manners and customs of their Hindoo subjects. They may upset one dynasty and reconstruct another—they may crush armies of hundreds of thousands of disciplined men, and even climb the Himalah mountains to dispossess other conquerors of lands which have been won by the sword of brave men. What is of far more importance, and far more difficult of execution—they may extend, and indeed have already extended the empire of law and justice far and wide over their vast possessions, and have given peace, security of person and property, and a wonderful degree of contentment, to the millions upon millions of their subjects. But with all this weight of influence, arising not merely from the possession of faithful armies and abundant wealth, but from the still higher source of authority—opinion, they dare not rashly interfere to stop many of those mischievous and superstitious proceedings of the natives, until all, or nearly all, the parties concerned are agreed in condemning them.

It becomes therefore the business of a statesman in India to watch his opportunity, and if he has reason to believe that the time has arrived when, with safety to the well-being of the state, he can interpose the high arm of authority to check abuses, he ought to act promptly and vigorously. The practice of Hindoo infanticide—thanks to the energy and sagacity of the late Colonel Walker—has been long abolished in India. In this way, also, the extensive local experience of the present governor-general, Lord William Bentinck, showed him that in suppressing the abominable practice of Suttees, or widow murder and suicide combined, he should carry with him the sympathies of the intelligent Hindoos themselves, and in no respect weaken our own political authority. He, therefore, boldly issued a regulation (dated 4th December, 1829,) positively forbidding the practice—and declaring its abettors to be murderers. Thus, by a single stroke of the pen, at the right moment, one of the most shocking and deteriorating of all the Hindoo usages was totally and effectually abolished.

If future authorities shall act with equal discretion, and only take care to time their interference with equal skill, there can be no doubt that very great ameliorations may be safely effected among the natives of India. If, for example, the improvements in the judicial and revenue systems, already alluded to, be carried forward very gradually, and in that right spirit which seeks only to apply practical remedies to admitted evils, we may hope to see, even in our own day, no small moral change for the better in the vast population of our splendid Eastern empire.

CHAPTER VII.

PALANKEEN TRAVELLING—IRRIGATING TANKS IN THE MYSORE COUNTRY.

It was my rare good fortune, while actually serving in my proper calling as a naval officer in India, and without the loss of a single day's time, to make two land journeys across the peninsula of Hindustan, and thus to see the interior of the country, which is seldom visited by sailors.

"Fair friends make fair winds," says the sea proverb, and so it proved in my case; for my kind patron Sir Samuel Hood, who, in true Nelson style, was always endeavouring to discover what would be most agreeable and useful to those under him, bethought him of a method of serving me professionally, at the same time putting it in my power to make one of the most delightful trips possible.

About the middle of the year 1813, his majesty's ship Cornwallia, a seventy-four gun ship, built of teak-wood from the coast of Malabar, was launched at Bombay, on the western side of India. The captain who was appointed to this new ship then commanded the Theban, at that time lying in Madras Roads, on the eastern side of the peninsula. But as this frigate required repairs which could be given her only at Bombay, she was ordered round to that port. Fortunately for me, the officer appointed to command the Theban happened at this juncture to be cruising in another ship far away to the eastward, amongst the Moluccas or the Philippine Islands; and Sir Samuel Hood offered me the temporary appointment as acting commander until her proper captain should join.

"You will have to go to Bombay," he said, "to reft the frigate and to bring her back to this side of India; but you may go either by sea, in the ship herself, or you may run over by land across the continent, only taking care that you reach Bombay in good time to relieve the officer in command of the Theban, that he may be free to go on board the Cornwallia."

I, of course, gladly availed myself of the alternative which enabled me to visit so interesting a part of India as the Mysore country, the scene of Hyder Ali's and Tip. poo Sultan's wars, and so well known in Europe by the splendid catastrophe of Seringapatam.

The preparations for the journey were very soon made, and I hurried away from Madras as fast as I could, being stimulated into extraordinary despatch, not only by the wish to make the most of my opportunities, but by a latent apprehension that there must be some mistake in this piece of good fortune. I felt, indeed, as if it were all a dream, and could scarcely persuade myself that I was really and truly on the eve of making a journey through the interior of India, and that in a week or ten days, I might actually be sleeping in the palace of Tip. poo, or scrambling over the breach where that formidable enemy of the British name was found slain under a vast pile of his devoted adherents.

I knew little or nothing of the mode of travelling in the East, and my stock of the language was as yet but small, albeit I had studied sedulously to acquire some knowledge of Hindustance, which, although not the colloquial dialect of all parts of the country I was to pass through, I was told might be used for the purposes of travelling in every village. The cutwal, or head man, one of whose offices it is to assist travellers, can always speak this language, which, as I have been told, is a jargon, or lingua franca, consisting of Arabic, Persian, Sanscrit, a little sprinkling of Portuguese, and a still smaller dash of English, with here and there a stray word of Malay origin. Unfortunately all languages are nearly equally difficult to me; and certainly, had I not travelled in the country, I should never have advanced beyond the elementary sentences, "Give me a glass of water;" "Bring the palankeen;" "Go faster;" and so on, together with a moderate stock of those truncated little oaths which every one seems so soon to acquire, and without effort. But on a journey made quite alone, even the least apt mouth for languages is forced to model itself to the current speech of the high road. Hunger, thirst, and fatigue, are famous teachers of foreign dialects, and in all journeys there must occur many accidents which not only try the temper, but put the traveller on his mettle to explain his wants, or to extricate him from scrapes; and the emphatic lessons thus drilled into him, fix themselves on his memory, let it be ever so slippery.

The utility of languages to a naval officer is so great, not merely as a source of utility and enjoyment to himself, but of occasional advantage to the public service, that I would fain see it established as an admiralty regulation, that no midshipman should be allowed to pass for lieutenant who, besides French, could not read and speak moderately well either Spanish, Italian, or Hindustance, the four great dialects with which naval men are likely to be much concerned. Such a regulation would cause a famous hilla-balloo amongst the rising generation of officers, and many a deep curse would be launched at the suggester of such a measure; but, on long, both these execrators and the public service would feel the advantages of the rule.

My first thought was to cast about for letters of introduction; but an experienced Indian traveller told me not to mind such things, that they were scarcely ever required, and that my uniform alone would be an ample introduction.

"Take a passport with you," said my friend, "in case of accidents, and your blue coat, merely to show who and what you are, but nothing more; you will find a welcome, and a hearty one too, at every station, civil and military, over the whole country. You cannot possibly go wrong," he added; "and if at any time you should be at a loss, you have only to apply to the nearest English station for assistance, and straightway all the resources of the spot will be at your command."

With this comfortable assurance I set off; but I confess I felt queerish the first night, when jogging along all alone on the high road, in a country totally unknown to me, and of whose language I knew so very little. After tumbling and tossing about, greatly to the annoyance of the bearers, for about an hour, I fell asleep, but only to dream of tigers and robbers, till at length the pal-keen was suddenly and violently jerked on one side, and then thrown on the ground. I awoke, of course, in great alarm, and on thrusting out my head, I saw a snake twisting about amongst the feet of the foremost bearers, who had dashed down their load, and were leaping to the right and left into the jungle. As my sword lay on one side of the palankeen, I lost no time in drawing it forth, and before the catiff could effect his escape, cut him in twain, to the great admiration of the bearers, who dropped back again, one by one, to the road. It is singular enough that this was the only snake, so far as I recollect, which I ever saw in a wild state in India, though I must have travelled many thousands of miles in that country.

Palankeen travelling may be compared in some respects to sea voyaging; inasmuch as the traveller carries his house, furniture, kitchen, and wardrobe with him. He is not dependent, indeed, on the wind for his progress; but he is almost as much influenced in his comforts by the weather as if he were at sea; while the bearers, though docile enough to a certain extent, can no more be put out of their own particular way than the monsoons or trade winds. They must be allowed to travel at certain hours and at a certain rate, and they claim the privilege of making as much noise as they please during their progress, greatly to the discomposure of new-comers, but, it is said, greatly to their own relief. Every resident possesses a palankeen as a matter of course, just as we in Europe own a hat or an umbrella. A gig or a saddle-horse might seem better comparisons; but in England, alas! many people sport neither gig nor horse;—in India, no person moves without his palankeen. Those who can afford to do things in style, or who choose to be stylish whether they can afford it or not, keep a dozen bearers; but moderate men, except on a journey, content themselves with half a dozen.

The palankeen, which is generally kept in the verandah of the house, is taken up by the bearers in the morning, who brush it out, wash it if necessary, place it near the door in some shady spot, and, if their master be not ready to start immediately after breakfast, they stretch themselves on the ground, in the shade, and either go to sleep, or continue chatting to one another in a low rumbling under-tone, in which the words are scarcely articulated. On the appearance of their master, they instantly bestir themselves without bidding—for it is one of the delights of Indian service, that the attendants seem to possess an intuitive faculty of discovering what is wanted; and it very rarely happens that they require to be spoken to or lectured. In truth, no one, until he has visited India, can form any just notion of the immense comfort of being waited on by those truly angelic fellows, the white-robed serving men of the East, or estimate the positive addition it makes to the sum of human happiness to be exempted from the wear and tear of looking after the habits, and studying the temper and humours of European domestics.

The palankeen-bearers, who form, I believe, a caste or class by themselves, are a faithful and diligent race of men; and as it is their invariable custom to be honest, a traveller may leave any thing loose in the palankeen with perfect safety. I have heard that it is not quite safe or fair to leave the brandy bottle too much exposed, as, poor human nature, under whatever colour of the skin it may be hid, is said never to be proof against the seductions of that wonderful tippie. For my part I do not believe I ever tasted it till I came to travel in India, and then I was as much taken in as the savage king, so cleverly described by Captain Cook, who mistook a bottle of this new-found beverage for an avatar of one of his gods. A worthy friend of mine at Madras, just as I was starting, thrust his head into my palankeen, and cried out,

"Why, man, you have got no brandy! You cannot possibly get on without some support, as we call it."

And running back to the house, he unlocked his private store, and deposited with me a small square nicely cut crystal bottle of cogniac, so delicious, that, he declared, it would bring a dead man alive again.

I forgot all about this supply till some days afterwards, during a sultry, choky afternoon in the jungle, when there was hardly a breath of wind aloft of sufficient force to stir even the tremulous leaf of the bamboo-tree; while down below, where the ground was parched up and riven into a net-work of crevices by the heat, the still air had reached that suffocating pitch which makes one feel close to death's door. The bearers had stopped at a sparkling well, or rather a natural fountain, from which a small stream of cool water gurgled and splashed over the rocks, and spread its refreshing influence for many yards on either side. Being burnt up with thirst, I leaped out, and in the next minute would have plunged my face into the basin formed by the falling drops, and drank down the water to my own destruction, had not one of the bearers gently interposed himself, and recommended me to put some brandy with the cold spring. I had no objection to this modification; but as I longed for a deep potation, I put only a couple of thimblefuls into a tumbler, and then filling it to the brim with water, swallowed the whole at one delectable gulp. The sensation produced by this experiment was so agreeable and new, that I could not well resist the temptation of repeating it; and although the veteran bearer who dipped the water for me a second time, smiled as he filled the glass, I did not comprehend the meaning of his expression of countenance till some time afterwards. I also told him to fill one of the goglets, and to carry it in his hand, that it might enjoy the benefit of the breeze caused by our rapid advance. By and by I felt an irresistible desire to take another drop of the very weakest brandy and water; and as it proved three times more delicious than the first, but left behind it a treble degree of thirst, I tried it again. I now became impatient, and called to the bearers to go faster.

"Go faster still!" I said, rather sharply. Upon this they moved on so quickly that I was nearly jerked out. I then desired them to stop; an order more easily obeyed than the first. I took advantage of the pause to mix one more glass of what seemed very weak grog.

"Go faster!" I roared out—"go faster!" as I emptied the glass. But their utmost speed seemed to me a snail's pace; and after a few more exclamations, reproaches, and threats, I leaped out of the palankeen, and rushing forward to enforce my orders, fell flat on my face in the dust! The terrified bearers dropped the palankeen on the road, and scampering into the forest, left me all alone to crawl back to my nest as I best could.

I know not how long I slept, but on waking I perceived that the bearers had again lifted the palankeen, and, having come to the termination of their night's journey, were just setting me down by the side of a tank, twenty or five-and-twenty miles from the spot where I had frightened them away the evening before.

The sun's rays were beginning to flicker through the lowest brushwood, dripping with dew; and the air felt so cool and elastic, that I begged to have a bath, to clear my noodle. I undressed myself accordingly; and while I sat on the steps in front of the pagoda, allowed the bearers to pour in succession a dozen large jars of water over my head. After this, as soon as I was dressed, I called the men together, distributed the remainder of the brandy amongst them, and in spite of my friend's assurance at starting, found I got on a great deal better ever afterwards.

When a journey of more than thirty or forty miles is to be made in India, it is usual to acquaint the palankeen-boys with this intention, that they may make the fitting preparations, in the shape of torches and oil, besides rice and curry stuff, and sundry other matters for themselves. Their cook, also, who makes the thirteenth man amongst them if it be a full set, sees his pots and pans in order for the march. A person—I think one of the bearers—is also got in readiness with a bamboo across his shoulder, to each end of which he attaches a light travelling trunk, made generally of basket-work covered with green wax-cloth. The night season, for obvious reasons, is generally chosen for travelling in India, both by bearers and travellers. The heat of the day interferes both with the length and speed of the journey; and although the person inside of the palankeen is shaded from the direct rays of the sun, he is sure to be well-nigh suffocated with the heat, or choked with the dust thrown up by the bearers' feet. At night, even in the hottest season, there is generally some dew to lay the dust, and the air is of course cooler.

People generally start after an early dinner; and as the night falls, the torch is lighted and held by one of the bearers, who runs along with it by the side of the palankeen. The torch, at first, may be about four feet long, and nearly as thick as a man's arm; it is made of rags and strips of cotton, well saturated with oil and grease, and then wound into a firm cylinder. The flame is supplied with oil from a tin vessel carried in the torch-bearer's other hand. Unfortunately for the traveller, it happens to be more convenient for the men that the torch should be held on the windward side of the palankeen than on the lee side, and consequently the smoke of ten blows right in upon him. During the early part of my journey, I endeavoured, by the wonted artillery of commands, scolds, entreaties, and bribes, to reform this matter, but all without effect. "Bap ke dostoor," was the only answer I got—"It is father's custom." The truth is, that if the torch be carried by a man to leeward, his shadow interferes with its light if he holds it in one hand, and the flame burns him if he holds it in the other. I often made the musallee change sides; but I could hear him chattering and growling sadly until he fancied me asleep, and then round he went again to windward. At length I discovered that it was much the best way to submit with what patience I possessed—which was not much—for I never found my stock of this virtue improved by attempting, in wretched Hindustanee, to explain to persons who did not wish to understand, the propriety of doing that which they believed improper, and felt to be exceedingly inconvenient. In some parts of the country, these torches are made of long slips of well-dried bamboo, occasionally of faggots bound up; and at other places they consist of long thick reeds. I could seldom prevail upon the bearers to use a lantern, unless when their stock of faggots had been burned out. The light, they said, was not sufficient for the safe guidance of their feet.

The palankeen is about six feet long by two and a half wide, and serves at night-time for a bed, in the day-time for a parlour. In the front part of the interior is fitted a broad shelf, underneath which a drawer pulls out, and over the shelf a net is stretched, such as we see in travelling carriages. In the after-part, as a sailor would call it, there is generally fixed a shelf for books, a net for fruit or any loose articles, and hooks for hats, caps, towels, and other things. There are two doors, or sliding partitions in each side, fitted with Venetian blinds in the upper pannel; and in each end of the palankeen are placed two little windows. Many travellers choose to have a lamp fixed in one corner, with a glass face turned inwards, but trimmed from without, either for reading or for sleeping by—for your Indian must always have a light to see how to shut his eyes, as Pat said. The bottom, or seat, is made of strips of rattan, like that of a chair, over which is laid a light elastic mattress, made either of horse-hair, or, which is still better, I believe, of the small shavings used in dressing the bamboo and rattan.

Across the palankeen, at the distance of a foot and a half from the end, is hung a flat square cushion, buttoned tightly from side to side, for the traveller's back to rest against; while his feet are prevented from slipping forwards by a cross-bar, similar in principle to the stretchers in a boat, against which the rowers plant their feet. This bar, which slides up and down in slits cut at the sides of the palankeen, is capable of being shifted nearer to or further from the end, according to the length of the voyager's legs, or to his choice of position. In the space behind the cushion or rest for the back, are stowed away, in the day-time, the sheets, blankets, pillow, and other night-things; and in the net above, two or three changes of clothes, in case of any accident separating the traveller from his heavy baggage. In the drawers may be kept shaving articles, and such nick-knacks as a compass, thermometer, sketch-book. On the shelf behind, a few books—among which, of course, will be found a road-book and a Hindustanee vocabulary—joistling with a tea-pot and sugar-canister. Under the mattress, an infinity of small things may be hid, provided they be flattish. In each corner of this moving house are placed little round sockets for bottles and glasses. Many other odds and ends of comforts and conveniences suggest themselves as the journey advances, or may be found cut and dry in expensive palankeens, I speak merely of what mine possessed, and it was a very ordinary affair—cheap and strong, and not too heavy. Along the top, on the outside, is laid a wax-cloth cover, which, when not in use, is rolled up; but in rainy weather, or when the night air becomes chill, this cloth is let so loose as to envelope the whole palankeen.

At each end there is fixed a single strong smooth bar, which rests on the bearers' shoulders. This pole, which is somewhat thicker than a man's arm, is possessed of none of the elasticity which gives such an unpleasant motion to a sedan chair, being secured tightly to the corners of the palankeen by iron rods. To one of these poles there is generally suspended a beautifully shaped rattan basket, holding a goglet or water-pitcher, which is still further defended from injury by an open tracery of split rattans, resembling not a little the work in relief on the buttresses and pinnacles of Henry VII.'s chapel in Westminster Abbey. This goglet is hung in front, that the dew which exudes from its pores may be evaporated by the current of air it encounters as the bearers move on; and thus, even in the hottest weather, a cool draught of water may always be obtained. Under the pole behind are hung a tea-kettle, coffee-pot, and a curious but useful kind of wash-hand basin, imported from China, of a cylindrical shape, made of wood highly varnished.

Some people add a brace of pistols to the equipment of their palankeen; but I preferred, if it came to the push, rather to be robbed in peace, than to fight a pitched battle with desperadoes about a trumpery watch, or a handful of pagodas. At the very best, one could only hope to repel the boarders, and perhaps put one or two of them to death; in return for which, a broken pate, or a slice with a grass-cutter's knife, would remain as lasting evidences of the traveller's prowess in the jungle. As for tigers, I was assured that in ninety-nine cases in a hundred, they are quite as glad to make off from man as man is glad to get off from them; and in truth their instinct must be but small, or their hunger inordinately great, if they have not learned by this time, that Mr. Homo is much more than a match for Mr. Brute, with all his claws and teeth. Of this fact I saw ample proofs in the course of my journey, as I shall have occasion presently to relate in describing a great native festival near Seringapatam, where animals really wild, and not such tame creatures as are to be seen in our misnamed "wild beast" shows, were exhibited and baited for our edification, within twenty-four hours after being caught in the forest.

If the journey to be made in the palankeen be a short one, say thirty or forty miles, it may be run over in the night, with only one stop, during which the bearers light a fire and dress their supper. Including this delay, I have made, between eight in the evening and half-past six in the morning, a journey of full forty miles—that is, from Madras to the Seven Pagodas, or Mahabalipooram, the city of the great god Bali. On ordinary occasions, for short distances between house and house, when you are going out to dinner, only a couple of men run under each pole, and at such times the palankeen is carried at the rate of four or five miles an hour. But on journeys, there are generally three men to each pole, which employs six men out of the twelve, while the others run by their side, ready to relieve their companions at intervals. During the whole time they are in progress, they make a noise which is not easy to describe. Sometimes it consists of a long, deep, but slightly varied groan, in which the whole party join in correct time. Mostly, however, the men in front use one kind of groan or grunt, which is answered by another from those behind. These sounds often approach to a scream, and frequently include words of warning against stones in the way, or pools of water; but these are articulated so indistinctly, that it is difficult to catch them. I remember one exclamation frequently used, "Kurab high!" Occasionally, when it is wished to make a great exertion, the leader of the song suddenly calls out some such word as "Shabash!" to which every one answers, and away they spring at double speed, while the tone of the music, so to call it, is changed from a dull sort of grumbling bass, to an angry and sharp intonation, mixed with something almost insulting or reproachful in its tone.

A stranger, or griffin, as he is called, on first getting into a palankeen at Madras, is naturally much alarmed, and often rather distressed, at these hideous sounds, as he naturally fancies the men must be suffering dreadfully under their load. There have even been instances of Johnny Newcomes so prodigiously sensitive, or spoony, as actually to get out and walk in the sun, to the particular amusement of the bearers, who, it is alleged, make their yells doubly horrible when they fancy they have caught a griffin. I do confess, that at first, it feels a little queer to be carried along on men's shoulders; but this is a great waste of sympathy, inasmuch as every man so carrying you is not only a servant at will, but a very well-paid, contented servant, and one of a caste whose greatest anxiety and pleasure is to be so employed—who makes money by it, and saves it, and buys land, and becomes, in time, a gentleman in his way. I never remember to have heard the brawny Highlanders, who carry people about in chairs in Edinburgh, Bath, and elsewhere, accused of any extra servility, because they lifted the box containing their employer, instead of driving the horses which dragged the carriage holding the same personages. In short, all these matters turn on usage, and the deuce is in it if the parties most concerned are not the best judges of what, upon the whole, is most to their mind. But the fashion now-a-days is to cram compassion down contented people's throats, and, in the true spirit of the philosophers of Laputa, or the needy knife-grinder's friend in the Antijacobin, to make happy men miserable, in order that they may be reconverted to happiness by some patent general principle—an invaluable process, always best known, it would appear, to those who are personally ignorant of all the practical details of the subject!

This song, or cry, or groan, or whatever it be, of the palankeen-bearers of India, is different in different parts of the country; while, at some places, as at Bombay, they use none at all, but move along quite quietly. There seems to be as much art in carrying a palankeen, as in driving a carriage, or riding a horse. Some bearers shake you to pieces, while others glide along so gently, that you are scarcely conscious of any motion. In every part of the country which I have visited, except Cananore and Mangalore, on the coast of Malabar, the palankeen is carried in a straight-forward direction, that is, parallel to the road, or so that the hind-bearers follow exactly the footsteps of those in front. But at the places alluded to on the western coast, they carry it nearly across the road, so that the hind-bearers are but little astern of the others, the poles making an angle with the direct line of about seventy-five degrees. This crab-kind of fashion of moving sideways, which resembles that of the abominable Omnibuses of Europe, is any thing but agreeable. I well remember the first time I encountered it feeling quite sick, and a little giddy. It was in the evening, about sunset, and I had shut to the doors to take a nap, when, after a little time, I thought there was something very odd in the motion, and I sat up to consider what it could be. On opening one of the doors, and looking out, I beheld all the objects passing by me at such a strange obliquity of angle, that I began to suspect I must have been again taking to the brandy bottle!

When a long journey is to be made, you must decide upon one of two ways, and either travel through with one set of bearers, which is the slowest method; or you must make arrangements for having relays of fresh men laid for you at different stations on the road. If one set go all the way, and be good of their kind, they will undertake to carry a moderate-sized traveller about twenty-five miles a-day for a continuance, which is surely great going. Travelling by dawk, as it is called, or when the bearers are laid, is the most expeditious way of proceeding, but, of course, much the most expensive. Before starting, you must write letters to the different collectors of the various districts through which you mean to pass, stating the time you mean to set out, and the route you are to follow. It seems to signify little whether or not you are personally acquainted with these gentlemen, for it is the universal fashion in India to be obliging and hospitable. The bearers written for will therefore always be found waiting for you at their assigned stations. It sometimes answers equally well, and saves time and trouble, to send on as many sets of bearers as may be required to make the journey. Thus, when I left Madras on my second journey overland, I sent forward one set to the Mount, eight miles distant; another to Sri Paramatara, twenty miles further; a third to Baul Chitty's Choultry, twenty-four miles further, which was about twenty short of Arcot, my first halting-place. I have already mentioned, that each set of bearers consists of thirteen men, when a journey is to be made. The ordinary price of this description of labour, when I was in India, and I don't suppose it has changed materially since, was three fanams (or about six pence and a farthing) to each bearer for every ten English miles, or six shillings and nine pence for the whole thirteen, which is about eight pence per mile. An additional sum is paid for those sets which are sent on past the first stage, and of course something extra is paid to them daily when they are kept waiting.

Fanams, rupees, and pagodas, form the money current at Madras. There are twelve fanams in a rupee, and forty-five in a pagoda. The word rupee (or rupiya) means silver, and is applied to that metal generally. What we term fanam, I remembering being told was called "fullum" by the natives; this, as etymologies go, is but a small shift. But where the word pagoda came from, I believe is not known; the coin so called by us is named "hoon," or "hoong," by the natives; but the temples which we style pagodas, are called by them "dewul." In China, the sacred edifices also receive at our hands the name of pagoda, though, in the European slang of the spot, they are called Joss-houses—evidently from the Portuguese Dios. The word gentoo, like that of pagoda, is also, I believe, entirely of European origin; but though much used by Orme and other writers on India, I do not think it is any where a current word in that country, even amongst the English. I have indeed heard the name of Gentooes applied to the athletic race of palankeen-bearers who belong to a district north of Madras. They are naturally drawn to the presidency, which is the most wealthy spot in the country, just as the gallogos of the northwest of Spain are drawn to Lisbon, and other large cities of the European peninsula; or like the hardy race of Pats and Donalds of our own country, to the rich foci of London and Edinburgh.

When travelling dawk or post, the same set of men will rattle you along for about twenty miles, without stopping, in five or six hours at most; and then, if all things have been well ordered, the palankeen will be transferred to the new set without its being allowed to touch the ground. You pay your bearers at the end of the stage—and it is amusing enough to trace a characteristic resemblance between these Asiatics and an animal apparently so dissimilar to them; I mean an English postboy, or a French postilion. If you pay them their exact customary due, they make you a profound salaam, and are perfectly contented; but if you give them a single fanam over and above their allowance, they instantly smoke you to be a griffin or an ignoramus, or both, and therefore fair game for plucking. So they either begin to beg for more money, or petition for a sheep for supper—their choicest feast—for they are not of the Banyan race, who eat no animal food. They also exhibit such wretched looks of supplication, and make so many signals of starvation, that your purse opens even if your heart does not, and at last you yield to their machiavellian opportunity. Here, however, the comparison with the post-boy ceases; for if you give him an expressly coin shilling, or a mug of ale to warm him, he drinks your honour's health, and looks pleased. But I never was contrived, by any stretch of over-payment, to extort or bribe a smile out of the palankeen-bearers of India. On the contrary, the more you give, the more discontented they look; alternately eyeing the cash and the road travelled over, and then, after glancing sulkily at one another, in the most provoking style possible, they slowly turn about and march off.

There is a current Joe Miller story in the East, of a gentleman who laid and lost a bet, that he would not easily satisfy but astonish his bearers, whom he had taken only ten miles. In order to make sure as he supposed, he gave them, besides their pay, a whole pagoda as a gratuity, being more than double their hire. They stood stock still, however—turned the pieces of money over in their hands, as if it had been a base coin;—and at length, with that dissatisfied tone and manner with which people so often shipwreck their prospects, by substituting the word claim for the word favour, they whistled out, "Perhaps master will give us a sheep?"

I have mentioned that the travelling is generally at night; and, I believe it is so stipulated, when you are making with only one set of bearers, that they shall be allowed the entire choice of the hours of motion and rest. When the bearers are posted on the road there is no necessity for this limitation; and the secret of agreeable travelling appears to lie chiefly in contriving to reach some military or civil station about the hour of breakfast, tiffin, or dinner. I have mentioned before, that I carried no letters of introduction [with me, but trusted entirely to the habitual hospitality of the authorities scattered over the country, nor was I ever disappointed. I remember, one morning at sunrise, coming in sight of Nundydroog, perhaps the most remarkable of those huge round-backed hill forts for which India is celebrated. It looks like a considerable mountain; for though only twelve hundred feet high, it rises so abruptly from the plain, that it appears double its real altitude. The morning air was cold and clear, and all things about us lay glistening with dew, which had settled on every leaf and every blade of grass, during one of those serene and starlight evenings, of which the month of October boasts, I think, more than any other in the whole year. This applies to almost all parts of the northern hemisphere which I have visited, from the Missouri to the Yellow Sea.

Between the fort of Nundydroog and the rising ground on which we stopped to view the prospect, there extended a valley some six or eight miles across, the whole bottom of which was marked with a succession of artificial tanks, used for irrigating myriads of rice-fields lying below the level of these huge ponds. But as the best specimens of the picturesque and beautiful, or useful, always stand but a poor chance against the claims of a sharp-set appetite, I urged my fellows to jog on merrily, in hopes of reaching the military station in time for the commandant's breakfast; and, instead of admiring the landscape, I kept feasting my imagination all the way with visions of curries and hot rolls, and almost fancied I could smell at a league's distance the aromatic perfumes of the delicious hookah.

"How shall I attack the commandant?" said I to myself; "for I have no letter to him, neither know I my friend's name, nor even his rank."

As we entered the suburbs we fell in with a sepry, of whom I asked whereabouts the commanding officer's house lay? "That is Captain Dowglas's house," he said, pointing to a bungalow near us. So in my bearers trotted without more ado, smorting and groaning with a double dose of yells, as if they had an inkling of my being an unbidden guest, and wished to give timely warning that a stranger was approaching. The owner of the mansion came forward in his white jacket to receive me.

"Sir," said I, to the commandant, "I am an officer of Sir Samuel Hood's ship, travelling towards Mysore, and I have done myself the honour of waiting upon you with my passport."

"Have you breakfasted?" was the characteristic reply, as he unfolded the paper and glanced slightly over it to learn my name. On my saying that I had not, he called out, "Boy! let us have breakfast instantly; put the palankeen into the verandah: we have a good deal to show you here, and there are some pleasant people, whom I shall be glad to introduce to you."

My host, I found, had been seventeen years in India; and it was pleasant to be able to give him, in return for his hospitality, a budget of news from Antrim and Belfast. By and by several of his brother officers, and some of his friends in the civil service, came dropping in, all as anxious to be useful to the stranger in his researches, as if they had known him for years. I thus soon felt myself completely at home. A young officer accompanied me next day to the rock; and as I had previously been "reading up," or cramming myself with the histories of Orme, Wilks, and Dirom, I surprised my friend by the minuteness of my knowledge of all the technicalities and the military events. What interested me, however, fully as much as the traces of Lord Cornwallis's siege and successful storming of the fort of Nundydroog in 1792, was the view from the top of the rock, and particularly the sight of a vast number of those extraordinary tanks, or artificial ponds, for irrigating the rice-fields for which that part of the peninsula is so remarkable.

The table-land of Mysore, which stands several thousand feet above the level of the sea, is not strictly a flat plain, as the name would seem to imply; neither is it mountainous, or even very hilly; and yet the surface is extremely uneven, being moulded into gently sloping ridges, which form between them a succession of long valleys slightly inclined, broad and shallow, and winding about in all directions. Across almost every one of these valleys the natives have thrown embankments, some of them of very ancient date, though some are even so recent as the dynasty of Hyder. These walls, or bunds, as they are called, are made of considerable strength, and when of small extent, they generally curve upwards, so as to offer their convex side to the pressure of the water; but if they be a mile or several miles in length, the embankments assume a waving, snake-like shape, in what particular view I know not, but I suppose from some idea of strength. One valley was pointed out to me, which might be about a mile broad, and forty miles long from end to end: this included between thirty and forty tanks, some large and some small, every square yard of the intermediate space between the bunds being richly cultivated, while the surrounding country appeared to be condemned to nearly perennial sterility; indeed, I believe that almost the whole rice crop of Mysore is derived from artificial irrigation.

This vast supply of water is gained partly by the method of tanks just described, and partly by tapping the Cauvery and other rivers by means of subaqueous dams, called annacuts, built, during the dry season, diagonally across the bed of the stream. The effect of these dams is to direct a portion of the river into lateral trenches stretching far and wide over the country. From these it is again drawn off to water the rice-fields. I remember hearing a traveller describe the manner in which the great river Indus is tapped, or drawn off in this manner to the right and left, for the purposes of agriculture, till the unhappy river is sometimes fairly exhausted, and its channel left dry! One is so much accustomed to consider the mighty mass of waters forming a river of any magnitude as something beyond the power of man to control, that it requires good evidence to satisfy our incredulity on this point. But if the Indus, in the districts alluded to, resemble the Mississippi and many other streams flowing over extensive alluvial countries, there need be no difficulty in conceiving such a transfer of the whole of its waters from the ordinary bed of the stream to the fields on either side; because rivers which traverse deltas almost invariably flow along the summits of ridges somewhat higher than the adjacent country. These ridges, it is true, are so wide and flat, that their elevation at most places can scarcely be detected by the eye; but still the inclination of their sides is abundantly sufficient to admit of water draining away from, instead of flowing towards the river.

The Cauvery, after traversing the Mysore country, and forming, by one of its fantastic loops, the celebrated island of Seringapatam, is precipitated, over the edge of the table-land, into the Carnatic, in a series of magnificent falls, which I visited in the course of my journey. It then flows along quietly to the sea, past Trichinopoly and Tanjore, and joins the sea near Tanquebar. During the fierce struggles between the French and English in the south of India, the embankments of the river Cauvery were frequently cut, and the whole country, in consequence, laid under water. To explain this, it must be mentioned that, as rivers which run along deltas, or along ground nearly level, are liable to flow over their banks during the rainy season, it becomes necessary, in order to prevent the country being inundated, to raise walls or embankments to confine the stream. These (which are called, in Louisiana, levees, in India, bunds), being raised a little higher than the surface of the river at its highest, confine the stream within proper limits. But as the floods of each successive year bring down a prodigious mass of gravel and sand—the wear and tear of the mountains, fields, and forests, through which the tributary streams have passed—a certain portion of the largest and heaviest of these materials must subside, and remain at the bottom when the river reaches the low grounds, where its rate of motion is much diminished. This addition, though it be small in any one year, gradually raises the bed of the river. If this rise were not carefully met by a correspondent annual elevation of the artificial embankment, it is obvious that the water, in the course of time, would periodically flow over and submerge the country. The consequence of these alternate struggles between the waters trying to escape and man insisting upon confining them, has been to lift the whole body of the Cauvery, in its passage across the Carnatic, several feet above the highest level of the surrounding country. The power of deluging the adjacent district was therefore a very obvious though a dreadful weapon in the hands of which ever party held possession of the banks during those formidable wars in which the French and English contended for the sovereignty of Hindustan. In the long period of peaceful and secure repose which those regions have enjoyed since the contest has been terminated by the unquestioned supremacy of one party, the supply of water, so curiously raised into the air, has been appropriated exclusively to the irrigation of the country.

In the upper lands of Mysore, the peasants are dependent chiefly on their tanks for moisture, as the rains are uncertain in quantity, and transient in their effects. The stock of water collected in these numberless and extensive tanks or ponds, many of which well deserve the name of lakes, is capable of being distributed in the precise quantity and at the precise times required. I have often been amused at observing with what scrupulous care the persons appointed to distribute the water let it off from these magnificent reservoirs. The thirsty soil of Mysore, parched and riven by the heat, drinks up the fluid with a grateful kind of relish, a sort of animated enjoyment, at which I was never tired of looking.

In describing things which lie so much out of the ordinary course of observation, one becomes sensible of the poverty of language. Thus the word "tank" suggests to most people the idea of a common cistern attached to a dwelling-house, and filled with rain-water from pipes along the roof. The word "pond," again, recalls images of muddy water, dragged post-horses, rank weeds, and a combined fleet of ducks and geese engaged in common warfare against frogs and worms. To call the tanks of Mysore by the name of lakes would be nearer the mark, for many of them well deserve that appellation. The Moota Talou, for example, or Rich Tank, near Seringapatam, I understand is nearly thirty miles in circumference. I never saw that particular sheet of water: but many of the artificial lakes which I did examine measured six, eight, and ten miles round; and so vast are their numbers, that I remember counting considerably more than a hundred at one view from the top of Nundydroog, nor do I believe that the least of these could have been less than two or three miles in circuit.

Dr Buchanan, in his journey through those countries, made by order of Lord Wellesley in 1800, shortly after the capture of Seringapatam, describes minutely the formation of these tanks, or erays, as they are called in the Tamul language. The Saymbrumbacum tank, not far from Madras, he says, is eight miles in length by three in width, and its contents are sufficient to supply with water the lands of thirty-two villages for eighteen months' supposing the usual rains to fail.

I have mentioned the manner in which a traveller in India may get a breakfast or dinner, bed, board, lodging, and troops of friends, when he happens to be near any military or civil station of the East India Company. But it will sometimes fall out that he cannot exactly nick the hour of breakfast or dinner, and then he must trust to his own wits and those of his bearers. Such, however, is the style of doing things in that fertile and populous country, that he must be a sorry traveller indeed who need ever experience any real difficulty on this score. I remember enjoying many of these campaigning kind of meals almost as much as I did the premeditated luxuries of the Residences and other head stations of the interior—those true palaces of enjoyment, wherein we find all that plenty, good taste, a fine climate, and hospitality grown into a habit, can produce.

After a night's run, in a part of the country remote from an English station, and just as the day is beginning to dawn, the weary bearers look out for some village on the road. Instead of entering it, they make for the little grove or tope which marks the position of the pagoda and tank always to be found near a native village. The palankeen is then set down under the most shady tree which is to be found near these cherished nooks. The traveller, if not awake before, is of course roused by the grating sound of the palankeen on the ground. He steps out in his slippers and sleeping trowsers, and speedily plunging into the clear pool, proceeds, after a good swim, to make his toilet, with his shaving apparatus, glass, and basin, ranged on the top of his moveable house.

While he is thus engaged, one of the bearers on the opposite side of the palankeen takes out the blankets, sheets, and pillows, to give them a good shaking, and after the interior has been well swept out, to arrange all things for day travelling, by stowing away the night furniture, hanging up the back cushion, and placing the foot-rest across. A couple of the men are likewise despatched to the village for milk and eggs; and if, by good fortune, there be a running stream near, they may bring a newly-caught fish. By the time these foragers have returned, a fire has been kindled, the little kettle set a boiling, and the tea made. The eggs are then put on, the fish split and grilled on the embers, and the milk heated. Countless slices of toast are now prepared in rapid succession; and the nipping morning air having quickened the hungry edge of the traveller's appetite, he casts himself on the corner of his cloak, spread out for a tablecloth, and feasts away right joyously.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DUSSEERA FESTIVAL AT MYSORE.

I think I have already mentioned, that little or no intercourse of a domestic nature takes place between the natives of India and the Europeans resident among them. The habits, in fact, of the two races of men are so dissimilar in all respects, that it is scarcely possible to conceive much agreeable or useful association. Some missionaries, indeed, by adopting the dress and language of the people, and by conforming to all their customs, have succeeded in domesticating themselves with the Hindoos; but the great points they aimed at were little, if at all, accomplished by such unwonted degradation—for it is a degradation—and, what is more to the purpose, has always been so considered by the natives. Curiosity may be gratified by such an experiment, but nothing more. The taste, even of a very coarse-minded European, must revolt at usages so foreign to his ideas of delicacy; and the influence which he might readily acquire, by other means more consistent with his own station, must vanish under this sort of condescension. The Abbé du Bois, and others, furnish us with enough, and more than enough, of the details of the private life of this singular people; and I can safely refer the curious in such matters to the Rev. W. Ward's book on the history, literature, mythology, manners, and customs of the Hindoos.

The usages of savage life in the cold regions of the world—for example, of the Esquimaux or the Cherokees—are essentially revolting in every shape, whether in reality or in description. Pretty nearly the same thing may be said of the domestic manners of the Asiatics, which are only less disagreeable to us, I suspect, from their being unaccompanied by the misery and filth which belong peculiarly to cold climates. The Hindoo, who is eternally bathing his person, cleaning his house, and scouring his brass kettles, casts over his shoulders his light and graceful wrapper, as white as snow; while your western savage would consider it a disgrace to wash his hands. The Equimaux, after gorging himself with the raw flesh of a seal, draws the monster's skin round him, and goes to sleep in the mud. In this case, as there occurs nothing but what is disgusting, we dismiss the subject as speedily as we can, without a wish to see or hear more of it. In truth, though these savages be human in form and speech, they seem so close to the brute creation, that any sympathy with them is out of the question.

It is so far different with the Orientals, whose civilization, in some respects, is considerable. Our wonder, indeed, is often excited by the most anomalous mixture of pure barbarisms with refinements of a high order. The institution of castes, and the rigorous ceremonial discipline which it imposes, appear fatal to any improvement in manners, by rigidly defining the course of every action. The utter extravagance, also, and measureless absurdity of their superstitions, which pervade every thought, word, and deed of their lives, seem effectually to place a bar against amelioration in that quarter. What time and change of political circumstances may bring about, it is difficult, if not impossible, to say.

The public festivals, and other out-of-door habits of the Hindoos, however, do certainly include some points of transient interest. But they are so entirely without taste or fancy, that the attention of a European becomes fatigued, as soon as his mere curiosity is satisfied. I remember experiencing this process in the interior of the South of India, on two different occasions, between which an interval of more than a year elapsed. My head-quarters, in both cases, was the British resident's house, or residency, at Mysore, a town about ten miles from Seringapatam. The country of Mysore, after we had conquered it from Tippoo, was restored by us, as I have already mentioned, to the original native dynasty of the Hindoos. As a measure of precaution, however, we retained the island of Seringapatam, in the river Cauvery, garrisoned it, and kept the British flag flying on the forts. It was stipulated, also, that a subsidiary force, consisting of several thousand men, partly European and partly native, but all officered by English, and under the command of a general officer, should be maintained by the company in the heart of the country. The object of this subsidiary force (so called from a subsidy being paid by the native power to maintain it), was to prevent invasions from abroad, and also to render it unnecessary for the Hindoo government to keep an army in the field. The civil administration, however, of the country, the collection of the revenue, the execution of the laws, the appointment to office—in short, every detail of government, was left in the hands of the native rulers. In order to secure compliance with the various stipulations of the treaty—re-establishing the Hindoo dynasty on the throne of Mysore, a British resident was appointed to live at or near the court, to watch what was going on; and, in case of need, to interfere by remonstrance, or, in extreme cases, by force.

This was certainly not independence, nor was it intended to be so. It was essential to our political existence in India, that we should retain a preponderating influence in Mysore, and other countries similarly circumstanced; but the same course of measures which secured our authority, afforded peace, security, and, it was hoped, contentment to the great mass of the nation. That some of the chiefs should sigh for more uncontrolled authority, according to the despotic customs of the East, is not to be wondered at, nor ought it to be disregarded; on the contrary, it requires the greatest delicacy of treatment, on our part, to keep them in tolerable good humour. Sir John Malcolm well remarks on this subject, that "while we are supported by the good opinion of the lower and middling classes, to whom our government is indulgent, our power has received the rudest shocks, from an impression that our system of rule is at variance with the permanence of rank, authority, and distinction in any native of India. This belief," he adds, "which is not without foundation, is general to every class, and its action leaves but a feverish existence to all who enjoy station and high name. The feeling which their condition excites, exposes those who have left to them any portion of power and independence, to the arts of the discontented, the turbulent, and the ambitious. This is a danger to our power which must increase in the ratio of its extent, unless we counteract its operation by a commensurate improvement of our administration."—Central India, Appendix, No. xviii. p. 434.

As the British resident, of course, wished to keep on the best terms, personally, with the native ruler near whose court he was stationed, he introduced, on all occasions of ceremony, such private friends as might chance to be living with him; and the Rajah, on his part, was no less careful to mark, by his reception of such guests, the high consideration in which he held the officer appointed to watch him. Both parties might, at heart, be hating one another like cat and dog; but none of this came to the surface, for your Asiatic, like a Spaniard, knows well how to be courteous under almost every trial of temper.

I had the good fortune to arrive at Mysore during the Dussera feast, a celebrated Hindoo festival in honour of Shiva, and known to the natives by the name of "Nuwwee Ratree," or nine nights—though the word Dussera means "tenth." I lost the first four days, but I saw more than enough in the last five to satisfy me. The Rajah's palace, in the fort of Mysore, lay at the distance of half a mile from the British residency, from which the resident and his suite set out generally about four o'clock in the afternoon. It was not considered etiquette to move till we had been summoned by a message from the Rajah, stating that he was ready to receive us. As soon as the order to march was given, off we scampered to the door; and while some of us flung ourselves into the palankeens, others mounted their horses, and the whole moved along as fast as the crowd would permit. The bearers set off at a full run, shouting and screaming as usual, and preceded by about fifty men carrying spears in their hands fourteen feet long. At the head of the procession, a fellow, blessed with powerful lungs, sounded a long slightly curved sort of trumpet, called a colley horn, to announce the resident's approach. The blast sent forth by this wild instrument rung far over the plain with a note such as I never heard before, rising towards its close into a pitch of shrillness which pierced the head from ear to ear. As we rushed along towards the gate of the fort, the palankeens, to the number of a dozen or twenty, frequently came into smart collision with one another. As the road contracted, there remained only room for three abreast; but as all seemed equally anxious to get in first, the mêlée became trying enough for those who possessed weak nerves. Besides our own party and immediate attendants, there pranced along the resident's body-guard of troops, and many hundreds of native horsemen—all struggling for admission, and casting up clouds of dust as high as the topmost pinnacle of the adjacent pagoda—every man shouting, screaming, and jostling, apparently trying who should make most noise, and occasion most disorder.

Within the gate a little more room was found; and the apprehension of being upset and trodden under foot diminished for a time; but the row and risk proved even worse as we entered the quadrangular court of the palace, in the centre of which the ring for wild beast bathing was fixed. On the outside of the ropes such a dense mass of the multitude were jammed, that the poor Sepoy guards stationed there to keep a lane clear for us to pass, could with great difficulty obtain an opening barely large enough for two of the party. Into this narrow strait, however, four or five palankeens used to make a determined rush together; and on one occasion, such was the momentum of their charge, that both the protecting lines of soldiers were toppled down exactly in the fashion of the child's play at cards, known by the title of Jack sent for mustard. The palankeens were instantly closed upon by the crowd, like the hosts of Pharaoh when the Red Sea collapsed upon them; but in spite of the chance of being squeezed to death, it was impossible for us not to laugh. I can remember to this minute the shout which a merry countryman of mine set up—o'erlapping all but the skirl, as he called it, of the colley horn.

On reaching the inner-side of the palace square, we rolled out of our palankeens dusted over like millers, at the bottom of the stairs, where the resident was received by the prime minister or dewan, Ram Row by name, and another high officer of state, whose name and station I forget. It appeared to be the practice first to make a salam to these functionaries, and then to shake hands with them—ceremonies, doubtless, typical of the mixed nature of a subsidiary government—half native, half English. As soon as we had all been received, the resident and the dewan—unquestionably the two most important men of the country, and the real managers of all public affairs—moved on, while we followed up stairs according to our rank and consequence, such as it was. At the top, we entered a long gallery, or verandah, open towards the court. A row of pillars in front sustained a low roof, richly gilt, and gaudily painted with flowers; to match which, a brilliant set of cotton carpets had been spread under foot—so gay, indeed, that one felt it almost a shame to tread upon them.

In the middle of the front row sat his highness the Maha Rajah, Kistna Rajee Oudaveer, on a throne of gold, silver, and ivory. This gorgeous seat was shaded by a canopy of similar materials, supported by four polished steel pillars, and festooned round its edge with such strings of such pearls as might have drawn sighs from a dozen grand duchesses. On the top of all sat a bird, composed, as it seemed to our dazzled view, entirely of precious stones, the eyes sparkling to the life, being two diamonds of a brilliancy far surpassing all the rest.

It was more satisfactory than I can well describe, to behold the Rajah thus rigged out in the very garb which youthful imaginations bestow upon all monarchs, but in which, to the mortification of many a youth and many a maid, few monarchs actually exhibit themselves. Except, indeed, in the shop of Messrs. Russell and Bridges, so many jewels are rarely to be seen collected in one space; at least, I never but once beheld such a load of riches on the person of any individual. In the front part of his Hindoo Highness's turban blazed a battery of diamonds, twice as large as the splendid ornament which most of the present generation may remember to have seen on the forehead of that great Raneer, or queen of song, Catalani, valued at ten thousand guineas. From the right side of the Rajah's turban rose a curved pedestal of gold, from the projecting part of which hung down a cluster of enormous pearls, at different strings, forming a bunch larger than one last could grasp. This weight of wealth gave his majesty a slight "list to starboard," but, as one of our party remarked, a man might be content to go with a cravat in his neck for the remainder of his life, in consideration of the honour and glory of such ballast. Our royal host, however, was also pretty well weighted below, for over his neck and shoulders he had cast about a dozen chaplets of precious stones, some of them reaching to his middle, and others clasping his throat. From each ear was suspended a thick ring of virgin gold, five three inches in diameter, carrying a huge ruby, sparkling above all the other jewels which loaded his person. To his left arm, from the wrist to the elbow, there appeared to be fitted a broad gold plate, like a piece of armour; but what its purpose might be we knew not. On each day of the festival the Rajah's turban and his robes were different: one day his tunic consisted of a white ground, with small red spots; another day it was entirely red; and on a third, the whole consisted of gold cloth. But the jewels seemed to be the same on each day, and thence our inference was, that the whole stock of "barbaric pearl and gold" belonging to the crown of Mysore was produced on these occasions.

On entering the gallery, we marched up in a row to the foot of the musnud or throne, saluting all the way; and after shaking hands with his highness and saluting again, we backed away stern foremost, exactly as in European courts, to the seats assigned for us in the first row. The space behind us, between our chairs and the wall, was occupied by the sovereign's family and officers. Close to the Rajah, on the right hand, sat the Dewan, the British resident on his left, and then various near relatives and official folks—not to mention two attendants of high rank, whose sole business appeared to consist in popping into his highness's mouth, from time to time, the proper portion of betel-nut!

I forget exactly at what stage of the interview an officer of the household despatched by the Rajah came along the line and cast over our necks a chaplet of white flowers, each person, of course, rising and saluting towards the throne as this high honour was conferred upon him. Next followed an attendant bearing a silver dish on which were laid some bits of betel-nut, with a few leaves, and the proper proportion of lime to chew with them. Some of the party did actually go through this ceremony—on the principle, I suppose, of Captain Cook, who ate and drank every thing. I have sometimes, by the way, thought, in reading the accounts of our great voyager, that he must have been blessed with the stomach of an ostrich, to whom spike-nails are no harder of digestion than asparagus, as is said and believed on board ship! Close behind the betel-nut bearer came an attendant with a tray of small nose-gays, followed by a boy with a bottle of highly perfumed oil, one drop of which he bestowed on each bunch of flowers, thus literally "adding a perfume to the violet."

Last of all came a most important personage, whose office every one could appreciate. The business of this welcome messenger consisted in throwing a pair of the finest cachemere shawls over each of our shoulders! Never shall I forget the effect which this present produced on my mind and feelings. Up to that moment I had been in the habit of thinking as ill as possible of the Rajah of Mysore; and with the ready indiscretion of youth, and all the confidence of recently acquired and partial knowledge, had never failed to state in company, without any measure in the terms, that the government of his highness Sree Kistna was most oppressive. But ever since feeling the delicate pressure of these beautiful shawls, I have been unable to bring myself to say one word against the giver.

The East India Company very judiciously take care that none of their servants shall be exposed to such temptations: for every present whatsoever, given to any officer, civil or military, in their employ, must immediately afterwards be handed over to a person appointed to receive it. An exact equivalent being, as a matter of course, presently returned, in some shape or other, to the treasury of the Rajah, Sultan, or other native authority who gave the present. As I was not within reach of this provoking ordinance, I was allowed to keep my pair of shawls, and, though rather the worse for twenty years' wear, they still figure on the necks of some fair friends of mine at home.

Many a time have I witnessed the intense mortification of the wives of East India Company's servants, on their being obliged to relinquish the beautiful presents which they and their husbands brought home from the Durbar. I remember once seeing, or thinking that I saw, a tear or two drop and mingle with a handful of pearls which a lady was in the act of returning, according to regulation.

"Why?" said I to her, "what does it matter? What could you do with the jewels here? You have no society amongst whom you could desire to wear such valuable ornaments?"

"No," she replied, "that is very true; but my two poor girls at home, whom I have not seen for these three long, long years, would look so becoming in them!" And then the mother's tears flowed fast and in earnest, as she thought of her children, between whom and her rolled ten thousand miles of sea!

The rajah having ordered the sports to commence, we turned our eyes to the area below with much curiosity, to see what should first happen. In the middle of the great square, an enclosure or ring, about thirty or forty yards across, had been formed by means of a double line of posts, ten feet apart and ten feet high, over which was cast a strong netting, forming a secure wall of ropes, but so loose that it hung in folds to the ground. The populace filled the rest of the square, along with the guards, some mounted, some on foot, and I am afraid to say how many elephants there might be—twenty or thirty, at the least, together with numerous bodies of policemen bearing long poles with flags at the end. These, I presume, were intended for show; but another set carried immense long whips, with which the sovereign people were kept from pressing in too great numbers upon the ropes. A dozen native bands of music, consisting of sharp sounding drums, and a number of shrill pipes, resembling in squeak that of our penny trumpets, only most painfully louder, and all playing at once, grievously disturbed us during the whole exhibition.

On one side of the space within the ring two beautiful leopards stood chained to separate posts. As these animals had been caught in the jungle the day before, nothing could be more sleek and glossy than their coats. Near these noble beasts, as if in contrast, were turned in, quite loose, two jackasses, each of which drew behind him, tied to his tail, a globular empty leathern bottle called, I think, a dubbah, about as large as a man could grasp in his arms. Into these machines a handful of gravel or dried peas had been inserted, to make a noise as the poor donkeys moved about. On the other side of the arena two painted wooden figures of men were placed in a leaning posture against stakes fastened in the ground.

Exactly opposite to the rajah, at the further side of the ring, a huge cage, composed of strong wooden bars, had been wheeled close to the ropes. A door on that side of the cage which faced us being now drawn up, we discovered a large royal tiger sitting in the attitude of the sphinx, apparently all ready for a spring. He looked exceedingly fierce, and no wonder, for the poor wretch had been kept with little or no food ever since his capture in a pitfall in one of the great teak forests of the Malabar Ghauts upwards of two days before. The royal animal seemed very ill disposed to afford sport to folks who had treated him so uncourtously, for not an inch would he budge even when the netting was drawn up, and a clear course opened for him into the ring. Perhaps he felt alarmed at the dreadful hubbub of so many thousands of people bawling out, drums beating, and horns sounding, rows of elephants tossing up their trunks, and horses snorting and prancing all round. Possibly, too, he might not have felt much tempted by the dainty company of the jackasses with their bottles of peas. At all events, no poking of sticks or thumping on the cage could make him start back or sheet, till his hind-quarters were blown up by a handful of squibs and crackers cast into his den.

The instant the explosion took place the tiger gave a tremendous roar, and sprung forwards with great violence into the circle, where he stopped suddenly, and then glared his eyes round and round with a most suspicious scowl. After surveying the ground for a few seconds, he turned tail, and, in a most cowardly fashion, ran back; but observing the door of his den closed, he swerved on one side, and leaped with prodigious violence against the ropes. Had the cords not been left so loose that his force became expended before they were drawn tight, I verily believe he might have broken through the meshes, or pulled down some of the posts. Instead of this he merely got entangled with the lines, and losing all his patience, if he ever possessed any, he raged and roared, lashing his tail about in the most furious style till he got free. Then turning round, he shot across the area like a Congrove rocket, and after making an immense cat-like spring, pounced upon one of the mock figures of men, the head of which he twisted off in an instant. During this proceeding he gave utterance to a fierce growl, or murmur of satisfaction, enough to make one's blood run cold. As soon as he detected the trick, he first flung the head violently from him, and tore the figure all to pieces with his claws, then made another attempt to break through the enclosure, but with no better success than at first.

I really thought at one time he would have effected his escape, by climbing over at the place where his cage stood. Both his fore paws were actually on the roof, and, with no great struggle, he might have gained the top, from whence his leap into the midst of the crowd must have produced a pretty tolerable sensation, I guess! Fortunately, a courageous little boy, about twelve years old, who had perched himself on the cage to see the fun, stood quite firm when all his older companions scattered to the right and left, in terror of the tiger's open jaws close to them. This bold young fellow held in his hand a short stout club, and the instant the tiger showed himself above the ropes, he lent him such a sound rap on the nose, that the animal fell back again into the enclosure, heels over head, with a sort of inverted somersault. While a shout of applause rung over the whole space, an old Mahometan soldier, an officer of the extinct dynasty, remarked to us in a whisper, that this exploit was just the sort of thing which his former master, Hyder Ali, might have been expected to do in his youth.

The baffled tiger now attacked the other figure of a man, and wrenched off his head as he had done that of the other; but instead of getting into a passion, as he had done on the first occasion, when he discovered the cheat, he stood perfectly still, with his tail on the ground, his head drooped and turned away from the figure, as if he felt ashamed of having been twice deceived. In this attitude he remained several minutes, with his eyes half closed, slightly moving his head from side to side; after which he deliberately laid himself down. A dozen yelping dogs were now turned in, some of which prudently contented themselves with taking a distant look at the royal beast. Not one of them approached him except an English grayhound, and even he was not such a fool as to press matters too far, but merely barked and snarled; once or twice he came so close to the tiger's nose that we wondered the monster had not laid his paw upon him, and crushed him at a blow. Meanwhile, the rest of the dogs, in a body, attacked one of the chained-up leopards—a most unfair contest; but as he had the good fortune to catch one of them on the hip, he gave such evidence of his capacity, that the barkers, leaving the nobler game, one and all scampered off in chase of the donkeys. These poor beasts, terrified by the sound of the bottles at their tails, and worried by the dogs, were soon dragged to the ground, after which a distant action was recommenced against the leopards, with no results, as military men express it.

By this time, probably the rajah, and certainly his company, were pretty well tired of so much nonsense; and his highness, turning to one of his courtiers, desired him to go down to the court with a bow and arrow which was handed to him. The officer descended accordingly, and having passed round to that side of the ring where the tiger lay, very deliberately shot an arrow at the unoffending animal. He immediately sprang at the ropes; but upon receiving another arrow in his breast, the poor creature fell back, and stood locking reproachfully at his opponent. This gave the unconcerned courtier time to draw a third arrow from his quiver, and so on, till the wretched beast was literally bristled all over like a porcupine; yet, to our great surprise, he still kept his feet. As the arrows pierced his side, he merely turned round his head, and broke them off with his mouth, leaving the barb far within. We observed one arrow pass clean through his body from side to side, and could not but remember the old song of Chevy Chase, where the gray goose-quill, a cloth yard long, is wet with the heart's blood of a warrior. As nothing could be more disagreeable than this method of putting so noble an animal to death, some of us sent up a petition to the rajah, that one of the party might be allowed to go down for the purpose of despatching him à l'Anglaise. This favour was readily granted; and it was curious to observe how instantaneously death followed the passage of a single musket-ball, though eight or ten arrows had already gone through and through him without producing any visible effect.

Persons who have only seen those beasts which are called (ironically, I suppose,) wild, though the tamest and most docile of God's creatures, can form but an imperfect idea of the beauty of the skin and the nobleness of the air of those truly wild inhabitants of the tropical forests, thus inhumanly "butchered to make an Indian holyday." We had a good opportunity of studying the habits of the tiger at the British residency hard by, where one of the most remarkable specimens of his tribe was kept in the open air. He had been brought as a cub from the jungle a year or two before, and being placed in a cage as large as an ordinary English parlour, in the centre of the stable-yard, had plenty of room to leap about and enjoy the high feeding in which he was indulged. He devoured regularly one sheep per day, with any other extra bits of meat that happened to be disposable. A sheep in India is rather smaller—say ten per cent—less than our Welsh mutton; so this was no great meal for a tiger four feet high. The young hands at the residency used to plague him occasionally, till he became infuriated, and dashed with all his force against the bars, roaring so loud that the horses in the surrounding stables trembled and neighed in great alarm. Indeed it was very difficult even for persons who were fully satisfied of the strength of the cage, to stand near it with unmoved nerves. He would soon have made famous mince-meat of half a dozen of us, could he but have caught the door open for a moment.

But what annoyed him far more than our poking him up with a stick, or tantalising him with shins of beef or legs of mutton, was introducing a mouse into his cage. No fine lady ever exhibited more terror at the sight of a spider than this magnificent royal tiger betrayed on seeing a mouse. Our mischievous plan was to tie the little animal by a string to the end of a long pole, and thrust it close to the tiger's nose. The moment he saw it he leaped to the opposite side, and when the mouse was made to run near him, he jammed himself into a corner, and stood trembling and roaring in such an ecstasy of fear, that we were always obliged to desist from sheer pity to the poor brute. Sometimes we insisted on his passing over the spot where the unconscious little mouse ran backwards and forwards. For a long time, however, we could not get him to move, till at length, I believe by the help of a squib, we obliged him to start; but instead of pacing leisurely across his den, or making a detour to avoid the object of his alarm, he generally took a kind of flying leap, so high as nearly to bring his back in contact with the roof of his cage!

I heard afterwards, with much regret, that this noblest of tigers had been put to death. One day, a drunken, useless fellow of the soodra caste, the lowest rank amongst the Hindoos, happened to be passing through the court-yard, and not being able to steer very straight, he ran foul of the cage. In the stupidity of his intoxication, he allowed one of his arms to pass between the bars, upon which the tiger, naturally supposing this was an invitation to help himself, snapped off the man's arm in a moment, and before assistance could arrive the man bled to death. The British resident, very properly considering that the feelings of the natives would be outraged if, after such an accident, the animal were permitted to live, ordered him to be shot.

We were promised a grand day's sport one afternoon, when a buffalo and a tiger were to be pitted against each other. The buffalo entered the ring composedly enough; but after looking about him, turned to one side, and rather pettishly, as if he had felt a little bilious, overturned a vessel, placed there expressly for his use. The tiger refused for a long time to make his appearance, and it was not till his den was filled with smoke and fire that he sprang out. The buffalo charged his enemy in a moment, and by one furious push capsize him right over. To our great disappointment, the tiger pocketed this insult in the shabbiest manner imaginable, and passing on, leaped furiously at the ropes, with which his feet became entangled, so that the buffalo was enabled to punish his antagonist about the rump most ingloriously. When at length the tiger got loose, he slunk off to a distant part of the area, lay down, and pretended to be dead. The boys, however, soon put him up again, and tried to bring him to the scratch with aquibs and crackers; and a couple of dozen of dogs being introduced at the same moment, they all set at him, but only one ventured to take any liberty with the enraged animal. This bold dog actually caught the tiger by the tail, but a slight pat of the mighty monster's paw crushed the yelping cur as flat as a board. The buffalo, who really appeared anxious to have a fair stand-up fight, now drove the dogs off, and repeatedly poked the tiger with his nose, and even turned him half over several times with his horns.

As the gentleman showed no pluck, the rajah requested one of us to step down to give him the coup de grace. I accordingly loaded a musket which was placed in my hands, but on reaching the area I felt rather unwilling to fire, as I had just heard a story of a gentleman who, the year before, in firing at one of the animals in the ring by the rajah's directions, not only shot the animal, but also killed an old woman who stood on the other side of the ring, the ball having continued its course after piercing the tiger's head. On my expressing a wish to try, in the first place, the effect of cold iron upon his tough hide, a very sharp-pointed spear was given me, and I tried with my utmost force to pass it through his hide, but in vain. He rose, however, on being pricked by the steel, and by making a violent effort to clutch my hand, thrust his head fairly through one of the meshes of the net, to my no small dismay. Either the ropes were not very strong, or the seizings weak, for they began to break, and in the next minute, as it appeared to me, the infuriated monster might have forced his whole body through. In this emergency I quite forgot all about humanity and old women, and catching up the musket, placed the muzzle of the piece at the tiger's head, and blew his brains out in a moment.

A more manly, though not a pleasing kind of sport succeeded, in which the Jetties, or native Athletes, exhibited before us. Mysore is the only part of India, as far as I know, in which these oriental prizefighters are still kept up. The Jetties, whose institution is said to be of very ancient origin, constitute in Mysore a distinct caste of persons, trained from their infancy daily in the most laborious exercises, or what we should call gymnastics, but far more varied and extraordinary than any I ever saw in Europe. Whether they spring from a peculiarly handsome stock, or whether it be that the nature of their unremitting exercises develops the beautiful points of the human form, I know not; but certainly nothing except the statues of antiquity go beyond them in symmetry. The beau ideal, if I understand the term correctly, consists in the appropriation and just disposition of the most characteristic forms of each department, selected, not from one or two individual specimens, but from the whole class. Judged by such a severe test, every one of these Jetties would, of course, be found wanting in many respects. But I cannot doubt, on the other hand, that a sculptor or painter in search of materials to fill up, by observation of actual nature, his own conceptions of ideal excellence, would consider the exercising room of these singular people a capital studio. At all events, their attitudes, and even some parts of their limbs, recalled to me so strongly the surpassing wonders of the Elgin marbles, that I went very often to their quarters to see them rehearse.

The Jetties intended for the real combat are brought forward, two at a time, wearing no other dress than a pair of light orange coloured drawers, extending half way down the thigh. The right hand of each is furnished with a weapon which may be called a cæstus; for though it is somewhat different, I believe, from the Roman instrument of that name, its object appears pretty nearly similar. Colonel Wilks, in his History of Mysore, says it is composed of buffalo horn fitted to the hand, and pointed with four knobs resembling very sharp knuckles, and corresponding to their situation, with a fifth of greater prominence at the end nearest the little finger, and at right angles with the other four. This instrument, if properly placed, would, he conceives, enable a man of ordinary strength to cleave open the head of his adversary at a blow; but the fingers being introduced through the weapon, it is fastened across them at an equal distance between the first and second lower joints, in a situation which does not admit of attempting a severe blow without the risk of dislocating the first joints of all the fingers.

The set-to or battle consists of a mixture of wrestling and boxing, but the head is the only object allowed by the rules of the ring in India to be aimed at. The Jetties are led into the arena and placed in front of the rajah, by the two masters of the fight, always old stagers, who have fought in their day. The right hands of the two combatants being then held up by the masters, to show that all is fair, the Rajah nods his approbation, and this is considered a signal to commence. The Jetties may either strike at arm's length, or close and grapple, or, if they can, they may throw each other down—every thing, in short, is considered fair, except striking with the cæstus lower than the head. The guards for defence, I have heard persons skilled in boxing say, are all of them extremely good and scientific. These refinements, like the niceties of English boxing or French fencing, are, I need scarcely confess, quite unintelligible to ignorant eyes. However this be, there is no mistaking the nature of a successful blow, though it often baffles the quickest observation to discover how it was given. Every such out lays the skin open, rattles smartly on the skull, and sends down a stream of blood from top to toe of the wounded man. This is all very disagreeable, but we were assured never dangerous. The wrestling part of these contests was really admirable, and being unmixt with any thing painful, interested us much more than the savage cutting and maiming alluded to. Sometimes the combatants continued for several minutes prancing round a common centre, in attitudes very like those of our boxers, facing one another, each eyeing his antagonist with the utmost intentness, and watching for a favourable opportunity to close with him. During these movements, which frequently recalled to my mind the figures in the Spanish bolero, the fingers of the left hand were kept in perpetual motion, and that arm constantly waved about in the most graceful way possible, the purpose of each fighter being to catch the eye of the other, and so to draw away his attention from the meditated point of attack. The whole muscles of their bodies, at this period of the fight, appeared to be made of highly elastic springs; for as their feet touched the ground, their bodies rose again into the air, as if they had become actually buoyant.

Suddenly one of the parties, seizing his moment, rushes in, makes his blow, and having cut a gash into the other's head so deep as to show for an instant, by a bright white line, that the skull is laid bare, he grapples his antagonist by the shoulders, or clasps him round the body, or even seizes him by the leg, and tries to throw him over. This is by far the most interesting part of the battle. The elasticity of the muscles already alluded to, seems now quite gone, for every fibre appears to have become as rigid as a bar of steel. The violent exertion of the limbs swells out the muscles between the joints into firm knobs almost as hard as the buffalo's horn of the cæstus. For a long time the centre of gravity of the two bodies keeps within the well-marked base carved deeply in the sand by their feet during the struggle; but at length, down they go together with a most formidable crash. It is not always, I took notice, that the wrestler who is undermost comes worst off; for it frequently happens, that the upper one is obliged to weaken his guard in order to keep the other down, and thus, although he has the superiority in position, he gets many a severe pecking from the armed knuckles of his prostrate antagonist. In this manner they lie rolling about in the mud for a long while, struggling to regain their feet, and occasionally giving each other such blows on the head that they become dreadfully disfigured.

After battling in this way for some time, without my decided advantage on either side, they cast up many pitting looks to the rajah, who at length makes a signal for them to desist. The victor, if there happens to be an obvious superiority, generally goes off the ground in half a dozen somersets, to show his undiminished vigour, as our champions in the prize-ring cast up their hats when they have won, and say they are ready for a fresh fight. Meanwhile, the loser puts on a pathetic or wistful look; and first bending towards the rajah, makes a low salam towards the lattices, behind which the ladies of the court are seated, so as to view the sport, while they themselves keep out of sight of the profane world. Presents, consisting of gilt or silver armlets, turbans, veils of cloth, and so on, are then thrown down from the throne to the Jetties, upon which the bleeding combatants again prostrate themselves in the dust before the rajah, and make similar obeisances on both sides of the court to the invisible ladies above.

Immediately after these rather painful exhibitions, we were entertained with stilt dancing by a set of men, the soles of whose feet were raised, on slender poles, more than seven feet from the ground. They stalked about amongst the crowd, and in this elevated position went through the whole series of what are called the Perris exercises. One strong fellow, thus elevated, presented himself before the rajah with a couple of fall-stead ploughs on his shoulders, a feat which called forth much admiration. We had then a fight between two buffaloes, which ran their heads against each other with a crash that one could fancy shook the palace to its very foundation; indeed, the only wonder was how both animals did not fall down dead with their skulls fractured; but there appears to be a wonderful degree of thickness & hardness in this part of the animal structure both in beast and in man, for just after these buffaloes had given evidence of the hardness of their heads, a dozen persons came forward, and placed themselves before a large pile of cocoa-nuts stripped of their outer husks. These being cast successively high into the air, were caught in their descent by these hard-pated fellows, who stood erect, and received the cocoa-nuts, I presume, on their "bumps of resistiveness." In every case the shell was literally dashed to pieces, and the milk scattered in showers over the crowd. Such a cracking of heads I never heard, except once at a fair in Ireland. Thus, our careful mother, Dame Nature, it should seem, has taken good care to defend the brain, though it may perhaps be surmised, that folks who furnish such hazardous evidence of the thickness of their skulls, have no great stock of brains to protect.

The prettiest game, to our taste, during the whole of this long and rather wearisome festival, was one which might be imitated with some effect by the figures of our own opera. From a ring in the middle of a pole stretched horizontally over the centre of the area were suspended eight differently coloured silk strips, the ends of which were held in the hands of as many little boys. Upon a signal being given, and music striking up, these eight young persons commenced a dance, the purpose of which was to plait up the separate cords into one rope. After working about a couple of feet of this line, the music changed, and the little weavers, inverting the order of their dance, undid the silken strands of their party-coloured rope, and stood ready to lay them up again, according to the same or any other pattern which might be ordered by his highness the Maha Rajah of Mysore.

CHAPTER IX.

GRANITE MOUNTAIN CUT INTO A STATUE—BAMBOO FOREST—RAJAH OF COORG.

During my stay in Mysore, I made an excursion thirty miles north of Seringapatam, to examine a large statue of solid granite, nearly seventy feet in height, & a place with a name almost as long as the statue itself—Shrivanabalagol. It is wonderful how indifferent most people, living on any given spot of the earth's surface, become to the sights in their immediate neighbourhood; for when I asked at the Mysore residency for information about this extraordinary colossal statue, which lay within one night's journey, I found the greater number of the party had never seen it; nor could I prevail on any person to accompany me on the expedition. I set out, accordingly, alone, about sunset, went to bed in my palankeen, and never awoke till the bearers set me down, next morning, on the pavement of a choultry near the spot. As I could see nothing of the statue, however, for an intervening grove of trees, I ran to the corner of the wood, where I suddenly obtained a view of this astonishing work of art, standing up boldly against the sky, and howing itself above a low range of intermediate hills.

I certainly never saw any work of man before or since, which gave me so complete an idea of a giant, as his extraordinary statue. It has sometimes been described as an image of Doodh; but I understand that it represents Gomuta Raya, a celebrated saint of the Jains—a sect of Hindoos, differing in some important respects from the Brahminical, and also from the Boodhist varieties of oriental superstition.

I possessed no exact means of measuring its height; but the authorities I have consulted on this point vary between sixty-seven feet and seventy feet three inches, which is the height stated by Dr. Buchanan; and, from such estimates as I could make, I am sure it cannot be much less. It is admirably placed for effect, as it stands on the summit of a conical granite hill about two hundred feet high, which serves for a pedestal. The statue still constitutes a part of the solid rock, which originally may have been three hundred feet high, the stone which formed the upper part of the mountain having been carved away, until nothing but the figure remained. The original shape of the hill cannot, indeed, be correctly inferred from any thing we now see, but it probably formed a steep cone, or peak, of which the bold sculptor has taken such magnificent advantage.

I have often, when travelling since in foreign countries, been struck with natural forms and positions, which, by the hands of a man of genius, might easily be turned to account for the construction of similar colossal figures, calculated, under certain circumstances, to produce a much greater effect, at incalculably less cost than the ordinary methods of casting or carving can accomplish. I was therefore much rejoiced to hear a great modern sculptor declare, that he had long entertained a project of constructing such a statue in this country. On my showing him the sketches I had made of the gigantic figure in Mysore, and describing it as minutely as I could, he remarked to himself: "I'll beat this big Indian nan yet."

In looking at Buchanan's account of Mysore, for a description of the statue at Shrivanasabalagol, I found the following remark: "Sir Arthur Wellesley visited the place lately;" and on enquiring amongst the officers who had belonged to the army which marched from Seringapatam to the Mahratta country, some time after the fall of Tippoo, I learned that the general had actually gone upwards of thirty miles out of his way to see the statue, and then galloped back to rejoin the troops, whose march was never interrupted.

I had also the curiosity lately to ask the Duke of Wellington himself, whether this account was correct, and what he thought of the statue? He said it was quite true, and added, that he had never seen any thing so magnificent in its way. It will therefore be interesting enough if Mr. Chantrey, with such an example before him as the Indian statue, and such a subject at hand, shall make good his boast of beating the Oriental sculptor.

During my stay at the residency of Mysore, I took many trips to Seringapatam, for I never felt tired of wandering amongst the fortifications and other spots so celebrated in our Eastern history. I got hold of an intelligent old corporal, a pensioner, who had actually entered the breach as one of the storming party when the place was taken in 1799. I easily induced him to go regularly through the whole siege, Uncle Toby fashion, from the beginning to the end—from the first hour the ground was broken, to the capture of the city and the discovery of Tippoo's body. The trenches and breaching batteries, of which scarcely any traces now exist, had been formed on the right bank of the river, not far below the spot where the river divides itself into two streams, which, after running apart for about three miles, again unite, and thus form a loop, within which stands the island of Seringapatam. On the upper end of this island, which is sharp like a spear-head, is erected the fortress, by no means in a good situation, as I understand from military men, nor well constructed in itself. That, however, signifies little, as it is now dismantled. The breach had been built up; but although fourteen years had elapsed since the siege, the difference in colour of the modern masonry rendered the spot quite distinct. We could even count numerous shot-marks and shot-holes on the different faces of the bastion adjacent to the breach, which was made in the curtain of the work. The river happened to be so low, that Corporal Trim and I managed, at the expense of a pretty good wetting, to follow the exact line of the storming party across the bed of the stream, and over the Fausse Braye wall. We were obliged to make a little circumbendibus to enter the works, for we carried no scaling ladders with us.

The readers of the history of the campaign, which terminated so gloriously, will remember that a huge ditch was found within the ramparts by the astonished storming party, and, had it not been for a few planks inadvertently left by the troops of Tippoo, they might never have been able to cross, and the besiegers have been repulsed. As the waters rose in the river to seventeen feet in depth, within a day or two afterwards, the fort might then have long withstood its assailants, had the moment of attack been deferred.

On these visits to Seringapatam, I slept in one of Tippoo Sultan's palaces, called the Dowlat Baug, or garden of riches; but I paid dearly for my temerity. Indeed, I believe that island is nearly the most unhealthy spot in the East Indies. What is curious, however, I felt none of the evil effects of the malarial poison as long as I remained on the high level of the Mysore country; but within a few days after reaching the sea-coast of Malabar, was seized with what is called the jungle fever, of which I feel the consequences to this hour. The Duke of Wellington (then Colonel Wellesley), when governor of Seringapatam, lived in the same palace, which he rendered more commodious than it had ever been in the days of Tippoo Sultan or even of his father Hyder Ali. He filled it with European furniture, and made it less unhealthy by placing glass sashes in all the windows, by which some portion of the noxious air of the night could be kept out.

A characteristic touch of the same hand was pointed out to me in the Dowlat Baug. On the walls of the verandah, on that side of the palace which is most conspicuous, there had been represented, with much minuteness of detail, but with a total absence of perspective, the native version of Colonel Baillie's defeat—a disaster, which, as I have elsewhere mentioned, occurred some twenty years before, (1780,) under the reign of Hyder. As the success, upon that occasion, was undoubtedly on the side of the Mahometans, there could be nothing fairer, in the way of nationality, than blazoning the victory on the walls of the palace. By the same right of conquest, the new governor of the island might undoubtedly have ordered a brush to be passed over the original painting, and have substituted in its stead the storming party in the breach where Tippoo fell. The English warrior's taste, however, was of a different description. He sent for the best native artists in Seringapatam, and made them carefully restore the original work, which had been much destroyed, desiring them to omit no item which the fallen dynasty had sanctioned. In consequence of this fresh painting, I saw, so late as 1813, the whole disastrous story displayed to public view, in the glaring colours in which Hyder had originally delighted to exhibit the prowess of his arms.

In the same manly taste, though possibly with higher political motives, the custom, which antecedent to our conquest of Mysore had been religiously observed, of reading the Koran several times a-day beside the tomb of Hyder, was continued by the Duke of Wellington; and, in fact, it is continued to this hour. During the few days I lived in the palace, I went repeatedly to hear these moolahs offer up their prayers. All the Mussulman priests of the subverted dynasty were pensioned by the British government, and also most of the principal officers and civilians of Tippoo's court. This wise policy included the celebrated old Purneah, the late sultan's prime minister—the Talleyrand of India—who, though he served at different times many different masters, behaved to each and to all with rigid fidelity, and stood by them heartily as long as they kept their respective heads above water.

After remaining about a fortnight, wandering over the Mysore country, I turned my steps to the westward, with the intention of passing the Ghauts and reaching the coast, where I considered it would not be difficult to procure a sea conveyance to Bombay. The resident at Mysore advised me to call at the Rajah of Coorg's capital on my way, and furnished me with a letter of introduction to that native prince.

Early in the morning, therefore, of a beautiful day in the latter end of September, I set out from the bare tableland of Mysore, and proceeded towards the hilly and thickly wooded regions overhanging the Malabar country. When I awoke in my palankeen, I knew not very distinctly where I had got to, for I had been dreaming all night about the monstrous statue at Shrivanasabalagol. I sat up, drew the door gently back, and, looking out, found myself in the midst of one of the most curious and magnificent scenes which my eyes had ever beheld. It seemed as if I were travelling among the clustered columns of some enormous and enchanted Gothic cathedral, compared to which the minster at York, or the cathedral at Winchester, would have seemed mere baby-houses. The ground extended on all sides as smooth, and flat, and clear of underwood, as if the whole had been paved with gravestones. From this level surface rose on every hand, and as far as the eye could penetrate into the forest, immense symmetrical clusters of bamboo, varying in diameter at their base from six feet to twenty or thirty, and even to twice that width, as I ascertained by actual measurement. For about eight or ten feet from the ground, each of these clusters or columns preserved a form nearly cylindrical, after which they began gradually to swell outwards, each bamboo assuming for itself a graceful curve, and rising to the height, some of sixty, some of eighty, and some even of one hundred feet in the air, the extreme end being at times horizontal, or even drooping gently over, like the tips of the feathers in the Prince of Wales' plume. These gorgeous clusters stood at the distance of fifteen or twenty yards from one another, and being totally free from the interruption of brushwood, could be distinguished at a great distance—more than a mile certainly, in every direction, forming, under the influence of an active imagination, naves and transepts, aisles and choirs, such as none but a Gothic architect ever dared to conceive. Overhead the interlacing curves of the bamboos constituted as complete a groined roof as that of Winchester or Westminster, on a scale of grandeur far beyond the bold conception even of those wonderful artists who devised that glorious school of architecture, which, in the opinion of many people, has raised the dark centuries immediately subsequent to the era of the crusades almost to the level of the days of Pericles.

On counting the separate bamboos in some of the smallest, and also in some of the largest clusters, I found the numbers, to vary from twenty or thirty to upwards of two hundred, and the height generally from sixty to a hundred feet from the ground to the point of intersection of the curves overhead. Most of the bamboos were somewhat thicker than a man's thigh at the ground, where, as I have before said, they are clustered so close as to be almost in contact. They then taper off very gradually to the extreme end, where the point is not thicker than a quill. There occurs a joint at about every foot and a half, distinguished not only by a slight flat ring or fillet, but by a set of small branches, eight or ten feet long, striking out at right angles to the main bamboo. These minor shoots are again divided into joints, from which minor series of shoots, still more minute, are thrown out; and so on for many successions, the last always terminating in a sharp-pointed narrow leaf two or three inches long, and half an inch wide in the middle, not unlike a large tea-leaf when spread out.

As each bamboo of the hundred or more forming the cluster sends out shoots from every joint, and as all the joints of these subordinate branches do the same, a compact mass is formed by these innumerable little branches, which cross one another at every possible angle. If a person were to fill a hat full of pins or needles, and shake it about for some minutes, it might give a notion of the inextricable confusion which is presented to the eye on looking into one of these clustered columns of bamboos. It is only at the top, where the bend takes place, that the foliage has full room to play, or where the tapering arms of this magnificent plant form, by their meetings and crossings, a complete system of pointed arches.

What surprised me very much, and greatly puzzled me at first, was to observe that, notwithstanding the multitude of lateral shoots from each of the main bamboos, and from all the subordinate branches, not a single trace of displacement, or the slightest obstruction to the growth of any branch, could be detected. Every person must have heard of the astonishing rapidity of the growth of the bamboo. It is said, indeed, that in one season it starts up to its whole length. I do not know if this be true, but am quite certain that if one of the main bamboos were to spring from the ground in the centre, or even near the sides of the cluster, and that from its joints there were at the same time to sprout out the lateral branches I have described, it would be impossible for the main stem to force its way through the obstructions presented by the network, formed by the little branches growing from the joints of the other bamboos in the cluster.

After examining a considerable number of the clusters, however, we can, I think, discover how nature manages this difficult affair. When the bamboo first springs out of the ground, it is about as thick as a man's wrist, but it is armed with a very sharp point, not unlike that of a wooden instrument called a fid, which sailors make use of in splicing ropes. As this point is extremely hard, and the bamboo always highly polished, it readily makes its way through the very thickest masses of the little branches, as one might thrust a sword through a quickset hedge. Thus, the bamboo, whose growth is prodigiously rapid, starts upwards, and by reason of its smooth sharp end, and perfectly smooth sides, easily makes its way to its extreme length and thickness, without, as I conceive, sending out a single lateral shoot from any of its joints till the utmost extent has been gained. The subordinate branches from the joints then, but not till then, begin to start out horizontally, all these being, after the manner of the principal stem, exempted from lateral shoots at their joints till their utmost length has been reached. In consequence of this beautiful arrangement, none of these successive branches, however numerous or delicate, find any difficulty in piercing the confusion.

I saw bamboos in every different stage of this process, and, in particular, I noticed several of the main stems rising to the height of seventy feet and upwards, of a clear yellow colour, and evidently of recent growth; but without a single lateral branch growing from their joints from top to bottom; and this led me to infer that their extreme height had not yet been attained, or was just attained.

On reaching a pretty little town, with the long name of Eerajunderpet, I was received by an officer of the Rajah of Coorg, whose dominions I had entered. A guard of sepoy, with several elephants, and a most inconvenient allowance of ear-splitting music, were placed at my disposal by the soubadar, as he styled himself. I begged him, as delicately as I could, to stop the tom-toms, and then insinuated something about breakfast. I suspect this functionary had often before been sent to meet my countrymen similarly circumstanced, for I could see the ends of his huge whiskers gradually curling upwards by the muscular action of that kind of smile called a broad grin, as he listened to my demand, and pointed to the choultry, or caravansary, close at hand. In truth, in spite of the picturesque beauties of the bamboo forest, and the witchery of the still more magnificent scenery which embellishes the summit ridge, or crest of the Ghauts, I had not been able to exclude from my thoughts the chances, pro and con, of a good meal at the end of the stage. Accordingly, I felt my heart leap as I caught sight of a table-cloth, flapping in the breeze in the verandah, above which rose a goodly range of dishes, a huge tea-pot, and a bowl brim full of eggs. The attendant lifted up the covers, and displayed a pyramid of rice shining like a snow wreath in the sun, supported by a curry, the savoury smell of which spread so far as to reach the senses of the tired bearers of my palanquin, who seemed as hungry as myself. In the joy of the moment, I presented them with a whole sheep, of the small mountain breed, for their dinner.

During the rest of this day I travelled, sometimes in the palanquin, and sometimes on the back of one of the elephants sent me by the Rajah of Coorg, for whose capital, Markara, I was now bound. The road wound about amongst the hills, or along the valleys of the Ghauts, and across numberless small streams, besides the great Cauvery, now shrunk to a rivulet, which we forded repeatedly during this journey. When the sun became disagreeably hot at those places where the woods opened, I had only to dismount and pop into the palanquin; but when we plunged into the forests, and enjoyed the shade of the teak tree, iron wood, banyan, and tamarind, I again got on the back of my elephant. She was an exceedingly fine animal, in the prime of her life, as I was told, being only fifty years old, called Bhigelee, or lightning. Your grand folks in India, upon state occasions, place a howdah, or castle, on their elephants, and ride about in triumph, like Darius in Le Brun's pictures of Alexander's battles. But for ordinary travelling, a good thick matting, or rather a pad, answers the purpose; in fact, this method is the more agreeable of the two on a journey, for there is less motion felt when one is seated close to the elephant's back, than when perched three or four feet higher, and wagged about like the head of a Chinese mandarin over a chimney-piece. Even with the pad, it is not very easy to keep on when the road is steep; and this would be impossible, were not a piece of cloth, twisted up like a rope, placed before and behind, which may be grasped by the hand, according as the inclination of the road is upwards or downwards.

An elephant is proverbially one of the surest-footed animals in the world; but we came, during this journey, to some passes so very steep, and so much covered with loose stones, empty water-courses, broken trunks of trees, and all the other debris left by mountain torrents, that I quaked not a little at times as we passed along the edges of precipices. But our trusty Bhigelee appeared perfectly self-possessed on these occasions; and as the mahout, or driver, made me remark, she never took her foot off one stone till she had made sure of a solid foundation for the next step. Sometimes she made this inspection with her trunk, sometimes with her foot; but she never once made a false move, though occasionally she slid down for a yard or two on all fours.

At one place, the bough of a tree happened to cross our path, upon which the elephant raised her trunk and wrenched it from the stem in a moment, in order to use it as a fly flap, and so brisk were her movements, that she had very nearly whisked both the mahout and myself into the valley. At another turn of the road, where we crossed a running stream, her thirsty ladyship sucked in a hoghead or two, and then, having filled her trunk, and wishing to cool herself, she squirted the contents so dexterously over her sides and back, that we were both completely drenched. For this trick Miss Bhigelee received a suitable correction at the hands of her guide, albeit his age, as he said, was less than that of the elephant by about a dozen years. He told us, that he had scarcely been absent from her a whole day since he was born; and that even when a mere crawling infant, he used to be left by his mother under the elephant's care.

It was at the close of twilight when I reached Markara, the rajah's capital; and not a little astonished was I to be shown into a large house, built in the taste of the English bungalows at Madras, furnished, also, in the European style. In one of the rooms, which was brilliantly lighted up, I found a table laid with twenty covers; and before I had been there three minutes, a sumptuous dinner was placed on the table, as if it had been brought by magic. A couple of dozen mutes, in white robes, stood round like the ivory attendants of the Black Prince in the fairy tale. I lamented that I had not twenty mouths, to do more justice to my host's ultra hospitality. As it was, however, I did pretty well; for the keen air of the Coorg mountains, and the rough riding of the elephant, had set my appetite so sharply, that I felt rather provoked to receive a summons to attend the maha Rajah of Coorg, Lingra Jender Wadee, just as I had smoked out my first chillum, and was considering whether or not to break in upon a second bottle of claret, for the rajah sported some of "Maxwell and Key's best long cork." Not a moment was to be lost, however; so I jumped up, and being shown to another suite of apartments, found a bed-room and dressing-room, for all the world like those of any hotel in Jermyn-street. I rigged myself in my best coat, tucked in my sword, screwed on my cocked hat, and rattled away to the durbar.

This worthy rajah's whim, as I soon discovered, was to have every thing in one department of his palace, as much as possible, in the English style. In this view, the floor of the room in which he received his European guests was laid with Brussels carpets, and round the walls stood piano-fortes and organs, music books, sofas, card-tables, writing-desks, clocks of a dozen shapes and sizes, mirrors, and pictures—all English. He seemed enchanted with my amazement at this strange jumble of upholstery; nothing, however, was ordered aright, and it looked more like one of Mr. Dowbiggin's warehouses in Mount-street than an English drawing-room, which it was intended to represent. As I entered the durbar, the rajah claimed my admiration of the disposition of his goods in such a way, that it was impossible to contradict him. In one instance, indeed, the sagacity of the native outran his taste; and in the midst of much that was trashy, and even childish, betokened a degree of knowledge of character for which, indeed, the Hindoos are peculiarly distinguished. He led me up to a picture of Sir Arthur Wellesley, sent to him by the general, at the rajah's request, after the great campaign against Tippee.

"There," said he, "look at that picture; there is the portrait of the greatest man we have ever known in India."

Just as these words were interpreted, I was surprised to hear a band of music strike up the tune called, I think, "The Hunting of the Stag," of which song the burden is, "Hey ho, chevy!" To this most incongruous tune, a set of Indian figurantes, or notch girls, were made to dance before us, and very strange work they made of it! After a short audience, the rajah observed that I must be tired with the day's journey, and allowed me to retire.

Next morning I got up betimes, and took a survey of the grounds, which satisfied me, that although nothing could be more picturesque in the way of mountain scenery, a more absurd spot for a strong-hold could not have been selected in Asia. It would indeed be a fine place to keep a state prisoner in, for the fort stands in the centre of an amphitheatre of hills, each overlooking, and either commanding it, or the approaches to it, within half cannon shot. I returned to the fort, after standing on the top of one of these knolls for about half an hour, watching the mist as it gradually stole out of the valleys, and became invisible in the higher air, whenever it mixed with sunbeams as they peeped over the eastern ridges of the Ghauts. Meanwhile, the light wind, which generally flits about at that hour, shook down the dew drops from the branches of the well-steeped forest; and I had almost forgotten, in the coolness of the air, and more than Alpine beauty of the Indian landscape, how far I had wandered from the scenes which it recalled. At the door of the bungalow, I was met by half a dozen attendants, who saluted me to the ground, and led the way to the parlour, where a feast sufficient to have satisfied twenty half-pay officers was laid on the table. I counted eighteen dishes, and I forget how many silver tea-pots, cream-jugs, besides crockery enough to have equipped an Indian—such was the magnificent pleasure of the Rajah of Coorg.

In due season, a message came to me from his highness, to say he wished me to go over the new palace, which he was fitting up like an English house, and upon some of the details of which he desired to have my opinion. As things were in actual progress, I had the liberty of suggesting a few changes, with which he was greatly pleased. He had already made some very erroneous arrangements, probably from acting upon imperfect information; and as even his queer taste revolted at these incongruities, he felt delighted to have a European's authority for making further alterations.

On returning to the great square in the centre of the building, we found three chairs placed for us on a Turkey carpet spread on the ground in the open air. The rajah took a seat and made me come beside him, after placing his son, a nice little boy nine or ten years of age, on my right hand. This young fellow was gaily dressed, with a huge overspreading turban. A dark circle about the tenth of an inch broad, was painted round each of his eyes, which gave him a strange staring look; and on his cheeks, brow, and chin, were placed small black marks, or beauty spots, about twice as large as the head or dot of a note in music.

The whole area of the court was now begirt with soldiers, each holding as high as his face an immense bill-hook or knife, the blade of which, near the extremity, could not be less than three inches wide, and diminishing gradually towards the hilt. This formidable instrument, well known in Indian warfare under the name of the Coorg-knife, is often used as a sword, and when handled by men who are not afraid to close with their antagonists, is said to be a most efficient weapon.

On a signal given by the rajah, a folding door was thrown open on one side of the court, and in stalked two immense royal tigers, held by several men on each side by long but slight ropes attached to collars round the animals' necks. These beasts appeared very tractable, for they allowed themselves to be led close to us. I confess I did not much like this degree of propinquity, and eyed the slender cordage with some professional anxiety. Meanwhile the rajah and his son, and the officers of the household, appeared quite unconcerned, though the tigers passed within a few yards of them, and, as it seemed to me, might easily have broken loose. What degree of training these animals had undergone, I know not; but after a little while the rajah, probably to increase the surprise of his guest, directed the men to let go the ropes and to fall back. There we sat, in the midst of the open court, with a couple of full-sized tigers in our company, and nothing on earth to prevent their munching us all up! The well-fed and well-bred beasts, however, merely lounged about, rubbed their noses together, and then tumbling on the ground, rolled about like a couple of kittens at play. I could, however, detect the rajah spying at me out of the corner of his eye, and half-smiling at the success of his trick. After a time the men were recalled and the tigers dragged off.

A pair of lionesses and two furious looking buffaloes were then introduced, but nothing could be more innocent or more respectful to the rajah and his son. Like Falstaff, indeed, they seemed to have an instinctive knowledge of the true prince. Yet, for all this, I caught myself several times edging my chair back a little bit, and looking out for a clear place to escape, as the monsters stalked up and down the court, and once or twice actually touched the edge of our carpet with their feet. On these occasions, that part of the circle of guards which stood behind us advanced just so far as to bring our chairs on the outside of their ring, and to place themselves between the beasts and us. On clapping their hands and flourishing their knives, the lionesses and other beasts moved a little farther off; after which the guards again dropped to the rear. Still, this seemed rather a poor protection: at least, I had my recollection so full of the rapid motions of the same class of animals which I had seen baited at Mysore, that I could discover nothing which need have prevented the tiger from whipping off the heads of the rajah and the heir-apparent, or, at all events, that of their guest, who having no particular claims to the throne of Coorg, could reckon on none of the benefits of instinctive respect.

A troublesome story, too, respecting a touch of insanity in the rajah's family, recurred to my thoughts occasionally. I had heard somewhere of his predecessor calling for a fowling-piece one day in open durbar, and having ordered forth his cabinet-ministers, he deliberately popped them off, one by one, like sparrows—an honour to which, it is said, they submitted with edifying patience and propriety. I confess I felt rather queerish when he sent one of his family for a double-barrelled gun, a beautiful piece of workmanship, bearing the name of Joe Manton on the lock. I admired it of course.

"That piece," said the rajah, "was made here by one of my people."

I ventured respectfully to point to the name of the London maker.

"Pooh!" cried his highness, "what's in a name? The man who could make such a piece as this could surely copy a name. Bring the London gun."

And, strange to say, when the model from which one of his native gunsmiths had made the piece was placed in my hands, so exact was the imitation, I could scarcely tell which was the original, which the copy. On pulling the trigger of each, however, the difference in the viracity of the spring made the distinction apparent. I had often heard of their powers of imitation, but had no idea before of its extent.

When we had satisfied ourselves with an inspection of these pieces, the rajah gave orders for half a dozen tiger's cubs, about eight months old, and as many puppy-dogs, to be set to play before us on the carpet, while a full-grown royal tiger was at the same time dragged forward and pitted against a boar for a real battle in the open court. Any thing more disproportionate or absurd cannot be conceived than this match; and so, perhaps, the poor brutes thought, for fight they would not, although both of them were well thumped and forced against each other by the attendants. At length a brilliant thought struck the rajah.

"Tie them together!" exclaimed his majesty; and accordingly the rope which was fastened to the tiger's collar was hitched to the belly-band of the bear.

Neither party liked this. The tiger roared and the bear growled, while the rajah and his son laughed and clapped their hands in ecstasy at their own good joke. Of course the guards and courtiers joined in the mirth, and the whole quadrangle rung with mixed shouts of the soldiers, the growl of the bear, and the roar of the tiger. Of all the parties in this singular concert, the tiger appeared to be the most discomposed. His eye flashed fire, and his tail waved from flank to flank in the most ominous style. I thought at one time that this was to turn out no laughing matter; for, if the angry animal, when at length he lost all patience, had taken a direction towards us, he might have demolished the dynasty of Wadeer, or at least made a vacancy for an officer in his Britannic Majesty's Navy. Fortunately he chose exactly the opposite course, and running furiously across the court, made a flying leap right into one of the low windows of what the rajah called his English drawing-room. The glass and frame-work of the window were of course dashed to pieces in a moment, and the pianos, pictures and book-cases, must soon have shared the same fate, had not the tigers' progress been checked by the weight of the wretched bear, which hung outside, half-way between the window-sill and the ground, somewhat after the fashion of the golden fleece over a mercer's door. The tiger we could no longer see, but we could hear him smashing the furniture at a great rate.

The rajah, who naturally thought this was a little too much of a good thing, desired his people to enter the room, in order to catch hold of the ropes fastened to the tiger's collar, by which he had been brought forward in the first instance. This being accomplished, and the tiger secured, the rope connecting him and the bear was cut, upon which poor Master Bruin tumbled to the ground, no great height indeed, and off he moved very sulkily to his den. Meanwhile the tiger was dragged out of the house by main force, and sent to the rear.

As soon as order was restored, five elephants made their appearance, none of them standing less than thirteen feet high. At the bidding of the rajah, these grand fellows knelt down, prostrated themselves, rolled over on their sides, lifted their keepers in their trunks, and whirled them high in the air. In short, they went through all manner of gambols.

"Now," said the rajah, "let us have an elephant dance!"

I forgot to mention before, that on one side of the court a group of pretty dancing girls had been exhibiting all the time of the show, without attracting much notice. These ladies being ordered forwards, one of them was stationed before each of the elephants as a partner, and the keepers, slipping down from the animals' necks, seated themselves cross-legged on the ground, in front and within reach of the animals' forefeet. The music now struck up, the girls began to dance and sing, while the keepers, by touching the elephants' feet gently with little sticks, made them hobble likewise. As the unwieldy monsters jogged from side to side, they beat time with the ends of their trunks on the bare heads of their keepers, shook their monstrous ears, and stared at the girls. Never was any thing more grotesque! The effect, indeed, was so ludicrous, that even the poor Indian girls themselves appeared at a loss whether to laugh or to cry at being set to dance a jig with elephants to the tune of "Drops of Brandy," or some such exotic air—villanously played by Hindoo pipers—a glorious concourse of absurdities! The day was pretty well advanced before these sports were over, for we had still to witness sundry sheep-fights, and ram-fights, and an endless variety of antics by human tumblers.

At last the rajah broke up this queer durbar, or levee, ordered out the palankeens, wished me a safe descent of the Ghauts, and, as I thought, was about to dismiss me rather unceremoniously; but on the contrary, he did me the high honour to accompany me as far as the outer gate of the fort, on the hill, a distance of at least a mile from the palace. A double row of soldiers lined the road the whole way; and those being joined by many hundreds of labourers from the adjacent fields, the crowd became quite dense towards the end of the line. The most profound silence was observed, however, and as each person stood with his broad-bladed knife in his hands, raised nearly to his mouth, in what we should call an attitude of prayer, the palms being pressed together, the effect was very lively and striking. On reaching the gate the rajah presented me with one of the Coorg knives already described, and a handsome sandal-wood walking-stick.

The dress of these bold mountaineers is simple, and not inelegant. On their heads they wind a long white cloth into a broad flat turban, and round their bodies wrap a loose white frock, reaching two inches below the knee. This robe or tunic is tied round the waist with a shawl of more or less richness according to the wealth of the parties.

In the evening I found my way back to Eerajunderpet, and strolled into the woods in quest of adventures. What should I meet but a Roman Catholic priest, "all shaven and shorn," speaking a strange mixture of Portuguese, Spanish, and Hindustanee! As I possessed a slight smattering of each of these languages, we got on pretty well. Although this good padre had passed much more than half his life away from Portugal, he still took a lively interest in those distant scenes, which, as he said, he never hoped to visit again. He had heard, he told me, of the peninsular war, but he knew none of the details. The worthy missionary's thoughts, indeed, were much more earnestly engaged in works of peace and charity than in those of war and conquest. He showed me his native school, where a number of boys were taught to read, and, with an air of exultation, assured me he could reckon upon there being at least nine or ten hundred Christians in the Coorg country, of which the population is said to be fifty thousand.

Next morning I descended the celebrated Poodicherum Pass in the great Malabar Ghauts—a gorgeous specimen of rugged but well-wooded mountain scenery. At the bottom of the pass I found bearers who carried me to Erricore, and so onwards to Cananore, a very interesting trip along the coast.

After various common-place adventures and worrying delays, I reached Tellicherry, and lastly Mangalore, where I considered myself most fortunate in catching an English ship just sailing for Bombay, loaded with teak timber for the dock-yard. By taking advantage of the land-winds at night, and the sea breezes in the day, we reached our port within a few hours of the time to which Sir Samuel Hood had limited my excursion.

CHAPTER X.

VISIT TO THE SULTAN OF PONTIANA, IN BORNEO—MR SAMUEL HOOD.

In the summer of 1814, Sir Samuel Hood made a voyage, in his majesty's ship Minden, to the eastern parts of his station. We called first at Achien, on the north end of the island of Sumatra, where we held some very amusing intercourse with the king of that district, whose capital the admiral visited. From thence we steered over to Pulo Penang, or Prince of Wales's Island, and thence down the Straits of Malacca, entering the China Sea by the beautiful Straits of Singapore. The admiral's chief object was to visit Java; but as there lay three routes before him to choose between, viz. the Straits of Gaspar, the Straits of Banca, and the Caranata passage, he preferred taking the last and widest, which also led him near the western shore of the immense island of Borneo. On reaching the equator, he steered for the mouth of the great river Laya, which passes the town of Pontiana. The weather being very favourable, the ship was anchored, and the barge got ready for an expedition.

At four in the morning on receiving the joyful intimation that I was to be officer of the boat, I lost no time in getting together every thing likely to be useful—a sextant, artificial horizon, spy-glass, chart, compass, and Nautical Almanac, besides a Malay dictionary; for Sir Samuel, with his wonted ardour, had already commenced the study of that language, saying, and saying truly, that before our cruise amongst the eastern islands was over, he should cut us all out in speaking Malay. This boast he afterwards made good; for before he completed his travels in Java, he could maintain a conversation with the natives with very little assistance from the interpreter, merely by the help of a vocabulary, which he made for himself and carried in his pocket. He actually travelled over more than twelve hundred miles of ground on that island, during the last quarter of which, at the eastern end, I had the good fortune to accompany him. I had previously visited alone about seven hundred miles of the interior of that noisiest of all our insular possessions in the East.

It is truly grievous to think how unwittingly we allowed that magnificent possession to slip through our fingers, in 1814, at the grand settlement of affairs. But after the downfall of Bonaparte, such a game of check-farthing was played with kingdoms, that even a gigantic country like Java failed to excite its due share of notice, or was totally lost sight of in the haze which obscured every thing at a distance from the scene of excitement. We had some difficulty in finding our way in the barge, for the mouth of the river of Pontiana lay so completely hid amongst low cane brakes, mangroves, and other aquatic trees and shrubs, which grow thickly along the western shores of Borneo, that until we came quite close, no inlet was perceptible. The first hit we made proved wrong, and lost us three or four miles; and it was not till nearly noon that we reached the rush of fresh and troubled water, which indicated the true entrance. The admiral desired greatly to observe the sun's meridian altitude, saying, he had a childish sort of anxiety to take an observation exactly on the Equatorial line. His excellency, however, though he could command many things, could not command this; for although our fellows gave way lustily, so as to stem the current running out, and we had a full half hour to spare, we could not effect a landing in good time. On reaching what had seemed the shore, no footing could be found any where. Even the little boat which we carried with us in tow of the barge, though she threaded the mangrove stems and roots, and went in much farther than the barge, could not reach any thing like dry land. As the main bank refused to afford us a resting place, we put off, and rowed as briskly as we could to a small island about half a mile from this treacherous shore; but this, too, proved a cheat, for what we took to be solid ground consisted merely of a mass of green shrubs, growing on the ridge of a soft slippery mass of mud just peeping above the water.

As the sailors, by this time, were pretty well exhausted with rowing so long in the hot sun, they hailed with great joy the sea-breeze which just then set in. They soon stepped the masts, hoisted the sails, and laid the oars in.

"Now go to dinner, men," said the considerate chief, "this rattling breeze will not carry us up far, and you will pull all the better for a good bellyful."

Just as this judicious order was given, and while we were still laughing at the recent adventure, which reminded us of Sinbad's mistaking a whale for a solid rock, our eyes were attracted by the sight of another island, much smaller than the first. It seemed, indeed, like a little grove or tuft of palm-like foliage, rising out of the water somewhat in the fashion of our Prince of Wales's feather. None of the party had ever seen such a tree before, and every one tried to guess what it might be; but all were puzzled. At length, a diminutive moving black speck showed itself at the root, or centre, from which these fairy-like branches radiated.

"It is a rock with a tree on it," cried one.

"Pooh!" said Sir Samuel, "there are no rocks hereabouts; the soil for many a league is alluvial."

"It skims along like a witch," exclaimed a third; "it is surely alive!"

"Let us sail to it whatever it be," said the admiral, waving his hand to the cockswain to shoo the barge further from the side of the river.

As we drew near, we discovered our phenomenon to consist of a fishing canoe, gliding along merrily before the sea-breeze, with no other sails than half a dozen branches of the cocoa-nut tree placed in the bow, and spread out like the feathers of a peacock's tail. These were held together by a slender bar of bamboo, and supported by small strips of bark to the stern, in which sat a naked Malay.

The admiral proved a true prophet, for the deceitful sea-breeze presently lulled, and it cost us a very hard row to accomplish our purpose against the stream. The town of Pontiana stands on a low point of land formed by the confluence of two mighty rivers, names to us unknown. This particular spot is always held sacred in India, and is known under the Hindoo name of Sungum. I suspect, however, that the Malays and other Mahomedans, who inhabit the coasts of most of the Indian Islands, acknowledge no superstitious predilections for one spot more than another, and consider such things as mere prejudices unworthy of the followers of Mahomet, their great military prophet. Probably the Sungum point has some local advantages belonging to it, as I observe it is generally appropriated by the strongest party in every country. At all events, it has the advantage of communicating directly with both the rivers, by whose junction the Sungum, or solid angle, is formed. In the instance of Pontiana, the Mussulmen had taken possession of it, though it was formerly a Dutch settlement, while the Chinese were left to occupy the corners opposite to the Sungum, on the right and left banks, respectively, of the river formed by the junction of the two streams. Thus three considerable cities had been built facing one another, and each displaying on the river a multitude of boats and barges, canoes and proas, in crowds which would not have disgraced the show at London Bridge, and, of course, indicating considerable wealth and activity.

We came upon this grand view quite abruptly, and having no expectation of encountering any thing so magnificent, were taken rather by surprise. Two enormous Chinese junks occupied the centre of the stream, each of them rising out of the water nearly as high as the poop of a line-of-battle ship. Along the shore, on both sides, lay a fleet of eight or ten sail of junks, some of them very large, and all bearing enormous white flags, in the centre of which sprawled huge dragons and other monsters familiar to the eyes of all fanciers of old China jares.

This was the first time that many of us had seen genuine or unmixed specimens of Chinese or Malay towns on a great scale, and our admiration was great accordingly. In strict language, it cannot be said that these Chinese are at home in Borneo; but in point of fact, they certainly are so. The truth is, that China Proper is so much over-crowded, that its surplus population must find vent somewhere and somehow; and, in spite of the severest laws forbidding people to leave the celestial realm, they emigrate in vast numbers. In this respect the enactments of England against the export of guineas bear a close resemblance in their efficiency to those of China against the exportation of human beings. Be this as it may, it has so happened, that all the islands which lie to the eastward and southward of the China seas—the Philippines, the Moluccas, and the Isles of Sunda—possess large colonies of Chinese on their coasts.

I remember hearing, when I was in Batavia, that the Chinese population of that city alone amounted to thirty-five thousand. Indeed, persons who have attended much to the subject on the spot, assure me there is good reason to believe, that in process of time the Chinese will occupy exclusively the whole of the eastern islands. They are the most industrious of human beings, and are physically strong and energetic; they also possess a cheerfulness and patience of disposition which makes them careless about danger and difficulty. Nor are the Chinese entangled with any of the ritual superstitions of their Hindoo neighbours, and in that respect are even more free-souled than the Malays, their only rivals on the coasts of the Oriental archipelago—although I suspect that they are not very strait-laced Mussulmen. The Malays form at present a fringe of population round most of the islands in those seas, whatever may be the description of the inhabitants in the interior. This we certainly find to be the case along four or five hundred miles of the north coast of Java, but the moment we strike inland, a different and indigenous race appears. The Malays are the masters by sea, and, like a certain nation "throned in the West," are said to lord it in tolerably imperious style. On the other hand, the Chinese, who are the worst possible sailors, but who are agriculturists by nature and by necessity, as well as taste, are gradually outmastering the Malays along shore; and in time, I have little doubt, they will become the chief proprietors of the soil. They may then build forts at the mouths of the rivers, and bully the good folks of the interior. Thus, ages hence, Pontiana may become a second Antwerp; and protocols in Chinese, Malays, and Borneo, occupy all eastern men's thoughts from Timor to Formosa!

In the mean time, as there existed no dispute about the navigation of the River Laya, we rowed up very peaceably towards the great city of Pontiana. On our meeting a canoe with a Malay in it, the admiral, who had been studying Marsden's dictionary all the way, stood up in the barge, made the men lie on their oars, and to their great astonishment, and probably to that of the native, called out, in the Malay tongue,

"Which is the way to the sultan's house?"

To Sir Samuel's unspeakable delight the man whom he addressed understood him, and after offering to show us the landing-place, paddled off a head of us. Our fellows gave way as hard as they could, but the Malay kept the lead; and as we shot past the Chinese towns, one on each bank, the natives crowded to the beach, as much astonished, no doubt, with our strange cocked hats, swords, and oddly shaped boat, as we could be with their long tails and wild-looking junks, or with the crases which every Malay carries by his side. This fierce-looking weapon is not, in form, unlike the waving sword one sees in the pictures of the angel Michael, though it is not above a foot and a half in length.

The sultan's cousin received the admiral and his party at the gate of the palace, and led him by the hand along a causeway of flag stones to the residence of the monarch. Directly in the middle of the gateway, which was only ten feet wide and about as many in height, there stood a 24 pounder gun. On the top of the arch there was built a small square room, from holes in which peeped out the muzzles of five or six field-pieces, the whole affair resembling very much that part of a child's box of toys which represents the stronghold or castle. Within the high wall surrounding the palace, we counted innumerable large guns scattered about, apparently with no other object than to be seen—as if the mere look of a cannon were expected to do the work of a fight! The same number of mock barrels of gunpowder, similarly disposed, would have answered the purpose equally well, or perhaps better, for there appeared no way in which the guns could be fired, without doing more injury to the besieged than to the besiegers.

On we went, till we were met by the sultan himself, at the inner side of the quadrangle. He courteously conducted the admiral to a large room or hall of audience, and having begged his guest to sit down at a small table, took a chair by his side, and began a conversation as if they had been long acquainted. Of course, in spite of the admiral's proficiency, this could not be accomplished without an interpreter; and the services of a very clever Malay boy, whom we had brought with us from the ship, were brought into requisition. The hall, in which we were first received, might have been about fifty feet square, bleak, unfurnished, and comfortless, with an uncovered mud floor. It was so feebly lighted by a few windows almost hid by Venetian blinds, that we could only discover the roof had been left bare and unfinished. After sitting for about ten minutes, the sultan rose and led the way to another apartment, apparently of still larger dimensions, but literally so dark, that, had it not been for the light entering by the door we had left, and the one behind us, we could not have moved along without breaking our shins over the stones, sticks, and other rubbish in the way. We had next to make rather a difficult transit along a precarious kind of bridge, formed of a single plank laid across an ominous-looking pool or puddle of mud, which divided these two branches of the palace from each other.

All at once we were ushered into a splendid room, seventy or eighty feet square, brilliantly lighted and not ill furnished, but strongly contrasted with the darkness and dirtiness of the suite we had passed through. This total want of keeping, it may be mentioned, is quite an Oriental taste. They know tolerably well how to be magnificent on occasions; but they never learn how to be uniformly decent. The Asiatics, and even some other nations which might be named nearer home, can seldom afford to be taken by surprise. Indeed, I am not sure if more than one country can be alluded to, in which the people are at all hours ready to receive strangers, and have no occasion to make a fuss, or to change any thing when a rap comes to the door.

In the centre of this gorgeous room, on a part of the floor raised to about a foot and a half above the level of the rest, and laid with a rich Turkey carpet, stood a long table, at the top of which the sultan placed the admiral, and then made the signal for tea. First entered as the attendant, bearing a large tray, on which were ranged several dozens of exceedingly small cups. This he placed on the carpet, and then squatted himself down cross-legged, beside it. Another attendant soon followed bearing the tea-pot, and he likewise popped himself down. After a conjuration of some minutes the cups were brought round, containing weak black tea, exquisite in flavour, but not very small in quantity. There appeared no milk, but plenty of sugar candy. Some sweet sherbet was next handed round, very slightly acid, but so deliciously cool, that we appealed frequently to the vase or huge jar from which it was poured, to the great delight of the sultan, who assured us that this was the genuine sherbet described by the Persian poets. It was mixed, he told us, by a true believer, who had made more than one pilgrimage to Mecca.

At the upper end of the apartment, in a deep recess, partly hid from our view by a rich fratoon of shawl drape, we could just discover the sultan's bed, flanked by large mirrors, beyond which, in an adjacent chamber, was probably stowed away the sultan's most favoured wife. But all this department of the establishment was thrown into such deep shade, that we could see none of the ladies, nor any of his highness's progeny, except one little boy, whom he introduced to us at supper. He appeared to be about five or six years old, very like his papa in miniature, rigged with turban and robes of cloth of gold. At first the little fellow looked somewhat startled, but he soon recovered his dignity, and sat on our knees, without much apprehension of being swallowed up.

Both the upper corners of the room were screened off by white curtains, eight or ten feet high, so as to form smaller chambers. One of these served the purpose of a pantry, or subsidiary kitchen, at least we observed the dishes issuing from it, and thought we could distinguish the well-known sound of the cook's angry reproaches—a note which, like that of muttering thunder, is nearly the same in every climate. The other corner we soon made out to be a sort of temporary nook, from which the ladies of the palace and the young sultans and sultanas might spy the strangers. This we ascertained from seeing sundry very pretty faces thrust out occasionally between the folds of the curtain, and by the sound of many an ill-suppressed giggle amongst the peeping damsels.

A half-choked squall from some rebellious baby, or a sound thrack on the pate of an over-curious urchin, betrayed the nursery in terms not to be mistaken. Indeed, I do not wonder at their eagerness to look at the admiral, whose very appearance, in any company in the world, or under any circumstances, must have claimed no small share of admiration. The characteristic prominence of the Hood nose, so well known for a glorious half century in the navy, with the tall and gallant bearing of our lamented chief, to say nothing of the Nelson-like circumstance of his right arm having been shorn away in battle, and, I may add, the peculiar sweetness of his voice and the benignant expression of his countenance, which, while they won all hearts to him, showed a mind entirely at peace with itself. Every thing, in short, that was great and amiable, conspired to render Sir Samuel Hood one of the most interesting officers of his time.

The sultan appeared to enter into his guest's character at once, and neither overloaded him with attentions, nor failed to treat him as a person to whom much respect was due. I heard Sir Samuel say afterwards, that he was particularly struck with the sultan's good breeding, in not offering to assist him in cutting his meat. The sultan merely remarked, that few people were so expert as his guest even with both hands: adding, neatly enough, that on this account the distinction which his wound had gained for him was more cheaply purchased than people supposed. While the admiral was hunting for some reply to this novel compliment, his host remarked, that in Borneo it was considered fashionable to eat with the left hand.

The supper, which soon followed the tea, consisted of about a dozen dishes of curry, all different from one another, and a whole poultry yard of grilled and boiled chickens, many different sorts of salt fish, with great basins of rice at intervals, jars of pickles, piles of sliced pine-apple, sweetmeats, and cakes. Four male attendants stood by with goglets of cool sherbet, from which, ever and anon, they replenished our glasses; besides whom, a number of young Malay girls waited at a distance from the table, and ran about nimbly with the plates and dishes.

All persons who approached the sultan fell on their knees, and having joined their hands in the act of supplication, lowered their foreheads till they actually touched the ground. The sultan held out his hand, which the people eagerly embraced in theirs, and pressed to their lips. What they had to say was then spoken, and after again bending their foreheads to the ground, they retired. This ceremonial took place only in the outer room or hall of audience, for no one, except the strangers and one or two of the principal officers of state, was permitted to approach nearer than twenty or thirty feet of the raised part of the floor where we sat. At that distance, a group of about twenty persons, probably the nobles of the court, sat cross-legged on the ground in a semicircle facing the sultan, and in profound silence during the whole supper, no part of which appeared to fall to their share.

Soon afterwards the cloth was removed, and a beautiful scarlet covering, of the texture of a shawl, substituted in its place. This might, perhaps, give us a hint for after dinner. Instead of dull mahogany, or dazzling white, why might we not spread over the table a cloth couleur de rose for the benefit of the complexions of the company?

The sultan now produced a letter which he had received from Lord Minto, when governor-general, thanking his highness for the friendly disposition he had always manifested towards the English people trading to the great city of Pontiana, and in a particular manner expressing his obligations for the manner in which Mr. Palmer, a wealthy merchant of Calcutta, had been received by the sultan, when his ship was wrecked on the west coast of Borneo.

"Mr. Palmer," said the sultan, "lived for some weeks with me, and on returning to Calcutta, sent me these beautiful mirrors and chandeliers. But," added he, pointing again to the governor-general's letter, "much as I value embellishments so splendid, I esteem far more this little signature, and those few words from Lord Minto. Still," continued his highness, "my wishes in this respect have never been fully satisfied. I have long desired to possess a specimen of Sir Samuel Hood's writing; and though I never ventured to hope that I should have had an opportunity of seeing his signature written with his own hand, I have always felt how essentially that circumstance would add to its value in my estimation."

It was wonderful how well the shrewd little Malay interpreter expressed all this rigmale to the admiral, who cheerfully agreed to the proposal, and desired me to send for his writing case. As I rose, the admiral whispered to me, "I wish you would contrive, at the same time, to see what the boat's crew are about. Try, also, if you can get them something to eat; the fellows must be hungry enough by this time—but mind they don't get too much today."

I found the crew seated on the mud floor of a large room close to the beach, and open on all sides, like a tent without walls. The Johnnies were in such high glee, that I feared they had already trespassed too deeply on the toddy pot; but I was glad to find that their satisfaction arose from a safer source, in the shape of a glorious hot supper, which Jack was tucking in, to the delight and astonishment of the natives, who had been ordered by the sultan to supply them with as much curry and rice as they chose to eat. The cook had no sinecure of it that evening!

I soon returned to the palace, and the admiral, having written several lines for his host's album, expressed his wish to retire to rest. The sultan instantly rose, and having conducted his honoured guest to the outer door, he left him in charge of half a score of the principal officers of the palace, amongst whom were several of the sultan's own near relatives. This guard of honour accompanied Sir Samuel to his bed-room, and it cost him a good deal of trouble and some address to free himself from his company—their intention evidently being to bestow their tediousness upon his excellency all night.

Scarcely was this party dismissed, when to our great surprise, the sultan himself came to the door of the house in which the admiral and his suite were lodged. Sir Samuel feared that he might possibly have given offence to some of the worthy connections of the sultan by dismissing them too abruptly, and that the sultan had called for "an explanation." The honest Asiatic had no such gunpowder fancies in his head. On the contrary, the object of his visit was to press upon the admiral's acceptance two large and beautiful diamonds. The poor admiral was now reduced to a great dilemma. He could not, he thought, with any official propriety, accept the present; and yet he felt very unwilling to hurt the generous sultan's feelings, especially as his highness had paddled at midnight through the mud of his own approach to make the offer. The sultan saw at a glance what a mistake he had made, and instantly withdrew, laughing, however, and saying that such was the custom of his nation. I think the admiral was sorry afterwards that he had not carried in the boat some trinkets of correspondent value, or that he had not accepted the diamonds, and afterwards sent something still more precious to the sultan.

Very early in the morning, long before there was the least peep of dawn, the admiral roused us all out of bed, ordered the boat to be manned, and declared his intention of dropping down the river while it was yet cool, so as to reach the ship before the fierce heat of the sun had set in. I suspect, also, that he wished to escape the salutes and other fussifications, of which he had seen some preparations over night. But in this he partly reckoned without his host, for scarcely had we gained the distance of two or three hundred yards from the shore, when the heavy guns of the batteries began to fire a royal salute. The night was uncommonly dark and still, and the successive flashes and reports of the cannons were followed by a long series of echoes from the edges of the damp forests lining the banks of the three different branches or forks of the river. The admiral, who had the finest perception possible for all that was picturesque or beautiful, was exceedingly struck with the grandeur of this nocturnal salute, and having made the men lay their oars across the boat, while she drifted quickly down the river, he stood up in the stern-sheets in order to enjoy the scene more completely. At each of the first dozen discharges we were near enough to be illuminated by the flash, and a smile of delight could be seen on the veteran's countenance as sounds so dear to him once more caught his ear. It is not improbable that they recalled to his memory the glorious night action of the Nile; in which it is not too much to say, that amongst all the distinguished warriors whom Nelson had gathered round him, there was not one on whom his great chief more firmly relied in battle, or to whom, personally, he was more attached in private life.

A trifling incident occurred shortly afterwards, which suggested to our thoughts another important service of Sir Samuel Hood's, which, although it be familiarly known in the navy, may not be so fresh in the recollection of persons on shore. A question arose in the boat as to whether or not the land-wind was blowing. Some said there was a breeze up the river, while others maintained that the wind blew down towards the sea. The admiral let us go on speculating and arguing for some time, and then said, "You are both wrong; there is not a breath of air either up or down the river. At all events we shall soon see, if you will strike me a light." This was done accordingly; and the admiral, standing on the after-thwart, held the naked candle high over his head, while the men ceased rowing.

"There, you see," exclaimed he, "the flame stands quite upright, which proves, that if there be any breeze at all, it blows no faster than the stream runs down."

As he yet spoke, the flame bent from the land, and in the next instant was puffd out by a slight gust from the forest.

"Ah! that's something like!" exclaimed the commander-in-chief; adding, in an under tone, as he resumed his seat, "I have known the time when a flaw of wind not greater than has just blown out this candle has rendered good service to his majesty."

We knew what was meant, and so will every naval man; but others may be interested by being told, that early in the year 1794, when Captain Hood commanded his majesty's ship Juno, he had very nearly lost his ship in a most extraordinary manner. The port of Toulon, though in possession of the English at the time of his departure on a short trip to Malta, had been evacuated while the Juno was absent; and as the land was made in the night, no suspicion of that important change of affairs arose in the mind of any one. With his wonted decision, therefore, into the port he dashed; for, although the Juno carried no pilot, Capt. Hood's knowledge of every port he had once visited rendered him comparatively indifferent on that score. A couple of the sharpest-sighted midshipmen were stationed with glasses to look out for the fleet; but no ships were seen—for the best of all reasons—none were there!

One vessel, only, a small brig, could be detected, and the captain, supposing the fleet had run into the inner harbour during the recent easterly gale, resolved to push up likewise. The batteries all kept quiet, and though the brig hailed the frigate as she passed in a language so indistinct that no one could make it out, not the least suspicion was excited.

Captain Hood, in his official letter to Lord Hood, (see Naval Chronicle for 1807, vol. xvii. p. 11.) says, "I supposed they wanted to know what ship it was, and I told them it was an English frigate called the Juno." The brig, however, was not quite so courteous in return; for they merely replied by the word "Viva," but made no answer to the captain's repeated enquiry, both in English and French, as to the brig's name, and the position of the British admiral's fleet. As the Juno pressed under the stern of this treacherous little craft, a voice called out, "Luff! luff!" which naturally induced Captain Hood to put his helm down, from an idea that shoal water lay close to leeward of him. Nothing could have been more adroitly managed by the Frenchman, for before the frigate came head to wind, she struck fast upon the shoal, to which the words "Luff! luff!" had no doubt been intended to direct her.

A boat was now observed to proceed from the brig to the town. As there was but little wind, and the water perfectly smooth, the Juno's sails were clewed up and handed; but before the men were all off the yards, a gust of wind came sweeping down the harbour, and drove her off the shoal so suddenly as to give her brisk stern-way. The anchor was speedily let go, but when she tended, the after-part of her keel took the ground and the rudder could not be moved. The launch and cutter being instantly hoisted out, the usual preparations were made to lay out a kedge, to heave the ship off.

At this critical moment a boat came alongside. The people appeared anxious to get out of her, and two of them, apparently officers, came up the side. They said it was the regulation of the port, as well as the commanding officer's orders, that ships should go further into the harbour, there to perform ten days' quarantine. In the despatch relating this transaction, Captain Hood says,

"I kept asking them where Lord Hood's ship lay;" and those who remember Sir Samuel's impatient manner when any one to whom he addressed himself trifled with his questions, will easily imagine how he must have perplexed and overawed the two Frenchmen, who really knew not what to do or say next. In the mean time, one of the mid's, who happened to be thrusting his head forward after the investigating manner of this enterprising class of officers, said apart to the captain, "Why, sir, they wear national cockades!"

"I looked at one of their hats more steadfastly," says Captain Hood in his narrative, "and by the moonlight clearly distinguished the three colours."

"Perceiving they were suspected," continues Sir Samuel in his narrative, "and on my questioning them again about Lord Hood, one of them replied, 'Soyez tranquille, les Anglais sont de brave gens—nous les traitons bien; l'amiral Anglais est sortie il y a quelque temps.'"

Sir Samuel well says that it may be more easily conceived than words can express what he felt at that moment. In one instant, the situation of the poor Juno, which was almost desperate, became known throughout the ship. The officers naturally crowded round their captain to learn the worst, while the Frenchmen, bowing to the right and left, grinned and apologised for the disagreeable necessity of making them all prisoners! The rest of this singular story, unique in the history of the navy, and altogether wonderful considering the formidable nature of the trap into which the frigate had fallen, will be best told in the words of the accomplished officer himself, to whose presence of mind, courage, and professional dexterity, the escape of the ship was entirely due. The personal regard in which the captain was held by every officer, man, and boy on board, and the thorough confidence which they possessed in his talents, enabled him to undertake a service which an officer held in less esteem might have found it very difficult to carry through. It used, indeed, to be said of Hood's ship, that, fore and aft, there was but one heart and one mind.

After describing the deportment of the French officers, he goes on to say, in his despatch, that "a flaw of wind coming down the harbour, Lieutenant Webley" said to me, 'I believe, sir, we shall be able to fetch out if we can get her under sail.' I immediately perceived we should have a chance of saving the ship; at least if we did not, we ought not to lose her without some contention. I therefore ordered every person to their respective stations, and the Frenchmen to be sent below. The latter perceiving some bustle, began to draw their sabres; on which I directed some of the marines to take the half pikes and force them below, which was soon done. I believe in an instant such a change in people was never seen—every officer and man was at his duty; and I do believe, within three minutes every sail in the ship was set, and the yards braced ready for casting. The steady and active assistance of Lieutenant Turner and all the officers prevented any confusion from arising in our critical situation; and as soon as the cable was taut, I ordered it to be cut, and had the good fortune to see the ship start from the shore. The head sails were filled; a favourable flaw of wind coming at the same time gave her good way, and we had every prospect of getting out if the forts did not disable us. To prevent our being retarded by the boats, I ordered them to be cut adrift, as also the French boat. The moment the brig saw us begin to loose sails, we could plainly perceive she was getting her guns ready, and we also saw lights in all the batteries. When we had shot far enough for the brig's guns to bear on us, which was not more than three ships' lengths, she began to fire; also a fort a little on the star-board bow, and soon after all of them, on both sides, as they could bring their guns to bear. As soon as the sails were well trimmed, I bent to quarters to get our guns ready, but not with an intention of firing till we were sure of getting out. When abreast of the centre of Cape Sepet, I was afraid we should have been obliged to make a tack; but as we drew near the shore, and were ready to go about, she came up two points, and just weathered the cape. As we passed very close along that shore, the batteries kept up as brisk a fire as the witness of the weather would admit. When I could afford to keep the ship a little off the wind, I ordered some guns to be fired at a battery that had just opened abreast of us, which quieted them a little. We then stopped firing till we could keep her away, with the wind abast the beam, when, for a few minutes, we kept up a very lively fire on the last battery we had to pass, which I believe must otherwise have done us great damage. At half-past twelve, being out of reach of their shot, the firing ceased."

The whole of this admirable piece of service was performed so quickly, and at the same time with so much coolness, that there occurred little or no opportunity for any remarkable individual exertion. Every thing, as I have heard it described by Sir Samuel Hood himself and by the officers, went on as if the ship had been working out of Plymouth sound at noonday. One little incident, however, which caused much amusement in the ship, will help to show the degree of regard in which Sir Samuel was held by those immediately about him; and to disprove the proverb of no man being a hero to his valet de chambre.

Dennis McCarty, an old and faithful servant of Captain Hood, who was quartered at one of the main-deck guns in the cabin, stood firm enough till the batteries opened on the Juno. No sooner had the firing commenced, and the shot came whizzing over and through all parts of the ship, than Dennis, to the great amaze and scandal of his companions, dropped the side tackle-fall, and fairly ran off from his gun. Nothing in the world, however, could be further from poor Pat's mind than fear—except fear for his master, behind whom he soon stationed himself on the quarter-deck; and wherever Captain Hood moved there Dennis followed, like his shadow. The poor fellow appeared totally unconscious of any personal danger to himself, though the captain was necessarily in the hottest of the fire. At length Sir Samuel, turning suddenly round, encountered the Irishman full butt.

"Ho! Master Dennis," exclaimed the captain, "what brings you here? and why do you keep running about after me? Go down to your gun, man!"

"Oh, by the powers! your honour," replied Dennis, "sure I thought it likely you might be hurt, so I wished to be near you to give you some help."

There was no resisting this; the captain laughed in the midst of the battle; and poor Dennis was allowed to take his own way, having no care for himself.

It would be quite impossible, within any moderate compass, even to enumerate the important services which Sir Samuel Hood rendered to his country, both before and after the time alluded to; nor can it be necessary to do so, for they are still so fresh in the recollection of the navy that they are often quoted as examples in every walk of duty. His forte appears to have been that invaluable quality of all great commanders, promptitude in seeing what was best to be done, and decision of purpose in carrying it into execution. At the moment of greatest doubt and difficulty, and when scarcely any one else could see through the confusion, he appears invariably to have taken those useful practical views which the almost subsequent reflection proved to have been the most expedient.

One of the most important, and also the most amusing instances of the effect of his resolute and characteristic presence of mind and boldness of manner, occurred in the summer of 1797, when Nelson attacked the town and fortifications of Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe. The enterprise failed; Nelson was wounded and carried on board in the only boat not captured or destroyed, while the remaining officers and men were necessarily left without any means of defence or escape. Sir Thomas Troubridge and Captain Hood now found themselves in the very heart of the town, at the head of only a handful of seamen and marines carrying merely a few pikes, but surrounded by several thousands of well-armed Spaniards. As the boats had been all demolished in the surf, or knocked to pieces by the fire of the batteries, retreat became impossible, and capture or destruction would inevitably have awaited them the moment daybreak showed their small numbers and wretched plight. In this dilemma Captain Hood went forward alone to the Spanish governor, and said he was sent by the commanding officer of the British troops and seamen within the walls to state, that as they had been disappointed in their expectation of finding treasure in the town, they were disposed to return peaceably to their ships, if boats were provided them for that purpose, but that should any means be taken to molest or retard them, they would then set fire to the town in different places, and force their way out of it at the point of the bayonet. With the utmost deliberation, and without betraying the smallest haste or anxiety, he then pulled out his watch, and said, "I am directed to give you ten minutes to consider of this offer."—See the Naval Chronicle, volume xvii. page 19.

Don Antonio, the governor, looked amazed at the coolness of this proposal from persons whom he conceived—and with good reason—to be his prisoners. He proposed to hold a council of war immediately, and let the British commander know their determination in the course of an hour; but Captain Hood saw the impression which his argument had produced, and again holding up his watch, declared he could not spare his excellency a single second; and as the fatal minute approached, he turned round and prepared to rejoin his shipmates. The governor, alarmed at the possible consequences of driving men so commanded into extremities, acceded to the proposals made by Captain Hood, and agreed to provide the defeated party with boats.

Next morning, accordingly, the Spaniard, having once pledged himself to certain terms, kept good faith, and not only allowed them all to return to their ships, but, previously to the embarkation of the invaders, he considerably furnished each of the sailors with a bowl of wine and a biscuit, filled their boats with fruit and other refreshments, and gave orders that such of the British as had been wounded should be received into the Spanish hospital!

It is by such deeds of true nobleness that the superiority of actual war is softened, and that kindly feelings take the place of that bitterness which only excites to angry retaliation, without at all advancing the great objects for which opposing nations are contending.

I have often thought that much of this kindness on the part of the generous Don, as well as the more important part of the service, may have been due chiefly to the more personal address of Sir Samuel Hood, whose appearance and manner were at all times unspeakably winning, and especially pleasing to the well-bred Spaniards. As these outward qualities were backed by solid judgment, professional knowledge, and the most thorough disinterestedness, he became almost irresistible, even on occasions when most other men might have seen little hope of success. It is not, then, surprising that a mind like Nelson's should attach itself cordially to that of Sir Samuel Hood, or that every successive incident of their joint services should rivet more closely and firmly the alliance of such kindred spirits.

There entered into the character of Sir Samuel Hood some peculiarities which, although I have never seen them stated, appear well to deserve the attention of professional men. When it is said that he was thoroughly disinterested, it must not be thought that he was indifferent to his own share of credit which belonged to meritorious service: for he conceived his own reputation, and that of the profession, as identical with that of the country, and in proportion as he rose in fame and rank, so this obligation to preserve his renown unsullied appears to have pressed upon his mind. But whenever the accession of credit became merely individual or personal to himself, and did not seem in his eyes calculated likewise to augment the honour of the service as well as his own, he not only felt careless about it, but actually staved off the honour and glory, which other men might have eagerly courted.

Of this a remarkable instance was afforded at the battle of the Nile. Previous to entering into that great action, Nelson, as every one recollects, hailed Captain Hood's ship, and consulted him as to the best method of attack.

"What think you," said the admiral, "of engaging the enemy to-night?"

"I don't know the soundings," was the answer, "but, with your permission, I will lead in and try."

The result is well known; but I believe it is not so generally known that, in the first draft of the despatch which Nelson wrote, he gave to Captain Hood the merit of confirming him in his determination of attacking the French fleet that night. On showing this letter, however, to Hood himself, he entreated that it might be altered, saying, "that they were all brothers, engaged in the cause, and that the admiral would have received exactly the same advice from any other captain in the fleet whom he might have consulted." The paragraph was therefore omitted in the despatch. But on many accounts this omission is certainly to be regretted; for it essentially adds to the true credit of Nelson himself, instead of diminishing it, that he not only knew how to estimate such concurrence in opinion, but how to acknowledge and reward the services of men of Sir Samuel Hood's stamp.

I have this anecdote of the change in the despatch from one of his nearest connections, and one of the dearest friends to his memory. He himself particularly wished the alteration in the despatch not to be told at the time; but as the story crept out somehow, it seems very material that the facts should be well authenticated. When the circumstance was mentioned to Sir Samuel Hood many years afterwards, by the friend from whom

* Now Captain Webley Parry, C. B., long afterwards the friend and follower of Sir Samuel Hood, who, as may well be supposed, never forgot any of the men who stood by him at that most trying hour of his professional existence.

I have received authority to state it, and he was asked if they were true, he confessed that it was so; but exclaimed, "How the devil could all this have got wind? I never mentioned it before to a living soul."

As there is hardly any professional anecdote which retains its freshness of interest more entire than the memorable parley above described between Nelson and Hood on the eve of the battle of the Nile, I venture to give another version of it, which is substantially the same, and is calculated to confirm, in a pleasing manner, all that is essential. The following particulars I have been favoured with by Captain Webley Parry, then first lieutenant of the Zealous.

When steering for the enemy's fleet, Sir Horatio Nelson hailed the Zealous, and asked Captain Hood if he thought he might venture to bear up round the shoals. The answer was—

"I cannot say, sir; but if you will allow me the honour of leading into action, I will keep the lead going."

"You have my permission, and I wish you good luck," was the reply; and as Nelson said this he took off his hat. Captain Hood, in his hurry to return the courtesy of his admiral, dropped his hat overboard. He looked after it, laughed, and exclaimed, "Never mind, Webley, there it goes for luck! Put the helm up, and make all sail."

Captain Foley of the Goliath, being close to the Zealous, perceiving this manœuvre, guessed what the orders were, and bore up likewise, so that when the two ships had shaped their course, they were nearly abreast of each other. The Goliath being a little in advance, which of course was rather annoying, Captain Hood stood on for some time, in hopes of being able to take the lead in the Zealous, but finding this could not be done without jostling and confusion, he turned round and said—

"This will never do! Well—never mind; Foley is a fine, gallant, worthy fellow. Shorten sail, and give him time to take up his berth. We must risk nothing that will tend to the enemy's advantage; and we shall all soon have enough to do."

This was instantly done; the Goliath shot ahead, and Captain Foley had the glory of leading the British fleet into action. By some accident, however, he failed to place the Goliath in opposition to the headmost ship of the enemy's line. The experienced eye of Hood instantly saw the inevitable consequence, and while the Goliath passed on to the second in the line, Sir Samuel placed his own ship, the Zealous, alongside the first, exclaiming, in the joy of his heart, "Thank God! my friend Foley has left me the van ship!"

The following private letter, written some time afterwards, from Lord Nelson, is so characteristic of the writer, and so flattering to Sir Samuel, that I venture to insert it.

"St. George, March 13, 1801.

"MY DEAR HOOD,—Many thanks for your kind letter; and believe me, there is not a man breathing that loves you more than myself. I am glad you have quitted the Courageux; she would have drowned you in chase of an enemy's squadron. I have directed four crosses to be made, and they are this day sent to Mr. Davidson's, I expect. I send you an order (of St. Ferdinand and Merit). No; I have written to Davidson to deliver it to Troubridge, who will send it you; it is to be worn round your neck like the order of St. Anne. I send you a piece of riband to suspend it by. We sail to-morrow for Yarmouth. I only hope Cornwallis will meet the French fleet, and that you will be in company. Ever, my dear Hood, your obliged and affectionate

"NELSON AND BRONTE.

"CAPTAIN HOOD."

The mixture of affection, business, playfulness, and professional allusions, in this short letter, is strikingly indicative of the intimacy and full understanding which existed between these distinguished officers. It is always delightful, when one gets a peep behind the scenes, to find such men on terms of true friendship.

The whole life of Sir Samuel Hood proves that he never took into his calculations what effect any particular measure might or might not have upon his individual reputation or fortunes, but that he looked exclusively to its probable effect upon the interests and honour of his country and the service. He possessed, it is true, the keenest possible relish for well-earned fame; but he enjoyed no applause which came unconnected with the general good; and his anxiety about his own reputation, which was very great, and to which I have already alluded, rested upon what he conceived the true view of professional principle and public spirit in its most genuine acceptance. Every action of his life showed that he was not only far beyond the reach of any envious feeling, but that his chief pleasure was to bring forward merit wherever it was to be found, and he was always more ready to bestow distinction than to claim it for himself. Whenever it became his good fortune to act with the army, he brought these principles into the most useful play, to the advancement of the public service, and greatly to the satisfaction of his sister service.

It is also highly delightful, as well as instructive, to know that these generous sentiments were speedily participated by all those who enjoyed his confidence, and worked along with him. I am indeed persuaded that he very often converted selfish and sulky officers into useful and cheerful public servants, in no great length of time, and not unfrequently to their own great surprise. What, then, must have been the extent of his influence over the minds of men similarly disposed with himself?

When, unfortunately for the profession and for his country, he fell sick at Madras, and knew that his last moments were fast approaching, he called his faithful friend, and old follower in many ships and many actions, Lieutenant (now Captain) Walcott, to his bed side, and said to him—

"It will be too hard, Walcott, to die in this cursed place; but should I go off, let nothing deter you from going home and accounting to the admiralty for my command of the East India station."

These were nearly the last intelligible words he uttered; and they serve to show how strong, even in the hour of death, was his sense of professional duty. As Lieutenant Walcott had served during the whole of Sir Samuel's India command in the double capacity of flag-lieutenant and secretary, and had enjoyed the admiral's entire confidence, he, and he alone, possessed the means of "accounting to the admiralty" for the measures completed, or in progress, for the good of the service, and therefore the admiral suggested to him the propriety of his going home to report matters in person.

The senior officer, who succeeded to the command in the Indian seas, felt so desirous of following up the friendly intentions of his lamented predecessor, that knowing the late admiral's attachment to Lieutenant Walcott, he offered to promote him into a death vacancy, which had either actually taken place, or was certain to fall within a week or two. Moreover, he assured him, that after the necessary time had been served, he should have the first vacancy for post promotion.

These were indeed tempting offers to a young officer devotedly attached to his profession; but they had no influence over a man bred in the "Sam Hood school." The admiral's dying injunction appeared to this right-minded officer fully as binding, or, if possible, more so, than a written command must have been in his life-time.

To England Walcott went accordingly; and the difference in professional standing which it made to him was this: had he remained in India, as Sir Samuel Hood's successor proposed, he would undoubtedly have become a post-captain of 1816, instead of which, his name now stands in 1822, six years later on the list! Had it been sixty times six, however, it would have made no difference in his conduct.

Along with all this professional merit, which won for Sir Samuel Hood the devoted respect of every one who served with him, there were mingled qualities of a nature more domestic and endearing, but not less decided. The unaffected suavity of his disposition, the absence of all affectation from his manners, and the kindly alacrity with which he entered into the wishes and feelings of others, won all hearts to him, from the depths of the cockpit even to the "throne's height." Of this some pleasing examples occurred when he returned to England, immediately after the loss of his arm.

When it was decided that he should be taken ashore at Ryde in the Isle of Wight, his cot was laid on a grating, and the cabin bulk-heads being knocked down, the wounded chief was hoisted out and lowered into the boat. "The whole ship's company, man and boy, came on deck, and I shall never forget this most affecting scene," writes an eye-witness, "for you would really have thought every man in the ship was his brother!"

In the course of the same evening, a lady and gentleman called at Sir Samuel's lodgings at Ryde, not for the idle curiosity of asking how the wounded commodore was, but with the considerate purpose of mentioning what they imagined would give him pleasure. They had that day received a letter from a gentleman holding a high situation in the household of George III., stating that the good old monarch, who was much attached to Sir Samuel, had actually shed tears when he heard of his loss, and exclaimed—

"Would to God the French had their frigates again, and poor Hood his arm!"

The affectionate respect of his ship's company in the morning had touched him closely; but this extension of sympathy quite unmanned the veteran warrior.

Of his friendly disposition to all persons whom he had it in his power to oblige, I could give many anecdotes. The following little circumstance, however, is so characteristic that it may suffice.

When the army returned from Spain, after the battle of Corunna, in 1809, there were between twenty and thirty officers accommodated in Sir Samuel's cabin. Notwithstanding the almost constant pain in his leg from an old wound, he gave up his cot to one of these gentlemen who was wounded, and slept himself either on the deck, or on a carronade slide during the whole passage. It happened that amongst these officers there was a distant connection of Lady Hood's, and so remarkable did the admiral's attention to him appear, that the young man very naturally ascribed the notice he received to this circumstance. But when the father and mother of the young man afterwards called upon the admiral to thank him for the uncommon kindness he had shown to their son, they learnt that Sir Samuel had not only been totally ignorant of the connection alluded to, but did not even know that a person of that name had been on board his ship during the passage!

"Indeed," said he, "I hardly knew the names of half my guests. But who," he continued, "would make any distinctions amongst such war-worn and brave fellows?"

The curious fact is, such was his general kindness, that each of these military officers, his passengers, fancied the admiral was more civil to him than to any one else. He suspended on this occasion all the usual strict-laced etiquettes of the quarter-deck discipline, and permitted the harassed soldiers to lie down and read between the guns, or wherever they pleased. His great delight was to coddle them up, and recompense them, as far as he could, for the severe privations they had undergone during Sir John Moore's retreat, and nothing entertained him so much as seeing the relish with which these hungry campaigners partook of his hospitality! On the day after the battle of Corunna, when these gentlemen came on board, he ordered a cock to be driven into a hoghead of prime old Sherry; and his satisfaction was perfect, when his steward, with a rueful countenance, communicated to him, on arriving at Spithead, that "his very best cask of wine had been drunk dry on the passage by the soldier officers!"

CHAPTER XI.

BOMBAY.

I have seen some persons who, after losing their friends, their health, or their fortunes in India, have looked back to that bright country without pleasure; but I am not sure that I ever met any one who arrived in it without great satisfaction, or who could hail the first glimpse of a world so totally new without feelings of curiosity more than commonly excited. For my own part, I was thrown into a high fever of wonder and enjoyment; and assuredly, as long as I have a trace of memory left, must retain the recollection of that happy period carved brightly and distinctly on my mind.

Early on the morning of the 11th of August, 1812, we first made the coast of Asia; and, on steering towards the shore, discovered, close under the land, a single sail, as white as snow, of a cut quite new to our seamanship, and swelled out with the last faint airs of the land-breeze, which, in the night, had carried us briskly along shore. As we came nearer, we observed that the boat, with her head directed to the northward, was piled half mast high with fruits and vegetables, cocoa-nuts, yams, plantains, intended evidently for the market of Bombay. The water lay as smooth as that of a lake; so we sheered close alongside, and hailed, to ask the distance we still were from our port. None of the officers of the Volage could speak a word of Hindustanee; and I well remember our feeling of humiliation when a poor scullion, one of the cook's assistants, belonging to the governor's suite, was dragged on deck, with all his grease and other imperfections on his head, to act as interpreter. Sad work he made of it; for, though the fellow had been in the East on some ten or twelve former voyages, the languages of the countries he visited had not formed so important a part of his studies as the quality of the arrack and toddy which they produced. The word Bombaya, however struck the ear of the native boatmen, who pointed in the direction to which they themselves were steering, and called out "Mombay! Mombay!" This word, I am told by an oriental scholar, is a corruption of Moomba-devy, or the goddess of Moomba, from an idol to which a temple is still dedicated on the island. Others, less fanciful in their etymology, say that the Portuguese gave it the name of Bom-Bahia, on account of the excellence of its port. That nation held possession of Bombay from the year 1530 to 1661, when it was ceded by the crown of Portugal in full sovereignty to Charles II.

It was not long before we came in sight of several headlands, which are so well described by that great hydrographer, my excellent friend Captain James Horsburgh, that we knew our place almost as well as if we had been sailing between the Motherbank and Spithead. When the next day broke, and the sun rose upon us over the flat-topped Ghauts, or mountains of the Mahratta country, I remember feeling almost at a loss whether I had been sleeping and dreaming during the night, or, whether the gay reality, with its boundless vista of promises, was still before my eyes. The imagination and the reason were both more or less heated by the simple facts of having actually seen the shores of India, having heard the language of the East from the mouths of its natives, and beheld the forms and figures, and that dusky aspect which induced its northern and fair-complexioned conquerors of old to style their new possession Hindoostan, or land of 'black men.' All these circumstances, though trivial, it is true, in themselves, were well calculated to give reality to pictures which, for many a long year before, I had busied my fancy with painting in colours drawn partly from the Arabian Nights and Persian Tales, and partly, if not chiefly, from those brilliant clusters of Oriental images which crowd and adorn the pages of Scripture.

Besides the mere picturesque feelings excited by such reflections, I had accidentally acquired others somewhat more substantial perhaps, and practically useful, from being thrown a good deal into the society of officers who had served in various parts of India, and called my attention to the histories and to the political arrangements of our possessions in the East. What with fiction and what with truth, therefore, my head was pretty full of combustible materials, ready to be acted upon at once by any thing and every thing that should meet the eye on landing.

Captain Cook asserts somewhere, when speaking of the delights of voyaging and travelling, that to such rovers as he and his companions, nothing came amiss; and I can safely venture to boast, that, as far as this goes, I may claim a corner of my great brother-officer's mantle. At all events, in sailing over the Indian seas, or travelling in those countries by land, I not only never met any thing that came amiss, but hardly ever met any thing which did not so much exceed in interest what I had looked for, that the grand perplexity became, how to record what was felt, or in any adequate terms to describe even the simplest facts, which struck the eye at every turn in that "wide realm of wild reality."

Of all places in the noble range of countries so happily called the Eastern world, from the pitch of the Cape to the islands of Japan, from Bengal to Batavia, nearly every hole and corner of which I have visited in the course of my peregrinations, there are few which can compare with Bombay. If, indeed, I were consulted by any one who wished as expeditiously and economically as possible to see all that was essentially characteristic of the Oriental world, I would say, without hesitation, "Take a run to Bombay; remain there a week or two; and having also visited the scenes in the immediate neighbourhood, Elephanta, Carli, and Poonah, you will have examined good specimens of most things that are curious or interesting in the East."

For this remarkable distinction, quite peculiar, as far as I know, to that one spot on the earth's surface, this presidency is indebted to a variety of interesting circumstances. Bombay, as perhaps many people may never have heard before, is an island, and by no means a large one, being only between six and seven miles long by one or two broad. It is not, however, by geographical dimensions that the wealth of towns, any more than the power and wealth of nations is determined. The harbour unites every possible desideratum of a great seaport: it is easy of access and egress; affords excellent anchoring ground; is capacious beyond the utmost probable demands of commerce; and, owing to the great rise and fall of the tides, is admirably adapted for docks of every description. The climate is healthy; and the ground, being diversified by numerous small ridges and hills, furnishes an endless choice of situations for forts, towns, bazaars, and villages, not to say bungalows or villas, and all sorts of country-houses, and some very splendid retreats from the bustle of business. The roads which intersect this charming island were beautifully Macadamised, as I well remember, long before that grand improvement was heard of in England; and as the soil of the island is made up of that rich kind of mould resulting from decomposed basalt or lava, the whole surface affords a good sample of the perennial verdure of tropical scenery, which dazzles and surprises the new comer, while its interest seldom, if ever, fails to rise still higher upon a more prolonged and intimate acquaintance.

Such are among the eminent physical advantages enjoyed by Bombay; but even these, had they been many times greater, would have been light in the balance compared to those of a moral, or rather of a political nature, which conspired in 1812 to render it one of the most important spots in that quarter of the globe. At the time I speak of, it was almost the only possession exclusively British within several hundred miles in any direction. The enormous territory of the Mahrattas lay close to Bombay on the east; and I mention this one district because the name is more or less familiar to English ears, chiefly, perhaps, from its having been the scene of the Duke of Wellington's earliest campaign in command of an army. The brilliant course of that service was wound up by the well-known battle of Assaye, not the least hard fought of his hundred fields. Assaye is about twice as far from Bombay as Waterloo from London. To any one familiar with modern Indian history, the name of Bassoon, where one of the most celebrated treaties that ever statesmen agreed upon was signed, will be well remembered. Then who is there that has not heard of the caves of Elephanta, those singular temples of the old Hindoos, excavated on the side of a hill on an island in the very harbour, and within one hour's row from the fort?

These, and many other circumstances, some military, some historical, give a very peculiar degree of liveliness to the interest we feel in that spot; and I certainly have as yet seen very few places on the globe which fasten themselves with more tenacity on the memory. I allude chiefly to matters of taste, association, and other refinements, with which the natives of the countries surrounding Bombay have no concern. To them it possesses, or did then possess, exclusively, an interest of a different and far more important character. At that time it was almost the only spot in that range of country where persons and property were perfectly secure, and in which all men might safely display and enjoy their wealth to the utmost limits of their taste for ostentatious parade, or hoard it as parsimoniously as they pleased, without the slightest chance of arbitrary interference. In addition to this, every form of religious worship was not merely tolerated, but allowed to exercise itself with the most ample and equal freedom. Every native of Asia, or of any other country in the world, so long as he infringed none of the established laws of the presidency, was allowed equal privileges; and as the advantages of security and freedom, in the most genuine senses of these words, were enjoyed under none of the native governments adjacent, but, on the contrary, were almost entirely unknown in them all, Bombay became the natural place of resort for the wealthy from all parts of India lying on that side of the peninsula, and indeed from many other regions much more remote.

The population of Bombay is about two hundred thousand; and I think it may be said with truth, that we can see nothing in China, or Java, or the Philippine Islands, or along the Malay Peninsula, or even in the interior parts of India, any single caste, or dress, or custom, or form of superstition, or any thing else, belonging peculiarly to Eastern manners, which we may not witness at Bombay in as genuine and apparently unsophisticated a condition as on the spot to which it properly belongs. In twenty minutes walk through the bazaar of Bombay, my ear has been struck by the sounds of every language that I have heard in any other part of the world, uttered not in corners and by chance, as it were, but in a tone and manner which implied that the speakers felt quite at home. In the same short space of time I have counted several dozens of temples, pagodas, joss-houses, and churches; and have beheld the Parsees, the lineal religious descendants of Zoroaster, worshipping fire; the Hindoos, with equal earnestness bowing their heads to Baal in the shape of a well-oiled black stone, covered with chaplets of flowers and patches of rice; while in the next street the Mahometan ceremonies of the grand moharem were in full display; and in the midst of all a Portuguese procession bearing an immense cross, and other Roman catholic emblems as large as life.

I have no language competent to give expression to the feelings produced by the first contemplation of so strange a spectacle. I was startled, amused, deeply interested, and sometimes not a little shocked. The novelty of the scene was scarcely diminished by a further inspection; which may appear a contradiction in terms, but is not so in reality. The multitude of ideas caused by the first view of such an astonishing crowd of new and curious objects, obscures and confuses the observation, in a certain sense, and prevents us from distinguishing one part from another. In like manner, I remember being almost stupefied with astonishment, when Sir John Herschel first showed me one of the great nebulae or clusters of stars in his telescope at Slough. When, however, the philosopher unfolded the results of his own observations, and ventured to separate and distinguish the different orders of nebulae and double stars, or pointed the instrument to the planet which his illustrious father discovered, and made me understand, or tried to make me understand, the revolutions of its satellites, I felt the confusion by which I was at first distracted gradually subsiding, while the fresh interest of the spectacle, strictly speaking, was greatly increased. And so I found it in India, especially at that most curious of places, Bombay, where the more I saw of the natives, the more there seemed still to discover that was new. It would be absurd to pretend that all this poetic kind of reasoning process took place at the moment, for, in truth, I was too much enchanted to speculate much on the causes of the enjoyment. I shall never forget, however, the pleasure with which I heard a native, with a bowl in his hand, apply to a dealer in corn for some of the grain called sesamé. The word, in strictness, is not the Indian name for this seed, though it is used generally in the peninsula of Hindustan, and forms one of the ingredients of curry-powder. Til is the native word for the plant from which the oil of sesamé is expressed. I need not say how immediately the sound recalled the "open, sesamé!" of the Arabian Nights; and the whole of the surrounding scene being in strict accordance with that of the tale, I felt as if I had been touched with some magic wand, and transported into the highest heaven of Eastern invention. As I gazed at all things round me in wonder and delight, I could fix my eye on nothing I had ever seen before. The dresses, in endless variety of flowing robes and twisted turbans, flitted like a van before me. The Hindoos, of innumerable castes, were there, each distinguished from the other by marks drawn with brilliant colours on his brow. There stood Persian merchants with shawls and other goods from Cashmere mingled with numerous Arab horse-dealers carrying about; Malays from the Straits of Malacca, chatting familiarly with those good-natured, merry fellows, the long-tailed Chinese, whose most ungraceful Tartar dress and tuft contrast curiously in such a crowd with the tastefully arranged drapery and gorgeous turbans of the Mahometans and Hindoos.

Some of these groups were fully as much distinguished by their sandals and slippers as by their head-gear; others arrested the attention by the sound of their voices, and many by the peculiarity of their features and complexion. It really signified little which way the eye was turned, for it could rest on nothing, animate or inanimate, which was not strange and full of interest. Most of the trees which shaded us, and especially a tall variety of the palm tribe, commonly called the Brah, I had never seen before. It is called by botanists Borassus flabelliformis, or Tara Palm; Tara or Tair being the native word for the toddy which is yielded by these trees. It grows, in respect to its stem, like the cocoanut, with a glorious set of projecting arms at the top. But these branches, unlike those of the cocoanut, do not send out lateral leaves along their whole length like the ostrich feather, which the cocoanut leaf resembles very much in form. They are smooth and naked to the end, and which is opened out, rather fantastically a huge circular leaf, marked with divisions like those of a fan, radiating from a centre, each ray or division being sharp-pointed.

But the chief object of attraction and I may well say of admiration, in this gay scene, was the appearance of the women, who are not only not concealed, but go about freely, and, generally speaking, occupy themselves out of doors in works not requiring any considerable strength, but a good deal of dexterity. Of course, this does not include the highest classes, who are kept quite secluded. The females appear to be the great water-carriers; and the pots or chaties, as they are called, which are invariably borne on the head, are of the most elegant form imaginable. Indeed, when standing by the side of a Hindoo tank, or reservoir, as I have often done for hours together, I have been reminded of those beautiful Etruscan vases, the discovery of which has given so great a character to modern forms. This practice of carrying all loads on the head is necessarily accompanied by an erect carriage of body, and accordingly the most graceful of dancers, even the matchless Bigottini herself, might have from observing the most ordinary Hindoo girl on her return from the tank, with her hand sometimes just touching the vessel poised on her head, and sometimes not, so true is the balance, and so certain the bearer's step. The dress of these women consists chiefly of one strip of cloth, many yards in length. This narrow web is wound round the body and limbs with so much propriety, that while the most scrupulous delicacy could find nothing to censure on the score of deficiency in covering, it is arranged with such innate and judicious taste that even the eye of a sculptor could hardly wish many of its folds removed. The figure of the Hindoos, both male and female, is small and delicate; and, although their features are not always handsome, there is something about their expression which strikes every stranger as singularly pleasing, perhaps from its being indicative of that patience, docility, and contentment, which are certainly their chief characteristics. We see at least, in every part of our Eastern empire, that with a little care, coupled with a full understanding of their habits and wishes, and backed by a thorough disinterestedness and genuine public spirit on the part of their rulers, the above-mentioned qualities of the Hindoos may be turned to the highest account in all the arts of war, and many of the arts of peace.

"Snatched a grace beyond the reach of art,"

Perhaps not the least curious sight in the bazaar of Bombay are the ornaments worn by the women and children, by which, with the most lavish profusion, and the most ill-directed taste, they succeed in disfiguring themselves as much as possible. And this might lead us almost to suspect that their taste in the other parts, like the gracefulness of their carriage, is the result, not of choice and study, but of happy accident. The custom of carrying their water-vessels on the head requires an erectness of gait during the performance of that duty, which may become the easiest and most natural at other times. And probably some circumstance incident to the climate may, in like manner, direct the fashion in adjusting the drapery.

Most of the women wear nose-rings of great dimensions. I have seen many which hung below the chin; and certainly to us this seems a strange ornament. I forget whether or not the Hindoo women cover their fingers with rings as our ladies do, but their principal fashion seems to consist in loading the wrists and ankles with armlets and bangles, as they are called, of gold and silver. The virgin gold generally used for this purpose, is almost always rich and grateful to the eye. But I imagine no art can make a silver ornament look any thing but vulgar. Just as we sometimes see persons in Europe crowd ring upon ring on their fingers till all beauty is lost in the heap, and all taste sacrificed for the mere sake of ostentatious display; so, in India, I have observed women whose legs were covered with huge circles of gold and silver from the instep nearly to the knee, and their arms similarly hooped round almost to the elbow. The jingle made by these ornaments striking against one another gives ample warning of a woman's approach; a circumstance which has probably led to the notion that this custom of attaching as it were, a set of bells to the heels of the ladies, may have been an institution of jealousy devised by the husbands of those warm latitudes to aid their researches after their gadding spouses. I cannot say how this theory squares with history; but I have never heard any hypothesis equally good to account for the still more ridiculous, not to say cruel, custom of covering the legs and arms of their poor little children with these rings. I have seen a girl three years old so loaded with them that she could not walk or hold out her arms; and I once counted no fewer than twenty heavy gold chains on a child's neck, besides such numbers of rings on its arms and legs that the little thing looked more like an armadillo of the picture-books than a human being. Such is the passion of some Hindoo parents for this practice that I have been assured they often convert their whole worldly substance into this most useless form of the precious metals, and thus transform their progeny into a sort of money-chest. Small happiness is it for these innocent wretches, however; who, as the head police-magistrate informed me, are not unfrequently murdered for the sake of the property they carry about with them?

I have often remarked, that when a traveller is first thrown into such a scene as I have here alluded to, although his enjoyment certainly is very great, there often comes across him a feeling of hopelessness, when he admits to himself his total inability to record one hundredth, one millionth part, I may say, of the splendid original. Every thing is totally new to him; even the commonest implements of husbandry, the pots and pans, the baskets and barrels, the carts and carriages, all are strange to his eyes, and far beyond the reach of his pen; while things which stand higher in the scale come still less within its range. Then what is he to do with the sounds he hears, or the motion he perceives? And strange it is to admit, but true, that the interest is at times actually increased by circumstances which are in themselves very annoying. I well remember submitting even to the intense heat and glare with great patience, and almost relish, in consideration of their being strictly in character with a scene I had so ardently desired to witness. The formidable smell of assafoetida, which reigns in every Indian market, I nearly learned to bear without a qualm, for the same reason. Other annoyances I cared very little about; and had it not been for the well-cursed mosquitoes, I should not hesitate to declare, that, as far as travelling human nature is capable of happiness, I was perfectly happy when cruising about the bazaars of Bombay.

Full well am I aware that much of all this will appear to many excellent persons who have been in the East, or who may visit it after me, as sufficiently fanciful and exaggerated; and there are many who will pass through the very scenes which excited in me so much rapture, and will have no more anxious wish than to get safely out of it before they are splashed with mud from the feet of the wild-looking, blue-skinned buffaloes, or have their toes trodden upon by bullocks with great humps between their shoulders. It is impossible to expect general sympathy for such things; and accordingly my English friends at Bombay used often to laugh heartily when I returned from these Arabian Night sort of excursions, with my head brim full of turbaned Turks, Hindoo pagodas, and all kinds of oriental associations about the Indus and the Ganges, or Brahma and Vishnoo, or with speculations on the customs, languages, and manners, of the extraordinary collection of people I had been rambling amongst.

But there is one set of images and delightful illustrations, meeting the eye at every turn in India, which I have never seen any person so insensible as not to attend to with unaffected interest. I allude to those numerous every-day customs of the East so often mentioned incidentally in the Scriptures, and with which our minds have become familiar from earliest infancy. We so naturally associate these customs with the sacred writings, that we are easily drawn to link the two indissolubly together. Before visiting Eastern countries, we almost fancy that because the events related in the Bible, and the characters who acted in them, have passed away and become matter of history, so also, must the customs have disappeared which served as familiar illustrations between man and man, or between our Saviour and the human beings whom it was the object of his mission to impress with his doctrine. We are apt to be startled, therefore, when we find ourselves actually surrounded by scenes almost identical with those described in the Bible. Be all this as it may, I could never see a Hindoo female sitting by the steps of a well in India, with her arm thrown wearily over the unfilled water-pot, without thinking of the beautiful story of the woman of Samaria, the association being perhaps helped by the recollection of a well-known Italian picture, in which the figures and the scenery are represented quite in the eastern style, such as I was now beholding it for the first time.

"Two women shall be grinding at the mill, the one shall be taken, the other left," conveys scarcely any meaning to European readers. But in India, where we see constantly two female millers, sitting cross-legged on the ground, turning by one handle the upper of two small stones, we are at once struck with the force of the illustration used to explain the uncertainty which should prevail at the destruction of the city. It is difficult, on looking at two persons so engaged, to conceive a situation in which it would be less easy to remove the one without interfering with the other; and this point was admirably enforced by reference to a custom with which every listener in those countries must have been quite familiar. The industry of commentators on the Bible has, I observe, long ago discovered the true explanation of this, and many other passages apparently obscure, but pregnant with meaning when duly investigated. Nevertheless, I aver that a whole quarto of commentaries on the above verse could not have impressed my mind with a tenth part of the conviction which flashed upon me when I first saw two women actually "grinding at the mill;" all unconscious, poor folks, of the cause of my admiration, and as yet ignorant, alas! of the sublime lessons, to enforce and explain which their humble task was referred to.

On the morning after my arrival at Bombay, I got up with the first blush of the dawn, and hastily drawing on my clothes, proceeded alone greedily in search of adventures. I had not gone far before I saw a native sleeping on a mat spread in the little verandah extending along the front of his house, which was made of basket-work plastered over with mud. He was wrapped up in a long web of white linen, or cotton cloth, called, I think, his cummerbund, or waist-cloth. As soon as the first rays of the sun peeped into his rude sleeping chamber, he "arose, took up his bed, and went into his house." I saw immediately an explanation of this expression which, with slight variations, occurs frequently in the Bible, in connection with several of the most striking and impressive of Christ's miracles, particularly with that of the man sick of the palsy. My honest friend the Hindoo got on his feet, cast the long folds of his wrapper over his shoulder, stooped down, and having rolled up his mat, which was all the bed he required, he walked into the house with it, and then proceeded to the nearest tank to perform his morning ablutions.

I remember mentioning this, amongst many other illustrations of the incidents recorded in Scripture to a worthy old Scottish lady, upon whom I expected it to produce the same pleasing and satisfactory effect which it had wrought on me. I made, however, a great mistake, for so far from raising myself in her estimation, on the score of correct observation, I sunk, I fear irrecoverably, in her good graces, by presuming, as she alleged, to interfere with the wonder of the miracle, the essence of which according to her, I discovered to consist, not in the recovery of "the man who was made whole," but in his being able to shoulder a four-post bed, and carry it off without inconvenience!

CHAPTER XIII.

A FAMINE IN THE LAND.

So many new and interesting objects were placed before me, on first landing in India, that I scarcely even dared to think of endeavouring to describe them, and, accordingly, the memorandums which I find amongst my papers bear strong marks of an overloaded topic. And although there can be no doubt that a superabundance of matter is a better source of composition than a scantiness of materials, yet we may even in these respects have too much of a good thing, and be cast, at first, into a sort of despair, from the utter hopelessness of being able to do the subject any kind of justice. After a time, when the novelty begins to wear off, we may expect to find leisure to study each circumstance carefully, and to record it with distinctness. How vain this hope is, every traveller, I am pretty sure, will admit. For he soon discovers, that many of the most striking points which, from first engaging his attention, it would have been so important to seize and preserve, have either faded away, never to be recalled, or, which is more probable, their place has been supplied by others still more perplexing. It is certain, also, that many of those prominent differences between the manners of distant countries which, from first striking the observer, especially a sailor, who generally comes suddenly upon them, might constitute their chief interest in description, soon lose that bewitching sort of angular sharpness due, perhaps, to novelty alone; and as the mind cannot be forced back to its original state, the later descriptions will always be more or less feeble and confused, like objects seen through an ill-adjusted telescope. If it be the traveller's wish, therefore, as it certainly appears to be his duty, to preserve, for the benefit of his friends, the more prominent differences between his own country and those he visits at a distance, he must contrive to work vigorously on his first landing, and set down, as well as he can, in order, or out of order, as many as possible of those prominent differences which actually strike him.

As far as I can recollect, the first rational thing I did at Bombay, even before I had recovered from the intoxication of this glorious draught of novelty, was to engage a moonshie, or teacher of Hindoostanee, that I might take lessons in the colloquial dialect of India. This language is said to be a jargon, or lingua franca, a corrupt compound of many others. The greater part I believe, is Persian, with a sprinkling of Arabic, a little Sanscrit, a few words of Portuguese, and here and there a faint dash of English. I remember, for example, hearing the English military words of command given to the native troops of an independent sovereign in the interior of the country, where the language in all other respects was Asiatic. "Shoulder arms!"—"Present—Fire!" conveyed distinct practical ideas to the minds of the native soldiers; but neither they nor the officers had the slightest idea of their actual meaning.

I considered myself as very fortunate in having arrived in India just as a severe famine was beginning to make itself felt over a great part of the northwestern portion of Hindoostan. It may not be generally known, that most of the rice crops of India, though not all of them, are dependent upon the actual quantity of rain which falls in the wet season for their very existence; so that when the rains prove scanty, which misfortune occurs at irregular periods, the inevitable consequence is not merely a scarcity, but an absolute famine. In some regions of India, where mighty rivers, such as the Indus and Cauvery, are entirely sucked up in the process of artificial irrigation, that is to say, are drawn off at the sides by what are called, I think, "anicutts," this frightful evil may be averted. But, even in those cases, the most swollen rivers can supply but a comparatively narrow strip of verdure along their banks, when compared to the thousands of thickly peopled leagues of territory which must be left arid and hopeless when the windows of heaven remain unopened at their wonted season.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the details of those terrible scourges, the Asiatic famines, by which whole tribes are sometimes swept away, to be able to describe correctly, from personal observation, their immediate causes and consequences. I can only answer for what I saw, and from that some idea may be formed of what was passing in the interior. I have already mentioned that Bombay, being almost the only perfectly secure spot in that quarter of India, had drawn to it in the course of years many of the native inhabitants, together with much of the wealth of the adjacent countries, and that the possessors of these riches, being under no apprehensions of the jealousy or cupidity of the government, lived in happiness, and spent their fortunes freely. The natural consequences followed this extensive demand for the luxuries, as well as the necessities of life; traders of all descriptions flocked from the remotest corners of the world to reap the golden harvest, which only grew the faster and the richer for being well gathered in. Each year brought fresh and more wealthy settlers, and every sea-breeze wafted into the crowded and beautiful harbour of Bombay, ships of every port from China to Peru. The resident population of all the native classes went on increasing under this prosperity, till, at the period I speak of (1812), it was rather more than a hundred and sixty thousand, though its numbers occasionally swelled to more than two hundred thousand at periods of public excitement, or high commercial enterprise. But what strikes the imagination as curious, or at least instructive, is the fact that the produce of the whole island would not feed its ordinary inhabitants for more than a week; and yet there is not a spot, I will venture to say, on the earth's surface, where the means of subsistence are cheaper, or in greater variety, and even profusion.

The explanation is almost too simple to require statement; but the consequences which followed the occurrence of the terrible famine in Guzerat, and other districts at no great distance, in 1812 and 13, are not quite so obvious, though highly valuable. The produce of the island itself being so extremely small compared to the demand, it follows that Bombay must import all its grain, and, as a matter of course, the corn-dealers form a most important set of men. These persons draw their supplies of rice, in ordinary times, chiefly from the Malabar coast, which lies between them and Ceylon, and not very far to the southward; while they import most of their wheat, maize, and some other grain, from the high grounds of the Mahratta states, lying directly to the eastward. The interest of these great corn-merchants induces them to keep at all times a considerable stock of grain on hand, enough to feed the population for a period of more than a year. I have also some obscure recollection of the government requiring them to retain a certain quantity. Be the cause what it may, there was actually stored in the granaries of Bombay, in the autumn of 1812, rice enough to have kept the population alive for fifteen months, even had there not arrived in the port another corn-ship in the interval. This position of things gave rise to one of the most tangibly interesting questions of political economy which I ever remember to have heard discussed.

The south-west monsoon, which blows from May to September, is the rainy season in that part of India; but it was now late in August, and no rain had fallen, nor was there much hope that, if it fell so late, it would be in time to save the rice-crop; so that, independently of the reported destruction caused by a flight of locusts in the north of India, experienced observers began to predict a famine in Cutch and Guzerat. There is perhaps no barometer, in these cases, so certain in its indications as that of hunger, and, accordingly, it was soon discovered that all the ferries between the main land and the island of Bombay were crowded with half-famished natives, streaming in converging lines from all parts of the country towards this little island, which, I have already mentioned, was not in itself capable of raising, in the whole year, one fiftieth part of the food required by its own inhabitants.

The resident native population of Bombay, at that time, may be thus stated in round numbers:

Hindoos	103,786
Mussulmen	27,811
Parsees (worshippers of fire)	13,156
Jews	781
Native Christians	14,454

Permanent native residents	159,988
Add to these the European residents, and the European officers and troops	1,700
Native troops (officered by British)	3,000

And we have for the average fixed population of the island	164,688
Add the migratory or floating portion of the natives, who come and go according to seasons and other circumstances	52,012
The additional number of total strangers driven into the island by the great famine of 1812 and 1813 appears to have been about	20,000
Making a grand total of	236,700

The area of Bombay island is about 18½ square miles, being between 7 and 8 miles long by 2 or 3 in breadth; so that taking the ordinary, or average population, there are about 9000 residents for every square mile; while in times of pestilence and famine in the adjacent states, it reaches nearly to 13,000 for each square mile. The houses may be reckoned at more than 20,000, and there occurred frequent instances of fifty, sixty, and even a hundred persons, sleeping under one roof. I remember hearing of upwards of 300 persons being stowed away within the narrow limits of one building!

The effects of the famine which was desolating the neighbouring districts soon made themselves visible at Bombay, by a very curious and painful sort of reflected, or rather what the opticians would call transmitted, light. We were living on that island in the midst of peace and plenty, while the territories north of us had become a prey to absolute want and the fiercest tumults, accompanied by bloodshed in every variety of shape. As each day broke, the wharfs and roads of our happy spot were lined with crowds of wretched, half-starved objects, who had with difficulty made their escape from the accumulated horrors of their own desolated homes. The whole of the eastern, or land side of Bombay, was strowed over with the dead and dying natives. I never saw misery on such an extensive scale, either before or since, except, perhaps, in some of the wretched villages of Spain, when the French dragoons had taught the poor inhabitants, at the edge of the sabre, to understand what the evils of war really are when brought close to their own altars and fire-sides.

The most striking, and, perhaps, I may add, most affecting circumstance connected with this glimpse we had of the famine, was the marvellous patience, or what, in other lands, we should have called Christian resignation, of the unfortunate sufferers. I mixed amongst the natives constantly, and saw them exposed to every shade of distress, but never heard a complaint, nor saw a gesture of impatience. And what was still more extraordinary, immense groups of persons actually dying of hunger would sit round the fire on which the rice provided for them had been cooked, and there wait, with perfect composure, while the several messes were measured out and distributed to them; a process that often lasted more than an hour, during which their food lay within two or three feet of them, and quite within their grasp. It was curious to observe, also, during the whole period of this famine, that in several of the squares and other open spaces in the town, immense piles of rice were left exposed, night and day, for weeks together, without any guards, yet not a single bag was ever cut open.

I ought to have mentioned, that subscriptions to a considerable amount were made for the support of the starving multitude. And what was particularly interesting, the wealthy natives, the Banyans and Parsees, in particular, opened a subscription amongst themselves, and purchased many thousands of bags of rice for the strangers, some weeks, or, at all events, a good many days, before the English residents came forward. This, however, was partly accidental, and partly caused by the natives having a more intimate acquaintance with the pressing nature and the extent of the distress. The two parties soon combined their exertions, and the native and English committees mutually assisted each other in this work of charity. Huge boilers were provided, under a picturesque tope, or grove, of cocoa-nut trees, about half a mile from the fort; and as a Hindoo, in general, will not eat a morsel of food, even to save his life, if it has been dressed by a person of a different caste, care was taken to provide cooks whose foreheads were marked with the proper streak of red or yellow paint, as the case might require. I myself repeatedly saw natives actually expiring of hunger, who refused the food presented to them, because a doubt existed as to the hands through which it had passed.

Exceptions did occur sometimes to the strictness of this rule, as I shall have occasion to state in describing the horrors of the countries where not merely scarcity and extensive illness prevailed, but where famine and pestilence swept away whole tribes. In those wretched districts immense masses of people were reduced to absolute starvation, and every thing like law or customs, old prejudices or old manners, appears to have been disregarded. Under such dreadful circumstances, the vehemence of hunger, and the excitement of despair, drove bodies of men into the commission of crimes, which, in ordinary times, they would rather have ~~been~~ have perpetrated singly.

I remember a story which made a great stir at Bombay; and though involving something ludicrous along with much that is dreadful, it is too essentially characteristic to be omitted.

Eleven natives, belonging to one of the strictest of all the castes of Hindoos, were travelling from Cutch, through Guzerat to Bombay. They had been driven out of their own country by the famine, and were flying to the south, in hopes of reaching territories not yet desolated. By the time they passed through the village of Bhowanagar, the majority of the party were almost dead with hunger, sickness, and fatigue. On the outskirts of the town they fell in with a cow, when, instigated by the irresistible cravings of hunger, and reduced to the last stage of existence, they slaughtered the animal, and eagerly devoured the raw flesh. This proceeding will convey nothing very extraordinary or flagitious to European ears; but when it is recollected that over the whole of Hindustan the cow is held sacred, it will easily be conceived that killing and eating one of that species was an offence of the blackest die. To taste beef in any shape, or under any circumstances, is likewise an unspeakable abomination in the eyes of the Hindoos; so that the guilt of these famishing wretches was considered of a double degree of atrocity.

No punishment short of death, it seems, could expiate such complicated enormity. Had they murdered one or two of their own party to assuage their hunger whilst, possibly no particular notice would have been taken of the circumstance, considering the dreadful state to which they were reduced. But the deadly offence of killing a cow, an animal all but worshipped, was not to be forgiven! The Thakore, or chief of the village, therefore, immediately directed the whole of these eleven human beings to be executed on the spot!

All this might, perhaps, have passed off quietly, had not a curious question of local authority arisen between the orthodox native ruler and the British powers. As chief of an adjoining province, the Thakore was what is called (at the expense of a slight diplomatic contradiction in terms) an independent tributary; but being also a landholder under the British, it was thought by some that he might in that capacity have been held amenable to their jurisdiction. Bhowanagar, it appears, was situated within the British sovereignty, and the chief was certainly guilty of an offence punishable by its laws. As the government, however, fortunately for this over-anxious functionary's neck, had not yet distinctly marked the line of his allegiance as a landholder, no notice could be taken of this arbitrary act beyond a strong remonstrance on the subject, with an explicit warning against its repetition within the British territories. A regrettable was also passed, declaring Mr. Thakore, in spite of his independence, fully amenable in future to the jurisdiction of our courts of law, as a landholder within our territories.

In the meantime, as the evils of the famine advanced, the governor in council at Bombay, with the wonted vigour and promptitude of the East India Company's administration, not only assisted, by grants of money, the subscriptions raised to subsidize the famishing natives who flocked to the presidency, but contributed another description of help which was very much wanted—I mean that of medicine and medical attendance. As pestilence invariably follows, if it does not accompany famine, several great sheds, each, I think, a hundred yards long, were erected as hospitals on the smooth green sward lying just beyond the foot of the glacis, and reaching nearly across the esplanade or clear space in front of the northern line of the fortifications. Numerous surgeons, some military, and some belonging to the civil establishment, were called in from various out-stations, and placed in charge of these and other infirmaries, which were soon filled; for it was made a rule to reject no one requiring medical aid. I often accompanied the gentlemen connected with these hospitals, and never went the melancholy round without seeing instances well calculated to excite interest in the Hindoo character. I shall never forget the touching effect produced by our encountering one day a pretty little girl, between five and six years old, who seemed quite adrift. We asked where her father was—she pointed to a crib on which her parent lay dead; and when questioned about her mother, she made a similar sign towards another figure, also dead! She had come, she believed, from the northern country, but whence she knew not exactly, neither could she tell her own name; nor had she, apparently, any other relations besides these two, who, it seems, had expired about an hour before.

I took such a feverish interest in the whole of this painful drama, too forcibly real, indeed, but still highly exciting, that I used to ride out early every morning, to watch the awful and picturesque scene which the opening day was always sure to expose to view. Along the roadside, particularly in the districts near the ferries, there lay scattered about many bodies of persons, of all ages, who had sunk during the night; others we found just dying; and it happened not infrequently that we fell in with children, who, like the poor little girl in the hospital, having survived the whole of their kindred, were toddling about all unconscious of their desolate condition. At first sight it seemed strange, that the youngest and weakest of the family should be the last to perish; but the reason probably was, that the parents may have deprived themselves of sustenance, in order to support these helpless things. This, I imagine, would happen in any country; but amongst a people, almost every act of whose lives is marked by self-denial, it seemed to follow as a matter of course. It was very consolatory to observe that these orphans were never left to wander about or to perish from want of care, but were always taken charge of by some of the natives of the caste to which the parents had belonged.

In the same way we observed that the bodies of those who had died of hunger, or disease, or fatigue, during the night, were carried away by the members of the same tribe; although, in most instances, there could have been no personal acquaintance between the parties, nor, indeed, any other means of ascertaining the caste to which they had belonged, than those painted marks on the forehead already alluded to.

These scattered bodies, as well as those of persons who died in the hospitals, or who expired from sickness or exhaustion, under the care of the natives, on different parts of the island, being straightway carried off to the beach of Back Bay, were there burned, according to the immemorial custom of the country. I am not quite sure, but I think all the different castes of Hindoos burn their dead; and although this method of disposing of the body after death is, on many accounts, repugnant to our notions of such things, it must be confessed that the ceremony itself includes much that is highly impressive, and not a little that is classical in its associations.

Few people know, probably, how soon and how readily a dead body may be consumed; and still fewer, I suspect, are aware that there remain at last, of all this goodly frame, but a few ounces of white ashes.

“Expende Hannibalem: quot libras in duce summo Invenias?”

All the rest is sublimed, or carried off, in the shape of vapour, into the atmosphere, again to be returned in due season to the parent earth, to assist in the various processes of vegetative and animal life.

Although, of course, there was much to distress the feelings, and occasionally something to shock them, at the spot selected by the natives to perform these last melancholy rites to their departed countrymen, after the picturesque custom of their forefathers, I could not resist the temptation of going frequently to witness their proceedings. Never shall I lose the recollection of these visits, nor the wild sort of interest with which I passed along the shore, amongst those innumerable funeral piles, and seldom failed to discover a multitude of new and curious objects all crowded into one spot. I generally went alone; for few, if any, of the English gentlemen with whom I was acquainted could comprehend what possible delight any one could take in seeing a number of black fellows burned. One friend in particular, who, from his vehement curiosity in respect to every thing else relating to the natives, I had reckoned upon for companionship and sympathy in these rambles, always failed me as we approached the bend of the coast round the turn of which the fires were blazing. He lived in a delightful house, in the woods, half way up the side of Malabar Hill, just beyond the bay, and his course led him naturally near the shore; but, in spite of all I could do, he always turned his horse's head inland at the separation of the roads, and made a circuit of a mile to avoid these scenes which excited me to such a pitch, that I could never resist their fascination.

Back Bay is formed by two projecting headlands; one, which is called Malabar Point, being high and thickly wooded; the other, called Colaba, is low, and broken into pretty islets, well known to seamen by the few but conspicuous trees which distinguish them from the main land, and still more by the splendid lighthouse near the southern extremity of this low and partially wooded spit. The shore, which, between the two points, takes a semi-circular sweep, is fringed by a flat beach of sand, immediately in front of a dense belt of cocoa-nuts. The trees in this grove stand so unusually close, that they afford shade to numerous straggling huts of the natives, which are so low as scarcely to be seen amongst the rich foliage of the underwood of plantains, limes, and figs. These, however beautiful in themselves, pretend to no rivalry in stature with the lordly cocoa, the most graceful, and, after all, perhaps the most truly characteristic member of the eastern forest. It is quite a mistake to imagine its stem a more tall, straight pole, or to suppose that a grove of these singular trees resembles an overgrown fir-plantation, or the tireless pine-barrens of America. I scarcely, indeed, remember to have seen one that was quite straight, or even exactly upright, or by any means uniform in size, from the ground to the magnificent cluster of leaves spreading out at top.

The stem of the cocoa-nut tree, it will be observed, generally starts from the ground with a thickness calculated apparently to give it a great degree of strength just at the point where, from the length of the lever above, it might most naturally be broken over. But this swell rapidly melts away into the more slender stem, or stalk, as it may almost be termed, which is often a little inclined to one side at first. It then becomes more upright, or bends again the other way, but always gently and gracefully. Towards the very top, before it reaches the great cluster of fruit lying under the leaves, the stem in general becomes larger, after which it is lost in the shade of the ever-splendid top. I hardly know if we ought in strictness to describe the upper part as composed of branches or of leaves; though it is more usual, I think, to speak of the long curving arms, which extend on all sides, as leaves. These, which vary in length from ten to twenty feet, closely resemble an ostrich feather in structure, being composed of a smooth, strong, gradually tapering centre-piece, with subordinate leaves three or four feet in length growing from it on each side, and tapering in their form to the end, which is a sharp point. These lateral or small leaves become shorter and shorter towards the end of the branch. In the middle of all at top, the young leaves may often be seen sprouting up, green and vigorous, and all ready to bend over to the right and left in their turn. Occasionally a good deal of what a sketcher loves to call spirit is given to the picture by the forlorn condition of a branch, which has either been broken by the wind, or injured by some accidental cut of the Tari or toddy gatherer's knife. Such a branch, of course, speedily withers, and hangs down its head in perpendicular lines, singularly contrasted in colour and in form with the living foliage and graceful curves forming the rest of this magnificent bunch of court plumes.

Although the funeral piles of the poor Hindoos possess none of the splendour with which the classical imagination delights to paint such things, they are sufficiently interesting, and might furnish many hints for such an artist as Turner, whose grand picture of Rizpah watching the dead bodies, has often recalled to my thoughts the scenes of this famine. For many an hour I have stood looking at the groups of natives as they emerged from the grove, bearing along the remains of a friend, or of some unknown countryman of their particular caste, found dead by the roadside, or who had expired in the hospital. While some of the party employed themselves in washing the body in the sea, others erected an oblong pile, between one and two feet high, and five or six long, out of short blocks or billets of fire-wood, on which the famine-stricken form being laid, it was covered over with a few additional pieces of fuel. I have no distinct recollection of any ceremonies or religious rites being performed by the Hindoos upon this occasion. As soon as the fire was kindled, the natives squatted on the sand, close to the pile, on the windward side, and they generally preserved the most perfect silence. I never observed in any of their countenances the slightest appearance of what we should call emotion; indeed, the most characteristic point I recollect about the Hindoos is tranquillity under every degree of suffering. On watching with attention the progress of the flames, I remarked that, after a time, the unctuous parts even of the most wasted of these bodies, as they dropped down piecemeal, assisted materially in their own conflagration. Whenever, by the action of the flames, the several limbs fell asunder, the parts were carefully replaced on the fire by the attendants, with a wonderful degree of indifference or of composure; I hardly know which to call it. I have frequently threaded my way amongst a hundred of these funeral piles blazing away at once, each attended by a party of the natives consisting of four or five men, but without hearing a single word spoken.

In ordinary times the deaths in Bombay may be taken at 17 daily, or one for every 9687 persons, making the annual mortality about 6205, or one for every 264 inhabitants. During the famine, the additional deaths in Bombay exceeded 15 a-day, the whole mortality then varying between 30 and 40 daily. Sometimes the numbers amounted to three or four times as many, when accidental circumstances augmented the arrivals from the famine countries.

The periods of the day when I visited this strange scene were either in the morning, when the damp land-wind was just dying away into a calm, or in the afternoon, when the delicious sea-breeze still blew freshly home to the bottom of the light, waving the plumes of the cocoa-nuts in fine style. In the morning the bay, not only within the two points, but quite out to the horizon, remained as smooth as a sheet of glass, without even a ripple large enough to break audibly on the sand; and as no swell rolled in from the offing, the sea, at such moments, lay so perfectly still, that all the surrounding objects on the shore, as well as those resting on the surface of the water, became reflected with a degree of sharpness in every respect like the originals.

The funeral piles being placed just within the margin of the beach, at the very water's edge, and fringing the shore, there rose up, in the most striking manner, nearly at equal intervals, a hundred pillars of smoke, as it were guarding the coast; or like tall columns stretching their heads into the air, many times higher than the highest trees of the dark, thickly planted tops, or grove, further inland, not a single leaf of which seemed now in motion.

What added something of a mysterious and unearthly character to this solemn scene, was its perfect silence. Scarcely a sound could be heard along the whole shore, though within the space of a mile many hundreds of persons might be seen flitting about. Had it not been for the frequent splash, as another and another dead body was dipped in the sea, or a low word or two escaping from the natives as they arranged the pile on which the corpse was to be consumed, or the crackling of some fire fanned into more brisk action than the rest by a casual flaw of wind whisking in from the bay, the whole might have passed for a ghost-like vision. As I moved up and down the melancholy beach, I passed apparently as totally unnoticed by the natives as if I had been invisible. On every side I could see indistinctly through the smoke and flames, heads, and arms, and half-destroyed bodies, falling down and mingling in a confused heap with the blazing faggots, each pile being surrounded and kept in order by a group of silent, ghastly, hunger-worn Hindoos. It became difficult at times not to fancy the whole scene a mere delusion of the senses!

Adjacent to this fearful spectacle, I remarked a small, but striking circumstance, which, without dissipating these dreamy kind of fancies, brought forcibly to my mind the extent of the calamity by which that part of India was then so dreadfully scourged. In ordinary times, when the average number of deaths at Bombay is seldom so great as twenty a-day, the current supply of fire-wood in the bazaar is sufficient for all the funeral piles of the natives. But when the terrible famine of 1812 extended its ravages over Marwar, Cutch, and Guzerat, and other states lying to the northward, and the crowds of half-starved miserable Hindoos rushed to the presidency, many of them only to die, the demand for fire-wood was so great, that it became a profitable speculation to import fuel from a distance in this express view. There might always be seen, accordingly, a long line of coasting vessels, at a few hundred yards from the beach of Back Bay, anchored abreast of the fires, which never ceased to blaze night or day. These boats were loaded half-mast high with faggots and billets of timber, cut to the proper length and well dried for the occasion.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PLAGUE OF LOCUSTS.

What we saw of the remote effects of the great famine which desolated the northwestern parts of India, we had good reason to fear gave scarcely any idea of the dreadful misery which pervaded the actual scene of the calamity. For whatever may happen elsewhere, plenty and prosperity of every kind hold their permanent headquarters at the British presidencies, as Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, the three seats of government, are called. Although we certainly witnessed distress enough to give a high and painful interest to the passing events, the suffering we beheld must have formed only a petty episode in the great tragedy. So little, indeed, were the effects of the famine considered of engrossing importance at Bombay, that the ordinary amusements and occupations of the natives, as well as those of strangers, went on just as if neither famine nor pestilence had been known in the neighbouring states. Crowds of dying wretches, who poured into the island daily from the province of Kattiwar and elsewhere, were soon lost sight of in the rich and benevolent population of Bombay. I really believe, that if their numbers had been ten times greater, the vast resources of that wonderful little spot, which hardly occupies the breadth of a pin's head on the map of India, would still have outstretched the occasion.

But in Guzerat itself, the unhappy region of the actual famine, the case appears to have been very different. There the persons almost in absolute want of food formed a large majority of the population, in a country destitute of the means of procuring subsistence, and not, as at Bombay, a small minority in a district abounding with resources. It may well be supposed, also, that the scenes which occurred in those devoted countries partook but little, if at all, of the picturesque though melancholy interest which engaged our attention so deeply at a distance. I remember, upon one occasion, expressing in rather strong terms the excitement, and almost the gratification I had experienced on witnessing some occurrence connected with a party of more than half-famished natives, who had just arrived after many days' march, during which their numbers had been reduced from several hundreds to a few dozens. A gentleman, who had been living in the countries from whence these people were recently driven out by sheer famine, shook his head, and remarked, that if I had only seen for one hour the horrors which he had been compelled to witness for weeks and months together, I would do every thing I could to drive their recollection from my mind, instead of courting fresh sights as a source of picturesque curiosity.

From this gentleman and others I learned various particulars of the famine, which certainly altered the character of the interest I had felt at first in the events passing under our own eyes at Bombay. We are apt, perhaps, to hear of such things without receiving much of the instruction which assuredly they are intended to convey; and I am tempted to repeat, that if we merely read of wars and famines, but all the while live in peace and plenty, we necessarily gain a very imperfect conception of the blessings we enjoy. If there could only be described, however, in adequate terms, a few of the miseries actually witnessed by travellers in different parts of the world, arising obviously out of the absence of those very circumstances which the home-croakers amongst us consider as evils, and so recklessly wish removed, not a few persons might be reconciled "rather to bear those ills they have, than fly to others that they know not of!" This, however, is perhaps a vain attempt; since it may be observed, that the authority of an eye-witness of distant scenes of misery, whether they spring from misgovernment, from the accidents of the climate, or from any other cause, seldom goes for more than the mere passing interest of his story, while ninety-nine in every hundred of his hearers adopt the good old school-boy rule, "and skip the moral."

Most people in England know nothing of locusts except what they read of them in Scripture; and even in India their habits are not generally understood. I remember meeting a gentleman who told me, that, during fifteen years' residence in the east, he had only seen locusts three times; once on the wing, and twice dressed in a curry. For my part, I never saw them at all, except in a museum; but I have conversed with persons who have seen them in all their mischievous glory. Their flights are described as resembling a heavy snow-storm, only black, and sending forth a rustling noise from millions of billions of wings, and sweeping along like a deluge in the air for three times twenty-four hours together.

Captain Beaufort, whose interesting and delightful book on Caramania every reader of travels is familiar with, told me that, when he lay at Smyrna, in 1811, he had an opportunity of forming a rude estimate of the magnitude of a flight of locusts which was drifting past from south to north. The consul had occasion to send a messenger in a due easterly direction to the Bashaw of Sardis, in Asia Minor, that is, in a course at right angles to the flight of locusts. This person rode forty miles before he got clear of the moving column of these ravenous animals. It was inferred, from observations made with a pocket telescope, that the height of the column could not be less than three hundred yards, and the rate at which it passed not slower than seven miles an hour. This continued for three days and nights, apparently without intermission! As these insects succeeded one another at an average distance of not more than three feet, and were about one foot apart above one another, it was computed that the lowest number of locusts in this enormous swarm must have exceeded 168,608,563,200,000.

The mind, however, is strained to no purpose in trying to conceive such vast sums; it is like trying to judge of the distance of the fixed stars or the velocity of the sun's rays. When we are told that light moves over a space of 192,000 miles in a second, we are quite bewildered: but if we learn that in the same interval it would pass round the earth eight times, we have something to rest upon not altogether beyond the reach of our thoughts.

In the same way, in order to assist the imagination, Captain Beaufort determined, that the locusts he saw, if formed into a heap, would have exceeded in magnitude more than a thousand and thirty times the largest pyramid of Egypt; or, if they had been placed on the ground close together in a band of a mile and an eighth in width, it would have encircled the globe!¹

My acquaintance with Cocker having become a little rusty, I found myself at a loss to state the above huge sum in words; but, in order to avoid mistakes, I wrote to one of the most distinguished astronomers and computers of this country, to beg he would enlighten my ignorance. His answer is as follows:—

"There is some difference between the French and English in their notation of millions.

"We class our numbers into periods of six, ascending in the order of thousands, millions, billions, trillions, &c. Thus, your 15 figures would be

Billions. Millions. Thousands.

1 6 8, 6 0 8 5 6 3, 2 0 0 0 0 0.

"The French class their numbers by periods of three, ascending in the order of hundreds, thousands, millions, billions, &c. So that the same 15 figures would be called by them

Trillions. Billions. Millions. Thousands.

1 6 8, 6 0 8, 5 6 3, 2 0 0, 0 0 0."

As we have been dabbled with billions and millions, I may take occasion to mention, that the prodigious sum above written is only about a fourth part as great as that which the undulations of light have been demonstrated to make in one second of time; viz. 600,000,000,000,000!!

There is some reason for supposing it not impossible that this was merely the tail of the flight, the desolating effect of whose march, in countries lying much further to the eastward than the Holy Land, I am now about to describe.

Myriads of these destructive insects appeared in the eastern provinces of Bengal about the beginning of 1814, from whence they took a northwesterly course across what is properly called Hindustan, including the upper provinces of India, but not the peninsula geographically so termed. In 1811 they first attacked the great district of Marwar, and then coasted along the edge of the western deserts of India. It so chanced that the annual fall of rain either failed entirely, or was so scanty in that year, that the locusts found it easy work to strip the country of every blade of vegetation. As soon as this was accomplished, they proceeded in a body to the northwest district of Guzerat, named Puttun, and from thence scoured the province of Kattiwar. On one occasion only they made their way as far south as the city of Baroach, on the right or northern bank of the river Nerbudda, a mighty stream which empties itself into the gulf of Cambay, a degree and a half south of the tropic, and about three degrees of latitude, or sixty leagues north of Bombay. Beyond this point the locusts were not known to extend in a southerly direction; and by the commencement of the monsoon of 1812 this dreadful plague vanished from the face of that wretched country; but whence it came, or where it proceeded to, is not known; though, as I have hinted above, it may possibly have been no more than a detachment from this very flight which Capt. Beaufort saw at Smyrna.

The destruction in Guzerat effected by these insects was almost universal. In the latter part of 1811 the whole of the western part of the province was covered, to every appearance, with a rich cultivation, though, when the crops were examined, the grain was found to be gone, and merely the stalks left, as if these had been unworthy of notice. Then came the failure of rain already alluded to in Marwar; when the drought co-operating with these abominable locusts, drove the unfortunate inhabitants of that country, in a huge living wave, tumultuously into the Guzerat territory. At the condition of the wretched outcast Marwarrees was rather improved by this change; but misery soon followed their untoward steps; for in 1812 Guzerat also experienced a failure of rain, which well nigh demolished the crops in those districts which the locusts had not visited. The demands upon the resources of the country were thus doubled, when the means of supply were reduced to one tenth part of their average amount; and in many places there was literally no crop at all.

A very graphic account of this famine is given by Captain Carnac, in the Transactions of the Literary Society of Bombay, vol. i. article xix.; to which I must refer for many interesting particulars. He describes the result in strong and distinct language. "The exorbitant price of grain added to the apprehensions of the inhabitants, which impelled them to store their individual resources in times of such danger; and the villainies practised by the higher classes, to derive pecuniary advantage from the pressing wants of the people, soon reduced the half-famished emigrants to the greatest extremity. The endurance of hunger was supported, however, by the Marwarree people with unaccountable perseverance, which in some degree blunted the natural feelings of sympathy in their lot. Whether the ready assistance rendered to these people, on their first entrance into Guzerat, had induced them to imagine, that under such circumstances would the hand of charity be withdrawn; or whether it was from the innate indolence of their character, or the infatuation which often accompanies the extremes of misfortune, that they rejected the only means of subsistence by labour, it is notorious, that when the benevolent tendered employment to these people, it was uniformly declined, even with the certainty of death being the consequence of the refusal."

The account which all writers agree in giving of the scenes which speedily followed is almost too horrible to be repeated. Multitudes of the Marwar people, after suffering severely from famine in their own country, had wandered into Guzerat, were soon crowded like cattle, in droves, beyond the suburbs of all the great towns, or by the road-sides, the dead and the dying together, men, women, and children, packed, as it were, one mass, perishing of hunger, and almost all of them suffering under acute diseases, brought on by fatigue and want. Of these the confluent small-pox was the most general, and committed incalculable ravages, not only amongst these starving multitudes, but amongst the people into whose territories they were urged by the pressure of despair.

There was one little picture in the narrative of this dreadful scene which always struck me as being particularly touching; I mean the unavailing struggles of the infants to draw sustenance from the exhausted breasts of their starving mothers! As a pendant to this, Captain Carnac describes another afflicting, but, upon the whole, less painful incident, which he likewise witnessed in person. A poor woman lay stretched by the side of a heartless group of her countrymen of the Marwar land, who would not spare her one drop of water, though she was herself dying, and her dead infant reposed on her breast!

The hourly recurrence of such accumulated miseries familiarized the minds of these poor people, as well as the natives in general, to every extremity of suffering which human nature could bear. "In a short time," adds Captain Carnac, "those emanations of individual feeling among themselves, which distinguished the first commencement of their sufferings, gradually abated, and the utmost indifference universally predominated." We are naturally disposed to feel more for the children than for the grown-up persons on these occasions; but in one of the dreadful group of anecdotes related by Captain Carnac, we hardly know which to sympathize most with, the parent or the infant. "I saw a child," he tells us, "not quite dead, torn away by a pack of dogs from its mother, who, unable to speak or move, lay with anxious eyes directed to the object of her fond affection. It was pursued by its former little playmates, who had shared in its extreme adversity; but the ravenous animals (which had acquired an extraordinary degree of ferocity from having fed on human bodies) turned upon these innocents, and displayed their mouths and teeth discoloured with the blood of the child. A rescue was, of course, attempted by ourselves; but the remains of life had been destroyed."

It is exceedingly curious that those feelings and prejudices which the Hindoos, in a state of ease and affluence, would assuredly not have resigned but with their lives, appear to have lost their power when the natives fell under the pressure of extreme and protracted distress. I must quote Captain Carnac's own words for what followed this relinquishment of their national and almost proverbial fortitude. This testimony on a point of some importance in national manners, is particularly valuable, from its being given as the result of actual observation.

"Distinctions of caste were preserved," he says, "until the moment when the hand of adversity bore heavy; then the Bramin sold his wife, his child, sister and connections, for the trifle of two or three rupees, to such as would receive them?"

The number of the wretched Marwarrees who died at Baroda alone was often five hundred in one day; but what is interesting on many accounts is, that in spite of the reduced means of the opulent natives of Guzerat, they subscribed their money freely to assist their countrymen as well as these wretched strangers. The native governments in those provinces also subscribed very large sums of money for the relief of the famishing multitude. I have mentioned, that at Bombay nothing could exceed the calmness or patience with which the crowds of half starved strangers waited till it came to their turn to be fed. But in the north, where the famine raged in earnest, and where, as I have before mentioned, the hungry part of the population were in a large majority, this forbearance disappeared.

"It was a cruel sight," says Captain Carnac, "to those possessed of sensibility, to witness the struggles when the doors were opened to apportion the victuals. Every sentiment of humanity appeared to have been absorbed by the crowds collected around; and it was no unusual thing to be informed, that such and such a number had fallen a sacrifice to their precipitate voracity: many, also, whose wants had been supplied, continued to devour until the means intended for their relief, proved, in the end, their destruction in a few hours. Children were often crushed to death, when attending for their pittance of food, under the feet of their own parents."

"The establishment of which I have been speaking was imitated in most of the principal towns in Guzerat, and added a few months of life to a class of beings reserved for greater miseries: indeed, subsequent events would seem to show that these people were marked for total annihilation, and that in their destruction the inhabitants of this country were to be deeply involved."

I have already had occasion to mention, that at Bombay the natives paid the utmost respect to the funeral rites, so to call them, of their deceased friends, and even of those who had no other claims upon them but such as were common to the caste to which they belonged. But all this attention to the dead appears to have vanished, along with every spark of sympathy for the dying, in Guzerat. The bodies of the poor Marwarrees who had expired during the famine were left unheeded on the spot where they had sunk; and this total apathy, Captain Carnac is of opinion, was the chief cause of the contagion experienced in 1812, and the consequent extensive mortality. At Baroda, the seat of government, there was still authority and civil discipline enough to insure either the burial or the burning of the dead, although the numbers who had perished daily amounted at one time to upwards of five hundred. At Ahmedabad, however, the mortality was so enormous that these precautions were impossible. No fewer than one hundred thousand persons died in this city alone, or nearly a half of the entire population. "The demand for wood to burn the dead called for the destruction of the houses; even this was barely sufficient for the performance of the rites required by the Hindoo faith; and the half-consumed bodies on the banks of the Sabarmuttee evince at this hour (February 1815, or two years and a half afterwards) to what straits the Hindoos were reduced in fulfilling the last duties to their kindred."

It is also stated, that in the latter periods of the famine many females were engaged in removing the dead and committing them to the piles. In this there appears nothing extraordinary, however painful it be to European ears; but we learn incidentally, from the remark of the writer, how exceedingly repugnant such a practice must be to Indian habits, since he considers it worth while to mention it as a kind of climax to the intolerable miseries caused by the famine. The inference from this fact seems also to be, that women, under such circumstances, retain their strength and fortitude longer than men. It is mentioned, likewise, that in all parts of the country, with the exception of Ahmedabad, the Mahometan population did not suffer so severely as the Hindoos, an advantage ascribed to their use of animal food; and yet at Kaira the Europeans suffered still more than either Mahometans or Hindoos. The melancholy fact, however, pervading all these terrible scenes appears to be, that during seasons of famine, pestilential diseases of every description are far more rife than at any other time, and that all the ordinary causes of mortality are then urged into tenfold action. The periodical insalubrity of the climate of Guzerat, after the rainy season, is well known, and cannot be counteracted; but, unfortunately, it would seem that it may readily be augmented. The deaths, accordingly, over the province at large, during the visitation above described, were as ten to one above the average!

It seems to have been impossible to draw any thing like a correct estimate of the destruction amongst the expatriated Marwarrees; but some idea may be formed of the severity with which that unhappy country was scourged, when an impartial eye-witness, possessed of the best means of information, considers it probable that ninety-nine in every hundred perished! The following extract, which winds up the account of these fearful calamities, may serve to show that we have not been describing the worst parts of the famine; for that in another province the destruction caused by the locusts was still greater than in Guzerat.

"The influx of a large proportion of the population of a country yielding an annual revenue of £500,000 cannot be accurately ascertained. The emigrants arrived in detached bodies, and, for the purpose of convenience, spread themselves over the face of Guzerat, from the borders of the gulf of Cutch to Surat, in many instances even flocking from ports on the coast to Bombay, which they were enabled to do in consequence of native chiefs and opulent merchants granting them passages free of charge. It should be observed, however, that the larger proportion of people who resorted to the presidency (of Bombay) were from Kattiwar, which suffered from the want of rain, and the ravages of locusts, in a much greater degree than the province of Guzerat."

"It is also out of my power," adds Captain Carnac, "to give any certain account of the number of Marwarrees who perished in the famine. I have seen in an evening's ride in the suburbs of this town of Baroda, in which every practicable means for saving them were benevolently exercised, not less than fifty bodies scattered around, which the servants of government had not time to inter. I would, therefore, from a review of all the circumstances related, be inclined to estimate, that not more than one in a hundred of these poor creatures ever returned to their native country."*

CHAPTER XIV.

INDIAN NOTCH. THROWING THE COCOA-NUT.

We hear the fatal truth, that "in the midst of life we are in death" repeated so often, and in such a variety of tones, that our ear becomes accustomed to the sound, without its arresting the attention. The warning accordingly produces but little effect upon our thoughts, and still less upon our conduct. Such being the case, it may often prove highly useful to seize upon such accidental circumstances as those described in the last chapter, in order to turn them to account, as illustrations of maxims of which no one can be said actually to doubt the truth, but to which few attach much importance, or only such as goes, practically, for little or nothing.

By a strange kind of obliquity, however, in our moral vision, it would appear that the direct view of such instruction as we may find in the beautiful text above quoted, is not always the most efficacious. For example, it must be confessed (and, I suppose, we ought to own it with shame), that we may witness even the effects of a famine without many other feelings being excited than that of intense curiosity. At all events, I fear it never occurred to me at the time to extract any moral lesson out of the wholesale work which death was then making before my eyes, till an accident induced me to turn the picture round, and I then speculated to some purpose on the reverse view which presented itself to the imagination. One day, after having passed several hours amongst the starving, dying, and burning Hindoos, I returned home strangely interested with the work of destruction; and while repeating the verse quoted above, and cudgelling my brains to extract something solemn out of the text, in order to subdue the high flow of spirits into which the novelty of this scene had thrown me, a friend called, and carried me off with him to a native dance, or notch, given by a well-known Persian nobleman, named Mohamed Ally Khan, then resident at Bombay. It is odd enough, that this brilliant spectacle, intended for the express purpose of driving away care, as it is called, should have caused at once the very feeling of melancholy which all the horrors of the morning had failed to excite.

On recently examining a set of long-forgotten memorandums and letters written at Bombay twenty years ago, during the progress of the scenes described in the preceding pages, I was more struck than I appear to have been when writing them, with the extraordinary mixture of incidents one would have supposed every way harrowing to the feelings, with gay ceremonies and amusements apparently quite incompatible with each other. I find stories of death by absolute hunger and pestilence jumbled up with dinner-parties—records of Hindoo burnings, with descriptions of evening parties—feastings, and flirtations, side by side with hospital practice, and questions on the corn-laws! Then follow long pages of rapture about oriental scenery, strewn over with a wild sort of youthful curiosity about native manners, dresses and other customs, all so much crowded before me at the same moment, and in one little spot on the earth's surface, that I appear scarcely to have known how to spread them out, or how to select them. Besides all which, I find that at the time when the feelings which those interesting objects excited, from their novelty and combination, were at their height, the power to do them any justice in expression was deplorably wanting. This sort of retrospective glance naturally makes a traveller often wish he could pass again through scenes of which he discovers he knew not the value till too late, but which he is always vain enough to fancy he could now describe much better.

My worthy friend Mohamed Ally could not speak one word of English, nor I a word of Persian; nevertheless we got on mightily well, chiefly by the aid of a smoking apparatus called a killian, which hardly differs from the well-known hookah, with eternal accounts of which old Indians are so apt to weary Europeans. The secret of the sedative or complacent power of this charming variety of the pipe lies, I suspect, fully as much in the guggle-guggle-guggling noise made by the smoke in passing through the water, as in the celestial sort of semi-intoxication produced by the fumes of the tobacco and other fragrant herbs of which the glorious "chillum" of the east are composed. Of course, all ladies abuse the use of tobacco, though, perhaps, only because they dare not indulge in it themselves. Indeed, when we look at the tranquil ecstasy, and complete self-satisfaction, of an Irish female porter in Covent Garden market, with a pipe, as black as her hand, one inch in length, clinging to the corner of her mouth, can we venture to assert, that any rank, station, or wealth in the community, boasts of a commensurate degree of luxury?

Wine, and other generous fluids, right joyous though they be in their incipient effects, generally exact such a swinging compound interest for their advances, in the shape of headaches and heartachs, duels, dyspepsias, and the devil hardly knows what besides, that I question if there is any man come to that period of life lying a little beyond the season wofully miscalled the "years of discretion," who looks back with unmixed satisfaction to his wine-bibbing days. But it is quite another affair with the "virtuous tobacco."

I had certainly no objection to my friend Mahomed Ally's killian, when I found myself seated on his thickly-matted and treble-carpeted floor at Bombay, in the days of my youth, before the poverty of my head and stomach (and not my will!) had compelled me to abandon smoke, and all other good things, save the Hindoo diet of rice and water. Chairs there were none; but to relieve the fatigue of sitting on the ground, there lay scattered about on the floor a profusion of hard, well-stuffed, and richly-covered pillows, of different sizes and shapes. The Chinese, I think, are the only nation in the East who use chairs, tables, and sofas, like those of Europe. I must say, however, that although it is amusing enough, for a time, to loll or roll about on the floor, in the midst of a pile of bolsters, it soon becomes very tiresome practice. The Persians generally kneel, and, with their feet close together, sit on their heels, so that the soles of their feet are turned nearly upwards. This posture is said to become, after a time, a very easy and convenient one, though Europeans find it intolerably painful at first, perhaps from the tightness of their dress, compared to the looseness of that worn by Asiatics. I observed that all the company, except ourselves, left their shoes, or slippers, at the door, and I felt rather disappointed at not being obliged to conform to the customs of the country: this, however, our host would not allow us to think of; but he made no objection to our removing our hats, though he himself and his countrymen kept on their turbans.

After puffing away for a short while, we were presented with a little cup of coffee, holding about as much as would fill a couple of thimbles, but including the essence of two or three dishes of such diluted stuff as we drink in those degenerate longitudes. The coffee was as black as ink, and so rich in flavour, that it instantly filled the apartment with the most delicious aroma. It was potent, too, in another sense, and produced a slight degree of exhilaration in the spirits, just enough to set the fancy off in quest of similar meetings in the Arabian Nights. It required but little help to complete the picture, for every thing was strictly in character with those happily-described scenes, which establish such a strong hold on our young imaginations, that the presence of the reality only brightens their lustre. Disappointment on this subject, there can hardly be much, in the mind of any man not the crustiest and least easily pleased of his species. The descriptions contained in those fairy tales may be compared to the landscapes of a good painter, not servile copies either of individual forms, or of the accidental tints of nature, but judiciously selected and harmonised groups, coloured in such a way as to remove all that is vulgar in mere reality, and yet to retain much of what is essentially picturesque; the result being better, and more true to general nature, or, at all events, more pleasing, than the detached scenes themselves.

The fantastic tales alluded to are extremely apt to assume, in our fancy, the place of the originals; while the realities, when we come actually to look at them, appear like pictures. I at least, for my part, was so completely under the influence of this delusion, or poetical "mirage," that I could scarcely manage, even to the last period of my stay in India, to put things in their proper places. I seldom took a walk in the bazaar, or visited a native's house, without thinking of some fairy tale from which the incidents appeared to have been expressly got up; and, in like manner, I hardly ever passed a Hindoo's hut, before which a swarthy turbaned inhabitant of the east was whirling round the potter's wheel, without having my thoughts carried back to some of those beautiful narrations of Scripture, which fasten themselves so early and so firmly on our minds.

I had once the good fortune, as I must ever consider it, to see a workman accidentally break the pot, which had cost him no small trouble to fashion. He immediately collected the fragments, dabbed the clay together again, and, with the industry of an ant, set about the reconstruction of his vessel. As the whole process recalled an illustration I remembered to have seen used somewhere in the Old Testament, I set about hunting for the passage, and was delighted to find what I had just witnessed most graphically represented in the following text:

"The word which came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there will I cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels; and the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. Then the word of the Lord came to me, saying, 'O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel.'"

Mahomed Ally's party proved to be a "Notch" or dance, where the company, unlike that of a European ball, took no share in the performance: instead of dancing, we were danced to; and, what is more, were sung to by one and the same person. The performer was a celebrated dancing-girl, well known in Western India, of great wealth and talents in the line of her art, which was as different as can be conceived, in all respects, from that displayed at the ballets of our hemisphere. In the first place, this figurante was encumbered with huge piles of dress, so much stiffened by embroidery, formed of gold and silver threads crossing its texture, that the folds stuck out nearly at right angles from her waist, and hung so low down that even her ankles were entirely hid. The shoulders, likewise, and breast, being totally eclipsed by endless folds of cloth, wound round her in such quantities, the only wonder was how she contrived to move at all under the load. I forget in what taste her head-gear was arranged; but well remembered that her nose was pierced like that of a pig, with an immense gold ring, and that her face and hair shone like a new dollar with cocoa-nut oil. Her feet were bare, and she wore no gloves on her hands, while both ankles and wrists were concealed beneath the multitude of rings or bangles by which they were encircled. I believe bells were attached to the good lady's legs; but this fact we could not ascertain by actual observation, on account of the vast profusion of petticoats already described. At all events, the sound made by the short quick stamping of this celebrated performer's feet, seemed louder than any bangles, or mere circles of gold and silver, might have been expected to produce.

Most of her dancing consisted of gesticulations with the hands and arms, accompanied by what we should call horrible contortions of the body, all of which were considered particularly fine by the admiring natives. The movement most frequently practised was executed with the hands waved, or rather twirled, round the wrists as sockets, as if all the articulations of the joints had been destroyed. A correspondent slow twisting and twining of the arms and legs, with a comical sort of wriggle of the whole body, and a sudden round turn now and then, completed the leading features of this least graceful of exhibitions. The sound of the bells, or whatever they were, attached to her legs, made us fancy at first that the damsel had concealed a timbrel or eastern tambourine amongst the folds of her huge robe, and that she gave it thumps from time to time with her knee. Occasionally the singer squatted down on the floor, where she remained for several minutes singing, or rather screaming, at the full stretch of a shrill voice, and grinning with what she doubtless considered a very languishing and winning smile. As the recovery from this low position was not an easy affair, she generally contented herself with resting on one knee as a centre, round which the foot of the other leg described a circle, in a circumference of little stamping paces, in good time, to the squalling voices of a couple of pretty young girls, further aided by the accompaniment of two very harsh-sounding stringed instruments.

An hour or two of this monotonous work is rather tiresome to witness; and I suspect that even amongst the natives it serves the purpose merely of a running bass to their bald chat while smoking their pipes, and drinking their well-cooled sherbet. I afterwards attended many of these Hindoo notches; and although there certainly appeared an occasional dancer, with a figure so graceful as to defy art to disguise it, and a simplicity of movement which no corruption of taste could altogether pervert, yet, upon the whole, it is difficult to conceive any thing less agreeable to European habits than these exhibitions. I think I may add as a general remark, that almost all dancing, except in countries where the intellect has been much cultivated, is not only ungraceful and tiresome, but generally disgusting, very often highly indecorous, and repugnant alike to good taste and good manners.

The chief interest of oriental topics, accordingly, whether of living beings, or of inanimate nature, lies almost exclusively out of doors. The domestic economy of the natives differs so totally from ours in all those points which give what we call refinements and comforts, as well as dignity, to the private relations of society, that we are much more apt to be shocked by the indelicacy of their household matters than interested by their novelty. The consequence I believe is, that the English residents in India see scarcely any thing of the domestic customs of the Hindoos. Here and there an inquisitive European may be found, whose strange fancy leads him to take delight in the habits of the East, and who, after years of enquiry and patient observation, attains a small degree of knowledge of the interior arrangements of the Hindoo families. But the reports of these gentlemen disinclined me very soon from following their example; and, after any little trials which I made, I always came back to the open air with a strong resolution never again to cross a native's threshold.

It was, therefore, with infinitely greater pleasure, that I mingled with the enormous crowd assembled on the day of full moon to witness the grand annual ceremony of throwing the cocoa-nut. The south-west monsoon here nearly right on the western coast of India, from June to September inclusive. This is the season of rains, and of gales of wind which would be held very cheap by the hardy mariners of higher latitudes, though they are sufficient to interrupt the coasting trade of the delicate Asiatics. The day of the full moon about the end of the monsoon is always held sacred by the Hindoos of that side of India, on account of its being near the period when the bad weather breaks up, and navigation and commerce revive. The gods of the winds and the sea are then supposed to be in the fittest humour to be propitiated; and, it must be allowed, that there is no end show of taste, as well as splendour, in the ceremony itself, whatever may be the degree of its influence, as such says, with the "clerk of the weather office."

The whole population of the island (which, I suppose, means about one tenth part of their number, or between twenty and thirty thousand) were assembled along the shore between Malabar Point and the fort, in their best and whitest dresses, fluttering in the sea-breeze. The Brahmins, who, of course, took the lead, were collected on the beach in great crowds to officiate as priests; and the chief of the caste, having repaired to the edge of the sea, stood in the water along with his family in a circle, repeating a number of prayers, which were echoed by the other Brahmins. I could not learn what purpose the different parts of the ceremony were intended to answer, but could observe the chief of the Banyans fling rice and flowers into the air, and occasionally scatter some on the surface of the water. Such of the flowers as the wind drove back to the beach, were eagerly caught up by the multitudes in attendance. After this, portions of the different articles held in highest estimation amongst them, as the production of industry, or the reward of commercial enterprise, were cast into the waves. These we were told, consisted of rice, salt, and various spices, particularly cinnamon, from the island of Ceylon, and lies within a few days' sail of Bombay; nutmegs, black nut, and cloves, from Penang and the Moluccas. All of all came the cocoa-nut, which was not thrown into the sea till the deities were supposed to have been satisfied and flattered into the most perfect good humour by the operation of the previous complimentary proceedings.

Along the margin of the bay were collected many thousands of the natives, all anxiously waiting for the final ceremony; and it was curious to observe the eagerness with which they sought to possess a portion of the sacred nuts flung into the water by the Brahmins. At the end of the beach commences the green expanse of the fort; a fine level plain, carpeted with a short but short-bladed grass, enclosed by railings, and forming an area of half a mile square. Upon these grand occasions the esplanade presented a singular mixture of most of the different inhabitants of the earth, each wearing his own peculiar dress, speaking his own native language, following his own customs, and distinguished by many of those attendant circumstances by which he would have been accompanied at his proper home.

All sorts of European coaches, barouches, chariots, and gigs, were driving about, with every other kind of wheeled conveyance, from an artillery-wagon to an engineer's wheel-barrow. Elephants bearing castles on their backs, paced about the ground, in company with camels, and hundreds of small Arabian horses, just landed from ships arrived from the Red Sea and the gulf of Persia. Packs of coarse innumerable, might be seen traversing the field, across the path of native hackeries, and vehicles of which I then knew not the names, and did not know them not. By far the greater part of this immense crowd, however, were on foot; and I felt almost bewildered as I passed and repassed amongst them, watched their dresses and gestures, and listened to their various tongues. When I bethought me, moreover, of the singular politeness circumstances which had combined to bring together such a diversified multitude, from every corner of the globe, to worship strange gods, to live happy and free, and to enjoy their wealth in peace and security under the guns of an English fortress, twelve thousand miles from home, I scarcely knew how to contain the expression of wonder which this novel and brilliant scene was so well calculated to inspire.

I have only once more to repeat, that he who wishes to see all, or nearly all, which the eastern world affords, that characteristic in the dress, language, or manners, of the Asiatic nations, in the shortest time, and at the least expense of money or trouble, has only to make a run to Bombay; and if on arriving there he be not gratified far beyond his expectations, he must—to use the common phrase—be very hard to please.

CHAPTER XV.

ELEPHANTA—PANORAMAS OF INDIA.

No one is long at Bombay before making a run to Elephanta. I remember it was on a Sunday evening, though I could get no one to accompany me, which I was secretly very glad of, that I slipped away from a party, hired a bunder-boat, and, aided by a fresh wind from the south, skimmed up the harbour, dashed stem on the beach, and landed just below the spot where stood, but, I am sorry to say, no longer stands, the huge stone elephant from whence the island, in our nomenclature, has derived its title. This island, which is called by the natives Gara-poori, or Place of Caves, from two words in the Mahratta language, lies exactly six miles from Bombay castle, and five from the main shore of India; it is between three and four miles in circumference, and is composed of two long hills, with a narrow and thickly-wooded valley running between them.

The elephant stood about two hundred and fifty yards to the right of the landing place, on the side of one of the hills above mentioned, and not far from a ruined Portuguese edifice. Nothing could be more rudely sculptured than this figure, which possessed none of the gracefulness of the living elephant, though in some of the sculptures in the cave temples of India that character is exceedingly well preserved. I was in much too great a hurry at my first visit to think of measuring or drawing this singular specimen of ancient Hindoo art; but about a year afterwards, in company with Mr. William Erskine, of Bombay, complete sets of measurements of all his dimensions were made, and I also took a sketch of the figure, then almost tottering to its fall. The wood cut here inserted is from a drawing made on the spot, and, though slight, it conveys a pretty correct idea of the form and proportions of this celebrated figure. Some of the dimensions which we took are also given.

	Ft.	In.
Length from the forehead to the tail	13	2
Height of the head	7	4
Circumference at the height of the shoulders	35	5
Circumference round the four legs	32	0
Breadth of the back	8	0
Girth of the body	20	0
Length of the legs, from 5 ft. to	6	0
Circumference of ditto, from 6 feet 3 inches to	7	7
Length of the supporter	2	2
Length of the tail (not seen in the above sketch)	7	9
Length of the trunk	7	10
Remains of the right tusk	0	11

In September 1814, before I left India, the head and neck dropped off, and the body shortly afterwards sunk down to the earth; so that, I fear, all traces of our old and much respected friend will by this time have disappeared. For the sake of those who take an interest in these things, I am glad we bestirred ourselves in time, and that quite as minute an account as can be desired of the Elephant, in all his bearings, is faithfully recorded in the first volume of the transactions of the Bombay Literary Society.

Captain Pyke, who wrote in 1712, exactly a hundred years before our visit, mentions that the Elephant carried a smaller one upon him; and Anquetil describes the young elephant as still existing in 1760. Niebuhr observes, in 1764, that the Elephant had on its back something which age had worn so much that it had become impossible to distinguish what it was. I perceive it asserted in a note of mine to Mr. Erskine's account, that in 1813 the small figure on the top could not have been an elephant, but may have been a tiger! Thus it is, that the fewer and more indistinct the data we possess, the more confidently we often pronounce upon a dubious fact.

After paying my respects to this celebrated figure, I set off as fast as I could run, to save the little daylight that was left; for the sun had set before we reached the island, and I was anxious to catch a glimpse of the caves. The panting guide toiled after me in vain, and I had well nigh lost myself in the jungle from the extremity of my impatience to secure at least one glance at the stupendous wonder which I knew to be close at hand. As I scampered along, a curious species of delusion came over me, which I have experienced on several other occasions not altogether dissimilar. I allude to those agitating moments when one is on the very edge of a discovery, and just about to witness in reality something upon which the mind's eye has so long rested that its imaginative character has almost gained the ascendancy in our belief over its actual existence. Under such fantastic circumstances I have often become half afraid that some accident was still to occur to interfere with the accomplishment of a purpose so long and ardently sought after; and have felt as if some magical process were in action to carry the whole scene out of reach.

I remember, in particular, three other occasions when a very strong presentiment of this distracting nature haunted my mind, and rendered the period which preceded the events any thing but agreeable.

When summoned to Bonaparte's ante-chamber, and told that "in two or three minutes the Emperor Napoleon would give me an audience," this tormenting feeling came fully into play. While waiting in this apartment, and listening to the creak of the mighty monarch's shoes, I held my breath till I was well nigh suffocated, and trembled with a sort of dread that some untoward event would yet spring up to stand between me and a sight of him who had been so long the foremost man of all the world.

I was less fortunate the next time, when under the influence of a similar dread of being thwarted in my wish, I had always a vehement desire to see and converse with Lord Byron; and on being seized with an ague at Venice in 1818, I solicited and received the benefit of his friendly offices. But even then, when in communication with him by notes and messages, I had a strong feeling that I was never to be gratified by a sight of the noble poet himself. I once actually heard his voice in the neighbouring apartment, but was too unwell to admit him to the room, or even to raise my head. Still, I made certain that, after all, I was to be disappointed—and so it proved.

The third occasion was that of Niagara; and I remember quite well having a still stranger fancy perplexing me then. I had an idea, very vague of course, and only floating about in my brain in the most evanescent style possible, that although ten minutes would suffice to bring the cataract in sight, I might perhaps not live long enough to see it! In my anxiety to secure the first possible glimpse, I gave my neck a twist by stretching it and bending it out of the window of the carriage, as we drove along the top of the perpendicular bank, overlooking the river below the falls.

The caves of Elephanta, indeed, have hardly pretensions to stand in the same group of wonders with those above alluded to. But when I first visited India I was about fifteen years younger, and my blood was completely on the boil with curiosity in all that related to the Eastern world. Neither did I find this high fever of orientalism ever subside while on the spot, or indeed since. On the contrary, the taste for Asiatic wonders gained fresh accessions with every new gratification, till at times I almost fancied I must have been struck by that wild calenture of the brain caused by the vertical rays of the tropical sun, which seems to turn the open sea into such beautiful green fields and fruited gardens, that the enchanted seaman is with difficulty prevented from leaping overboard.

However this may be, I am persuaded the unhappy guide who accompanied me into the great cave at Elephanta thought me utterly bewitched. At all events, he speedily made a side move towards the opening, so as to secure his retreat, and there stood, with his arms folded on his breast, the Eastern attitude of respect, gazing with a mixture of fear and astonishment at the antics I cut, and the vehement shouts I sent forth on first getting sight of the gigantic triple head which forms the principal feature in this prodigious temple.

As the night was falling rapidly, I could make no sketches, nor take any measurements of consequence. I, therefore, merely satisfied myself that the distance from the top of the nose to the bottom of the chin of the centre head was three feet and two inches, and that the length of the nose was one foot seven inches and a half. I also spanned several of the columns; and easily ascertained the height of the roof, by means of a pole, to be about sixteen feet. I then scampered round the different compartments, or chapels, into which the cave is divided, till it was almost pitch dark, and, at last, tugged myself away from a scene which, nearly as much as any I think I have ever beheld, filled up the expectations previously formed of it. It is quite true, that nothing I now saw bore the smallest resemblance to what I had been led to expect from the numerous accounts I had read; but as the whole was much more interesting than had been looked for, there could be no reasonable complaint on that score. I had seen quite enough to show that there were many good days' work before me, and came away fully resolved to return next morning, to devote myself exclusively to the cave, to cut all society, and even to give up the various objects of high and exciting interest connected with the fumine at Bombay; in short, to forget every other thing but the caves of Elephanta.

How little can we reckon upon such resolutions! It was hardly possible that any man could be more in earnest than I then was, and yet it was upwards of a year afterwards before I again entered the cave, with which I had been so much enchanted as to swear I would not forsake it! The real truth is—and this I have learned by much actual experience in every quarter of the world—that the social living interests of good company, and the mutual communications of friendship between man and man, are, to my mind at least, vastly more attractive than the most curious objects of the inanimate world. I would almost back a pleasant dinner-party, or a promising ball, against the greatest natural wonder, or even artificial curiosity, that art or nature ever turned out of hand!

It must be owned, that of all the lions of India, there are few to compare with the cave temples of Elephanta, which, from lying within less than one hour's sail of the town of Bombay, form the scene of many a pleasure-party, a circumstance which ought to add considerably to the recommendation I have already given, that any person wishing to behold at a glance all the wonders of the East, should select Bombay rather than any other place. The island of Elephanta lies only a few miles further up the harbour than the spot where the ships anchor off the fort; and as large and commodious boats, covered with awnings, are to be had at a minute's warning, nothing is so easy as to transport one's self from the midst of the European society of the presidency, or from the bustle of the crowded native bazaar, into the most complete solitude. As the island is not inhabited, the traveller finds himself at once undisturbed amidst some of the oldest and most curious, or, at all events, most striking remains of the ancient grandeur of the Hindoos, which are any where to be met with. The effect, I have no doubt, is considerably augmented by the unusual abruptness of the change from a scene of such particular bustle to another of entire stillness. There are many points of intrinsic local interest about Elephanta which rank it very high in the scale of curiosity; yet it is one of those wonders which, although it may far exceed in interest what we expect, necessarily baffles anticipation. No drawing can represent it. Even a panorama, which, in the case of Niagara, I am convinced might convey to European senses most of the wonders of the great American cataract, could make nothing of Elephanta. The only device that could give a just conception of the form, size, colour, and so on, of these caves, would be a model of the full dimensions, similar to what Belzoni exhibited of a mummy pit in Egypt. But even such a gigantic work as the model supposed, though it might entertain some folks, would prove but a poor speculation, I suspect, in London. Not two persons in every ten thousand of those who daily pass Charing Cross ever heard of this wonderful cave; and if seduced into the show by the familiar influence of the name Elephanta, they would probably expect to see their old friend of Exeter 'Change swallowing a bushel of rice at a mouthful, or picking up a needle with his trunk.

Even were such a model, or exact copy of Elephanta to be examined by a person who really cared about such things, and had heard so much of the caves as to be interested in their details, the model would of necessity fail to produce on his mind the full effect of seeing the original on the spot. The associations of place, and other circumstances, such as climate, scenery, and historical recollections, perhaps constitute the greater portion of such interest. What could the rattle of carriages outside the brick walls containing a panorama of Elephanta furnish to the imagination, compared to the rustling of the monsoon through the branches of the mangoes, the bananas, and the tamarind, or high aloft amongst the cocoas-nuts, and the flickering fan-shaped leaves of the brab-tree! What ideas of time and place would be suggested by the presence of six or eight families of sober citizens, with their attendant swarms of little holiday cockneys, from the schools of Putney and Pentonville, compared to the bright fancies conjured up by the glow of an Indian landscape, and the presence of numerous groups of Hindoos scattered on the grass, under the shade of some broad-leaved plantain, or, more appropriate still,

"Reposing from the noon-tide sultriness, Couched among fallen columns," of the great temple once held so sacred by every worshipper of Shiva and Shakti, though now desecrated, and half destroyed by the rude hands of their heretical conquerors.

But although it be utterly hopeless to gain a just idea of Elephanta by other means than an actual visit, I must not be understood as saying any thing to depreciate panoramas of objects which fall within the range of that stupendous branch of the art. These paintings, are, in fact, the greatest possible allies to a traveller in his descriptions: witness the beautiful representation of Madras now exhibiting in London, and painted by Mr. William Daniell, an artist who, from long residence in the East, has acquired the habit of feeling his subject so thoroughly, that the power of expressing it seems a sort of instinct. I certainly never beheld any thing comparable to the taste and fidelity with which all that is characteristic of Indian climate and scenery in general, and of the Madras variety of it in particular, not forgetting the magnificent surf, has been preserved in this exquisite panorama. It is very mortifying to think that in a few months this master-piece, in its way, will be painted over, and lost for ever. It is nearly hopeless, indeed, to expect that another such painter of oriental scenery as Daniell shall start up in our day; and even if he did, it might not suit his views to paint panoramas.

If the India House possessed a circular room of adequate dimensions, it would be well worthy of their magnificent style of doing things, to rescue and fix up this painting of Madras, in evidence to future times of the splendour of their rule in these days. Is there no rich old Indian, or nobleman, or wealthy patron of the fine arts in this country, who might be tempted to step forward to snatch from destruction a work of the highest order of excellence, and calculated to live for centuries, but which, merely for the value of the base canvass on which it is drawn, will ere long be daubed over to form a ground for another picture?

* Since the above observations were written, I have learned with great satisfaction, from the distinguished

CHAPTER XVI.

SIR SAMUEL HOOD AND THE ALLIGATOR HUNT.

As soon as the Volage was refitted, and her crew refreshed, after our voyage from England of four months and a half, we sailed from Bombay to the southward along the western coast of India; and having rounded Ceylon, at the extremesouthwestern corner of which, Point de Galle, where we merely touched to land the governor's despatches, we hauled up to the northward, and, after twelve days' passage, sailed into the beautiful harbour of Trincomalee. There, to my great joy, we found the commander-in-chief, Sir Samuel Hood; who, to my still greater joy, communicated that a vacancy had been kept open for me in his flag-ship, the Illustrious. In a few minutes my traps were packed up, my commission made out, and I had the honour and the happiness of hailing myself a professional follower of one of the first officers in his majesty's service. It is true, I was only fifth lieutenant of the ship, and not even fifth on the admiral's list for promotion; for I came after a number of old officers who had served under Sir Samuel for many long years of patient, or rather impatient expectation. But my first and grand purpose was attained, viz. that of getting fairly into the line of promotion; and for a time I did not fret much, or consider myself the most ill-used man in the service, merely because my chance of advancement was very small, and remote.

In capstans and other machines, there is a mechanical device with which every person is acquainted, termed a pall or catch, by which the work gained by the effort last made shall be secured, and the machine prevented from turning back again. Something of this kind takes place in life, particularly in naval life; and happy is the officer who hears the pall of his fortunes play "click! click!" as he rapidly spins up to the highest stations in his profession. Proportionately deep is the despair of the poor wretch who, after struggling and tugging with all his might at the weary windlass of his hopes, can never bring it quite far enough round to hear the joyous sound of the pall dropping into its birth! I well remember most of these important moments of my own life; and I could readily describe the different sensations to which their successive occurrence gave rise, from the startling hour (thirty years ago) when my father first told me that my own request was now to be granted, for on the very next day I was to go to sea—up to that instant when the still more important and awful announcement met my ear, "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder!"

Nothing perhaps more distinctly characterises men than the different manner in which they behave on these occasions. One person acquiring fresh spirits from the consciousness of so much of his fortunes being secured, plants his foot more firmly on the deck, and grasping the handspike anew, springs aloft to command by a still more vigorous effort of his strength, the next revolution of the windlass; while another man, similarly circumstanced, remains content with the first step gained. It is wrong, however, to say that he remains content, for there is no contentment in the sluggishness with which he waits till some one helps him to accomplish that purpose which he has not energy enough to attempt single-handed. In two words: the classes of people we are speaking of may be divided into those who know how to avail themselves of the opportunities within their reach, and those who will not, or, at all events, who do not, screw up their courage to the sticking-place alluded to. There is a charming sea-song by Dibdin (that prince of nautical minstrels!) one part of which often came to my aid in seasons of professional despondency:

"So I seized the capstan-bar
Like a true-hearted tar,
And in spite of sighs and tears sung out, Yo heave ho."

"It is easy to be cheerful when one is successful," says a high authority; and there are "few people who are not good-natured when they have nothing to cross them," says another equally profound recorder of common-places; but the secret of good fortune seems to lie far less in making the most of favourable incidents, or in submitting manfully to disastrous ones, than in studying how to fill up to advantage the long intervals between these great epochs in our lives. Perhaps, therefore, there is no point of duty which affords more scope for the talents artist himself, that although for the present he has taken down the Panorama of Madras, he has no intention of painting any thing else over it, but hopes, ere long, to exhibit it in a situation more easy of access than it has hitherto occupied.

of a superior than the useful and cheerful employment of the heads and hands of his officers and people during these trying periods of inaction which occur in every service. Sir Samuel Hood possessed this faculty in a wonderful degree, as he not only kept us all busy when there was nothing to be done, but contrived to make us happy and contented, though some of our prospects were poor enough in all conscience. My own, for example; for I was placed at the tip of the tail of his long string of private followers; and when the admiralty list came out, on which I had built so many beautiful castles in the air, my poor name was not upon it at all. I had not expected to be first or second, or even third; fourth I had reckoned upon as possible; fifth as probable; sixth as certain; so that my horror and disappointment were excessive when this kindest of commanders-in-chief broke to me the fatal news, in the following characteristic manner.

A telegraphic signal had been made from the flag-ship at the admiral's house to the ship, in these words:

"Send Mr. Hall on shore, with a crow-bar, two pickaxes, and two spades."

All the way to the landing-place I puzzled myself with thinking what on earth could be the object of these words; little dreaming, good easy lieutenant! that I was so soon to dig the grave of my own hopes. The admiral received me at the door with his coat off; and holding out his remaining hand (his right arm was shot away in action,) he squeezed mine with even more than his wonted kindness.

"I have been waiting for you with some impatience," he said, "to be present at the hunt after a white ant nest, a sort of thing I know you like. These rogues, the Termiles bellicosos, as I find the naturalists call them, have made their way into the house; and having carried their galleries up the walls and along the roof, have come down in great force upon a trunk of clothes, which they would have destroyed entirely before night had I not caught sight of them. Now let us to work; in I propose to rip up the floor of the verandah, in order to follow their passages and galleries till I reach their nest. If it be a mile off; won't this be a glorious piece of service?" exclaimed the admiral, as he warmed himself by anticipating the chase. He could hardly have been more delighted, I am persuaded, had he been giving orders for a fleet under his command to bear down upon the enemy's line. Of course I failed not to feign or feel the enthusiasm of my commander-in-chief—a little of both, perhaps; for the utmost possible, or even conceivable, familiarity of an admiral, will scarcely ever crack the ice of a lieutenant's reserve in his commander-in-chief's presence. We may cherish and obey him, as much, or more, than any wife ever did, or promised to do, her spouse; but I never yet saw a naval man, in uniform or in plain clothes, on shore or afloat, sober or merry, that could, even in appearance, bring himself to take liberty with one who, in times past—no matter how long—had once been his commanding officer. The truth is doubly, trebly true at moments of actual service; and though Sir Samuel was all smiles and favour, standing without his coat in the verandah with a crow-bar in his grasp, his bare breast and single arm exposed naked to the sea-breeze, then just beginning to puff at intervals over the low, red-hot isthmus or neck of land between the inner harbour and the eastern beach, I could not venture to do more than bow, and say I was much obliged to him for having so considerably thought of me at such a moment.

"Oh!" cried he, apparently recollecting himself, "but I have something else to show you, or rather to tell you, for I must not show it to you; though I fear it will not please you quite so much as the prospect of a white ant hunt. Here, Gigna," called the admiral to his steward, who stood by with a tea-kettle of hot water ready to pour over the ants, "put away that affair, which we shall not require this half hour yet; and hold this crow-bar while I step into the office with Mr. Hall."

"It is of no use to mince the matter," said the veteran, shutting the door, and turning to me with somewhat of the air which he might be supposed to have put on, had he been instructed from home to tell me that one of both my parents were dead; "it is no use to conceal the fact from you; but here is the admiralty list, just come to my hands, and your name, in spite of all your promises, verbal and written, is not on it!"

Had the admiral fired one of the flag-ship's thirty-pounders, double-shotted, down my throat, he could not have demolished more completely my bodily frame, or than this fatal announcement shattered to pieces the gilded crockery-ware of my fondest hopes. All the pyramids of command, and power, and independence, in which I had indulged my fancy during the voyage, vanished like the shadows of a dream I vain would recall, but could not. I stood at first quite stupefied, and can remember nothing that passed for some minutes. As I recovered my scattered senses, however, I recollect gazing at the anchorage from the open window of the Admiralty House, near which we stood. The flag-ship then lay just off Osanburgh Point, with her ensign, or, as it used to be called in old books, her ancient, the "meteor flag of England," dropped in the calm, so perpendicularly from the gaff end, that it looked like a rope more than a flag; while its reflection, as well as that of the ship herself, with every mast, yard, and line of the rigging, seemed, as it were, engraved on the surface of the tranquil pool, as distinctly as if another vessel had actually been inverted and placed beneath. I have seldom witnessed so complete a calm. The sea-breeze, with which the shore had been refreshed for twenty minutes, had not as yet found its way into the recesses of the inner harbour, which, take it all in all, is one of the snuggest and most beautiful coves in the world. And such is the commodious nature of this admirable port, that even the Illustrissimus, though a large 74 gun ship, rode at anchor in perfect security, within a very few yards of the beach, which at that spot is quite steep-to, and is wooded down to the very edge of the water. I gazed for some minutes, almost unconsciously, at this quiet scene, so different from that which was boiling and bubbling in my own distracted breast, and swelling up with indignation against some of my truest friends at home, whom I had such good reason to believe had either betrayed or neglected me, maugre all sorts of promises.

In the midst of my reverie—which the kind-hearted admiral did not interrupt—I observed the wind just touch the drooping flag; but the air was so light and ransient, that it merely produced on it a gentle motion from side to side, like that of a pendulum, imitated in the mirror beneath, which lay as yet totally unbroken by the sea-breeze. Presently the whole mighty flag, after a faint struggle or two, gradually unfolded itself, and, buoyed up by the new-born gale, spread far beyond the gallant line-of-battle ship's stern, and waved gracefully over the harbour. It is well known to nice observers of the human mind, that the strangest fancies often come into the thoughts at a moment when we might least expect them; and though, assuredly, I was not then in a very poetical or imaginative humour, I contrived to shape out of the inspiring scene I was looking upon, a figure to soothe my disappointed spirit. As I saw the ensign uncurl itself to the wind, I said internally, "If I have but life, and health, and opportunity, I trust—for all the bitterness of this disappointment—I shall yet contrive to unfold, in like manner, the flag of my own fortunes to the world."

Just as this magnanimous thought crossed my mind's eye, the admiral placed his hand so gently on my shoulder that the pressure would not have hurt a fly, and said, in a cheerful tone, "Never mind this mishap, Master Hall; every thing will come right in time; and if you only resolve to take it in the proper and manly temper, it may even prove all the better that this has happened. Nothing is without a remedy in this world; and I'll do what I can to make good this maxim in your case. In the mean time, however, come along, and help me to rout out these rascally white ants. Off coat, however, if you please; for we shall have a tough job of it."

It cost us an hour's hard work; for we had to rip up the planks along the whole of the verandah, then to shape a course across two cellars, or godongas, as they are called in the East, and finally the traverses of these singular animals obliged us to cut a trench to the huge hillock or nest, which rose to the height of five or six feet from the ground, in numberless shoots, like pinnacles round the roof of a Gothic church. We might have attacked them at head-quarters in the first instance, had we wished it; but the admiral chose to go more technically to work, and to sap up to his enemy by regular approaches. In his way we had the means of seeing the principles upon which these ants proceed in securing themselves at every step of their progress by galleries or covered ways, which, though extremely feeble, are sufficiently strong to repel off the attacks of every other kind of ant. It is curious enough, that although the white ant be the most destructive of its species, it is said to be, individually, by far the weakest, and cannot move a step without the artificial protection of the galleries it constructs as it goes along; just as the besiegers of a fortification secure themselves in their trenches and zigzags.

We now brought our spades into play; and having cut the hill across, laid open the secrets of these most curious of all the ant tribe. At last we reached the great queen ant, the mother of millions of her race, a most enormous personage to be sure, nearly four inches long, and as thick as a man's finger, with a head not bigger than that of a bee, but a body such as I have described, filled with eggs, which continually rolled out like a fluid from a reservoir. Never shall I forget the shout of rapture which the gallant admiral sent over half the harbour, as he succeeded in gaining the object of his labour.*

There are some men who go about every thing they undertake with all their hearts and souls, and this great officer was one of those. He did nothing by halves and quarters, like so many other men. The greatest deeds of arms, or the most trivial objects of passing amusement, engrossed his whole concentrated attention for the time. He was equally in earnest when holding out examples of private generosity, or lending the heartiest and kindest encouragement even to the least distinguished of his followers, as when performing acts of the highest public spirit, or making the greatest sacrifices to what he considered his duty. Every thing, in short, that he did, or thought, or uttered, bore the stamp of the same peculiar impress of genuine zeal. So eminently exciting, and even fascinating, was this truly officer-like conduct, that even those who had served under him the longest often wondered at the extent of their own exertions when roused by his example, and were led almost to believe that his very look had something stimulating in it which actually gave fresh vigour to their arms as well as to their thoughts. With all this, he was the gentlest of the gentle, and accomplished all he undertook without apparent effort, or the least consciousness that what he was doing was remarkable.

I remember an instance of his skill in the small way. One morning, near the spot where he headed the storming-party against the white ants, a working party of the crew of the Illustrissimus had commenced constructing a wharf before the dock-yard. The stones of which this platform or landing-place was to be built were, by Sir Samuel Hood's orders, selected of very large dimensions; so much so, that the sailors came at last to deal with a mass of rock so heavy, that their combined strength proved unequal to moving it beyond a few inches towards its final position at the top of one corner. The admiral sat on his horse looking at the workmen for some time, occasionally laughing and occasionally calling out directions, which the baffled engineers could by no means apply. At length his excellency the commander-in-chief became fidgety, and having dismounted, he tried to direct them in detail: but never a bit would the stone budge. Finally, losing all patience, he leaped from the top of the bank, and roared out, in a voice of reproach and provocation, "Give me the crow-bar!" Thus armed, he pushed the officers and men to the right and left, while he insisted upon having the whole job to himself, literally, single-handed. He first drove the claws of the instrument well under the edge of the stone then placed with his toe a small iron pin on the ground under the bar and across its length, to act as a fulcrum, or shoulder. When all things were carefully adjusted to his mind, he slipped his hand to the upper end of the lever, and weighing it down, gave what he called "life" to the huge stone, which just before half a dozen strong men had not been able to disturb. Sure enough, however, it now moved, though only about half an inch, towards its intended resting-place. At each prize or hitch of the bar, the rock appeared to advance farther, till, after five or six similar shifts, it was finally lodged in the station prepared for it, where, I doubt not, it rests to this day, and may occupy for centuries to come.

I need scarcely say that the admiral himself was delighted with his triumph, or that his provocation against the men subsided at each successful march of the stone, till, at length, when the operation was completed, he flung down the bar, and called out to the grinning party, but with infinite good humour, "There! you hay-making, tinkering, tailoring fellows, that's the way to move a stone—when you know how!"

In fact, no officer I have ever served with, better "knew how," not only himself to do every thing "that might become a man," but how to stimulate others to do so, likewise; or, if need should be, as in this instance of the corner-stone, to instruct them practically. What is interesting, however, and still more important in every way,

* See an exceedingly interesting account of the Termes bellicosus, or white ant, in Shaw's Zoology, vol. vi., taken chiefly from the Philosophical Transactions for the year 1781.—Also in Rennie's History of Insects, republished by Lilly, Wait & Co. of Boston, one of the most entertaining books on natural history in the language.—Ed.

he never lost sight of his own true dignity, or weakened his personal or his official authority, by any such concessions. On the contrary, both appeared only to be enhanced by familiarities which such a mind alone could safely trust itself with, and which, from their being totally devoid of affectation, were always suitable to his character, and appropriate to the circumstances as well persons in whose favour they were granted. This unreserved freedom of manner, an officer less gifted by nature, or not so thoroughly master of his business in all its branches, could hardly have indulged in; but in Sir Samuel Hood's hands it became an instrument of great importance, and invariably turned the heartiest exertions of every officer and man under him to his purpose, which, I need scarcely add, was synonymous with the public good.

The loss of such a man to the country at large, and to the naval service in particular, was in many respects irreparable; for although his example must ever dwell deeply engraven on the minds of those who knew him personally, he carried away with him to his early grave very much which no instruction could impart, no memory supply, nor indeed any eulogium do justice to. I allude chiefly to that rare combination of talents and professional experience, welded together by the highest public spirit, animated to useful action by the most ardent zeal which perhaps ever possessed an officer.

Fortunately for me, however, Sir Samuel Hood's death did not occur till more than two years after I reached India. Owing to his kindness, I was enabled to visit the interior of the peninsula of Hindoostan on two different occasions, and likewise to perform a journey of more than a thousand miles on the island of Java. Before touching on these extensive themes, I must give a short account of an alligator-hunt, at a place called Nellivelly, near Trincomalee, got up for the admiral's express amusement, and performed by a corps of Malays in the British service, the 1st Ceylon regiment.

Very early in the morning of the 22d of September, the party, which consisted of several ladies and a large proportion of red coats and blue coats, were summoned from their beds to set forth on this expedition. The admiral, as usual, was up, dressed and on horseback, long before any of the rest of the company, whom he failed not to scold or to quiz, as they severally crept out of their holes, rubbing their eyes, and very much doubting whether the pleasures of the sport were likely to compensate for the horrible bore of early rising. In other countries the hour of getting up may be left to choice; in India, when any thing active is to be done, it is a matter of necessity; for after the sun has gained even a few degrees of altitude, the heat and discomfort, as well as the danger of exposure, become so great, that all pleasure is at an end. This circumstance limits the hours of travelling and of exercise in the East very inconveniently, and introduces modifications which help in no slight degree to give a distinctive character to Indian manners.

As there was little risk of being too late on any party of which Sir Samuel Hood took the lead, the day had scarcely begun to dawn when we all cantered up to the scene of action. The ground lay as flat as a marsh for many leagues; here and there the plain was spotted with small stagnant lakes, connected together by sluggish streams, or canals, scarcely moving over beds of mud, between banks fringed with a rank crop of draggled weeds, and giving birth to clouds of mosquitoes. The chill atmosphere of the morning felt so thick and clammy, it was impossible for the most confident in his own strength and health not to think of agues, jungle fevers, and all the hopeful family of malaria. The hardy native soldiers, who had occupied the ground during the night in despite of the miasmata, were drawn up to receive the admiral; and a very queer guard of honour they formed. The whole regiment had stripped off their uniform and every other stitch of clothing, save a pair of short trousers, and a kind of sandal. In place of a firelock each man bore in his hand a slender pole about six feet in length, to the extremity of which was attached the bayonet of his musket. His only other weapon was the formidable Malay crease, a sort of dagger or small edition of the waving two-edged sword with which the angel Michael is armed in Raphael's picture of the Expulsion of our First Parents from Paradise.

Soon after the commander-in-chief came to the ground the regiment was divided into two main parties, and a body of reserves. The principal columns, facing, one to the right, the other to the left, proceeded to occupy different points in one of those sluggish canals I have already mentioned, connecting the lakes, or pools, scattered over the plain. These detachments, being stationed about a mile from one another, enclosed an interval where, from some peculiar circumstances known only to the Malays, (who are passionately fond of this sport,) the alligators were sure to be found in great numbers. The troops formed themselves across the canal in three parallel lines, ten or twelve feet apart; but the men in each line stood side by side, merely leaving room enough to wield their pikes. The canal may have been about four or five feet deep in the middle of the stream, if stream it may be called, which scarcely moved at all. The colour of the water when undisturbed was a shade between ink and coffee; but no sooner had the triple line of Malays set themselves in motion, and the mud got stirred up, than the consistence and colour of the fluid became like those of pease-soup.

On every thing being reported ready, the soldiers planted their pikes before them in the mud, and, if I recollect right, each man crossing his neighbour's weapon, and at the word "march" away they all started in full cry, sending forth a shout, or warwhoop, sufficient to curdle the blood of those on land, whatever effect it may have had on the inhabitants of the deep. As the two divisions of the invading army, starting from opposite ends of the canal, gradually approached each other in pretty close column, screaming and yelling with all their souls, and striking their pikes deep in the slime before them, the startled animals naturally retired towards the unoccupied centre. Generally speaking, the alligators, or crocodiles, (for I believe they are very nearly the same,) had sense enough to turn their long tails upon their assailants, and to scuttle off as fast as they could towards the middle part of the canal. But every now and then, one of the terrified monsters, either confused by the sound, or provoked by the prick of a pike, or mystified by the turbid nature of the stream, floundered backwards, and, by retreating in the wrong direction, broke through the first, second, and even third line of pikes. This, which would have been any thing but an amusement to unpractised hands, was the perfection of sport to the delighted Malays. A double circle of soldiers was speedily formed round the wretched aquatic who had presumed to pass the barrier. By means of well-directed thrusts with numberless bayonets, and the pressure of some dozens of feet, the poor brute was often fairly driven beneath his native mud. When once there, his enemies half choked and half spitted him, till at last they put an end to his miserable days in regions quite out of sight, and in a manner as inglorious as can well be conceived.

For the poor denizens of the pool, indeed, it was the choice between Scylla and Charybdis with a vengeance; and I am half ashamed to acknowledge the savage kind of delight with which we stood on the banks, and saw the distracted creatures rushing from one attack right into the jaws of another. The Malays, in their ecstasy, declared that the small fry from one side rushed down the throats of the big ones whom they met flying in the opposite direction. But this seems very questionable, though positively asserted by the enraptured natives, who redoubled their shouts as the plot thickened, and the two bodies of troops, marching from opposite quarters, drew within a hundred yards of each other. The intermediate space was now pretty well crowded with alligators, swimming about in the utmost terror; at times diving below, and anon showing their noses well plastered with mud high above the surface of the dirty stream; or occasionally making a furious bolt in sheer despair right at the phalanx of Malays. On these occasions half-a-dozen of the soldiers were often upset, and their pikes either broken or twisted out of their hands, to the infinite amusement of their companions, who speedily closed up the broken ranks, as if their comrades had been shot down in battle. The killed were none, but the wounded many; yet no man flinched in the least.

The perfection of the sport appeared to consist in detaching a single alligator from the rest, surrounding and attacking him separately, and spearing him till he was almost dead. The Malays then, by main strength, forked him aloft, over their heads, on the end of a dozen pikes, and, by a sudden jerk, pitched the conquered monster far on the shore. As the alligators are amphibious, they kept to the water no longer than they found they had an advantage in that element; but as the period of the final mêlée approached, on the two columns of their enemy closing up, the monsters lost all discipline, floundered, and ploughed up the weedy banks, scuttling away to the right and left, helter-skelter. "Sauve qui peut!" seemed to be the fatal watch-word for their total rout. That prudent cry would, no doubt, have saved many of them, as it has saved other vanquished forces, had not the Malays judiciously placed beforehand their reserve on each side of the river to receive the distracted fugitives, who, bathed in mud, and half dead with terror, but still in a prodigious fury, dashed off at right angles from the canal, in hopes of gaining the shelter of a swampy pool overgrown with reeds and bulrushes, but which, alas for most of the poor beasts, they were never doomed to reach. The concluding battle between these retreating and desperate alligators and the Malays of the reserve was formidable enough. Indeed, had not the one party been fresh, the other exhausted, one confident, the other broken in spirit, it is quite possible that the crocodiles might have worsted the pirates, as the Malays are called in every other part of the world but the East, where they are generally admitted to be as good a set of people as any of their neighbours.

It is needless to say, that while all this was going on, our gallant Admiral, Sir Samuel Hood, was a pretty busy spectator. His eagle eye glanced along the canal, and at a moment took in the whole purport of the campaign. As the war advanced, and sundry small affairs of outposts took place, we could see his face flushing with delight. But when the first alligator was cast headlong and gasping at his feet, pierced with at least twenty pike wounds, and bristled with half a dozen fragments of these weapons fractured in the onslaught, the whole plain rung with his exclamation of boyish delight. When the detachments closed in upon their prey, and every moment gave birth to some new prodigy of valour, or laid a whole line of the Malay soldiers prostrate on the muddy stream, like so many nine-pins, I verily believe, that if none of his own people had been present, the admiral would have seized a pike himself, and jumped into the thickest of the fight, boots, sword, cocked hat, and all! As it was, he kept himself close to the banks, and rivalled the best Malay amongst them in yelling and cheering on the forces to their duty. This intensity of eagerness had well nigh proved rather awkward for his excellency's dignity, if not his safety; for, in spite of the repeated warnings of the English officers of the regiment, who knew from former hunts what was sure to happen eventually, the admiral persisted in approaching the edge of the canal as the final act of the alligators' tragedy commenced. And as we, his poor officers, were, of course, obliged to follow our chief into any danger, a considerable party of us found ourselves rather awkwardly placed between the reserve of Malays already spoken of and the canal, just as the grand rush took place at the close of the battle. If the infuriated crocodiles had only known what they were about, and had then brought their long sharp snouts, and still harder tails, into play, several of his majesty's officers might have chanced to find themselves in a scrape. As it was we were extremely near being wedged in between the animals' noses and the pikes and creases of the wild Malays. It was difficult, indeed, to say which of the two looked at that moment the most savage—the triumphant natives or the flying troop of alligators wallowing away from the water. Many on both sides were wounded, and all, without exception, covered with slime and weeds. Some of our party were actually pushed over, and fell plump in the mud, to the very provoking and particular amusement of the delighted admiral, whose superioradroitness enabled him to avoid such an undignified catastrophe, by jumping first on one side and then on the other, in a manner which excited both the mirth and the alarm of his company; though, of course, we took good care rather to laugh with our commander-in-chief than at him.

I forget the total number of alligators killed, but certainly there could not have been fewer than thirty or forty. The largest measured ten feet in length, and four feet girth, the head being exactly two feet long. Besides these great fellows, we caught, alive, a multitude of little ones, nine inches long, many of which we carried back to Trincomalee. Half-a-dozen of these were kept in tubs of water at the admiralty house for many days; the rest being carried on board, became great favourites amongst the sailors, whose queer taste in the choice of pets has already been noticed.

CHAPTER XVII.

PIC-NIC PARTY IN THE CAVE OF ELEPHANTA.

From Trincomalee we sailed back again to Bombay, the only port in India possessing docks sufficiently capacious, and a harbour commodious enough for so large a ship as the Illustrations. This was the second visit I paid to that most interesting of all the presidencies. On two subsequent occasions I had even better opportunities of making myself acquainted with its merits; for I had by that time made two extensive journeys across the country, and, of course, become more or less familiar with various oriental topics. Nevertheless, Bombay continues to hold its ground as the place best worth seeing of any spot I have visited in India.

The fascinations of society at Bombay, in the particular circle to whose intimacy I had the happiness to be admitted on these occasions, were certainly very great; and, in a pretty extensive experience since, I have hardly found them matched. To think of studying, to any good purpose, the mouldering antiquities of the Hindoos, or of speculating with spirit on the manners and customs of the existing generation of the natives, while the conversation of such specimens of my own country folks by within reach, was totally out of the question. And this feeling being shared by all the party, it was considered a most brilliant idea to unite the two sources of interest in one expedition.

"Why should we not," said one of the ladies, (who, alas! is now no more,) "why should we not make a regular expedition in a body to Elephanta? not for a mere visit of an hour or two, but to remain a week or ten days, during which we might examine the caves at leisure, draw them, describe them, and, in short, perform such a course of public antiquarian services as were never before undertaken?"

The notion was eagerly caught up by the company; one of whom, an officer of the engineers, called out,

"I'll send over a couple of tents, to be pitched before the mouth of the cave; one for the ladies, the other for the attendants and kitchen, while the gentlemen may pick out the softer bits of pavement within the cave to spread their beds on."

"I'll send cooks!" cried another.

"I'll be the caterer of our mess," shouted a third, "and take care of the commissariat department."

"And I," said a gentleman, who alone of all the party now lingers on the spot, though it is nearly twenty years since those merry days, "I shall see that you have wine enough, and plenty of Hodgson's pale ale."

All were eager to be of use, and nothing was thought of but making arrangements. We hired hand-boats, or native launches, to transport the heavy baggage, the tents, tables, and victuals; while it fell to my lot to provide smaller and faster-moving boats, called gigs, for the accommodation of the ladies. We passed over in detachments; some early in the morning; and others, whose business kept them in the fort, later in the afternoon; but in the course of a couple of days we were established close to the scene of operations, and ready to commence working in earnest.

When I come to describe the method of travelling to India, it will not seem surprising how readily we made ourselves comfortably at home on the island of Elephanta. Most of the gentlemen slept actually within the cave, either boxed up in their palanquins, or on mattresses, which they spread in the little niches or chapels carved out of the living rock on the sides of the cavern.

The first day was passed in rambling up and down the aisles, if they may be so called, of this wonderful cathedral, which the Hindoos of past ages had hewn out of the solid stone. The sculptures on the wall being varied in every possible way, within the fantastic limits of their extravagant theology, the effect was almost bewildering to those who viewed this wild scene for the first time. Even to those who had witnessed it once or twice before, it was impressive in a degree very difficult to describe. The imagination of a new comer like myself was carried back irresistibly to dark periods of traditional history, where every thing appeared nearly as vague and indistinct as the recollection of a fairy tale. To those, again, who had studied the subject long, and made themselves acquainted not only with the religion of the natives, but with their peculiar style of representing their gods, the cave of Elephanta offered a rich feast of research; and there could be heard from time to time loud expressions of delight from these adepts in the science of oriental antiquarianism, when they lighted upon any group particularly fertile in characteristic attributes of the deities they were in quest of.

Towards the end of the day, the party, which had hung together more or less during the morning, fell in pieces. Some of the gentlemen straggled into the jungle to catch a shot at a parrot or a monkey; while others, exhausted with the closeness of the cave, and the labour of climbing up to examine the details, stretched themselves in the shade, under the fly, as it is called (see vol. i. of a large tent, beneath which the air passed freely) along, in consequence of the canvass walls being removed. For my own part, I could hardly detach myself more than a few minutes at a time from the temple, for of impatience of my own ignorance, which was more aggravated than relieved by the snatches of explanation won from more experienced orientalisks. During the whole time of dinner I could think of nothing but the indistinct figures on the dark walls which enclosed us on three sides; and I stole away from table as soon as I could, to regale myself with this antiquarian banquet, till the night closed in. I then tried a walk in the open air, but felt the chill land-wind, breathing through the damp underwood, afford only a deceitful kind of refreshment which soon passed away, and left my brow throbbing and feverish with the intense excitement of the day. My companions declared themselves sick of the cave; and as I could talk of nothing else, I was no society for them, nor they for me, so off I slipped very early to my cot, spread in one of the little recesses already mentioned, lying on the left or eastern side of the principal excavation. Without taking off my clothes, I threw myself down, and in the course of a few minutes, as I imagined, fell asleep.

It is the fashion in India to burn a lamp in every sleeping apartment; not a vulgar rushlight, enclosed, as in England, in a wretched case of perforated tin, like a stable lantern, but a small bright flame rising from a classical-shaped bronze vessel, worthy of Etruria, filled with oil expressed either from the cocoa-nut or the sesame, and as clear as crystal. What is the origin of this oriental custom of burning a light in the bed-chamber, I could never learn exactly. Some persons allege that it affords a protection from the snakes which are said to prevail in those regions; though I never had the fortune to see a single one of them in all the different journeys I made across the continent and islands of India. Whatever be the cause, the practice is so universal, that our servants, who in that country are the most perfect machines imaginable, continued, even in the cave, to place lights by our bed-sides, as a matter of course. A thousand such lamps, however, as were flickering on the stone floor of our huge apartment, would have served very feebly to illuminate even the small portion of the gorgeous temple which I then occupied.

After lying asleep for some time, as I thought, I either awoke, or believed I did, and, on looking round, was not a little startled to find myself alone in such a strange place, of the real nature of which I had but an obscure recollection. The solitary lamp appeared to have gained far more power, for the whole cave now seemed as light as if the sun had been shining into it. On turning round to discover where I could possibly have got to, and looking up, I beheld, with a feeling of indistinct alarm, and of much uncertainty as to the reality or visionary nature of what I was gazing upon, a huge figure, half male and half female. I remembered, that during the morning we had been told by one of the learned folks of our party, that in the Hindoo mythology such a monster was to be found, with the jaw-breaking name of Ardhanareshwar. As I strained my eyes to examine this fantastic figure, I asked myself over and over again whether I could be awake or was still asleep. The foaming cups of Hodgson's pale ale, and the ruby-coloured nectar of Chateau Margaux, at a pretty late dinner, may possibly have helped this mystification, while they certainly took nothing from the interest of the dream, if dream it were. The gigantic image at which I was looking, though at first it seemed detached and in motion, appeared, on closer examination, to be sculptured in high relief on the hard rock of the mountain. This strange hermaphrodite seemed gifted with four arms, (which is one of those clumsy devices by which the Hindoo artists seek to convey an idea of power), and standing not quite erect, but inclining a little, with the foremost of its right arms resting on the hump of the famous Nundi, the bull of Shiva, on which it is the fancy of this double-sexed god occasionally to ride. The right side of the figure appeared to be male, the left female; and it is singular how much this distinction was preserved in all respects. The two sides of the cap seemed different, the right presenting the crescent of Shiva, and the female side of the cap being trimmed with curls rising over it, while the male side appeared to be ornamented by a string of knobs, or beads. The ear-rings were different, and on the left, or female side, there hung two; one of them a bali, or jewel for the upper part of the ear, the other a large ring; while the male side carried one only, and the ear being lengthened and stretched downwards towards the shoulder. The armlets, also, appeared different; the two right or male arms being both encompassed by a thin metal bar, unjoined at the ends (a common ornament in the east), and the left, or female arms, encircled by a broader ornament. Each of the right-hand wrists was clasped by one ornament, the left by two bracelets. The inner right hand, which was in good preservation, bore a ring on the little finger. The inner left hand, which was also unbroken, carried two rings; one on the little finger, the other on the middle finger. The inner right hand held the snake called cobra di capella, the head of which rose aloft as if listening to the figure. The outer right hand rested on the horn of the bull, while the elbow was placed on the hump. Both the serpent and the bull Nundi marked out the god Shiva. From the left breast of this curious figure being that of a female, and from its being single, the idea has arisen that the intention was to represent an Amazon. But this is clearly a mistake. And indeed the same distinction of the sexes observed between the appearance of the right and left sides of the principal figure extend to all the others in this very curious compartment of the cave; those attendants on the right hand of Ardnari belonging to Shiva, those on the left to his wife Parvati. Long before I could get half through this catalogue of attributes of the celebrated double-sexed Hindoo deity, the lamp began once more to burn blue, the figures on the wall faded gradually away from my sight, and, in spite of every effort to continue the observations, I dropped again on my pillow fast asleep. During the whole of our stay at Elephanta, I was never afterwards troubled with such visions, for the labours and amusements, to say nothing of the festivities of our glorious and patent pic-nic, disposed all the party to good sound sleep.

At first we sat rather confusedly to work, without much discipline, in our examination of the cave; but as the task was extensive, and we had undertaken to do it properly, some systematic arrangement became absolutely necessary. Mr. William Erskine had agreed, with the assistance of his friends, to draw up the account of the cave, and we placed ourselves under his orders as the captain, or chief. The description which was produced by this united service, is by far the most exact and minute that has ever been made of Elephanta, and was afterwards published in the Bombay Transactions, vol. i. These details undoubtedly owe most of their interest to the skill and taste with which the accomplished writer has arranged them; but as he always very disinterestedly considered his account as the joint property of the party who aided his researches, I have not scrupled, in speaking of the caves, to borrow freely from materials which I helped to collect.

His first assistant (the original proposer of the scheme) was a lady of high qualifications as an artist; not a mere fashionable screen-sketcher and murderer of the picturesque, but a regular painter, trained by long study, and under the influence of good taste. It is grievous to think that so much worth, and beauty, and talents, and such extensive knowledge, should so soon have sunk into the grave; and the smart is, indeed, very bitter which accompanies such recollections, when we feel that they are taken away from us for ever. Perhaps there has very seldom existed any person whose loss has been so truly regretted by the circle of her friends, on account of the hopeless difficulty of supplying her place. As it was at all times a piece of good fortune to find one's self in the same party with this charming person, even when it was left to the chapter of accidents to provide opportunities of conversation, it was considered the greatest of all possible catches to secure her companionship for so many days, and in such a place as Elephanta.

Our master of the ceremonies very judiciously fixed his principal hand and eye before the celebrated triple head, the most remarkable by far in all the cave. A large mat was spread on the ground, with a table and drawing apparatus in the middle of it, near which there was left ample room for the fair artist's host of merry children to romp and roll about on. Near this spot was also placed the easy chair of her eccentric, but accomplished and highly informed husband, who refused to undertake any part of the hard work, but quizzed the whole of us unmercifully for the useless, or, as he called it, idle labour we were bestowing on the cave. This gentleman, who was a great experimental agriculturist, as well as theoretical political economist, in short, what may be called a philosopher of all work, was worth any money on such a pic-nic as this. His knowledge of the world, and his talents in the art of conversation, though of the first order, were still subordinate to the boundless ingenuity of his fancy, by which any thing and every thing could be made to fit the most incongruous phases of his arguments. If in his whole composition there had been a spark of ill-nature, such singular powers of adapting facts to fancies, and such earnestness in driving his points home, would have rendered him the most supreme of all bores, in or out of a cave; but, fortunately, for the Elephanta company, the matchless sweetness of his disposition, his thorough good-breeding, his delight in all the amiable parts of our nature, and his constant readiness to oblige and be obliged, carved him out as the beau ideal of an ally on such an occasion. Many a time and oft the old cavern rung with peals of jolly mirth, and called us from our various holes and corners, to enjoy the witty sallies of this most amusing of persons, whose endless good-humoured jokes, and queer views of things, were always cracking and sparkling round the drawing party before the principal compartment of the temple.

We took our breakfast and dinner at a long table, spread much nearer the mouth of the cave, that we might enjoy, not only the light of day, and the cool clear air of the sea-breeze, but such peeps of the distant ghats and other parts of the landscape, seen across the upper parts of the beautiful bay, as we could catch through the foliage. Of course, we kept far enough back to escape the fierce glare of the sky, which in those climates sends down, especially when it is clouded, the treacherous influence of the sun's indirect rays in a manner almost as troublesome, though not quite so fatal, as his full blaze of light. It may be worth while to mention, that we never allowed beef in any shape or way to approach our board; for although the temple of Elephanta has for centuries been desecrated, and, consequently, is no longer used by the Hindoos, there still hangs about this splendid monument a certain degree of sanctity in the eyes of the poor natives, which it would be cruel not to respect. Accordingly, one of the most beautiful rounds of beef that ever was pickled, received orders to march off the island, without any consideration for the wants and wishes of two or three gourmands of the party, whose self-denial proved no match for their appetite, and whose respect for these imaginary feelings of the natives became equal to zero, as the algebraists say. It afforded some consolation, however, to these disappointed members of the pic-nic, to observe the boundless delight with which our native attendants carried away the unspeakable abomination of the round of beef. The cow and bull, in every shape, are held sacred by the Hindoos; and even those castes who object to no other meat, would much rather die than taste that of an ox.

I was once gravely assured, that in the penal codes of Hindoostan, it is set down as a crime of greater magnitude for a man to jump over a cow than to kill his own mother!—a strangely fantastic classification, surely. Until I heard of this singular law, I certainly had no more thoughts of committing one of these crimes than the other; but, ever after receiving this curious piece of information, I could never see a cow reposing in a meadow without feeling a perverse desire to make a run and leap over her. I actually ventured to try the experiment once in the Green Park, and was very nearly paying the penalty of my Hindoo sacrilege, for the good lady (I mean the cow,) astonished at the proceeding, tossed up her head, and all but spitted me on her horns.

Since the above statement was written, I have discovered that I was entirely in error as to the Hindoo superstition above alluded to. Nevertheless, I let the paragraph stand, as it affords a pretty fair specimen of the manner in which a raw traveller, poking about greedily and indiscreetly in search of what he calls characteristic information, may sometimes manage to be taken in. A quizzical friend of mine at Bombay, observing my head half turned with the glare of oriental novelty, and bewildered in the intricacies of the Hindoo mythology, thought he would experiment on the traveller's credulity, by inventing and palming off upon me the above fiction about the crime of leaping over a cow. Before presenting to the public, however, so very curious a piece of superstition, I thought it but prudent to make further enquiries as to the fact, and only then discovered that, for the last twenty years, I have been going on relating, with all the confidence imaginable—as a solemn point of Hindoo law—the mere figment of a mercurial cadet's imagination. Verily, if the cow in the Green Park had given me a graze with her horn, it would have served me right!

Our antiquarian commander-in-chief, after a cabinet council held daily at the breakfast-table, distributed us in different parts of the cave; one gentleman being appointed to count and measure the columns, another to ascertain the height of the ceiling, while a third, a very exact and trust-worthy assistant, was ordered to construct a ground-plan of the whole excavation. The gentleman named as the chief engineer in this important department of our researches was a medical man in the Company's establishment, who had recently come down to the presidency from the interior, where he had been stationed for some years. He was a single man at the period in question; but most of his associates in this delightful Elephanta pic-nic had the pleasure of attending his marriage-feast not long afterwards.

The fair damsel of his choice had come out to India to join the family of a married sister; but, on reaching Bombay, it appeared that both that lady and her husband had died; and although she knew of several other relations in India, they either resided at remote up-country stations, or were not known to the people at the presidency. On learning these particulars, the captain of the ship in which the lady had taken her passage found himself in a strange puzzle. All his other passengers had landed, and were safe and snug in the bosoms of their respective families, while the disconsolate young woman alluded to remained alone in the empty cabin. The captain could hardly land her like a bale of goods on the beach, neither could he keep her on board; while the poor girl herself, totally ignorant of the ways of the East, could give no opinion as to what ought to be done. The captain, therefore, as in other cases of difficulty, held a consultation with his chief officer, a rough-spun business-like personage, who at once said,

"Go to the governor, sir; he's as good-hearted an old gentleman as ever stepped, and it is his proper business to give directions in such a case. At all events, if you report it regularly to his excellency, the affair cannot rest, and it will be off your shoulders."

"Man the boat! man the boat!" exclaimed the delighted skipper; then turning to the "maiden all forlorn," and assuring her that every thing would soon be settled to her satisfaction, he hurried on shore.

The governor, Sir Evan Nepean, though he had been many years secretary of the admiralty, (a tolerably puzzling birth, I guess!) was yet rather taken aback by the captain's communication.

"I'll see about it," he said, though not knowing for the life of him what on earth to do with the lady, who, being young, pretty, and accomplished, might have felt herself rather awkward in the government-house—for Lady Nepean had remained in England. The captain made his escape as soon as he heard the governor adopt the responsibility by declaring he would think of it.

"You'll see," said the mate to the captain, "that it will all go right by and by; this is not a country in which young ladies, so good and so bonny as our poor passenger, are likely to be left long adrift."

He was right in his conjecture; for the governor, having pondered a little on the matter, sent for a gentleman, not of the East India Company's service, but a resident merchant, at the head of a great house of agency in Bombay, one of the most benevolent of mortal men, and certainly one of the kindest and most generally useful in that country of kind offices and long purses.

"Mr. Money," said Sir Evan to the man of rupees, "will you oblige me by taking a young lady to live with your family till she can hear from, or be heard of by, some of her friends, as those to whom she has come out are either dead or not forthcoming?"

"I shall be delighted to be of use to any friend of yours, Sir Evan," was, of course, the ready and sincere reply; and in less than half an hour the mate and the captain of the ship were congratulating each other on having got a clear ship at last!

What might have been this very interesting young person's fate had she, on her first arrival, found all things as she expected, I cannot pretend to say. Fortune regulates these matters in such queer ways, that our calculations are often sadly put out; but nothing could have been more agreeable than the issue of this apparently untoward adventure. Our engineer of the cave was a friend of the wealthy citizen with whom the governor had deposited the fair lady who had been thrown on his hands by the captain of the ship, and he happened to be asked to dinner there one day. He likewise happened to sit down next the pretty damsel in question; and all this (though, I presume, purely the work of chance) seemed natural enough. The worthy doctor, however, was what is called a "determined bachelor," one of those knowing personages who, for reasons of their own, seem resolved never to marry, and yet who, perchance, may be just on the verge of that awful catastrophe, though little dreaming that the noose which is dangling in festoons on their neck will, by the fall of some unexpected "drop," become in a moment as tight as any rib of steel in the frame-work of their fate. So, at least, it proved with our Elephanta Benedict. In a happy hour he sat down to dinner, but, it is said, did not even look at his neighbour; for he had accidentally caught a glimpse of her figure and drapery, which, though he knew not why, had somewhat shaken his antimatrimonial fortitude, and made his pulse beat five or six throbs faster in the minute than when he first entered the room.

Nothing was said by either party; for, by some accident, no regular introduction had taken place between the gentleman and the pretty stranger, and even their names were respectively unknown. At length, the master of the house, recollecting this omission, introduced them to each other, and then called out,

"Doctor, won't you ask your neighbour to take a glass of wine?"

Both names were very remarkable, and might, perhaps, under any circumstances, have engaged notice; but upon this occasion the effect was striking enough; for the lady's father had been a great friend and patron of the doctor some years before, and she had often heard him spoken of at home, as a person in whom the family were much interested. On hearing their names mentioned, therefore, both the lady and the gentleman started—turned quickly round—their eyes met—the little god laughed—and on that day three weeks they were man and wife!

"But this," to use the words of dear old Robinson Crusoe, "is a digression, and I must not crowd this part of my story with an account of lesser things, but return to the main thread." Our party, then, in the Elephanta cave, consisted, besides our chief artist and her spouse, of two or three other ladies and gentlemen, extremely agreeable persons, one of these being a perfect treasure on such an expedition, from the extent and variety of her resources, and the delightful simplicity with which the whole were placed at the disposal of the company. There was one gentleman particularly well versed in Indian, as well as European astronomy, if we may distinguish these things, and our investigations in the cave often rendered his interpretations of much value. We had also with us a very learned person who had come to India as a missionary, but whose zeal in the cause of conversion had gradually evaporated, while in its place there grew up an intense curiosity to investigate the literature and antiquities of the Hindoos. He was just the hand for us, and formed a good pendant to another and still more agreeable companion, who took an equal interest in the modern customs of the natives, chiefly in what related to their religious ceremonies, their costumes, and their domestic amusements. His knowledge of details we found of great use in deciphering and describing the groups of figures sculptured on the face of the rock, in the different compartments of the cave.

Lastly, we enjoyed the society of a gentleman of the civil service, high in office under the East India Company; and the only drawback which we experienced in his case, was the necessity he was under of going across after breakfast to Bombay, where his business kept him till an hour or so before dinner. A shout of joy from old and young always hailed his most welcome return; and as the time approached, many an anxious eye was turned towards the mouth of the cave, happy to be the first to catch a glimpse of his tall figure on the bright sky. As I name no names, and make no allusions but such as will be understood by those only whom they will not offend, I may be allowed to say, in passing, that in beating up the world since, pretty briskly, I have rarely, if ever, met, even separately, persons so estimable, in all respects, as many of those who were here collected in the Elephanta cave, expressly to make themselves agreeable to one another. There can be no doubt, in most cases, and little doubt in any case, that time, distance, and totally different duties and occupations in life, estrange man from man, and by gradually diluting friendships into acquaintances, eventually obliterate, or nearly so, all recollection of the closest intimacies. But there are instances, and this Elephanta pic-nic is one of them, in which, by a strange and pleasing mental process, the recollection is not only kept warm, but is even improved in its temperature by time. At all events, the more I have seen of the rest of the world, the more sensible I have become to the merits of the delightful friendships of that day, and the more truly I have felt attached to them, although the correspondence which has since passed between us hardly deserves the name.

It makes me sigh, indeed, to think how busy death has been with some of the members of that party, whom the survivors could least have spared, and to look round and see how widely all the rest are now scattered over the different quarters of the globe. In the course of my wandering life, indeed, it has happened to me to meet most of them again, and several of them more than once. The extent, indeed, as well as variety of opportunities I have enjoyed of forming valuable acquaintances has been so great, and the loss of friends by death so frequent, that I now find, to whatever direction I turn, or to whatever fragment of my life I apply myself for topics of interest, or however brilliant the scene was at the time, the view is now almost always sobered, or mellowed, I will not call it "sicklied o'er" with the pale cast of thought, consequent upon the remembrance of these losses. So much is this the case, that I should certainly feel some reluctance in thus disturbing the ashes of my early expectations, if there had not happily arisen out of these promises, in most cases, a far more enduring performance than even I, sanguine as I have ever been, had ventured to hope for. I have read much and more of the disappointments to which all men are subjected in this matter; but I can only say, for myself, that in this much-abused lottery of human life I never drew a false friend.

Of the Elephanta party, one only of the whole number still hovers round the neighbourhood of the cave; another has been settled for nearly twenty years at Calcutta, and I had the pleasure of beating up his quarters on returning from China some years afterwards; a third took flight, strangely enough, exactly in the opposite direction, and exchanged the luxuries of the glorious and graceful eastern world for the raw materials of the west, and actually "located" himself and his family in North America.

The method we adopted for investigating and describing the cave, was to divide the labour in some cases, and in others to combine our exertions, but, in all parts of the task, to make the work as amusing as possible. While our principal artist was engaged at the proper distance in making the beautiful and accurate sketches which have since been engraved for the transactions of the Bombay Society, the chronicler of the cave proceeded, with one or two of the party as his aide-de-camp, to examine the sculptures more narrowly; and having continued his investigation till he was satisfied that nothing had been passed over, he sat down at a little table, arranged about for that purpose from place to place, and there, on the very spot, wrote an account of what was before him. When the description was completed, a kind of general council, or "committee of the whole cave," was assembled, to report upon the result. Some of the party, including, of course, the ladies, sat round the writer, while others assisted by ladders, climbed up to the top of the carvings, in order to detect any inaccuracy in the description. Mr. Erskine then commenced reading his own account, while the rest stood by in readiness to check whatever might seem to require correction. On the occurrence of any remark in the description which, to some of us, did not appear to be borne out by the facts, an immediate halt was requested; and the point being diligently re-examined, the writing was either confirmed, or altered till it met the approbation of the whole host of critics. This method of proceeding gave wonderful animation to what, under ordinary circumstances, might have been considered dry details. It also put all the investigating detachments to their mettle; generally furnished abundant matter for discussion; and often set us off upon fresh and amusing courses of enquiry.

It likewise not infrequently happened, that a piece of sculpture was unfortunately much decayed by time, or injured by the hands of wanton heretics, or chanced to be placed far back in the cave, there arose so small difficulty in coming to any rational conclusion about the matter. Where the cruel hammer of some meddling geological or antiquarian traveller had driven away two or three out of half-a-dozen of a poor Hindu god's arms, or crushed down his sacred nose, there remained for us little or no resource except that strabismic process of soundly anathematising the delinquent or delinquents unknown. But where there existed any remedy within reach, we spared no pains to throw light on the subject. This, in fact, (without any pun,) was our chief desideratum; and the scientific heads of the company were put in requisition to devise methods for illuminating the dark parts of the temple. The first and most obvious plan was to stick a number of little bits of wax taper all over and round those portions of the sculptures which were under immediate investigation. But this was found to be troublesome, in more respects than one. The wax melted and ran down, and the corner of the cave in which we were working either became too choky by the smoke and heat, or the light burned down and required to be shifted. This plan, therefore, was only resorted to when the other methods I am about to describe failed in effecting the purpose.

The sun at no time of the day shone full into the cave, which faces due north, but we found that by borrowing the looking-glasses from the lady's tent we could catch his rays, and send them to the very back of the excavation, and thence, by means of other mirrors, could polarise our light in such a way as even to make it turn corners, and fall on spots where probably, never sun-light rested before. The ecstasy of the natives on beholding the success of this manoeuvre was so great, that some of them expressed themselves highly flattered by the honours paid to their long-degraded deities. On hearing this stated by the Hindoos, one of the wits of our party remarked, that if these said gods, Messrs. Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma, should get their heads above water again, they could, of course, do no less than remember that we noticed them in their adversity; a stale Joe Miller, indeed, as every one must remember who has kissed the bronze toe of St. Peter in the Vatican—erst old Jupiter of the capitol; but it made the natives laugh heartily when it was interpreted to them.

Another device of the same kind assisted our researches not a little, and was of still greater service to us in dissipating nearly all the gloom of the cave, thus helping to keep up that air of cheerfulness which is of such vast importance to the success of every undertaking in this world, great or small. The tea-urn having been cap-sized on the breakfast-table one morning, the servants naturally spread the table cloth in the sun on the shrubs before the cave. The immediate effect of this mass of white was to lighten up every thing within; and the hint once given, we lost no time in expanding it, by hoisting half a dozen other cloths, at the proper angles, till a bright yet soft glow of light was thrown upon the principal figure of all, at the top of the great division of the cave. As soon as this effect was perceived, all other work was suspended, and every one flocked round the commander of the party while he drew forth his scroll, and, without any flourish of trumpets, proceeded nearly as follows:

"The figure that faces the principal entrance is the most remarkable in this excavation, and has given rise to numberless conjectures and theories. It is a gigantic bust, representing some three-headed being, or three heads of some being, to whom the temple may be supposed to be dedicated. Dr. William Hunter, in the Archæologia, vol. vii. p. 292, describes this bust as having four heads, one being hid behind. It is to be observed, however, that no traces of the fourth head appear, it being left entirely to the imagination to supply it, as well as the fifth on the top, if the bust be Shiva's. Some writers have imagined that it is what they called the Hindu Trinity of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, and very strange historical conclusions have been drawn from this hypothesis. The Hindu Trimurti, or Trinity, as it has been called, does not occupy a very remarkable place in the theology of the Brahmins. The word Trimurti means three-form.

"The three-headed figure at Elephanta represents the deity only down to the breast, or a third-length. One head faces the spectator, another looks to the right, and a third to the left; the fourth may be imagined to be concealed behind. It will give some idea of its bulk to mention, that from the top of the cap of the middle figure to the bottom of the image is seventeen feet ten inches, while the horizontal curved line, embracing the three heads at the height of the eyes and touching the eyes, is twenty-two feet nine inches. All these figures, it may be mentioned, are carved out of the solid rock, which is a coarse-grained dark-gray basaltic formation, called by the geologists trachyte."

When the describer had written so far, he paused, and asked our opinion; upon which there was a general demand upon him to insert something by which his future readers might be informed who, as well as what, this extraordinary figure was?—which of the various Hindoo gods it was intended to represent? Thus prompted, he went on again.

"All the Hindu deities have particular symbols by which they may be distinguished; much as the family of an European may be discovered by its armorial bearings. Unfortunately, many of the figures of Elephanta are too much mutilated to allow us to resort with certainty to this criterion for distinguishing them; and this is particularly the case with the principal figure. The face which looks to the east, or right hand (the spectator's left), is evidently Shiva or Mahadeo, whose principal face, by the rules laid down for fixing images in Hindu temples, must always face the east, while Yoni generally turns to the north. In his hand he holds the cobra di capella, which twists itself round his arm, and rears its head so as to look him in the face. His countenance seems to bear the marks of habitual passion."

While our accomplished antiquary was writing, the rest of the pic-nickers were scrambling about the heads like school boys on a haystack, till once more called upon to listen. The above lines (now quoted, as I may mention once for all, from the Transactions of the Bombay Literary Society,) were read, and agreed to, except some remarks towards the end. One of the company, whose name will appear by and by, and who was perched on the top of a ladder resting on the tip of Shiva's handsome Roman nose, called out that these last words were a scandalous libel on the worthy god, whose expression was eminently placid, evincing any thing but habitual passion.

"Well," said the narrator, "what do you make of that swelling between the eye-brows? Surely that indicates the corrugator muscle in action, or, in other words, shows that your friend Mr. Shiva is in a rage."

"I admit no such thing," said the objector, who from his garb appeared to be nautical, "I see no wrinkling of the brow: after a long examination, I cannot help thinking that the protuberance on this brow is intended for the third eye of the god: it is entirely raised above the general surface of the brow without any indurture, such as that which occurs on the wrinkled forehead of passion. The whole skin of this figure's brow is smooth except this oval protuberance, which nowise resembles that of Bhryava, as you called the figure we were examining yesterday in the northeast compartment north of the Lingam, where the brow is marked by deep furrows highly expressive of passion."

Upon this objection being started, the whole expedition assembled as near the disputed point as possible; a temporary scaffold was rigged up for the ladies on a level with Shiva's eyes; and no Lilliputians ever investigated the countenance of honest Gulliver with more interest than we did that of the no less wonderful Trimurti. A couple of additional mirrors were put in requisition to fling a strong light into the cave, and a fresh supply of candles ordered up from the tents. The more the parties examined the matter, the less they were agreed; and the controversy began at last to assume that positive and rather warmish character which so often belongs to enquiries in which the data are few and obscure. It is then we find the imaginative or guessing process most vivid exactly in proportion as the reasoning or matter-of-fact process becomes dull. The interest, also, which people take in any such discussions is generally inversely as its importance; and the hope of agreement becomes less and less as the enquiry proceeds. In all probability such might have been the result of this battle in the cave touching poor Shiva's third eye, had not one of our periodical absentees arrived just at that moment. He wiped his spectacles, held a candle to the image, and declared that, until the dirt was washed away, we might go on disputing till doomsday without getting nearer the mark.

Before those eager combatants, "the eyes" and the "no eyes," had recovered from the oily pause cast upon the troubled waves of the controversy by this dictum, our head-servant came forward to announce the ever-welcome fact that dinner was on the table! The communication was received with a cheer that made the bats fly out of their holes in dismay.

It is, perhaps, needless to observe, that on each succeeding day the wine appeared to become more racy, the water cooler, the coffee more fragrant, the tea more refreshing, and, above all, the conversation more animated, gossipy, and instructive. I ought to have mentioned before, that although, unfortunately, there were no singers of the party, one gentleman played beautifully on the violoncello; the effect of which, in the solemn stillness of the cave, was singularly pleasing. We had also a great store of books; and happening to have some good readers, (a rare catch,) our evenings slipped away so merrily amongst the olden gods and goddesses of the eastern world, that we often sighed to think how soon we must return to the ordinary business of modern life.

I lay awake half the night of the controversy about Shiva's eye, thinking how we could best settle this great question; and at last bethought me of a scheme, which with the earliest dawn I put in practice. When my coxswain came in the morning for orders, I sent him back to the Theban, a frigate of which I had then the acting command, and bade him return as speedily as possible with the ship's fire-engine. Accordingly, before breakfast was well over, we had the hose led along and the pump in full action. The deluge which was now poured over the celebrated Trimurti, must have enchanted the thirsty shades of the "water-loving Mahadeo." The Hindoos, assembled to see what was going on, were astonished and delighted, and so, in fact, were, we to discover how clear, sharp, and beautiful the sculptures stood out, after being played upon for a couple of hours, and well scrubbed with hard brushes in every corner. This service certainly had not been performed upon them for three centuries at the least, and possibly not for a thousand years.

At the next sitting of our grand committee on Shiva's well-washed countenance, the following notes were made by Mr. Erskine. "The face looking east has a fine Roman nose, and its brow is swollen, and protruded between the eyes. This was at first regarded as only the swelling protuberance between and above the eyelids, which is remarked by physiognomists to be indicative of passion; but having been led to more careful examination of it by Captain Basil Hall, to whose unwearied curiosity the present account owes much of the accuracy that it may possess; and, from comparing it with similar protuberances on the brow of other figures in the cave, I have little doubt that it represents the third eye of Shiva, from which flame is supposed to issue, and fire by which the world is finally to be destroyed. As Shiva had five heads, though he had only one such eye, it is represented on his principal head alone, which, of course, is that looking eastward." (As the centre head faces the north, this observation refers to that which is turned to the right hand, or is looking towards the spectator's left.) "He has mustachios," adds the writer, "on his upper lip; and he and one other figure in the eastern wing are the only figures in the cave that have them. At the corner of each of his lips a tusk projects over the under lip. The lower lip of all the figures at Elephanta seems thickish, and more African than Asiatic. His tongue is thrust out between his lips; his eyebrows are not regularly arched, rather irregularly twisted, and depressed on each side towards the nose, as in those of a person habitually passionate."

So far the historian; but it would seem, from the printed account in the Bombay Transactions, that the party were not yet unanimous; for in a note, or protest, which I gave to Mr. Erskine for publication along with his account, the following words occur:

"This head seems to be speaking to the snake; and I would rather say that the tongue is protruded in doing so, than that it is indicative of anger; nor can I quite agree to the account of the eyebrows. They are certainly not arched; but the deviation is not much, nor does it convey to me any idea of agitation, but rather of mirth, as if he were singing to the snake, and gratified to see its pleasure. The dimples at the corner of the mouth, too, strike me as resembling the approach to a smile much more than the distortion of habitual passion; and the corners of the mouth are, if any thing, turned upwards. The mustachios, also, lend their aid in giving a fiercer look to Shiva than I can allow is intended by the sculptor."

Thus it will be perceived that travellers, as well as doctors, can differ, even when the subject of examination is under their eye. In what follows relating to this beautiful head we were all quite agreed; and I add these few lines, more to complete the account, than from any particular interest they contain. Indeed, I question much if it be possible without numerous drawings to engage the attention egregiously or usefully towards any class of Hindoo antiquities. There are, indeed, some other specimens of ancient Indian sculpture which may form an exception, particularly an immense statue of solid granite, upwards of sixty feet high, in the centre of southern India, which I visited on crossing the peninsula.

Mr. Erskine concluded his account of the eastern head of the Trimurti in Elephanta, in these words:

"His cap is richly adorned with variegated figures, branches, and flowers; among others may be distinguished a skull, or death's head; a serpent, with various folds and branches of the bilva-tree, the leaves of which issue three from a point, like the trefoil; and nirgundi, a sort of shrub, which are symbols that belong peculiarly to Shiva; a few curls run along below his cap. Behind his cap the stone is excavated into two narrow parallel slips, (not seen in the drawing,) the one higher than the other, in which two persons might lie stretched at length, without being observed from below; but there are no steps up to them."

The description given in the Bombay Transactions of the two other heads is equally minute, graphic, and strictly accurate; and nobody should visit the cave without that account to guide them. At this distance from the spot, however, those details, so peculiarly interesting when present, are apt to become tiresome.

This magnificent triad lies in a recess cut in the rock to the depth of thirteen feet, including the thickness of the door-way screen, or wall, which is about two feet and a half. The basement is raised about two feet nine inches from the ground. In the corners of the threshold are two holes, as if door-posts had been inserted in them; and in the floor is a groove, as if for receiving a screen, which may have been occasionally let down to conceal the group.

The occurrence of a triple head of such magnitude, and of such skill and beauty in the workmanship, in a spot so much within the range of observation, has naturally led travellers into various speculations as to its origin and the object of its sculptors. On this subject, the following remarks of Mr. Erskine are possessed of considerable interest, not only with reference to this particular section of the Elephanta cave, but as they relate to a curious branch of the fantastic mythology of the Hindoos.

"Such, then, is the remarkable figure that occupies the most conspicuous place in the temple, and which of late has generally been regarded as the Hindoo Trinity: but it appears that, if our opinions be guided by a general examination of this figure compared with the others in the excavation, and with the apparent design of the cave, little doubt will be left that the whole excavation is a temple dedicated to Shiva alone, who is also singly represented by the three-headed bust. The impression made on Christians, however, by the view of this triple figure, has had more influence than any regard to genuine Hindoo doctrines, or to the legends in the sacred books of the Brahmans, in fixing the opinions most prevalent on the subject of this mysterious bust. To account for the appearance of a many-headed monster in a mythology like that of the Hindoos, which swarms with gods of every description, it does not seem necessary to resort to the doctrine of the Trinity, which cannot be correctly said to have a place in the theology of the Hindoos."*

CHAPTER XVIII.

MYTHOLOGY OF ELEPHANTA.

For several days after commencing our researches in the cave at Elephanta, we found ample stores of interest in looking at the different sculptures on the rock, in making measurements of the figures, and in sketching those objects which appeared most curious. After a time we began to feel a still higher description of curiosity, as we gradually became acquainted with the different groups, and recognised over and over again the same features or attributes in the principal personages represented. We then naturally desired to be made better acquainted with the intentions of the persons whose piety, superatition, or political policy, had devised this astonishing excavation. And we expected to derive more and more pleasure from contemplating the result, when the purpose which the artists aimed at was told to us. A general call, therefore, was again made upon our accomplished and highly-informed companion, Mr. Erskine, that he should enlighten our European darkness, and instruct us from time to time in the history of the gods, goddesses, bulls, elephant-headed monsters, and other fantastic idols before us. We alleged that we should draw and measure them more correctly, and perform the office of assistants to him as chronicler-general of the pic-nic with more spirit, if he would permit us to have some slight knowledge of what we were about.

"But then," he observed, "is it not proverbial even here on the spot, that Indian topics are a bore, and that Hindoo antiquities, mythology, and languages, are the supremest bores of all? unless, indeed," added he, "such a master-hand as that of Southey thinks fit to touch the subject with his inspiration, and to give to the world at large, in such a poem as the Curse of Kehama, a considerable portion of that pleasure which had been confined before to a few orientalists."

"Pray," said one of the company, "has Mr. Southey ever been in India?"

"There was a pause of at least a minute; at the end of which a gentleman, who had just been reading the poem alluded to, declared that the author could not have been in the East, otherwise he never would have made one of his characters lie down to sleep

"Beneath a cocoa's feathery shade."

"Why not?" was asked by two or three voices.

"Because," said the objector, "a cocoa nut tree affords no shade, or hardly any, and no native would ever think of such shelter from the sun; the image is purely European."

"Nevertheless," said a traveller of the party, a man of taste and observation, and long resident in the tropical districts of India where the cocoa-nut flourishes best, "it must be owned that, even if the poet have adopted an image from European customs, his description, as far as expression goes, is most admirably true to the scenery of this country; for no words can give a more perfect idea of the sort of shadow which is cast by the feathery topknot of the cocoa-nut tree, than those which Southey has used."

A pretty brisk discussion now took place as to sundry other points in the Curse of Kehama, which ended, as such things generally do, by leaving each party where he had begun. Indeed, the hard hits of an argument are often like those of a hammer on a nail, which either drive it farther in, or, if that be impossible, flatten out the head into what is both technically and figuratively called a rivet. At all events, when we came to "divide," which we did in imitation of our betters, the numbers of those who said Southey could not have been in India were exactly equal to those who declared it to be impossible that any man who had never visited those regions, could have described them with so much accuracy both of colouring and mere outline, or with such wonderful truth of oriental feeling. There the matter rested for some ten years at least, when I had accidentally the pleasure to find myself, in London, sitting at dinner alongside the poet himself. I told him of our battle in the cave, which, considering the ground on which it was fought, and the qualifications of the critics, he knew well how to appreciate. He smiled, but made no comment; while the expression of his countenance was such as one might fancy De Foe's to have been, had any wiseacre begged to ask if ever he had visited the island of Juan Fernandez.

This episode about the Curse of Kehama was of some use to us, by recalling scenes and circumstances in the mythology of the Hindoos, which, but for the immortal verse to which they are so happily married, might have escaped our memories altogether. As, however, the knowledge derived from the poem, to which we often referred, was no more of the kind we wanted respecting the caves, than that which Shakspeare and the Waverley Novels give to the minute enquirer into the constitutional history of England, we joined unanimously in a petition to our master in these matters, to give us, in a few popular words, some idea of the religions which had prevailed in this quarter of the East. Thus urged our friend agreed to try his hand at making the subject a little less dry than usual; and while we closed round him, one fine cool evening, he gave us a sketch of what we required in order to a fuller comprehension of the ancient sculptures by which we were surrounded. The position chosen for this interesting lecture, to use Mr. Erskine's words, "was near the entrance of the temple, where the spacious front is supported by two massy pillars and two pilasters, forming three openings, under a steep rock thickly overhung by brushwood and wild shrubs. The long ranges of columns that appear closing in perspective on every side; the flat roof of solid rock, that seems to be prevented from falling only by the massy pillars, whose capitals are pressed down and flattened as if by the superincumbent weight; the darkness that obscures the interior of the temple, which is dimly lighted only by the entrances, and the gloomy appearance of the gigantic stone figures ranged along the wall, and hewn, like the whole temple, out of the living rock, joined to the strange uncertainty that hangs over the history of the place, carry the mind back to distant periods, and impress it with that kind of uncertain religious awe with which the grander works of ages of darkness are generally contemplated."

Were the account not quite so long, I should feel much tempted to quote the whole of the luminous summary which Mr. Erskine gave us of the rise and progress of the three great religious sects of India, the Brahminical, the Bouddhist, and the Jainas. Those, however, who have any further curiosity on these subjects, will find them admirably treated in the Bombay Transactions, vol. i.

Many of the positions advanced were so entirely new to most of us, and also so different from the crude and ill-digested notions of those of our party who had attended to the subject in a superficial manner, that much animated discussion arose amongst us. In no great space of time, the company in the cave talked themselves into a famous mess of confusion, when they were very glad to appeal once more to the only man of the party who had really considered the points in discussion between us, which related chiefly to the numbers and qualities of the inferior-powers in the crowded theological list of the Hindoos. Our friend was now, therefore, called upon to instruct us in the circumstances which had degraded a theology, originally so pure as to possess, we were told, but one deity, into such a multitudinous creed.

He first stated the fact, and then showed us how it applied in practice amongst the Hindoos. "Besides the three great gods," said he, "Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, there are, it appears, a large crowd of minor deities. The wind, the sea, the elements, have all their gods; the sun, moon and stars also; every river and fountain is either a deity, or has a deity to preside over it; so that nothing is done but by or through a god. The greater deities have, besides, a numerous class of dependants and servants; and human passions being once bestowed on the gods, heaven, as well as the earth, has its physician, its poet, and its dancing girls. In this great crowd of deities there is no man however capricious or humble, that may not find some divinity, or portion of the divinity, suited to his humour, or self-humiliation. If a person find some difficulty in approaching Ram, that god's monkey-servant, Hanuman, may, however, claim his worship. A little red paint thrown on a stone, or on the stump of a tree, converts it into a Hindoo god, and all the lower classes who pass fall down and worship."

"But pray," some one asked, "do the natives really believe these stocks and stones to be gods, actually grided with intelligence and higher powers than themselves? For instance, if we had questioned any one of the multitude whom we saw the other day throwing cocoa-nuts into the sea, as to the number and attributes of the gods before whom he was prostrating himself on the beach, what would have been his answer?"

"I am glad you interrupted me to ask this question," said our good-natured preceptor; "for it deserves particular notice, that even in this apparent degradation of the human intellect, if you ask one of the lowest of these unfortunate beings how many gods there are? he will immediately answer, 'one God only.' And, I think, you will discover, that although they pay religious adoration to stocks and stones, from some superstitious belief that a portion of divinity resides in them, they never confound these subordinate objects of worship with the one great God, the supposed creator and preserver of the universe, but whom they consider as too mighty for them to venture to approach. When the Brahmans, therefore, are taxed with idolatry, they always excuse themselves by alleging the necessity of making an impression on rude minds by means of some intelligible symbols, on which the ignorant may rest their thoughts, and to which they may look for reward or punishment."

"In the Brahminical religion, as there were many incarnations, so the gods are supposed to have appeared with several heads, with the heads of animals, with a number of hands, and other singularities; and consequently, their images, in such temples as this in which we are now sitting at our tea and toast, correctly represent all these peculiarities, as I have already, in some degree, pointed out to you in the different compartments of Elephanta, and we can do more particularly to-morrow, if you please. But the religion of the Bouddhists differs very greatly from that just described. Amongst the Brahmans, God is introduced every where—by the Bouddhists no where. The deities of the Brahmans pervade and animate nature—but the god of the Bouddhists, like that of the Epicureans, remains in repose, quite unconcerned about human affairs, and therefore is not the object of worship. With them there is no intelligent divine being who judges of human actions as good or bad, and rewards or punishes them as such. This, indeed, is practically the same as having no god at all. Good and ill, according to their creed, are, however, supposed to spring invariably from virtue and vice, there being, as they believe, an inseparable and necessary connection between virtue and prosperity, vice and misfortune. Yet, as the mind of man must have some object of confidence on which to rest its hopes, and to which to direct its supplication and prayer, the Bouddhists teach, that from time to time men of surpassing piety and self-denial have appeared on earth, and from their singular worth have, after death, been transferred to a state of superior bliss; which state, however, they say, we can only intimate by describing it as an absence of all pain, as we can only define health by an absence of all disease. These saints, or prophets, after reforming the world in their life-time, and by their superior sanctity attaining the power of performing miracles, are still imagined, after death, to have certain powers of influencing us. It is these men, transferred by death to bliss, who are the object of Bouddhist worship. This worship assumes different forms in different countries, and is by some supposed to be more widely diffused than any other religion. It is also worthy of remark, that wherever this form of religion prevails in its original state, the relics of these holy men, or saints, are the objects of worship. The largest temples are often in the form of a pyramid, or the section of a globe, and are supposed to contain the tooth, or hair, or some other relic, of the saint.

"The forms of these holy places have been adopted from the custom prevalent in these countries of depositing the ashes of the deceased under a pyramid, or under a globular mound. The pyramids are often of great size, and on their summits are umbrellas, which are frequently adorned with bells; and sometimes this pyramid is gilded over. Other temples, of nearly similar construction, but hollow within, contain images to which adoration is directed. The images of these saints have different attitudes, sometimes sitting cross-legged in a meditative posture, sometimes standing upright. As all the ideas of the Bouddhists relate to men, and as no incarnations, or transformations, of superior beings are recorded, it is obvious, that in their temples we can expect to find no unnatural images, no figures compounded of man and beast, nor monsters with many hands or many heads, as we see here. As the priests and scholars of the Bouddhists live in a sort of collegiate establishment near some great temple, we always find a multitude of cells around the excavation in their temples."

I had afterwards various opportunities of verifying these remarks about the Bouddhist form of religion, in many other parts of India, in Ceylon, and lastly in China. At Canton, Lord Amherst and his suite, on their return from Peking, were lodged in a very extensive temple dedicated to the worship of Bouddha. It was singularly interesting to observe, that the ceremonial duties of this establishment were performed by a multitude of barefooted and shaven-crowned priests, dressed in yellow robes, and looking marvellously like some of the religious orders of Roman Catholics whom we see in Italy. These persons were lodged in cells built round the court of the great temple, pagoda, or joss-house, as the English indiscriminately call the religious edifices of the eastern world. Many of these worthies were made to turn out for the accommodation of the strangers, in a manner which, though it shocked our delicacy not a little, appeared to produce no such effect on the lay part of the Chinese population, who shoved their poor priests about in a very unceremonious style.

I remember once conversing on this subject with a Chinese, an intelligent Hong merchant, who spoke English perfectly; but I could not make him understand our feelings of respect to the ministers of any religion.

"What have we to do with that sort of business?" he asked; "the Chinese government provides and pays for a certain number of priests, who perform a certain number of ceremonies, chant so many prayers, and, in short, take charge of the whole religion of the country, leaving us merchants, and all other persons, to attend exclusively to our own business, without having any thing to do with the matter."

In corroboration of this strange indifference amongst the Chinese, it may be stated, that in the letters of the early Jesuits the most bitter complaints are found of the difficulties they encountered, not so much in converting the Chinese from a false doctrine to the true faith, as in getting the slippery minds of their Neophytes to hold fast any ideas upon such subjects at all.

It will easily be supposed, that one of the points upon which we felt the greatest curiosity during our visit to Elephanta, was the age of these caves. I cannot say that we came to any safe conclusion on this branch of the subject.

"Nothing presents itself in these caves," observed our antiquary, "which can lead to a satisfactory solution of the important and curious question, In what age, or by what dynasty, was this vast temple completed? One fact is worthy of notice, that a greater number of magnificent cave-temples present themselves on this part of the western coast of the peninsula of India, than are to be met with any where else in Hindoostan. The caves of Elephanta, those of Kanara, Amboli, and some others on the island of Salsette; the fine cave of Carli, on the road to Poona by the Bor Ghaut, the still more extensive and magnificent ranges at Ellora, not to mention several smaller cave-temples in the Kohan and near the Adjunta Pass, are all on Mahratta ground, and seem to show the existence of some great and powerful dynasty, which must have reigned many years to complete works of such labour and extent. The existence of temples of opposite characters, and of different and hostile religions, only a few miles from each other, and, in some instances, even united in the same range, is a singular fact, which well deserves to excite the attention and exercise the industry of the Indian antiquary. Thus, within no great distance from Bombay we have the caves of Kanara on the island of Salsette, and those of Carli on the mainland, both evidently belonging to the Bouddhists; while those of Amboli, also on Salsette, and of Elephanta on the adjacent island, belong to the Brahmans; and the wonderful caves of Ellora possess excavations of both classes."

After listening to these explanations, we returned the next day with fresh vigour to an actual examination of the strange abode in which we were living, respecting the dimensions of which a very few observations will suffice.

The great temple was found, by careful measurements, to be about one hundred and thirty feet deep, measuring from the chief entrance to the further end of the cave; and one hundred and thirty-three feet broad, from the eastern to the western entrance. It then rested (1813) on twenty-six pillars, of which eight were broken at that time; and on the sides were carved sixteen pilasters. As neither the floor nor the roof is in one plane, the height of the cave is found to vary from seventeen feet and a half to fifteen feet. The plan of the temple is regular, there being eight pillars and pilasters in a line from the northern to the southern entrance, and the same number from the eastern to the western entrance. It is interesting to observe, however, that the whole frame and form of the excavation, which to the eye appears regular, when critically examined and measured, is found in an uncommon degree faulty. The pillars in the different ranges deviate from the straight line, some advancing and some receding beyond the proper places. Many of them stand with a certain degree of obliquity; few are exactly of the same dimensions; and the different sides of the same pillar are rarely similar to each other. Even the whole temple itself, which to the eye presents the appearance of regularity, has no two sides of the same magnitude. The left side of the cave is one hundred and thirty-three feet eight inches in length; while the right side is only one hundred and twenty-eight feet four inches. Varieties of this kind are observable in every other part. Some of the pillars are situated from each other at the distance of only twelve feet ten inches, others are separated to sixteen feet four inches and a half, some at fifteen feet, and so on. The size of the pillars is not less various; and as their inequality extends to every part of the temple, great and small, it has given rise to the idea that it was intentional; in support of which view it has been alleged, that the Hindoos never make the sides of a tank, or reservoir, perfectly equal. But although this may be true, it only shows their want of skill and correct taste. Yet, in a work hewn and carved out of rock, with such prodigious labour and expense as the Elephanta temple, such defects appear astonishing.

We are apt to suppose, though perhaps from habit alone, that there is a natural or instinctive feeling of order in our minds which suggests to us to make the opposite sides of a room, for example, parallel and equal. But I remember to have often remarked circumstances in India which would seem to prove, that the natives possess but little of the bump of order on their skulls. I once watched a set of palankeen bearers who were sorely perplexed when ordered to spread a carpet. The apartment happened to be considerably larger than the carpet; but, for their lives, the poor fellows could not determine how to put it down. First they got it over on one side, then they pulled it till it touched the end of the room. In both these cases the unequal proportions of the uncovered spaces struck their senses, but afforded them apparently no clue to the remedy. They next dragged the carpet into one corner, and stood looking at it, muttering and chattering to one another, like so many puzzled monkeys, for five minutes. At length, after sundry other trials, and many pauses, they finally arranged it, in the greatest perplexity, in what is called diamond fashion, with the corners of the carpet touching the middle part of the wall, instead of being pointed towards the angles of the room, so that the sides were as far from parallelism as could possibly be. They now looked at one another, laughed, and, with the most satisfactory chuckle in the world, left the room under the conviction of having performed the service upon which they were sent in the most perfect style.

After we had worked for nearly a whole day at the curious avatar of Shiva, a grand hunt was ordered after traces of Bouddhist images. As the detestation of the Brahmans towards poor Bouddh, is nearly as deep-rooted as the hatred which exists between those European sects which differ from one another merely by slight shades of doctrine, the existence of an image of this rival deity in a temple dedicated to Shiva, would be about as great an abomination as an organ, or a painting, in a presbyterian kirk.

After much examination, we discovered only two figures that could by possibility be representatives of this hostile god; one of which we discovered in the western wing of the cave, the other in the first compartment on the left of the grand entrance. This spot we generally made use of as a sort of pantry, in which stood cold chickens, biscuits, and wine, all day long to refresh the spirits of the party. I can still see "reflected to memory's eye" two goglets of the most deliciously cool water that ever gladdened the parched palate of a traveller, filled from a little spring which dribbled over the brow of the rock, just to the eastward of the cave, after stealing out like a snake from amongst the broad-leaved brushwood fringing the edge of the cliff. As the cave faces the north, and the sun at its greatest height shines obliquely over the precipice, it leaves all that side of the hill cool and agreeable, when the rest of the island is parched up and withered. We always took care, however, to have our goglets suspended in the shade, and in the draught. These capital contrivances are earthenware vessels, of a red colour, only half baked, and so porous, that, although the water does not actually trickle from them, it forms a coating outside like dew, and sometimes runs into drops. This being evaporated by the current of hot dry air sweeping past, a degree of cold is produced, the value of which only those who have visited such regions of the sun can have learned fully to appreciate. Of course, when the more serious affairs of champagne and claret came into requisition, we summoned our regular wine cooler, or abdar, who, by some strange chemical hocus pocus connected with dissolving nitre, in which he twisted about the bottles for a few minutes, placed before us, as one of our party exultingly expressed it, "a nectar fit for the jolliest of these gods themselves, should they have returned to life and reclaimed their cave." I cannot answer for this; but I am sure that nothing short of the "last pang shall tear from my heart" the recollection of the intense enjoyment of those half dreamy, half waking, but perfectly enchanting two or three hours towards the close of every day in the Elephanta cave; when the ladies and children had sauntered off to their tent, or climbed the hill to take a look at the ghauts of the Mahratta country, or to see the sun set between them and Arabia—while we luxurious lords of the creation who remained behind flung our feet on the table, or rested them against some angle of the excavation—thrust our hookah pipes or our cigars into our mouths, swung back on our chairs, and asked and thought of no higher heaven upon earth.

Exactly abreast of the spot where these temperate revels were carried on, sat a figure in stone, with whose countenance and attitude we soon became wonderfully familiar. Many a merry bumper we tossed off to a better understanding of his mysterious history; for, to all appearance, the rogue (being a Bouddhist) had no more business in the Elephanta cave than we Topcewallas, or hat-wearing heretics of the west. This worthy personage, unlike his brother gods and goddesses farther within-doors, boasted of only two arms; a shabby allowance, in a company where any figure pretending to the rank of a gentleman had six at least. Unfortunately, both of our friend's arms were broken off; perhaps by some of the shot fired by a Portuguese fidalgo, who, Captain Pyke informs us, amused himself in the cave with a great gun. A monkey in a china shop has some shadow of sense and purpose in cracking the crockery; but the Portuguese nobleman, blazing away at the sculptures of an ancient temple, must be allowed to beat Jacko hollow.

There are still left some indications, however, to show that the hands of this figure rested on his lap. He is sitting (or was sitting, when we left him) on the Padmasan, or lotus seat, the stalk of which is supported by two persons below, very much as occurs in the caves of Kanara or Salsette, which are undoubtedly Bouddhist temples. This statue is certainly by far the most puzzling figure in all Elephanta; for we know of no instance in which Shiva is so represented: and yet, if this really be Bouddh, how the deuce comes he into a Brahminical cave? In the present orthodox Hindoo mythology, at least, it is well known that Bouddh, in so far as he is admitted at all, is considered as an avatar of Vishnu, incarnated for the purpose of leading mankind into error. He is, therefore, rarely represented at all, and never worshipped in that form. One can understand this easily enough; and yet the sly authorities who devised the great work at Elephanta appear to have thought it but safe to commence by propitiating so important a personage, for the compartment in which this image of the Father of Evil (if such he be) is sculptured, must have been one of the earliest excavated.

I have taken pains to verify the references from the Archæologia, vol. vii., by examining Captain Pyke's original journal, which is still preserved at the India House. This gentleman, who was afterwards governor of St. Helena, visited the Elephanta cave in 1712; and his ac count, given in the log-book of the ship Stringer, is not a little curious. It is written in a quaint, but graphic style, and is illustrated by several drawings of no great merit, either as to execution or fidelity of outline. The old boy, indeed, seems to have been rather ashamed of himself for bestowing so much trouble on such a subject, for he winds up his description with these words: "Thus I have given an account how busily I spent 2 days with an Industry about Trifles, w^h if I had Rightly applied to y^e Art of Getting of Money, would a' tended to a better Purpose."

It was curious to observe how differently we viewed the temple on different days, and how completely the objects of our curiosity changed as we became more and more acquainted with their history, and with the relations which linked them in one grand series. Fortunately, too, our party consisted of such a variety of persons, that some new thought was perpetually starting up, which being speedily seized upon, was generally turned to good account. I think it was not until we had been poking about the cave for nearly a week that any particular curiosity was expressed as to the intention which the contrivers of it had in view in making this enormous excavation. At length some one plucked up courage enough to avow his utter want of acquaintance with the uses which the Hindoos make of their temples or pagodas; and it was sufficiently apparent, by the looks of the rest, that the majority of our number were in as blessed a state of ignorance as the bold spokesman. All eyes were turned towards our Mentor, who, had he not been the most good-natured of mortals, must have been ferreted to death by our enquiries.

"I suppose," said he, "you are aware that the use made of temples by the ancient Greeks and Romans, as well as by the modern Hindoos, is materially different from that required of them by Christian nations?"

"I tell you," replied the information-hunter, "that I know nothing at all about the matter."

"Nor I—nor I," cried various other members of the cave.

"Well, well," exclaimed the obliging Oriental scholar, laughing, "I must tell you, then, that a Hindoo goes alone to the pagoda, as an ancient Roman would have done, offers his solitary prayers before his idol, prostrates himself in its presence, and then leaves his offering. He attempts in this way to bribe his god to prosper him in his trade, whether that be merchandise, war, or theft. There is no stated regular time of teaching amongst the Hindoos—no public prayers said by a priest in the name of a mixed congregation—no gathering of the people to go through a solemn service. Their great festivals are like our fairs. Each man proceeds to his own temple, makes his offering at the feet of the idol, then walks out again and purchases sweetmeats. All teaching or reading of the sacred books is in private houses; or if abroad, merely in the courts of the temple, never within the consecrated edifice. The verandahs or porticoes round about are used just as any others equally convenient would be. This use, to which the courts of the temple are applied, will throw light on many passages of the history and sacred volumes of the Jews. It is evident that the religious edifices of nations whose worship is so conducted need not be large like our churches, since it is not required that they should contain a multitude. In all very ancient temples, however magnificent, the part in which the Deity is supposed to dwell is small, and surrounded by numerous buildings in which the priests and servants of the temple reside. This seems to have been the plan of the first temple at Jerusalem, and it certainly was that of the older Grecian temples, as we may observe from the Ion of Euripides; and it is at this day that presented by the temple at Mecca. With the Hindoos the great object of worship is not constantly exposed to view, nor is it placed in the larger outer building, or excavation, but always in some inner, small, and dark apartment, usually having only one door, and requiring to have lights burning before it, in order to its being seen, and facing the door, so as to be visible from the further side of an intervening saloon."

I regret that I have not left myself space to introduce several other extremely curious speculations respecting the religious opinions and observances of the Hindoos with which Mr. Erskine favoured us. After all, however, I am not sure if there was not fully as much interest in viewing these curious remains of ancient Hindoo sculptures with reference to modern customs, as there was in tracing their origin and connection with the older theology of the East. We could easily detect resemblances in domestic habits, and particularly in dress, between those which appear to have existed at the time the excavation was made, and those now seen in the bazaars of India. It seems of consequence to mention this fact, because some writers have stated the contrary; and if their reports were correct, it would imply a change in the manners of the Hindoos, quite contrary to observation in other matters. The fact is, there is not a single piece of dress on any figure in the whole cave, except the fancy cap on some of their heads, which is not at this day currently met with in India. The shela, or long web of thin cloth folded round the loins, is that in general use all over Hindoostan and the Deccan. The same may be said of the jewels; they are precisely the heavy, tasteless ornaments which overload the necks, arms, ankles, and ears of the modern Hindoos. "If most of the figures are nearly naked, this," to borrow the words of our great cave oracle, "is owing to several reasons. Statuaries naturally dislike formal dresses, as an encumbrance to their art, since they often conceal, or deform, the most graceful contours of the human body, the expression of which is the great triumph of their art. In the next place, there are really very few pieces of genuine Hindoo dress. The Brahmin, for example, wears only the dhoter, or cloth which covers the lower part of the body, and the angwaster wrapped round the upper part. Indeed, until he is married he wears nothing but the angwaster and the langoti, or short cloth passing between the legs, and fastened before and behind to a string round the loins. The Sanyasi uses an angwaster dyed yellow with saffron, and called chati, and, of course, the langoti. The Gosavis and the Byragis wear the langoti alone. The only regular parts of a Hindoo woman's dress are, first, the laguda, a web of cloth from sixteen to twenty cubits in length, which, after being wound round the middle part of the body and the upper part of the legs, is thrown over the shoulders, and forms one of the most graceful coverings imaginable; and secondly, the cholee, a short jacket, with short sleeves, used rather to support than to conceal the breast. Most of the other articles of dress now worn in India have been introduced by the Mussulmen, such as the angraka and dopate, which cover the upper part of the body; the turban, also, and the cholna, or short drawers, have been introduced by the Mahomedan conquerors of Hindoostan."

"It should also be remembered," continues Mr. Erskine, "that when a Hindoo approaches his gods reverently, he purifies himself, and throws off all his dress except that part which covers his loins; and many of the figures in the cave are in the act of adoration. Finally, the principal figures in the cave of Elephanta are gods, who, in most nations, have been represented with little covering. None of the existing figures in this excavation are sculptured in a state of entire nudity, though, it is said, that some of those now broken more nearly approached to the state of nature, and were mutilated by the piety or wantonness of visitors. As for the circumstance of the figures being beardless, it is owing to their representing celestial beings who are supposed to enjoy eternal youth. The munis or celestial sages, however, are always represented in these sculptures with beards as aged men. Shiva, also, in Hindoo poems, as well as in paintings, has frequently a beard or mustachioes, such as we see in one of the heads of the great Triad."

It has been long a matter of dispute amongst travellers what is the degree of genius and taste which is displayed in the great temple of Elephanta, and in the sculptures, by which it is undoubtedly rendered one of the most extraordinary works of human exertion. Some writers speak in raptures both of the design and of the execution of the several compartments; and it cannot be denied that in some of them there is very considerable merit. On this point, and also on the general character of the cave as a work of art, our party were at first much divided in opinion; but as we became familiar with the details, and gave ourselves opportunities of judging of the general effect under different aspects, and under different shades of temperament in our own minds, we gradually settled into a pretty uniform estimate of the station in which this wonderful temple ought to be placed. Of course, if each of us had been called upon to write down his opinion on this delicate point, some differences, arising out of the variety of tastes amongst us, might have been started; and persons at a distance might become more confused than instructed by such a regiment of authorities.

The following statement, however, which was actually drawn up in the cave, gave such general satisfaction at the moment to the high contending parties on the spot, who possessed close at hand every possible advantage of checking its details, and of judging of its general correctness, that perhaps I cannot do better than wind up with it the narrative of our joyous Elephanta picnic. Independently, indeed, of the local fidelity of Mr. Erskine's remarks, in their direct application to the cave in question, they will be found, perhaps, to throw some useful light on certain phases of the fine arts, by practical references to countries in very different states of civilisation, and subjected to totally different forms of government and manners.

"To me," says the writer, "it appears, that while the whole conception and plan of the temple is extremely grand and magnificent, and while the outline and disposition of the separate figures indicate great talent and ingenuity, the execution and finishing of the figures in general (though some of them prove the sculptor to have had great merit) fall below the original idea, and are often very defective, in no instances being possessed of striking excellence. The figures have something of rudeness and want of finish, the proportions are sometimes lost, the attitudes are forced, and every thing indicates the infancy of the art, though a vigorous infancy. The grouping appears to be still more defective than the execution of the separate figures: a number of little and almost dwarfish figures are buddled around one or two larger ones. Indeed, it deserves consideration whether the nature of the Hindoo mythology, which represents every thing by hieroglyphics, be not extremely unfavourable to the fine arts. Painting and sculpture owe their chief beauties to a successful representation of external objects, and to a happy development of the universal feelings and passions of human nature as expressed on the human frame. But, in the mythology of the Brahmins, such is the number of legends relating to each of the gods, and so much are their various qualities and properties depicted by conventional marks and symbols which determine the character and situation of each individual, much as a written mark would do, that the ingenuity of the artist is not required to indicate, by the fine touches of his art, what is done by a rougher and grosser way. The Egyptian sculpture seems never to have passed beyond this step; but the Greeks, by their fine genius, burst the shackles which they received from their masters, and their statues and other sculptures will be found most excellent where the general characters and passions of human nature swallow up the understood symbols of the individual represented, and when the painter, rather than the people, speaks. The use of symbols, therefore, seems to be taking a step backwards, and to be degrading that beautiful art, from exhibiting a representation of general nature intelligible to all mankind, to the exhibitions of a local and temporary character, intelligible only to those whose age and country have qualified them to peruse it. When this principle is carried to its whole length, it brings back the fine arts from giving representations of ideal nature, and strong and refined passions, to the mere vulgar office of copying external objects. By making them a provincial dialect, instead of an universal and eternal language, this practice has a tendency to strike genius out of the art. The general use of such symbols, accordingly, appears to me to be combined with other causes to blunt the sense of the Hindoos for the fine arts. They are delighted to recognise a deity by his Vahana, or by his many hands and numerous arms, but they appear to set little value on the accurate delineation of a passion, or the fine forms that start from beneath the chisel or the pencil. The passion being represented by its artificial, conventional symbol, the natural sign, or that which would render it true to universal nature, and consequently intelligible to all mankind, loses its value amongst the natives of India. The Hindoos are always children, and amused with baubles; even their groups representing living beings in pictures are generally like still life. If there are many figures in the piece, they are commonly seated, and the action is rarely represented, or if attempted, it is generally an obvious one, like that of a fight or a battle. The various figures, as may be remarked in this cave of Elephanta, are never made to concur by different actions towards one end, so as to preserve unity in the piece. While sculpture is in this state, and while the art of grouping and of telling a story is in this condition, it is not going too far to consider the art in its infancy."

It was a melancholy day, indeed, when we prepared to break up our quarters at Elephanta; for the painful impression dwelt heavily on our minds, that we should never all meet together again. We expected, it is true, still to fall in occasionally with one another—during a morning visit, at a dinner, or in a ball-room. But what poor and unsatisfactory substitutes, after all, are such snatches of intercourse in public, to the deep delights of a well-managed, private, almost secret conclave, in such an out-of-the-way corner? There, and there alone, those who are most attached can stray together, unheeded by the rest, or sit together, or join in common pursuits day after day, not only without observation, but almost without their own consciousness of the growing intimacy between them, or of the gradual kindling of those flames destined, perhaps, to endure throughout life. Of all spots, indeed, that the queer little god of smiles and tears (who occupies a niche in every mythology) has selected for his avatars on earth, I should say the temple of Elephanta, with such a party, I was amongst the most favourable for the purposes of his worship!

With heavy hearts, then, we took a last view of the dear old cave, trudged slowly down the valley in silence, and, hardly deigning to say adieu to the crumbling elephant which has given its name to the island, we embarked in the bunder-boat prepared to receive us, and, just as the sun went down, relanded at Bombay.

CHAPTER XIX.

A SAILOR ON SHORE.

It is a far easier thing to get into a house in Ireland than to get out of it again; for there is an attractive and retentive witchery about the hospitality of the natives which has no match, as far as I have seen, anywhere else in the wide world. In other places the people are hospitable or kind to a stranger, as the case may be, or as the guest seems to want assistance: but in Ireland the affair is reduced to a sort of science, and a web of attentions is flung round the visitor before he well knows where he is. So that if he be not a very cold-blooded, or a very clear-sighted, or a very temperate man, it will cost him sundry headaches,—and mayhap some touches of the heartache—before he wins his way back again to his wonted tranquillity.

I had not a single acquaintance in Ireland when first I visited that most interesting of countries, of which few people in England know much—even though their imaginations have been so powerfully aided by the delicious pencil of Miss Edgeworth. Before leaving it, however, after about a year and a half's cruising off and on their coasts, I was on pretty intimate terms with one family at least for every dozen miles, from Downpatrick on the east, to the Bloody Foreland on the west, a range of more than a hundred and twenty miles.

The way in which this was brought about is sufficiently characteristic of the country. I had inherited a taste for geology; and as the north of Ireland affords a fine field for the exercise of the hammer, I soon made myself acquainted with the Giant's Causeway, and the other wonders of that singular district. While engaged in these pursuits, I fell in with an eminent medical practitioner resident in that part of the country—a gentleman well known to the scientific world as one of the best informed geologists and most accomplished philosophers of the day. What was more to my present purpose, he was still better known on the spot as the most benevolent and kindest of men. In no part of the globe have I made a more agreeable, or useful acquaintance. During a residence of a week under the roof of this delightful person, I observed that he frequently changed the conversation from literary, professional, or scientific topics, to urge me to make acquaintance with some friends of his, living also in the north of Ireland, but at the opposite angle. He was, in particular, desirous that I should see a family with whom he described himself as being very intimate, and who were then on a visit far in the west. I was nothing loth, as may be supposed; indeed, a young lieutenant is seldom burdened with many misgivings as to his reception anywhere!—(except within the precincts of the awful admiralty!)—and I, naturally, felt a vehement curiosity to see something more of the manners and customs of the country, of whose public proceedings, it is to be regretted, the world knows so much more than of their domestic life.

Besides these motives, I was influenced by the extreme earnestness of my worthy friend, who, indeed, would hardly let me stir from his house until I had promised to deliver, with my own hands, a letter of introduction to a lady residing in the part of the country above alluded to, and who, he assured me, would not only be most happy to see me herself, but also to introduce me to the family with whom she herself was then living as a guest. I thought it rather an odd arrangement, that a mere guest should introduce a stranger to another person's house: but I had already seen enough of the hearty hospitality of Ireland not to wonder at any thing having a kind purpose in view. I therefore promised that, if at any time I could obtain leave of absence for a few days, the introductory letter should be delivered.

I did not discover, until long afterwards, the secret motive of my friend's anxiety that I should pay the visit in question, though at the time alluded to, I was quite coxcomb enough to suppose that it all arose from personal considerations. It mattered little to me, however, to what the kindness was due; and, my leave having expired, I set off to my ship, the Endymion, of which I was then second lieutenant, with a firm resolution to avail myself of the first opportunity of visiting the persons to whom my excellent friend the doctor had given me an introduction. I had been so frequently absent before, that I expected to be fixed on board for a long time to come, and was therefore agreeably disappointed to discover that my brother officer had formed so many pleasant acquaintances at Burncrana—a town on the banks of the magnificent Lough Swilly—that they were quite willing to remain on the spot, and to take upon their shoulders the extra duty which my renewed absence imposed upon them. I had only, therefore, to obtain the captain's permission for a fresh run. This was easily gained, for he was the most indulgent of mortals; and his only caution was,—“Now, mind—don't you be falling in love with any of these Irish girls. It will be quite time enough for that when you are a post captain.”

I promised to attend to his advice; and set out on this new, but rather wild expedition in the highest glee, wishing for no better sport than to try the firmness of my resolutions on this head, though it must be confessed, I was fully more inclined to follow the precept enjoined upon me by another friend, who, as if to better the captain's instruction, said,

“Do take care of what you are about, when you mix with those fair and fascinating witches, the Irish ladies, and never hold yourself as heart-ase unless you are in love with at least two of them at once!”

Off I went; but it is needless to state whether the course steered was to the east or to the west after leaving Londonderry, the chief city in that part of Ireland. Indeed, for my own part, I was almost indifferent in what direction the road lay! for the whole scene was so new and so full of interest and variety, and I had already met with so much attention in the country, that I felt a sort of certainty of finding much amusement and a welcome reception wherever I went. Meanwhile, the circumstance of having a letter of introduction in my pocket naturally determined my route; and having hired a good stout horse, I strapped my valise behind, and set out on a fine summer's evening, as deliberately in quest of adventures as any knight-errant that ever put lance in rest. Yet I was in no respect prepared to find myself so soon in what appeared very like a field of battle. I had not proceeded twenty miles before I came to a village surrounded by troops, and guarded, at the ends of its few streets, by cannon which appeared to be loaded, as lighted matches were smoking by their side. A considerable encampment was formed on a slightly rising ground near the village; and on the neighbouring ground, still farther off, might be seen large irregular groups of people, who, I learned, upon enquiry, were chiefly Orangemen, preparing for a good ceremonial procession on the 1st of July old style, or the 12th of July according to the present reckoning, the well-known anniversary of the battle of the Boyne. In order to resist this proceeding on the part of the Protestants, an immense multitude of the opposite, or Roman Catholic side of the question, were likewise assembled in this unquiet spot, and all the roads converging towards that quarter were lined with parties of men carrying sticks in their hands, flocking to the scene of expected action. The military had been called in to keep the peace; but the angry passions of the respective factions were so much roused, that even the precautions above described seemed hardly sufficient to prevent the threatened conflict.

The sight was painful in the highest degree; and I could not but recollect with what different sensations I had viewed the chivalry of France and England drawn up in hostile array on the heights of Corunna. There the contest was between two different nations, one fighting against, and the other in defence of, the liberties of the country in which they were engaged. But here the combatants were brethren in blood, kindred in spirit, and all possessed—as they believed—with a common object,—the good of their native country! As a matter of curiosity, and of the most stirring kind of interest, I could have no great objection to seeing another such battle as that which I had witnessed near Corunna between those long-established fighting-cocks the French and English; but to look on while honest Pat and Tim were breaking one another's heads upon abstract political grounds, and English soldiery interposing with grape-shot and fixed bayonets to make them friends again, was what I had no mind for. I therefore tried to extricate myself forthwith from this unhappy struggle; but my horse being tired could not proceed; so I was forced to sleep in a village which, for aught I knew, might be sacked and burnt before morning.

Nothing occurred, however, to disturb the peace; but I felt far from easy till out of reach of this furious excitement; yet, strange to say, some quiet folks, a few miles distant, with whom I took breakfast, seemed scarcely to care or to know that the country round them was all on fire. From thence the course lay across a wild range of mountains, the names of which there was no one left to tell; but geographers may recognise their position by the circumstance of one of them having on its top a sheet of fresh water called Loch Salt. Nothing can be conceived more desolate or dreary than this part of the country; and as there were few inhabitants upon it at any time, and none at all at this moment, I had no small difficulty in making good my way. Neither was the prospect of the place I was bound to much more agreeable. “There can be little or no comfort,” thought I, “in a region so sterile: whatever art might attempt to counteract such desolation, must be unavailing.”

But on coming nearer to the noble bay, or lough, on the banks of which the country seat of my unknown friends was to be found, the aspect of things changed so suddenly, that if it had been done by magic it could scarcely have been rendered more surprising. A slight inequality in the ground served to conceal this “jewel in the desert,” as it was often called, till the whole of its rare beauties could be seen to the greatest advantage. Even without such a contrast as the wild moors afforded, the singular merits of this spot must have claimed the admiration of any one caring a straw for fine scenery; but after such a preparative they appeared doubly grateful to the senses; and I put spurs to my horse, anxious to come nearer to such a delicious scene.

The mansion of my future friend, of which only partial glimpses could be caught now and then, was well guarded on every side by fine old trees, rising from the surface of carefully dressed grounds, richly stocked flower-gardens, long and wide avenues, and graceful terraces, some of which reached to the very water's edge, along a delicate beach on which the ripple scarcely broke. This charming domain occupied a narrow spit of land, or promontory, jutting forwards into a land-locked bay, or arm of the sea, in which the water appeared to lie always asleep, and as smooth as if, instead of being a mere branch uniting with the stormy Atlantic, it had been some artificial lake, contrived by the tasteful hand of a good fairy, the touch of whose wand it might be thought had likewise embellished the shore, to keep every thing in character. Nothing, indeed, which the most fertile imagination could suggest, seemed to be wanting.

There was one extremely well-conceived device at this delightful spot, which I never remember to have seen anywhere else, though there must often occur in other places similar situations in which it might be imitated. Not far from the house, but quite hid under a thickly wooded cliff, overhanging a quiet bight or cove, about ten or fifteen yards across, lay a perfectly secluded pool, with a bottom of snow-white sand. It was deep in the middle, but shelved gradually to its margin, which rested on a narrow strip, or beach, of small round polished pebbles. This fringe, encircling the cove, was surmounted by a dry grassy bank, or natural terrace, reaching to the foot of the rock, the face of which was not merely perpendicular, but so much inclined, that the top more than plumb the edge of the basin. Along the sky line, there was drawn a fence or veil of briars, honeysuckles, and other impervious bushes, interspersed with myrtles, wild roses, and fox-glove, so thickly woven together, that all external view of this beau ideal of a bath was rendered impossible. The only access was by a narrow, steep, and winding path; and at the upper end was placed a high, locked gate, the key of which was in the exclusive charge of the ladies. I need say no more of the uses of this most enchanting of earthly grottoes, than that, if Diana and her nymphs had been as well provided, the catastrophes of Actæon could never have occurred.

Meanwhile, as I rode on, ignorant as yet of these and many other rich and rare beauties of this singular spot, and only admiring the general aspect of things, I began, for the first time, to reflect on the extreme awkwardness of my situation. I had no personal acquaintance with any one of the large party here assembled; nor was there the least reason for supposing that any one of them had ever heard of the intruder, or that, when told who and what he was, they would be a whit more inclined to notice him.

Said I to myself, "I am merely the bearer of an introductory letter to a lady, who is herself no more than a guest in the house; and although it might have been allowable enough to have called to deliver such an introduction, had business or accident brought me to the neighbourhood, or even within a short ride, yet it does seem rather a strong measure to travel fifty or sixty miles across a wild and disturbed country merely to pay a morning call."

The provoking inference, therefore, that my intention was to make a visit of some duration, became inevitable; and I pictured to myself the excessive annoyance of having a string of explanations to give respecting my movements, which, after all, might not be followed by any invitation to remain. After cogitating for a long time, I resolved to steal up to the house, if possible, unperceived,—to have my horse turned over to the groom, and my portmanteau stowed out of sight,—and then to walk boldly up to the door, with a visiting-card in one hand, and my credentials in the other, to be delivered to the servant for the lady to whom the letter was addressed. I next proposed to stroll about the woods, to give time for any good things said of the bearer in the introduction to work their way. I hoped, by this rather clumsy manoeuvre, that by the time I returned to the house its inmates might be prepared to receive the stranger; and then, if their invitation to remain should happen not to be very pressing, I might pretend to be collecting specimens for my geological friends, and so make my escape; though, to own the truth, nothing was further from my thoughts than geology or any other scientific object.

In spite of these ingenious plans, I felt rather absurdly situated, and half wished I had not engaged at all in such an unpromising adventure. It seemed, however, too late to retract, and therefore I jogged on, as earnestly hoping not to be detected as ever did any troops in advancing to the attack of a besieged fort.

What, then, was my speechless horror, on riding up the approach, to discover a cavalcade of not fewer than a dozen ladies and gentlemen bearing right down upon me from the house. Had it been a troop of French cuirassiers charging across the ground, and threatening annihilation to the unfortunate hack and his rider, I could not have been much more astounded. It was natural to suppose that, as the master of the house was probably of the number, he would stop to enquire the business of the suspicious-looking stranger invading his grounds. This I could but ill explain; as the person for whom I brought a letter being an elderly lady, was not likely to be on horseback amidst a party of young folks. I foresaw, at all events, that there would be a general halt ordered; while the poor new-comer, with his dragged horse and swollen valise (indicating any thing but a hasty departure), would become the object of pleasant criticism to the quizzical dandies and young ladies of the party—pleasant, I mean, to them; but wretched work for the hapless wight exposed to their pitiless pelting. Even when this scrutiny was over, what were they to do with their unexpected, self-elected companion? His horse was now too tired, and much too ugly at any time to accompany such gay palfreys as were prancing over the lawn; yet they could not in common civility leave a stranger adrift—nor could they accompany him back to the house, without breaking up their expedition for the day.

All this flashed through my mind in a moment, and left me in a dire dilemma. I pulled up my jaded nag, however, with such a jerk, that I well nigh threw him on his haunches. Fortunately, a little inequality in the ground hid me from the view of the advancing cavalry; and at the same critical moment I discovered an opening in the fence on one side. Without considering or caring whither it might lead, I turned my charger round, urged him forwards with whip and spur, and dashed into the gap as if I had been flying from the arm of justice, instead of making my escape from as companionable a set of people as ever breathed. Had any of the party detected the bashful fugitive, and given chase, he must have been caught; for the path into which I had fled terminated in a road leading to some farm offices, but with no opening beyond.

The awkwardness of my situation—already considerable—was greatly augmented by this ridiculous proceeding, and I heard the riders pass within twenty yards of my hiding place, with the most unspeakable alarm lest any one of them should catch a glimpse of me nestling behind a cart of hay. I breathed freer when the last servant's horse crossed the ridge; and then, creeping from my hole, soon gained the stables adjoining the house, gave up my horse, secured the well-stuffed valise out of sight, and repaired, according to the original precious scheme, to the front door with my letter. I stood for five minutes with the knob of the bell in my hand—irresolute whether to go on with the adventure, or fairly to cut and run from it. At length, when the fatal pull was given, I listened to the sound, and felt myself what statesmen call "fully committed." There was now nothing left but to screw up my courage, as I best might, to meet the dangers and difficulties of the crisis.

There happened to be no one at home except the old lady herself, so that the plan succeeded very well; and, though I now forget the details of the introduction, I can never cease to remember that the unbounded cordiality of the reception, not only from this excellent person, but from the master and mistress of the house, and all their assembled friends, showed how totally I had miscalculated the nature and extent of Irish hospitality. I learned, indeed, in no long time, that the fashion of the country is to receive every stranger as well, and to treat him with exactly the same perfect frankness and kindness, as they would do if they really knew him to merit such attention at their hands. If it shall prove on future acquaintance that he fails to make good his claim, they then treat him accordingly; but in the first instance his title to a hospitable reception is always taken for granted.

As most of the delightful party, amongst whom I now found myself domesticated, are still alive—though more than twenty years have gone by since those days—I scarcely feel at liberty to describe the sayings and doings of the establishment into which I was so freely and confidentially admitted. Nothing, indeed, could be more characteristic of the country than the whole scene. There were several elderly persons, then in the autumn of life, though now waning into octogenarians; and several were very young folks, scarcely able to walk, who now count many "daughters and sons of beauty." There was a pretty equal admixture of Irish and English, amongst whom were several persons of rank; also one or two foreigners; besides much native wit, worth and beauty, of the highest order, and all most delightfully set off by the graces and nameless enchantments of refined manners, and tasteful as well as useful accomplishments. I have rarely, if ever, seen in any part of the world so fascinating an assemblage of all that could render a country party agreeable as was here collected in one of the most out-of-the-way corners of Ireland. Nor is it to be wondered at if I very soon began to think of the ship and her routine drudgery with a degree of distaste I dared scarcely express even to myself. Compared to the delirious sort of witchery of this gay scene, every thing I had enjoyed before, even in the all-romantic Peninsula, or in the beautiful islands of Madeira or Bermuda, looked spiritless and tame. The dull duties and discomforts of a sea-life—the trammels of naval discipline—and the insignificance of a mere lieutenant's station, amidst all this luxury, and fashion, and wealth, and beauty, and rank, pressed on my fevered thoughts so severely, that at times I was half-distracted with sheer despondency, and felt out to the heart on recollecting the bitter necessity of returning to what seemed, at that intoxicating season, the vulgar duties of a sailor's life. My worthy captain's advice was thrown to the winds; and indeed any heart, aged twenty-two, must have been made of cast-iron to have resisted the rides and walks, the pic-nic dinners, the dances, and the music parties, and suppers, besides the infinitely varied round of other amusements—grave and gay—which contributed to render, and will for ever preserve this nook of Ireland the true terrestrial paradise of my juvenile days.

How the deuce I ever contrived to get out of the magic circle, I hardly know; but if I could only feel myself at liberty, without a breach of confidence, to give a few of the details of those hours, I would stake great odds on the side of the effect which the description of such a reality might produce, against the interest of the imaginary scenes in almost any romance. Although, unfortunately, this may not be done, I cannot resist the temptation of relating the cause and consequence of my introduction to these very kind persons, who, from that hour to this, have held their station amongst my steadiest friends.

I have already mentioned, that the gentleman whose introduction I carried was most urgent for me to deliver the letter in person; but he gave no reasons for this anxiety; nor indeed was I then aware, that besides his being an intimate friend, he was their family physician. While acting in this capacity, he had seen with regret how ineffectual his art had proved to alleviate the mother's sorrow caused by the recent loss of her favourite son. The young man had been in the navy, and was about my age and standing in the service. These accidental coincidences suggested to her judicious and kind-hearted friend, that as I, in some degree, resembled, in appearance and in manners, the officer who was no more, the poor mother's thoughts and feelings might possibly be diverted into a new channel, by the society of a person in so many respects similarly circumstanced to the child she had lost.

I was not made a party to this manoeuvre, because the experiment might thus have been totally marred. It was obvious, indeed, that the mere consciousness of acting such a part must have imposed an awkward restraint upon me, fatal to the character I was intended to fill; so the good doctor left matters to work out their own course. A very different effect, it is true, from what he wished and expected, might have been produced; for instead of my being received with open arms, and helping to fill up the blank in the mother's wasted affection, my presence might only have proved irksome, from tending to keep alive the anguish of those wounds, which principle tells us rather to do our utmost to heal than seek to irritate by unavailing sorrow.

It so happened, fortunately for me, and, what was of more consequence, fortunately for the friendly physician's reputation as a skilful "minister to the mind diseased," or rather to the pure but desolate heart, that the experiment completely succeeded—I hope and believe, to the mother's consolation. To me, of course, the reception I met with was matter of delight and astonishment; and at the time I could not by any means account for the notice with which I was honoured. So much so, indeed, that I occasionally felt somewhat startled, and almost oppressed, with the sense of obligation imposed by such unusual unmerited attentions.

The first explanation which reached me of the mystery, to whose agency I was so deeply indebted, is really so touching in itself, and likewise so fertile, as I conceive a matter for useful reflection to those who may be similarly circumstanced, that I give it without reserve. The incident—though to some it may perhaps appear trivial—had a very essential effect in modifying the course of my subsequent life—not so much by raising me in my own opinion, which it certainly did, as by inspiring me with still stronger motives to exertion, and with higher hopes of deserving, in time, a distinction so very flattering. In a letter which I received from this most excellent lady, about six months after my first acquaintance with her, and just before I quitted England for the East Indies, these words occur:—

"Once more, adieu! I must hope you will write to me; let me constantly know how you proceed, and how I can address you; and recollect, you have received the freedom of this house. I believe I told you I had lost a son in the navy, a lieutenant, and of superior talents. I therefore consider that Heaven has given you to my son in his place—and may the Almighty protect you."

CHAPTER XX.

TRICKS UPON TRAVELLERS.

A curious and vastly pleasing fashion prevails in that part of Ireland where I was so nearly bewitched as almost to forget my ship, my duties, and every thing else but beauty bright! When a country party, such as I have been describing, had passed a certain time together, they seldom broke up entirely, or scattered themselves in different directions, but generally shifted, or emigrated in a body—flitted, I think they used to call it—to the house of some one of the number. Now and then various members of the group dropped off by the way, but their places were presently filled up by other friends, either ready in the new hive, or who soon found their way to it, when the well-known sounds of festivity were heard in the neighbourhood.

In this manner the country party, into which I had been so kindly admitted an honorary member, made several moves, with sundry losses and sundry accessions to its numbers; and as every day rendered this life more and more grateful, I could scarcely bear to think of turning to the tame occupations and rugged society of the frigate, the duties of which had so recently been my greatest and most sincere delight. Meanwhile, since my good-natured captain, and still better-natured messmates, made no difficulties about this protracted absence, I continued to involve myself deeper and deeper in every step. I failed not to perceive at times, that I was getting into rather a dangerous scrape for a younger son and a young officer, who had yet to work his own way in the world. But as these reflections interfered rather incontinently with the enjoyments of the hour, they were crushed down and kept out of sight as much as possible, at that gay period.

What surprised me most, all this time, was the air of refinement and high polish in the Irish society amongst whom I was thus casually thrown. I had previously entertained an idea that their hospitality, proverbial in all parts of the world, was of a rude and rather troublesome description. I found it, on the contrary, marked not only by the strongest lines of sincerity and kindness, but by many of those delicate touches of consideration for the feelings of others which form the most indubitable symptoms of genuine good-breeding. So very carefully, indeed, are these traits preserved as characteristics of their society, that rather more latitude in the intercourse of young people than I remember to have seen elsewhere is not only permitted, but even perhaps encouraged. The propriety, as well as safety, of all this, consists in the perfect confidence which the parties possess in one another's sense of what is due to themselves; so that a degree of freedom, which in England might possibly be called bold or odd, is, in Ireland, merely one branch of a peculiar system of manners. It rests, no doubt, on as scrupulous a foundation of sentiment and principle as ours does, but it is less restricted by etiquettes, and far less frozen over with those conventional forms which the uninitiated find so troublesome to break through.

So far from discovering that the stories were true about the sort of compulsion used in matters of drinking, I can safely say—whatever might have been once the fashion—that, during the course of experience in joviality I went through in the north of Ireland, I seldom met with any thing at a gentleman's table approaching even to exigence on this score, far less to the formidable bullying which we had been warned against, when the alternative rested between another bottle or an ounce of lead. I do not deny that our friends the Irish have a wonderfully winning way of insinuating their good cheer upon us, and sometimes of inducing us—without the aid of firearms—to swallow more claret than is perhaps good for us.

I landed once at Burnerana, a pretty little quiet village, with a watering-place look, on the eastern banks of that great and beautiful bay Lough Swilly. One side of this noble harbour is formed by the bold promontory of Inishowen, celebrated in every land for its noble whiskey, second only—if second it be, (which I am bound as a Scotsman to doubt)—to that of Ferntosh or Glenlivet. I was accompanied by an English gentleman, on the first day of his landing in Ireland. As he then seriously imagined the inhabitants to belong to a sort of wild and uncouth race, I could see he was rather surprised at the gentlemanlike deportment of an acquaintance of mine resident on the spot, for whom he had brought a letter. We had walked together to his house, or rather cottage—for he was not a fixed resident, but came there for summer quarters. The neatness, and even elegance, of the domestic arrangements of his temporary establishment, both without and within the dwelling, gave token of a taste many degrees removed from the state of people far back in civilisation. Presently the ladies came; and their national frankness—modified by the most entire and unaffected simplicity—puzzled my friend completely. In due season the dressing-bell sent us off to prepare for dinner; and while we were getting ready, my companion said to me—

"I see perfectly what this fellow is at; he means to sew you and me up, by pouring claret down our throats. You may do as you please, but I'll be shot if he plays off his Irish pranks on me. I will eat his dinner—take a couple of glasses of his wine—make my bow to the ladies—go on board by eight or nine o'clock—and, having given them a dinner in return, shall have done my duty in the way of attention, after which I shall totally out the connection. I have no idea of their abominable fashion of forcing strangers to drink."

"We shall see," said I; and, having knocked the dust off our shoes, down we went to dinner.

Every thing was plain, and suitable to the pretensions of a cottage. There was no pressing to eat or drink during dinner; and in process of time the cloth was removed—the ladies sipped a little sweet wine, and disappeared.

"Now for it," whispered my friend; "he has sent the women out of the way, that he may ply us the better."

And I must own things looked rather suspicious; for our host, instead of sitting down again at the dinner-table, walked to a bow-window overlooking the anchorage, and exactly facing the setting sun, at that hour illuminating the whole landscape, in the gorgeous style peculiar to combined mountain and lake scenery.

"Why should we not enjoy this pleasant prospect while we are discussing our wine?" said the master of the house.

At that instant the door opened, and in walked the servant, as if he knew by intuition what was passing in his master's head.

"Tim," said our host, "put the card-table here in the bow-window, and give us some other glasses,—also, if you have such a thing, bring up a bottle of claret."

Tim nodded, smiled, and made the fitting adjustments. The table was barely large enough to hold a noble long-corked bottle, for the fashion of claret decanters had not as yet reached that remote district of the empire. Round the margin was placed the necessary accompaniment of capacious glasses—famous tall fellows, with such slender stalks, that they seemed scarcely equal to the weight of their generous load.

My friend and I exchanged glances, and I could see his shoulders slightly raised, as if he was saying internally,

"Now we are in for it!—but I will not drink a drop more than I choose."

The claret, which in itself was most delicious, was cooled in as perfect a style as if it had been subject to the skill of an Abdar or professional wine-cooler at Madras. The party consisted, I think, of four or five persons—I forget exactly which—but this one bottle, I remember, just passed round the group twice. As the flavour of the beverage appeared to have become more exquisite at the second turn than at the first, though but a short interval had been allowed to elapse, it seemed odd that another bottle was not called for. Instead of which, our landlord went on expatiating on the beauties of the lough, and the fineness of the season in general, and the sunset in particular, for full five minutes after the wine had disappeared—when he suddenly said, with a half-hesitating tone, towards my English friend, who sat at his elbow,—

"I beg your pardon—perhaps you would take some more wine?"

As no one made any objection, the bell was rung, and Tim reappeared, bearing with him another bottle. This likewise vanished in a trice, and Tim was again summoned.

"Bring some more claret," said the master to the man—or rather boy, as he was called, though twice as old as any of the party.

At this instant I caught my companion's eye; and I could see he was becoming alive to the plot against him—so much so, indeed, that he seemed to be preparing to rise. The following conversation, however, attracted his attention, and fixed him to his seat.

"Well, Tim, what are you gaping at? Why don't you run for the claret?"

"I didn't know," replied the other, "whether you'd like to use the whole of it."

"Use the whole of it!" exclaimed his master—"What does the boy mean? What are you at, Tim?"

"Oh, sir," quoth the well-instructed rogue, "I knew you came here only for a short time, and as the wine you brought was but little, I didn't know but you might wish not to use it all entirely to-day." And then he whispered something in his master's ear, the words of which we could not distinguish. The reply, however, showed, or seemed to show, what had been said.

"Nonsense, Tim, nonsense, you're an ass, man, bring it up."

Tim accordingly disappeared, but soon returned with a basket apparently full of straw; at the bottom of which, however, after some considerable show of hunting, a couple of bottles were said to be found.

"Confound you, Tim; is this all?" said the host.

"It is, sir," lied Tim; "and in faith, sir," added he, still lying, "it's one more bottle than I thought there was; for there was but the dozen when we started from Derry a week ago; and you know, sir, you and the collector on last Tuesday—"

But the catalogue of circumstances which were intended to act as buttresses to Master Tim's inventions, was cut short by a peremptory order to leave the room. This he did so soon as he had made a circumbendibus to escape notice, and deposited the basket behind his master's chair, muttering, as he put it down with a thump—

"There's as good a couple of bottles of wine as ever was uncorked."

The fresh broach was, indeed, so delicious, that we could hardly believe it was of the same vintage as that of the previous bin, though our host assured us it was "the identical." At all events, under its genial inspiration, the glorious sun, which was just touching the tops of the hills above Rathmullin, seemed already becoming doubly glorious, and the whole landscape more brilliant than ever.

Tim's basket well merited a still higher eulogium than he had given it; but while his reputation as a judge of wine rose, his character for veracity fell in about the same proportion, since we beheld, in due season, not merely two, but three, and at last a fourth long-necked gentleman from Bordeaux emerge from under the straw!

The trick played upon us by these confederates was now apparent enough; but the wine, fortunately, was of that light and pure kind which does not produce much effect on strong heads, and that of my companion was proof against far greater trials than this. He was, indeed, perfectly aware of what was passing; and though dearly loving the wine, (which he told me afterwards was superior to any he had ever before tasted,) and thirsting vehemently for more, yet he had no notion of being made tipsy by means of a common-place concert between host and butler. He therefore rose to leave the room, expecting, of course, to be forcibly detained, or, at all events, he reckoned upon being begged and entreated to sit down again.

Not a whit! The wily native knew his man exactly, and, instead of arresting his guest by force or by supplication, merely observed to him, that if he had a mind to admire the prospect, there was still daylight enough to command a view down the bay from the little knoll on the right. The Englishman was sorely puzzled by all this. He saw there was none of the detention he expected would be practised upon him, and yet he had a strong consciousness that he was undergoing the operation well known afloat and ashore by the title of "the game of humbug." At the same time, he felt the most eager desire to take another good pull at the claret.

There was no wine before us at this critical juncture of the evening, and our landlord, who, most unaccountably, seemed indifferent to this material circumstance, went on prosing for a quarter of an hour about Protestant ascendancy, the eternal siege of Derry, the battle of the Boyne, and such-like stale topics. At length one of the company—whose interest in these subjects resembled that of a man who has never looked through a telescope when listening to the conversation of a company of astronomers—became somewhat impatient, and, watching for a pause, asked this host if it were the custom in Ireland to discuss Orange politics with empty glasses?

"God bless me!" cried the other, with well-feigned surprise, "is there no wine on the table?" and ringing the bell furiously, scolded poor Tim so naturally that the confederate was almost thrown out.

"Well! you numskull, why don't you make off with you, and bring something for the gentlemen to drink?"

Tim stood fast till interrogated a second time, and then replied, with perfect gravity, that there was not another drop of wine in the house, swearing by all manner of saints to the truth of his assertion.

Upon this the master got up in a rage, and brushing past the servant, declared his intention of searching the cellar himself. He was absent some time; and before he came back, we had prevailed on our hesitating companion to sit down again. Just as the stranger took his place, and as if there had been some electrical communication between his chair and the handle of the door, it opened, and in walked our generous entertainer, exulting in his success, crowing like chanticleer, and bearing in each hand a couple of bottles, clicking against each other; while Tim, with a degree of impudence equalled only by that of his master, substituted clean glasses, of a still more capacious swallow than the first. To these were added two pair of candles which towered high above the jolly crew, and promised to last till another dawn should look in upon our revels. By this time the twilight had almost entirely ebbed away, and was succeeded by that cheerful, aurora-kind of brilliancy in the sky, which points out the place of the sun during the whole of his summer night's journey in those high latitudes. Politics dropped out of the conversation by general consent, for the joyous juice of the grape soon melted us all into one mind—and a hundred topics of more pleasing interest were stamked, in which the strangers could join without fear of any angry discussion. I will not say that these were discussed without warmth, for the mirth and animation of the company rose very pleasantly as each fresh bottle found its way by some magical process to the table. But I must own it was sometimes rather difficult to tell who were the listeners amongst us, or to say who was guest and who landlord, for the party seemed like a circle of brothers, all equally at home.

This went on for an indefinite length of time, but I should be the veriest conjuror on earth to say how long. Through the hazy atmosphere of my recollection of that jolly evening, I remember that about eleven o'clock, more or less, our host was enchanted almost beyond the power of words with seeing his wine so much relished, and tickled also with the good joke of having succeeded, as he thought, in throwing the suspicious Englishman off his guard, and making him drink just as much wine as he, the Irishman, thought fit to impose. On this occasion, however, he inverted the proverb, and reckoned without his guest, for, by one imprudent remark, he had well nigh torn the laurels from his brow.

"Well, sir!" he exclaimed; "although this is the first day you ever set foot on the island, you have seen enough, I hope to satisfy you that we are not quite such savages as you supposed. Political liberty we have not got, it is true; but liberty hall is the true title of every Irish gentleman's dining-room—there's no compulsion here, you must see very clearly."

It was but little, however, that my English friend could now see very clearly of any thing, for by this hour both the physical and moral optics of the company were mystified out of all distinct focus of adjustment; and the above premature announcement of victory, on the part of the native, hurried back all the stranger's suspicions that he was speedily to be made a martyr at the shrine of old Bacchus. Fired with this idea, he started on his feet, and eyeing the door for a long time before he ventured on the voyage, with a bold determination, and taking a good departure from his chair, he gained his post. He had, undoubtedly, expected to be lugged back again; for he whisked the tails of his coat out of reach, while, with his other hand on the lock of the door, and swaying himself about from side to side, like a ship in a calm, he stood the very image of tottering equilibrium, as the mathematicians call it.

Our adroit landlord, who was not a man to shrink from difficulties, mustered to his aid all the resources of a long well-practised hospitality, and gallantly met this great occasion. It is true, he had now some three or four bottles of wine under his girdle more than when he and Tim had tricked the party about the poverty of the cellar, just as the sun was going down. That manoeuvre, and all other similar devices, were, of course, exhausted; so he took another line, and called out,

"Oh, you're off, are you?—wish you joy—you'll find the ladies in the drawing-room—I think I hear the tinkle of the piano—I prefer the tinkle of the glass—pray tell the damsels we are coming, by and by—mind you say 'by and by'—I don't like to be too particular, for fear of seeming rude—don't you see?"

This speech was wound up by a telegraphic flourish of the hand towards Tim, who stood near, with a bottle between his feet, the screw buried in the cork, and his body bent to the effort which he only delayed to exercise till ordered by his master.

"Out with him, man! out with the cork!" cried the host. The loud report which succeeded rang over the apartment, like the sweetest music to the souls of the ever-thirsty company. Tim's thunder was echoed back by a truly bacchanalian shout, such as nothing on earth can give proper emphasis to, except double allowance of claret. The Englishman, fairly subdued by the sound, glided again to the table; then seizing his brimming glass in one hand, and grasping the fist of his merry host in the other, he roared out,

"You really are an uncommon good fellow; and bang me if ever I distrust an Irishman again as long as I live!"

But within three minutes afterwards, this promise was broken, for as soon as we had discussed the bottle which the incomparable Tim had so opportunely introduced, the master of the house, seeing us at length quite at his mercy, and eager to go on, rose, and said, to our great amaze,

"Come! we've had wine enough: let's join the ladies in the next room."

The disappointed company stared at one another, and loudly proclaimed that it was not fair to limit us in this way. The Englishman in particular wished to remain; but our host was inexorable. Meanwhile, Timothy grinned from ear to ear—familiar with his master's tricks upon travellers—and the landlord deliberately opening the door, marched off the field of battle with flying colours!

As we moved along to the drawing-room, my companion whispered to me,

"I must own, I have been well served for my suspicions. I made quite certain of being bullied into drinking more than was agreeable to me; but it turns out," cried he, laughing, "quite the reverse; for I cannot get a drop of wine, now that I want it."

"Well! well!" cried our hospitable friend, who overheard the conclusion of this remark, "you shall do as you please ever after this evening."

He then showed us to a couple of snug rooms, which he said were ours, as long as we chose to occupy them.

For the rest, I went off to the Giant's Causeway in the course of next day; and on returning, at the end of a week, found that my friend, instead of cutting the connection, according to promise, had not once been out of sight of the house, and had never been asked to drink a bottle, or even a glass, more than he liked. He declared, indeed, that he had rarely, in any country, met with persons so truly hospitable, or more gentleman-like, or so perfectly reasonable, in the truest sense of these words, than accident had thrown him in the way of becoming acquainted with, in what, previously, he had considered a region inhabited almost by a different set of beings from his own countrymen.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE FARMERS' SOCIETY.

It would be doing scrup justice, however, to the dear Green Island, were it not to be mentioned, that in some districts, and amongst certain tribes of the merry natives, a few rough touches of the ancient manners are still preserved entire, to the great amusement of the parties themselves, and to the high edification, no doubt, of such novices as myself in the mysteries of hard drinking.

Not very long after the occurrence above related, in which Tim and his master quizzed the strangers in such good style, I had occasion to visit a city at some distance from Lough Swilly. I had been charged by my friends in Scotland to make enquiries into various topics, particularly that of Florin; and having soon made acquaintance with the late Dr. Richardson, readily obtained all the information required from that enthusiastic advocate for the cultivation of the grass in question. Before I set out for Port Rush, the headquarters of Florin cultivation, a merry friend of mine hearing me ask some questions about corn-crops, hay-crops, and such matters, begged to know if I should not like to be introduced to the Farmers' Society of their good city; "for there," said he, "you will meet with all the best-informed agriculturists of the country." Of course, I gladly accepted his offer, and that of his companionship to the society's dinner on that very day. As we walked to the house, which I think lay about a mile or so beyond the limits of the town, I taxed my memory for all the queries which had been put to me on the subject of farming, resolving to apply these at the most fitting moments, and rejoicing over the famous opportunity I now had of reaping a grand harvest of information, at a small cost of trouble.

On we trudged to a pretty little country inn, which we reached just as the dinner was rattling on the table. The party consisted of a dozen persons, or there may have been a dozen and a half—as pleasant men, in their way, as could be met with. Before the repast was over, I chanced to ask my treacherous friend, next whom I was placed, some questions on the subject of turnip husbandry. He heard me out, and laughed exceedingly; but instead of answering, called out to the chairman of the meeting,

"I beg to inform you, sir, that the gentleman on my right wishes to know whether we in the north of Ireland pull up our turnips or let them remain in the ground, as in East Lothian, for the sheep to eat? Now, sir, I take this to be an agricultural question—don't you?"

"Certainly it is," replied the president.

"Undoubtedly agricultural!" cried out the rest of the company; upon which, turning to the waiter, the chairman said, in a chuckling and delighted tone,

"Boy! take the glass to Mr. Hall—the strange gentleman there."

Accordingly, a glass, not very much above the ordinary size, was handed to me, and straightway filled with whisky-toddy. This I was required by the president to drink off instantly.

"On what compulsion? and wherefore?" I asked, laughing, with the glass at my lips.

"Oh!" exclaimed he, "on no compulsion at all, my dear sir; for this, you must know, is Liberty Hall. Do exactly as you please, only conforming to the laws of the Association; that is to say," continued the president, grinning, "you will of course see the obvious propriety of complying with the fixed rules of the Farmers' Society, one of the strictest of which very properly is, that no one present shall allude to the subject of agriculture, much less discourse upon it, as you have done, or ask any questions?"

There was a national comicality about this queer rule which was of course quite unanswerable; so I paid the penalty, and drank off the punch, without further delay; for it was admirable in its ingredients, and what is almost as important, admirably concocted.

I had no sooner emptied the glass, than I was ordered to fill and swallow another bumper, as a fine for having used the left hand instead of the right; and when I remonstrated against the injustice of fining a man for breaking laws of which he had never before heard the existence, the president said, with most gravity,

"Do you really suppose, sir, that such an excuse as not knowing the existence of a law against hog-stealing would help you in a court of justice, if you were to run off with a pig?"

The reasoning was again unanswerable, so down went the drink.

My merry agricultural friends, who knew all the depths and shallows of the most delightful of all negotiations, that of a punch-bowl, were well aware that if they could, by any means, get the unwary stranger to pass a certain point of moderation, no additional impulse on their part would be required to bring about the grand consummation they aimed at, and which they were all the more bent upon, from seeing me a little on my guard.

It need scarcely be told that I failed, and that they succeeded in making me enter their trap. I have, indeed, only a very confused recollection of the risk scene; but I do remember seeing the hands of the clock dancing a jig about the hour of twelve, and have some faint remembrance of being made to drink at least ten times to the glorious and immortal memory of King William III., merely because I could not find articulation or memory enough to repeat, without tripping, an immense long tail to this royal and loyal Orange toast.

Such are the sort of pranks which Pat is apt to divert himself withal, when he has no real business in hand, or when his duties, public or domestic, do not claim his serious attention. It is true, he is sometimes a wild hand enough to deal with, even when not a drop of the cratur has passed his lips; but he is not a whit more so, I verily believe, than either English, Scotch, or Welsh man, when fairly roused into action by motives suitable to his peculiar national temperament. We have hardly any seamen in the fleet who are more sober and orderly, or who, when properly managed, are more docile and amenable to really good discipline, than the Irish. Perhaps it may occasionally happen that there is a difficulty in getting Paddy to see things in the particular light in which we wish him to view them, or, as we say, to make him cast with his head on the right tack; but there is no man who performs more or better work when once this is accomplished.

I remember being much struck with this peculiarity of the Irish character some years after the period of the farmers' feast above described. Indeed, I have not infrequently been puzzled in Ireland to recognise the same individual when engaged in transacting important affairs, and when he allowed himself to relax after the serious work was over.

In the autumn of the year 1817, on returning from India with important despatches on board, I reached the chops of the British channel, in command of a sloop-of-war. So confident were we of reaching Spithead in a day or two at furthest, that my travelling trunk was packed, and best boots polished, ready for a start to town. But, just as we expected to strike soundings, the wind shifted to the eastward, and we were blown off as far to sea, that we were well nigh starved. After much beating about, we succeeded in reaching the west coast of Ireland, harassed to the last degree. I landed with my despatches, accompanied by several passengers, at the little town of Bantry, which gives its name to a splendid estuary—perhaps the finest in the world, and one which must rise into immense importance whenever the present heartless and systematic agitations of the land shall be allowed to subside, and that magnificent portion of the empire shall have become as much an integral part of England as the banks of the Forth and Clyde have so happily been rendered by the permanent, and cordial, and mutually beneficial union of the lesser with the greater country.

There happened to be a fair at Bantry; and it so fell out, that just as we landed, a furious battle with shillelahs was commencing close to the beach; so that we had before us the actual representation of a scene we had often heard described, but never actually witnessed before. A householder—why or wherefore we could not find out—had refused to pay certain taxes or municipal duties. On intimation being given him, that on a certain day his furniture and other goods would be distrained, he prepared to do any thing rather than submit. At all events, he was resolved to have a fight for it. Such was the story we were told on landing, as to the cause of the wild uproar which saluted us.

The owner of the house laid his plans with some degree of that military skill which all men acquire in a turbulent country. He prevailed on a dozen or twenty of his friends to stow themselves away in his rooms, and, at a given signal, when the officers of government were in full pursuit of the articles named in their bond, they started up, shillelah in hand, and played crack! crack! crack! to the right and left. Twenty heads were broken in less than twenty seconds. As we jumped out of our boat, delighted to touch the ground after so long a voyage, these were the first sounds which saluted our ears, mixed up with loud cheers by the different parties, as victory swerved from side to side.

It was difficult for persons, so ignorant as we were of such things, to believe that so much execution could be done in so short a period. Before we reached the brow of the hill, however, which overlooked the village, an interval of only a few minutes, it was all over. On our way we encountered four or five of the wounded, preciously mauled to be sure, in charge of a reserve party of officers, who, suspecting the ambush, had assembled in readiness to support the first detachment.

This episode, added to the ordinary bustle and business in a fair, caused us the greatest difficulty in getting away from the town. No carriages or horses were to be hired, at any price; and I really know not what we should have done, had not a gentleman, seeing our distress, dismounted from his horse, and, prevailing on one or two others to do the same, kindly offered them to us, that we might proceed without further delay to Skibbereen, the nearest town through which the mail passed.

It was after sunset before we left the uproarious scene at Bantry, the sounds of which we could trace long after we left the village; and by the time we reached our destination it was dark, or nearly so. On alighting from our nags at the inn door, a gentleman stepped forward; and, with the air of a person who has been waiting for some friends, addressed us in these words:—

"You're welcome, at last, gentlemen! I hope, indeed, you may not be too late; the piece is just about to commence, and there is much difficulty about places—so, come along!"

All this being Hebrew to us, we begged to know what was required, conceiving that we must be mistaken for some other party.

"Oh, no, gentlemen, it's not a bit of a mistake! I discovered at first sight that you were just landed, and I thought you would surely like to see the play, which is now acting, or soon to be acted, with great applause in the court house. Strolling theatricals, they are—not a regular company—we don't sport that yet—but very good ones of their kind; so, come along, as the place is crammed full to the ceiling already. Nevertheless, there 'll always be room for strangers, which you will soon perceive."

As the coach was not to pass for some hours, and no post-horses could be procured, we yielded to our obliging friend's entreaties, and proceeded, booted and spurred, and as we were, to the theatre. With much difficulty we reached the bottom of the stairs, the ascent of which appeared an utter impossibility. At length our guide made himself heard; and the moment the crowd were informed that the party consisted of strangers, a lane was formed, and we reached the upper door. The same magical words had the effect of displacing several gentlemen in the best part of the house, and we presently found ourselves seated in the midst of some very pleasant company, in good time for the curtain drawing up. Our friendly pilot now left us, saying, that although he had got us in, he could not stay himself; "but," whispered he, "after the play, come you to the Harp and Crown, and there you'll find supper ready, all piping hot for you, and beds with well-toasted sheets, and places secured in the coach; so give yourselves no manner of concern about the future, but enjoy the play and the society about you."

Our friend proved himself even better than his word; for he contrived to hire a chaise for me and my despatches, by which means I was enabled to set off in the middle of the night. On reaching Cork, I found that I had exhausted all my cash, and had not wherewithal to prosecute the journey; but as a couple of my own quarterly-pay bills were safe in my pocket, it seemed impossible there could be any difficulty in getting money. On proceeding to the nearest bank, and presenting my government bills, the gentlemen in the office handed them from one to the other—held them to the light—whispered amongst themselves—inspected me in no very agreeable style—and at length said, they were really very sorry, but they could not give me money for this paper.

"It is very strange," I said. "In no part of the world that I have ever been in is any species of document representing money preferred to this."

"That may be, sir, but we can't help it, we cannot give you cash."

I proceeded to another and another bank, but all to no purpose—tried mine host of the Red Lion—but he shook his head very distrustfully. I was sorely perplexed, and thought of going to the military commandant, but, unfortunately, he had left the city. In the morning of that day, after coming from Skibbereen, I had, of course, proceeded to Cove, about twenty miles from Cork, to report myself to the naval commander-in-chief; but as I had no doubt about the facility of getting money for government bills, I never dreamed, when there, of asking the admiral to indorse them. As many hours must have been lost in returning all the way to Cove, I proceeded again to one of the banks I had before attacked, and tried all my eloquence; but they were still obdurate, and I marched back to the street in despair. On my way to the inn, I was overtaken by one of the partners of the firm.

"Were you never in Cork before?" he asked; "and if so, don't you know any one in the city who could identify you?"

Before I could answer his question, he saw that I was hurt at his suspicions, and called out,

"Nay! nay! don't be angry, now, nor colour up, nor fly in a passion. There is no harm in being an object of suspicion, provided no injury is done you. And, for my part, I, individually, believe you really are the officer you represent yourself to be; and if the worst comes to the worst, you shall have the money to put you on your way; but I would rather go through with the affair in a business-like manner."

"Well," I said, "that is kind enough. I was once in Cork for a single day, six years ago, when I made acquaintance with Counsellor O'Brien."

"In that case," cried he, evidently much relieved, "the matter will soon be settled, for here is the very street in which the gentleman lives, let us call upon him."

As ill luck would have it, this person, the only man I was acquainted with in Cork, had that moment rode off from the door!

"There's a plague," said the banker, resuming his embarrassed air; "for, to be quite frank with you, we have lately been so grievously taken in by a swindler, who, pretending to be a naval officer, forged and passed off a considerable number of bills similar to those in your hand, that I fear you will find it next to impossible to negotiate them."

While I was pondering over this dilemma, and pacing up and down the streets with my friendly banker, he suddenly stopped, and, turning round, called, or rather shouted,

"Oh! now I think I have it! Did not you say, my good sir, that you were charged with despatches to the government, about the Mahratta war? Where are they?—let me have a look at them?"

This brilliant idea gave new life to the transaction, and away we trotted to the inn. The desk was speedily opened—Admiral Sir Richard King's orders, and Governor Elliott of Madras's despatches produced, with a whole bagful of packets from Calcutta, the Isle of France, the Cape, and St. Helena.

"Quite enough! quite enough!" almost screamed out the delighted man of cash. "You shall have the money, sir! you shall have the money! and that right speedily; and along with it many apologies for all this trouble, and detention, and suspicion; and perhaps we may end our acquaintance in a way you little think of—but of that we'll talk by and by."

"In the meantime," I said, "you must sit down and take your dinner with us; though I dare swear it is famously over-cooked, since it is a couple of hours past the time it was ordered."

"No, no!" he cried, "I must run off to catch the money before the chest is locked; besides, I do not like to do things by halves; take your dinner, and you'll see me here again in due time."

We did as he advised; ate our dinner, paid the bill, ordered the chaise round, and sat in readiness for a start, the moment the means of greasing the wheels, as my friend aptly called it, should be put in my possession.

Ere long, this most considerate of friends in need re-appeared, with the money in separate parcels, one of which held notes, another guineas, and a third change in silver. He made me count it all carefully, and then received from me the bills of exchange, which I signed before him.

"Now, my very kind sir," said I, holding out my hand, "let me thank you most sincerely for the important service you have done me, and, pray, believe that I shall have no greater pleasure in the world than in being of use to you, if ever it lies in my power."

"Not so fast! not so fast!" cried he, affecting to refuse the proffered hand, "for I have a shrewd apprehension that, in spite of all these grateful assurances, you will make a demur at the very first, and perhaps the only favour I shall ever ask you, or have the means of asking you in my life."

"What's that?" I demanded.

"Neither more nor less," he replied, laughing, "than that you should now give me the pleasure of your company over a bowl of punch, which I, who am allowed to be the best mixer in the county of Cork, will concoct in two or three minutes."

"But don't you think," said I, "as I have public and important despatches to carry, and have already lost so much time, that I really ought to be proceeding to Dublin as fast as four horses can carry me?"

"There, now!" he exclaimed, "did not I say that you would make a difficulty about granting me the first and only favour I ever should have occasion to ask you? Besides, I don't at all understand your insinuating that time can ever be lost in drinking good punch; and lastly, but not least, I beg you to bear in mind, that but for me, you must either have been sticking here in the inn, or trudging down to the Cove to beg pecuniary assistance from your admiral. All which reasons you may lay before my Lords Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, if you should be called upon to account for the delay; but out of this room, without discussing a bowl, depend upon it you shall not start! Kelly," he exclaimed, "Joe Kelly, man, get the things, and, d'ye hear, the best materials."

So, as there was now left no possible mode of escape, down we sat.

He had promised to complete his incantations in two minutes, but I am confident he occupied a good quarter of an hour in performing this apparently simple operation, upon all the details of which he descanted most learnedly; assuring his company that it was not the quality or even proportions of the magical ingredients, so much as the exact attention to the best method of putting them together, that constituted the grand secret of manufacturing a good bowl. On our expressing some doubts as to the possibility of all this, he pushed the goodly vessel into the middle of the table, drew back his chair, and exclaimed, "I'll let you take a note of every thing I put in, and you may imitate me in all these movements; but I'll bet you ten to one your punch will not be worth drinking." And then he added, almost shouting with delight, as he sipped his own mixture,—"No, sir, no! It's utterly impossible—I defy you and all the rest of the world combined to make such an elegant mess as that!"

It was indeed glorious—beyond the belief of inexperienced mortals. Much as I had been enchanted by the sublime toddy of the North, I was forced to own, in spite of my intoxicating recollections, then still fresh, after an interval of half-a-dozen busy years, that the punch of the South was the superior tippie of the two.

But what surprised me most, was the extraordinary and sudden change which had been wrought in the appearance of our worthy friend. Instead of the straightforward, dry, calculating, cautious, and painfully formal man of accounts and securities with whom I had been in discussion half the day, here sat a jovial, reckless, hearty, and totally unreserved boon companion, whose whole affections appeared absorbed in a punch-bowl. This trans-mutation was begun and completed the very instant our money transactions were ended. The ink of my signature to the bills was not well dry, before he clapped his hands, sung out in a new key for "the materials," as he called them, and commenced the grand brewing, with a degree of energy of character, and certainty of purpose, which, I trust and hope, must, long ere this, have made his fortune.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE TROPICAL REGIONS AT SEA.

There sailed along with us in the Volage, from Spithead, the Princess Caroline 74, and the Theban frigate, to aid in protecting a fleet of the following ships of the East India Company:—the Elphinstone, Wexford, Cirencester, Marquis of Huntly, Bombay Castle, and Alnwick Castle, all for China direct. As these ships were of the largest class, well manned, well commanded, and were likewise pretty well armed, and got up to look like men-of-war, our force had not only an imposing aspect, but, in the event of coming in contact with an enemy, even in considerable strength, we should either have beaten him outright, or baffled him by crippling his spars in such a way as to prevent his interrupting our voyage.

On the occasion of our voyage in 1812, our most interesting evolutions were confined to the interchange of good dinners; for your Indianen know as well how to eat, drink, and be merry, as to fight, if need be. Their nominal, and indeed their chief business, is to trade; but their trading is a widely different thing from that of the ordinary merchant service. The East India Company's officers are bred up, in many respects, like naval men; and, as they are taught to act, they learn to feel, in the same manner. Being sprung from as good a stock as the officers of the brother service of the navy, they possess a kindred gentlemanlike spirit, and are in every respect, as far as their means go, perfectly suitable allies in battle. I allude chiefly to their warlike equipments; but in almost every thing else they are also essentially the same, save in the circumstance of actual trafficking. Unfortunately, manage it as we will, the habit of buying and selling goods must have a tendency, in spite of his best exertions, to detach an officer's thoughts from those high and delicate refinements which constitute the characteristic distinction between the art of war and the art of gain. Accordingly the two things, when joined together, make rather an agreeable than a profitable mixture.

In fine weather there is naturally much agreeable intercourse between the different ships in such a fleet as ours; for East India Company's folks, whether of the land or the sea service, understand right well the jolly art of good cheer wherever they go; be it on terra firma, or on the high seas, bivouacking on the lofty Himalayas, or feasting in the bungalows of the flat Delta of the Ganges, it is all one to them. So that, during our whole voyage, there scarcely occurred a day on which, in the course of the morning, if the sea were tolerably smooth, and the wind not too strong, and the weather otherwise agreeable, the dinner-invitation signal was not displayed from the commodore, or from some of his flock. When there was a breeze, and the ships were making way through the water, some technical address was necessary to avoid delay. This will easily be understood, without going into minute details, when it is remembered, that there must always in a convoy be found certain ships which sail worse than others, and that, although these tubs, as they are most deservedly called, crowd all their canvases, the rest are obliged to shorten sail in order to keep them company; as Lightfoot, in the fairy tale, was obliged to tie his feet in the race. If it be the commodore who gives the dinner, he either heaves to, while the boats of the different captains come on board, or he edges down to the different ships in succession, passes them at the distance of half a cable's length, picks up his guests, and resumes his station a-head, or to windward, or wherever it may suit him to place himself so as best to guard his charge. If any of the fast sailers have occasion to heave to, either before or after dinner, to lower down or to hoist up the boat which carries the captain backwards and forwards to the ship in which the entertainment is given, and in consequence of this detention any way has been lost, that ship has only to set a little more sail, that she may shoot ahead, and regain her position in the line.

The unfortunate bad sailers of all fleets or convoys that ever swam, as may well be supposed, are daily and hourly execrated in every note of the gamut; and it must be owned that the detention they cause, when a fine fresh breeze is blowing, is excessively provoking to all the rest, and mortifying to themselves. Sometimes the progress of one haystack of a vessel is so slow that a fast-sailing ship is directed to take her in tow, and fairly lug her along. As this troublesome operation requires for its proper execution no small degree of nautical knowledge, as well as dexterity, and must be performed in the face of the whole squadron, it is always exposed to much sharp criticism. The celerity with which sail is set, or taken in, by the respective ships, or the skill with which broken spars are shifted, likewise furnish such abundant scope for technical table-talk, that there is seldom any want of topic in the convoy. Sailors, indeed, are about as restless as the element on which they float; and their hands are generally kept pretty full by the necessity of studying the fluctuating circumstances of wind and weather, together with the due attention to what is properly called the navigation, or that branch of their art which consists in discovering the ship's place on the globe, and shaping the course to be steered after the exact position has been determined.

These, and various other occupations not now touched upon, served to give a high degree of interest to this Indian voyage, which, to most of us, was the first in its way, and filled up our time, as we sailed along with a flowing sheet over the broad Atlantic, much more completely and agreeably than can be well conceived. The mere circumstance of having to pass successively and quickly through a number of different climates, first in the order of increasing warmth, and then in the reverse order of increasing cold, was of itself most striking. The change of latitude being the chief cause of these phenomena, a succession of astronomical variations became necessarily attendant upon the progress of the voyage; and although all these were easily explained by reasonings which every one on board was accustomed to admit as sound, yet the actual, practical exhibition, as it may be termed, of the truths of astronomical science failed not to strike the unfamiliarised imagination as both wonderful and beautiful.

When we sailed from England the weather was very cold, raw, and uncomfortable; and although, fortunately, we had a couple of days' fair wind at starting, we were met in the very chops of the channel by hard-hearted southerly and southwesterly winds, which tried our patience sorely. On the evening of the tenth day we caught a glimpse of the north coast of Spain; and the rugged shore of Galicia was the last which most of us saw of Europe for many years. It was not till after a fortnight's hard struggling against these tiresome southwesterly winds that we anchored in Funchal Roads, Madeira, having by the way dropped several of our convoy. These stray sheep came in during the few days we remained to refresh ourselves at this most charming of resting places. After nearly a week's enjoyment, we proceeded on our course to the southward, and within three days came in sight of Palma, the most northern of the Canary Island group. It was thirty miles distant in the southeast quarter. Teneriffe, the sea "monarch of mountains," lay too far off for us to perceive even his "diadem of snow," which at that season (April,) I presume, he always wears. Some years after the period in question, when I paid him a visit, in the month of August, the very tip-top was bare, and the thermometer at 70°.

Under more favourable circumstances we might possibly have seen Teneriffe from the Volage, for our distance was not above a hundred miles. This, however, it must be owned, is a long way to see the land, unless it form a continuous ridge of great elevation, like the Andes, and even then to be distinguished well, it requires to be interposed between a bright sky and the ship. At day-break, and for about half an hour before sun rise, if the weather be clear, even sharp peaks, like the cone of Teneriffe, may be seen with a degree of distinctness, which is very remarkable, when viewed from the distance of a hundred miles and upwards, as I have several times experienced when navigating in the Pacific. But when the full splendour of the sun's light begins to fill the air, these gigantic forms gradually fade away amongst the clouds, or melt into the sky, even when no clouds are visible. I have likewise been told, that in sailing directly away from Teneriffe (or other high insulated peaks,) and keeping the eye pretty constantly fixed in the proper direction, it may be retained in sight at a much greater distance than it can be discovered on approaching. I am disposed to consider this very probable, but have never had a good opportunity of trying the experiment.

It was late in April, as we were stealing slowly past these distant Canary Islands, when the first real puff of the Tradewind caught our sleeping sails, and made the braces, haulyards, and all the other ropes connected with the yards, crack again. This breeze, by giving us a foretaste of what we were to enjoy for upwards of a thousand leagues across the torrid zone ahead of us, served more effectually to detach our thoughts from European interests than any thing which had occurred since our leaving England. At the very moment, however, when we were chuckling at this disengagement of our feelings from domestic anxieties, and all the varied agitation of home concerns, we observed a ship crossing our path at some distance. Signal being made to chase, we instantly darted off from the convoy to examine the stranger, who proved to be an English ship from Lisbon. We hailed, and asked, "What news?" "Badajoz has fallen," replied the other, "after a terrible siege."

This was received with a general buzz of joyous congratulation along the decks. In answer to further questions, we were told of some three or four thousand men killed and wounded in the trenches and breach. Then, indeed, the glorious intelligence was greeted by three jolly huzzas from every ship in the convoy!

Nothing so startling as this occurred to us again, but the serenity of our thoughts was in some degree interrupted a few days afterwards, by the northeasterly Tradewind dying away, and a gentle southeaster springing up in its place. This occurred in latitude 25° N., where, according to our inexperienced conception of these singular winds, we ought to have found a regular breeze from the very opposite quarter! Nor was it till long afterwards that I learned how much the force and direction of the Tradewinds are liable to modification by the particular position which the sun occupies in the heavens; or how far the rotatory motion of the earth, combined with the power which the sun possesses of heating certain portions of the circumambient air, are the regulating causes of the Trades, Monsoons, and indeed, of all the other winds by which we are driven about. It is by no means an easy problem in meteorology to show how these causes act in every case; and perhaps it is one which will never be so fully solved as to admit of very popular enunciation applicable to all climates. In the most important and useful class of these aerial currents, called, par excellence, and with so much picturesque truth, "the Tradewinds," the explanation is not difficult. But before entering on this curious and copious theme, I feel anxious to carry our course fairly across the tropical regions, after which as account of the Trades will be better understood.

I have just mentioned that the changes of temperature, on a voyage to India, are most remarkable. We set sail, for instance, in the month of March, when it was bitterly cold in England; then we came off the coast of Spain, where it was a little more moderate; next to Madeira, which is always agreeable. Then we passed the Canaries; after which we sailed over the tropic of Cancer, and got well toasted in the torrid zone; steered down upon the equinoctial line, passed the tropic of Capricorn, and again became conscious of the weakened influence of the sun; till, at length, off the Cape of Good Hope, we were once more nipped with the cold. Anon, having rounded the south point of Africa, we put our heads towards the line, and a second time, within a few weeks, emerged from the depth of winter into the height of summer.

The proximate cause of all these vicissitudes was, of course, our approach towards and removal from the direct influence of the great source of light and heat. At one time, the sun, even at noon, was seen creeping stealthily along, low down in the horizon, at another his jolly countenance was blazing away right over head. On the 5th of May, when our latitude was 17½° N., the sun's declination was 16½° N., his centre being only one degree from our zenith: shadows we had none, any more than the unhappy wretch in the wild German story, who, for a punishment was deprived of this honourable accompaniment. On that day we saw St. Antonio, the north-westernmost of the Cape de Verd Islands, the summit of which is about seven thousand feet above the sea.

On the next day I well remember going on deck with a certain flutter of spirits, to see, for the first time in my life, the sun to the northward, and moving through the heavens from right to left, instead of from left to right. No one doubts that the earth is round; yet these conspicuous and actual proofs of its rotundity always arouse the fancy, and frequently interest the judgment, almost as much as if they were unexpected. The gradual appearance night after night, of new stars and new constellations belongs to a still higher order of curiosity; for it is merely places well-known objects in strange positions, but brings totally new objects of contemplation before our eyes, and leads us to feel, perhaps more strongly than upon any other occasion, the full gratification which novelty on the grandest scale is capable of producing. I shall never forget the impatience with which I have desired watched the approach of darkness after a long day's run to the south, knowing that I, in a few moments, was to discover celestial phenomena heretofore concealed from my view.

After slanting through the northeast trade-wind, we reached that well-known but troublesome stage in the voyage, so difficult to get over, called the Variables. This region has acquired its title from the regular Trades not being found there, but in their place unsteady breezes, long calms, heavy squalls, and sometimes smart winds from the southward and southwestward. These Variables, which sorely perplex all mariners, even those of most experience, while they drive young navigators almost out of their senses, are not less under the dominion of the causes which regulate those great perennial breezes the Trades, blowing to the northward and southward of them. Their laws, however, are not quite so readily understood, and consequently are not so easily allowed for in the practice of navigation. I have even seen people as greatly provoked with their occurrence, as if the course of nature had been intermitted for the express purpose of bothering them. Such impatient voyagers will not condescend to recollect, that their own confined observation, or shallow knowledge of the facts, is rather more likely to be the cause of their disappointment, than that dame Nature should have halted in her operations merely to vex their worships. On the other hand, many persons besides navigators, misled by the seduction of names, rush headlong into very unsubstantial generalisations; and, upon the strength of a few unconnected facts, lay down what they call laws of nature, which they are mightily astonished to find will not always square with actual observation. Such reasoners, instead of being delighted with new facts, are vexed to meet with exceptions, as they call them, and are very slow to confess that the error lies with themselves. Still less are they willing to allow, that, if they had studied the subject more attentively, they might have profited by these very exceptions, and advanced their voyage, instead of retarding it.

When we actually encounter, on the spot, and for the first time, a crowd of new circumstances, of which, previously, we have only known the names, or have merely heard them described by others, we feel so much confused and bewildered, that we fly eagerly to the nearest authority to help us out of the scrape. It generally happens, in these cases, that the reference does not prove very satisfactory, because the actual circumstances with which we are engaged are rarely similar in all their bearings to those with which we compare them; and when this is not the case, the blindfold method of proceeding in the beaten path is very apt to mislead.

As an illustration of this kind of deception, it may be stated, that navigators, whose actual experience has not extended to the tropical regions, are very apt, in poring over the voyages of others, to acquire, insensibly, a very confident notion that each of the great Trade-winds blowing on different sides of the line, (the northeast and the southeast by name) are quite steady in their direction; and that, in the equatorial interval which lies between them, only calms and light winds are to be found. Moreover, inexperienced persons generally believe this interval to be equally divided by the equator, and that both the breadth and the position of this calm region continue unchanged throughout the whole year. Now, here are four important mistakes—important both in a scientific and in a practical point of view. For 1st, Not calms and squalls alone, but occasionally fresh and steady winds, are found between the Trades; 2dly, The belt called the Variables is by no means equally divided by the equator; neither, 3dly, is that belt stationary in its position; nor, 4thly, is it uniform in its breadth. It will hence be easily understood, even by a person who has never quitted one of the midland counties in England, and to whom the ocean is an unseen wonder, that a new comer to the tropical regions, his head loaded with these false views, will be very apt to mistake his own ignorance for the caprice of Nature, and perhaps call out, as I once heard a man do, in all the agony of impatience, caused by a protracted head wind,—"Now this is really scandalous usage of the clerk of the weather office!" The scandal, however, lay not so much with the clerk's usage as with his own limited knowledge—for if at the very time of his imprecation, instead of abusing the foul wind, and keeping his yards braced sharp up, and making his sails stand like a board, the grumbler had known how to take advantage of it, and had kept away two or three points, set his fore-top-mast studding-sail, and flanked across or through the breeze which he had in vain tried to beat against, he might not only have saved his temper, but have made his passage in half the time.

Navigation, after all, probably more than most other pursuits, requires, for its right performance, a constant mixture of theory and practice. The purely practical man, if his experience be extensive, and his voyages be repeatedly made over the same ground, will unquestionably have an advantage over the purely theoretical navigator. There is no necessity, however, that speculation and experience should be either disjointed, or combined in equal portions. A small chain of sound reasoning will serve to arrange and bind together a large pile of properly observed details. Actual facts form the rude materials of our professional knowledge; the skill of the mathematician supplies the theory by direction of which the edifice is built up. In ordinary navigation, a comparatively limited allowance of mathematics, and an acquaintance with the more general principles of astronomy, furnish what may be termed the plan and elevation of our structure; but experience alone can teach us how to apply those designs to useful account.

I am not sure that, in the whole range of this extensive subject, there could be picked out an instance more in point to what has just been said, than these interesting phenomena of the Trade-winds, which, if I mistake not, possess considerable interest to all classes of persons, whether professional or otherwise. To sailors of every age and rank, and especially to naval officers, an acquaintance with the laws which regulate these extraordinary aerial currents must be of great importance. For a commander may be ordered, at a moment's warning, either to carry his own ship, or to lead a squadron, or to guard a convoy, from the northern to the southern hemisphere, or perhaps from the West to the East Indies. If, however, he have not previously made a tropical voyage or two, or have not studied the subject in its genuine theoretical spirit, as well as in the log-books of his predecessors, he may expect to find himself most woefully embarrassed, both on entering and on leaving the Trades.

A captain of a man-of-war in charge of a convoy of India ships, it is true, may, at any time, consult the experienced commanders of the ships under his orders as to the best method of making the passage, generally; or, he may call them on board on reaching the Variables, to have their opinion, and, if he pleases, take their advice as to the quickest method of getting over this difficult stage in the journey. But I think it will occur to every officer, that in such a proceeding, however necessary it may sometimes be for the advancement of the public service, there must be a certain loss of dignity; and with it, some relinquishment of that authority which all experience shows is essential to the proper exercise of command.

Neither officers nor men throughout any fleet ever put forth their whole strength, unless they have the fullest confidence in the person placed at their head. On the other hand, if their confidence in their leader be complete, they fling their whole souls and bodies into the effort, and, under the inspiring influence of unbounded faith, often perform deeds which are equally surprising to themselves and to others. We all know how well this principle worked on the great scale in fleets under Nelson, and, in a smaller degree, but in a spirit hardly less remarkable, on board single ships under Lord Cochrane.

Without exhausting this branch of the question, it must be evident to every one, that the exact knowledge required for getting quickly over the more difficult parts of an Indian voyage may often prove of the utmost consequence in a national point of view. Suppose, for instance, a war breaks out unexpectedly between France and England, and two frigates, equally good sailers, are despatched, by the countries respectively, to spread the news in the eastern hemisphere. Conceive them to start simultaneously, one from Cherbourg, the other from Plymouth, let them both reach the edge of the Variables together, and also lose the northeast Trade-wind on the same day. So far, two equally good officers will probably run abreast of one another. But if one of the captains, without being personally acquainted with the numerous varieties which occur in those low latitudes, has yet a sound knowledge of the general laws by which the fluctuations in the winds are regulated, while the other has merely read about them in log-books, and has no theoretical key to help him to unlock the secrets of the perplexing anomalies he will inevitably encounter, the chances surely are, that the career of the two ships will become from that hour essentially different. If, to the theoretical knowledge which I have supposed one of the officers to possess, he adds even a slight personal acquaintance with the facts, from having studied them on a former voyage, his advantage over his rival will be still greater. At all events, that frigate commanded by the officer possessed of most philosophical knowledge of the causes which put the air in motion, would, in all probability, double the Cape many days, perhaps weeks before the other, and thus be enabled to scatter the important intelligence over the whole Indian ocean in time to prevent great disasters; or, by striking the first blow, to accomplish active warlike purposes of the highest importance to his country.

Independently of all such public objects concerned in these enquiries, which give them a degree of professional importance, and almost render their study a part of every officer's duty, there appears to exist a very general interest in the Trade-winds, sufficiently strong to engage the attention even of unprofessional persons when the subject is placed intelligibly before them. These vast currents of air, which sweep round and round the globe in huge strips of more than twelve hundred miles in width, are in a manner forced, more or less, on every one's notice, from contributing essentially to that boundless interchange of the productions of distant regions by which modern times are so agreeably distinguished from the old.

The great Monsoons, again, of the Indian and China oceans play almost as important a part in this grand nautical drama along the coasts of those remote countries. All these great phenomena, and every one of their numerous minor varieties, will be found, upon a little enquiry, to obey precisely the same laws as their less fluctuating brethren the mighty Trades. That theory, indeed, would be but a shabby one which did not include both; and hence, it may be useful to suggest to my young friends, springs one of the chief delights of science when its study is conducted in a proper spirit. If the pursuit of truth be engaged in with sincerity, phenomena apparently the most opposite in character—for example, winds in different parts of the earth, but in the same latitude, blowing in totally different directions at the same season of the year—will always prove in the end illustrative of one another, and of their common theory.

CHAPTER XXII.

PROGRESS OF THE VOYAGE.

Let people say what they please of the fine bracing weather of a cold climate, I never saw any truth-speaking persons who, on coming fairly to the trial, did not complain of a cold frosty morning as a very great nuisance, or who did not cling eagerly to the fire to unbrace themselves again. For my own part, I have always delighted in the relaxation, if such be the word, or the lassitude caused by hot weather, and accordingly, have very rarely in my life encountered too hot a day. Of course, in saying this, I take it for granted that the weather is to have fair play, and that our dress, apartments, and all other circumstances, shall be suitable. Many a day far too hot have I met with in the choky, oven-like streets of London, where the blacks and the dust and the multitudes of people combine to augment the temperature, already raised to the true German-stove pitch by the reflection of such of the sun's rays as succeed in forcing their way through the stratum of smoke to the half-black, half-red bricks of the walls. In winter evenings, too, when every crevice or opening for the air in a well-packed ball-room is carefully kept shut, by orders from those perverse dowagers who choose to plant themselves near the windows, a lively representation of the climate of the black-hole at Calcutta is sure to be enacted. At such seasons it certainly is rather too hot. Occasionally, also, at night, on board ship, in warm climates, in harbour, or in a calm at sea, when all hands are below, the climate may well be called insufferable. Or in such horrible sinks and swamps as Batavia, where the motionless air becomes thick and clammy with miasmata, there is no denying that the heat is too great.

But I have very seldom, if ever, felt the weather disagreeably warm, even in India, when sailing on the open sea, or enjoying the free range of a wide country, under awnings and bungaloes, or stretched in a palanquin, or shaded by an umbrella on the back of an elephant. Soldiers and sailors, whose duty exposes them at all hours, either on a march or in boats, must, in spite of every contrivance of this sort, be often struck down by the heat, and sigh with all their hearts for the bracing frosts of higher latitudes. I grant, therefore, that what is said above has reference exclusively to those happy folks who can command their own time and occupations, and who have the means of bringing to bear on their comforts those innumerable luxurious contrivances which the ingenuity of wealth has devised in the East, to render its climate not only bearable, but one of the most enjoyable in the world.

As we sailed along on our voyage to India, gradually slipping down from the high to the low latitudes, the merry sun crept up higher and higher every day towards the zenith, while the thermometer, of course, rose likewise. What was most agreeable in this change from cold to warmth, was the little difference between the temperature of the day and that of the night. As we approached the equator, the thermometer fell only from 82° in the day time to 79° or 80° at night, which, on deck, was delightful. We did not, of course, come to this high temperature all at once; for on the 6th of May, the day after we passed directly under the sun, the average of the twenty-four hours was 73°, and at night 69° and 70°.

It is not to be imagined that every one was pleased with these changes; for on board ship, as on shore, there exist, at all times, and in all latitudes, weathers, and climates, a set of discontented spirits, whose acquired habit or whose radical nature is to find fault with the existing state of things, be these what they may. To such cantankerous folks a growl of misery would really seem to be the great paradoxical happiness of their lives, and the more unreasonable the cause, provided there seem reason in it, the better for their purpose. It is frequently not any actual inconvenience of which these grumblers complain, but chiefly that which they might, could, or would suffer were certain things to happen, all of which, of course, it is a part of your thorough-bred growler to prophesy will happen. I have seen a middy of this stamp glad to find, on coming below, that some insignificant portion of his dinner really had been devoured by his hungry messmates, while he himself was keeping his watch on deck.

"I am used worse than a dog," he would cry, secretly delighted to have gained the luxury of a grievance upon which he might right the changes of his ill usage for the next week. "I can't even get a basin of posse soup put by for me; it's such an infernal shame, I'll cut the service!"

The diversity of climate on an Indian voyage furnishes capital nuts for these perturbed spirits. It is first too cold, then too hot, then there is not wind enough, then it blows too fresh in the squalls; by and by the nights are discovered to be abominably close and sultry, and in the day the fierce flaming downright heat of the sun is still worse; then the calms are never to be over; or the lying trades, as they call them, have got capsize, and blow from the west instead of the east! After the line has been crossed, and the south-east wind is met with, the weather soon becomes what these ingenious fellows call too temperate, then it grows too cold again; and next, off the Cape, the latitude is too stormy.—In this alone they have some reason; and I have often regretted that, by a royal ordinance of the King of Portugal, the name of this mighty promontory was changed from Cabo de Tormentes, the headland of storms, to its present spongy title. In short, this grand voyage is merely a peristrophe panorama of miseries, which, if they survive, say they, it will be happy for them. Happy! Not a whit. It is out of their nature to be happy. To find fault, and to fling away the good the gods provide them, to sour every cup of enjoyment by the gall of discontent expressed from their own hearts, and to aggravate the pain of every real wound by the impatience of idle complaints, is their diseased joy. "Evil, be thou my good!" they might well exclaim; for, instead of heightening the pleasures of life by full participation, or subduing its inevitable evils, or, at all events, softening their asperity by enduring with fortitude and cheerfulness what cannot be helped, these self-tormentors reject what is substantially pleasing, and cling, with habitual, but morbid relish, to whatever is disagreeable.

As we glided along, through the trade winds, towards the neck of sea which divides Africa from America, the symptoms of a change in climate became daily more manifest. Every skylight and stern window was fastened wide open, and every cabin-scuttle driven out, that a free draught of air might sweep through the ship all night long. In the day-time, the pitch in the seams of the upper-deck soon began to melt, and, by sticking to the soles of our shoes, plastered the planks, to the great discomfort of the captain of the after guard. The tar, oozing from the cordage aloft, dropped on our heads, speckled the snow-white boat covers, and obliged us to spread the hammock cloths, to prevent the bedding being ruined by the spots. On the larboard or eastern side of the ship, which, of course, is always presented to the sun when crossing the Trades on the outward-bound voyage, the pitch and rosin with which the seams had been payed ran down in little streams across the lines of paint. To prevent, as far as we could, some of these annoyances, we spread the awnings over the decks, and triced up the curtains, fore and aft, while every art was used to introduce air to all parts of the ship. The half-ports were removed from the main-deck guns, the gratings put on one side, and as many windsails sent down the hatchways as could be made to catch a puff of air. Blue trowsers and beaver scrapers soon gave way before the elements, and were succeeded by nankeens, straw hats, and canvass caps. In the captain's cabin, where the presence of the governor, our passenger, still kept up the straight-laced etiquettes of the service, coats and epaulettes appeared at dinner; but in the gun-room, the officers, the instant they came below, slipped on their light white jackets, and, sans waistcoat, seized their flutes and books, and drew their chairs as near as possible to the mouth of the windsail. In the midshipmen's berth, outside in the storeroom, truth compels me to acknowledge, that the shirt without neckcloth or stock, and sometimes with its sleeves rolled up to the elbows, was the most fashionable rig. The seamen and marines, of course, dined on the main deck, not only that they might enjoy the fresh air breathing gently in upon them through the ports on the weather side, and sweeping out again by those to leeward, but that the lower-deck might be kept as cool and airy as possible against the sultry feverish night season.

On such occasions the men leave their tables and stools below, and either seat themselves tailor-fashion, or recline Roman fashion. Nor is this in the least degree unpleasant; for the deck of a man-of-war is made as clean every morning as any table, and is kept so during the day by being swept at least once an hour. Of all the tunes played by the boatswain's pipe, that which calls the sweepers is the most frequently heard. When the order is given for dining on deck, the different messes into which the crew are divided occupy the spots immediately above their usual mess-places below, as far as the guns allow of their doing so. It has always struck me as very pleasing, to see the main-deck covered, from the after-hatchway to the cook's coppers, with the people's messes, enjoying their noonday repast, as delicious to them, and probably far more so, than any turtle feast to any alderman; while the celestial grog, with which their hard, dry, salt junk is washed down, out-matches, twenty-fold, in Jack's estimation, all the thin potations, the clarets, and hocks, and vin de Graves, of those who, in no very courteous language, are called their betters. For I will venture to say, that at such well-fed moments, no mortals, of whatever rank in the world, take precedence, on the score of enjoyment and contentment, of these our light-hearted tars and jolly marines.

Until we had crossed the north-east Trade, and reached the Calms, the ship's way through the water was too great to allow of bathing along side; but we easily contrived a shower-bath, which answered very well. This consisted of a packing-box, the bottom of which was perforated with holes, triced up between two of the skids, near the gangway, and under the quarter of one of the boats on the booms. A couple of the top-men with draw-buckets supplied the water from above, while the bather stood on the main-deck enjoying the shower. The time selected for this delicious bath was generally about four o'clock in the morning, after the middle watch was out, and before the exhausted officer tumbled into bed. A four hours' walk, indeed, in a sultry night, be it managed ever so gently, has a tendency to produce a degree of heat approaching to feverishness; and I have no words to describe the luxury of standing under a cool shower when the long task is ended. We were generally just enough fatigued to be sure of a sound, light, happy sleep, and just enough heated to revel in the coolest water that was to be had. In fact, we found that of the sea, much too warm, being only two or three degrees below the temperature of the air. To remedy this, we generally exposed a dozen buckets-full on the gangway at eight or nine o'clock in the evening: and these, being allowed to stand till morning, became so much cooler by the evaporation in the night, that the shock was unexpectably grateful.

Perhaps there is not any more characteristic evidence of our being within the tropical regions, one, I mean, which strikes the imagination more forcibly, than the company of those picturesque little animals, if it be correct so to call them, the flying-fish. It is true, that a stray one or two may sometimes be seen far north, making a few short skips out of the water, and I even remember seeing several close to the edge of the banks of Newfoundland, in latitude 45°. These, however, had been swept out of their natural position by the huge gulf stream, an ocean in itself, which retains much of its temperature far into the northern regions, and possibly helps to modify the climate over the Atlantic. But it is not until the voyager has fairly reached the heart of the torrid zone that he sees the flying-fish in perfection.

No familiarity with the sight can ever render so indifferent to the graceful flight of these most interesting of all the finny, or, rather, winged tribe. On the contrary, like a bright day, or a smiling countenance, or good company of any kind, the more we see of them, the more we learn to value their presence. I have, indeed, hardly ever observed a person so dull, or unimaginative, that his eye did not glisten as he watched a shoal, or, it may well be called, a covey of flying-fish rise from the sea, and skim along for several hundred yards. There is something in it so very peculiar, so totally dissimilar to every thing else in other parts of the world, that our wonder goes on increasing every time we see a single one take its flight. The incredulity, indeed, of the old Scottish wife on this head is sufficiently excusable. "You may have seen rivers o' milk, and mountains o' sugar," said she to her son, returned from a voyage: "but you'll ne'er gar me believe you have seen a fish that could flee!"

I have endeavoured to form an estimate as to the length of these flights, and find two hundred yards set down in my notes as about the longest; but, I think, subsequent observation has extended the space. The amiable Humboldt good-naturedly suggests, that these flights may be mere gambols, and not indicative of the flying-fish being pursued by their formidable enemy the dolphin. I wish I could believe so; for it were much more agreeable to suppose, that at the end of the fine sweep which they take, at the height of ten or twenty feet above the surface, they may fall gently and safely on the bosom of the sea, than pop full into the voracious jaws of their merciless foe.

I do not recollect whether the eminent traveller just mentioned, who not only observes many new things than most men, but describes them much better, has any where mentioned his having witnessed one of these chases. Indeed, they are not very often seen: at least, I am not sure that I have observed above half a dozen, though I have crossed and recrossed the equator fourteen times. The prettiest I remember to have assisted at, as the French say, and the details of which I shall describe presently, was during the first voyage I ever made through those regions of the sun. The pleasant Trade which had wafted us, with different degrees of velocity, over a distance of more than a thousand miles at last gradually failed. The first symptom of the approaching calm was the sails beginning to flap gently against the masts, so gently, indeed, that we half hoped it was caused, not so much by the diminished force of the breeze, with which we were very unwilling to part, as by that long and peculiar swell which, has found the hand of a master-artist to embody it in a description, more technically correct, and certainly far more graphic in all its parts, than if the picture had been filled up from the log-books of ten thousand voyagers.

The same noble writer, by merely letting his imagination run wild a little, has also given a sketch of what might take place were one of these calms to be perpetual; and so true to nature is all his pencilling, that many a time, when day after day has passed without a breath of wind, and there came no prospect of any breeze, I have recollected the following strange lines, and almost fancied that such might be our own dismal fate.

"The rivers, lakes, and ocean, all stood still,
And nothing stirred within their silent depths:
Ships sailorless lay rotting on the sea,

And their masts fell down piecemeal; as they dropped,
They slept on the abyss without a surge.
The waves were dead; the tides were in their grave,
The moon, their mistress, had expired before;
The winds were withered in the stagnant air,
And the clouds perished."——*

The faint zephyrs, which had coquetted with our languid sails for an hour or two, at length took their leave: first of the courses, then of the top sails, and lastly of the royals and the smaller flying kites aloft. In vain we looked round and round the horizon for some traces of a return of our old friend the Trade, but could distinguish nothing save one polished, dark heaving sheet of glass, reflecting the unbroken disk of the sun, and the bright, clear sky in the moving mirror beneath. From the heat, which soon became intense, there was no escape, either on deck or below, aloft in the tops, or still higher on the cross-trees; neither could we find relief down in the hold; for it was all the same, except, that in the exposed situations we were scorched or roasted, in the others suffocated. The useless helm was lashed amidships, the yards were lowered on the cap, and the boats were dropped into the water to fill up the cracks and rents caused by the fierce heat. The occasion was taken advantage of to shift some of the sails, and to mend others; most of the running ropes also were turned end for end. A listless feeling stole over us all, and we lay about the decks, gasping for breath, in vain seeking for some alleviation to our thirst by drink! drink! drink! Alas, the transient indulgence only made the matter worse.

Meanwhile, our convoy of huge China ships, rolling very slowly on the top of the long, smooth, and scarcely perceptible ridges, or sinking as gently between their summits, were scattered in all directions, with their heads in different ways, some looking homeward again, and some, as if by instinct, keeping still for the south. How it happens I do not know, but on occasions of perfect calm, or such as appear to be perfectly calm, the ships of a fleet generally drift away from one another; so that, at the end of a few hours, the whole circle bounded by the horizon is speckled over with these unmanageable hulks, as they may for the time be considered. It will occasionally happen, indeed, that two ships draw so near in a calm as to incur some risk of falling on board one another. I need scarcely mention, that, even in the smoothest water ever found in the open sea, two large ships coming in actual contact must prove a formidable encounter. As long as they are apart, their gentle and rather graceful movements are fit subjects of admiration; and I have often seen people gazing, for an hour at a time, at the ships of a becalmed fleet, slowly twisting round, changing their position, and rolling from side to side, as silently as if they had been in harbour, or accompanied only by the faint, rippling sound tripping along the water line, as the copper below the bends alternately sunk into the sea, or rose out of it, dripping wet, and shining as bright and clean as a new coin, from the constant friction of the ocean during the previous rapid passage across the Trade-winds.

But all this picturesque admiration changes to alarm when ships come so close as to risk a contact; for these motions, which appear so slow and gentle to the eye, are irresistible in their force; and as the chances are against the two vessels moving exactly in the same direction at the same moment, they must speedily grind or tear one another to pieces. Supposing them to come in contact side by side, the first roll would probably tear away the fore and main channels of both ships; the next roll, by interlacing the lower yards, and entangling the spars of one ship with the shrouds and backstays of the other, would in all likelihood bring down all three masts of both ships, not piecemeal as the poet hath it, but in one furious crash. Beneath the ruins of the spars, the coils of rigging, and the enormous folds of canvases, might lie crushed many of the best hands, who, from being always the foremost to spring forward in such seasons of danger, are sure to be sacrificed. After this first catastrophe, the ships would probably drift away from one another for a little while, only to tumble together again and again, till they had ground one another to the water's edge, and one or both of them would fill and go down. In such encounters it is impossible to stop the mischief, and oak and iron break and crumble in pieces, like sealing-wax and pie-crust. Many instances of such accidents are on record, but I never witnessed one.

To prevent these frightful rencontres, care is always taken to hoist out the boats in good time, if need be, to tow the ships apart, or, what is generally sufficient, to tow the ships' heads in opposite directions. I scarcely know why this should have the effect, but certainly it appears that, be the calm ever so complete, or dead, as the term is, a vessel generally forges ahead, or steals along imperceptibly in the direction she is looking to; possibly from the conformation of the hull.

Shortly after the Trade-wind left us, a cloud rose in the south, which soon filled the whole air, and discharged upon us the most furious shower I ever beheld, (except, perhaps, once at San Blas in Mexico,) and such as I can compare to nothing but that flung on the traveller's head who ventures behind the sheet of water at Niagara. As few people try this experiment, I am afraid the comparison will go but little way to help the imagination in conceiving the violence of a tropical shower. I must mention, however, one very essential difference between the two cases. In the space between the rock and the cataract of Niagara, the deluge of water is accompanied by such violent gusts of wind, that the inexperienced person who ventures into this strangest but grandest of all caverns is in constant terror of being whisked off his legs, and thrown headlong into the horrid, boiling, roaring pool below. In the tropical showers above alluded to, the rain generally falls down in perpendicular lines of drops, or spouts, without a breath of wind, unaccompanied by thunder or any other noise, and in one great gush or splash, as if some prodigious reservoir had been upset over the fleet from the edge of the cloud.

Our noble commander, delighted with the opportunity of replenishing his stock of water, called out, "Put shot on each side, and slack all the stops down, so that the awnings may slope inwards. Get buckets and empty casks to hand instantly!"

In a few minutes the awnings were half full of water, and a hole connected with a hose having been prepared beforehand near the lowest point, where the canvass was weighed down by the shot, a stream poured down as if a cock had been turned. Not a drop of this was lost; but being carried off, it was poured into a starting-tub at the hatchway, and so conveyed by a pipe to the casks in the hold. By the time the squall was over we had filled six or eight butts; and although not good to drink, from being contaminated by the tar from the ropes and sails, the water answered admirably for washing, which was our object in catching it.

Ever since the days of Captain Cook, (the father of our present domestic economy on board ship,) it has been the practice to allow the crew two washing-days per week, on the details of which proceeding, and some other points of discipline, first introduced by that great voyager, I shall have occasion to touch at another time. At present I merely wish to give a hint to those who have never tried the experiment, that there is a prodigious difference between a shirt scrubbed in salt water, and one which has been washed in fresh. We all know the misery of putting on wet clothes, or sleeping in damp sheets. Now, a shirt washed in salt water is really a great deal worse than either; because, in the cases alluded to, one may apply to the fire or the sun, and remedy the evil at the cost of a little time and trouble; but in the wretched predicament of putting on salt-water-washed linen, no such process avails anything. You first dry your unhappy shirt, by exposing it to the sun or the fire till it seems as free from moisture as any bone; you then put it on, in hopes of enjoying the benefit of clean linen. Alas, not a whit of enjoyment follows! For if the air be in a humid state, or you are exposed to exercise, the treacherous salt, which, when crystallised, has hidden itself in the fibres of the cloth, speedily deliquesces or melts, and you have all the tortures of being once more wrapped in moist drapery. In your agony, you pull it off, run to the galley-range, and toast it over again; or you hang it up in the fiery heat of the southern sun, and when not a particle of wet seems to remain, you draw it on a second time, fancying your job at last complete. But, miserable man, you are as ill off as ever; for the insidious enemy has merely retired out of sight, but still lurks so close, that no art we yet know of will expel him, save and except that of a good sound rinsing in fresh water.

Seeing, then, that there can hardly be any discomfort greater than what has been just described, I need scarcely add that there are few greater favours of the minor kind which a considerate captain may bestow on his crew, than giving them, whenever he possibly can, at least as much fresh water as will serve to carry off the abominable salt from their clothes, after they have first been well scoured in the water of the ocean. Even this small allowance is a great comfort on those occasions, when a sufficient quantity cannot be allowed for performing the whole operation of washing from first to last. By a judicious management of the ship's regular stock, and, above all, by losing no opportunity of catching rain water, either during these tropical showers, or upon ordinary occasions of wet weather, an officer of any activity, who really possesses a good feeling towards his people, need seldom be without the means of giving to each man of his crew a gallon twice a week during the longest voyage.

It was from an old and excellent officer I first learned that by proper and constant care this indulgence might almost always be granted. It is not easy, I freely admit, at all times, and in all climates, to keep a supply of washing water on board; and under most circumstances, it certainly requires more personal exertion than those persons are aware of, who have not given it their attention. But I feel persuaded that there does not exist an officer in the navy who would not cheerfully take even a great deal more trouble, if once made fully sensible of the unspeakable comfort which this very reasonable indulgence affords to the men under his care. To those who hold the doctrine that sailors are by their nature ungrateful, and that it is useless to grant them advantages which are not absolutely necessary, these recommendations will appear trivial and absurd. But, I trust, the prevalence of such unworthy sentiments in the navy is becoming less and less every day. Officers are now generally pretty well aware, that the alleged ingratitude of their men belongs fully more to unreasonable expectations on their own part, than to any want of feeling on that of their crew. A captain ought to do what is right and kind, simply because it is right and kind; and his conduct in this respect should not be influenced by the manner in which it is received; at all events, he may be certain, that if his favours be not well received, the fault lies in his manner of giving them. Sailors have the most acute penetration possible on these occasions, and if the captain be influenced by any petty motives of selfishness, or be prompted by any trashy desire to gain a flimsy popularity—in short, if his conduct be regulated by any wish except that of doing his duty uniformly and kindly, the Johnnies will see through it all, and either laugh at him or hate him, or both.

The art of granting a favour gracefully and usefully is one of far greater difficulty than is generally supposed; and as the command of a man-of-war is a grand school for its study, most truly happy shall I be if what I have said here or elsewhere shall induce a single brother-officer to turn his attention more earnestly than before to the domestic comforts of his people, one of the most delightful, and certainly one of the most useful branches of the arduous duties of a commander.

CHAPTER XXIV.

AQUATIC SPORTS.

One day, after we had lost the north-east Trade-wind, and when the fleet of China ships, with their companions, the two ships of war, were drifting about in the calm, more like logs of wood than any thing else, a furious squall, unperceived till it reached us, swept through the fleet. These violent tornadoes are generally called white squalls, from being unattended by those black heavy rain clouds which usually accompany such transient blasts.

On the occasion of ordinary squalls, even with the advantage of the warning given by rising clouds, we find it not always easy to escape their force unhurt. If the wind be fair, we feel a natural reluctance to shorten sail, so as to lose any portion of the good which fortune is sending us; or, at all events, we do not wish to commence shortening sail till the squall is so near that there is an absolute necessity for doing so. It will, therefore, often happen that inexperienced officers are deceived by the unexpected velocity with which the gust comes down upon them. And even the oldest sailors, if navigating in regions with which they have not become actually acquainted, are apt to miscalculate the time likely to elapse before the wind can touch them. In these cases, unless the men are very active, the sails are generally torn, and sometimes a mast or a yard is carried away. It is, besides, so often doubted whether there is to be any wind in the squall, or it is to prove merely a plump of rain, that there seem few points of distinction more remarkable between the seamanship of an old and a young officer than their power of judging of this matter. To a man quite inexperienced, a squall may look in the highest degree threatening; he will order the topgallant clew-lines to be manned, place hands by the topsail banlyards, and lay along the main clew-garnets. His more experienced captain, however, being apprised of the squall's approach, steps on deck, takes a hasty look to windward, and says to his young friend, the officer of the watch, "Never mind, there's nothing in it, it's only rain; keep the sails on her."

And although the older authority, nine times in ten, proves correct in his judgment, he might find it difficult, or even impossible, to tell exactly upon what his confidence rested. Sailors boast, indeed, of having an infallible test by which the point in question may be ascertained, their secret being clothed in the following rhymes, so to call them:

"If the rain's before the wind,
'Tis time to take the topsails in;
If the wind's before the rain,
Hoist your topsails up again."

By which we are taught to understand, that when the rain of a squall reaches the ship before the breeze which it contains, there will be danger in carrying on, and vice versa. Some rule of this kind, adapted to the meridian of London, might perhaps save our good citizens many a sound ducking in Hyde Park of a Sunday afternoon; for I observe the crowd never take the slightest precaution till the squall is right upon them, and then it is too late.

• The practical knowledge alluded to, however, which is sometimes called professional tact, comes not by rhymes, but by experience alone; and something akin to this, I presume, may be discovered in every calling. A painter, for example, might be utterly at a loss to communicate to a brother-artist the rules by which he has produced those effects, that he himself has flung, as it were, on the canvass, with a kind of intuitive confidence, scarcely conscious of effort. Many long and hard years of study, and myriads of forgotten trials, however, must have been gone through to give this enviable facility. So it is with seamanship, where it is so frequently indispensable to act with promptitude one way or the other.

No experience, however, can altogether guard against these sudden gusts or white squalls, since they make no show, except, sometimes, by a rippling of the water along which they are sweeping. On the occasion above alluded to, there was not even this faint warning. The first ships of the convoy, touched by the blast, were laid over almost on their beam ends, but in the next instant righted again, on the whole of their sails being blown clean out of the bolt-ropes. The Theban frigate and the Volage, then lying nearly in the centre of the fleet, were the only ships which saved an inch of canvass. This was owing chiefly to our having so many more hands on board, compared to the Indiamen, but partly to our having caught sight of the ruin brought on the vessels near us, just in time to let fly the sheets and halyards and get the yards down. But even then, with the utmost exertion of every man and boy on board, we barely succeeded in clewing all up, and preventing the sails from being blown to shreds.

When this hurricane of a moment had passed over us, and we had time to look round, not a rag was to be seen in the whole fleet; while the Wexford, a ship near us, had lost her three top-gallant masts and jib-boom, and what was a far more serious misfortune, her fore-top-mast was dangling over the bows. Part of the fore-top-sail was wrapped like a shawl round the lee cat-head, while the rest hung down in festoons from the collar of the fore-stay to the spritsail yard-arm. A stout party of seamen from each of the men-of-war were sent to assist in clearing the wreck, and getting up fresh spars. A light fair wind having succeeded to the calm in which we had been lolling about for many days before this squall came on, we took our wounded bird in tow, and made all sail once more towards the equinox, as old Robinson Crusoe calls the equator. By this time also, the Chinamen had bent a new gang of sails, and were fast resuming their old stations in the appointed order of bearing, which it was our policy to keep up strictly, together with as many other of the formalities of a fleet of line-of-battle ships on a cruise as we could possibly maintain.

While we were thus stealing along pleasantly enough under the genial influence of this newly-found air, which as yet was confined to the upper sails, and every one was looking open-mouthed to the eastward to catch a gulp of cool air, or was congratulating his neighbour on getting rid of the tiresome calm in which we had been so long half-roasted, half suffocated, about a dozen flying fish rose out of the water, just under the fore-chains, and skimmed away to windward at the height of ten or twelve feet above the surface. I have already mentioned, that the longest flight of these singular fish is about an eighth of an English mile, or two hundred yards, which they perform in somewhat more than half a minute. These flights vary from the extreme length mentioned above to a mere skip out of the water. Generally speaking, they fly to a considerable distance in a straight line in the wind's eye, and then gradually turn off to leeward. But sometimes the flying fish merely skims the surface, so as to touch the tops of the successive waves, without rising and falling to follow the undulations of the sea. There is a prevalent idea afloat, but I know not how just it may be, that they can fly no longer than their wings or fins remain wet. That they rise as high as twenty feet out of the water is certain, from their being sometimes found in the channels of a line-of-battle ship; and they frequently fly into a seventy-four-gun-ship's main deck ports. On a frigate's fore-castle and gangways, also, elevations which may be taken at eighteen or twenty feet, or more, they are often found. I remember seeing one, about nine inches in length, and weighing not less, I should suppose, than half a pound, skim into the Volage's main-deck port just abreast of the gangway. One of the main-topmen was coming up the quarter-deck ladder at the moment, when the flying fish, entering the port struck the astonished mariner on the temple, knocked him off the step, and very nearly laid him sprawling.

I was once in a prize, a low Spanish schooner, not above two feet and a half out of the water, when we used to pick up flying fish enough about the decks in the morning to give us a capital breakfast. They are not unlike whittings to the taste, though rather firmer, and very dry. They form, I am told, a considerable article of food for the negroes in the harbours in the West Indies. The method of catching them at night is thus described:—In the middle of the canoe a light is placed on the top of a pole, towards which object it is believed these fish always dart, while on both sides of the canoe a net is spread to a considerable distance, supported by outriggers above the surface of the water; the fish dash at the light, pass it, and fall into the net on the other side.

Shortly after observing the cluster of flying fish rise out of the water, we discovered two or three dolphins ranging past the ship, in all their beauty, and watched with some anxiety to see one of those aquatic chases of which our friends the Indiamen had been telling us such wonderful stories. We had not long to wait, for the ship, in her progress through the water, soon put up another shoal of these little things, which, as the others had done, took their flight directly to windward. A large dolphin, which had been keeping company with us abreast of the weather gangway at the depth of two or three fathoms, and, as usual, glistening most beautifully in the sun, no sooner detected our poor dear little friends take wing, than he turned his head towards them, and, darting to the surface, leaped from the water with a velocity little short, as it seemed, of a cannon ball. But although the impetus with which he shot himself into the air gave him an initial velocity greatly exceeding that of the flying fish, the start which his fated prey had got enabled them to keep ahead of him for a considerable time.

The length of the dolphin's first spring could not be less than ten yards; and after he fell we could see him gliding like lightning through the water for a moment, when he again rose and shot forward with considerably greater velocity than at first, and, of course, to a still greater distance. In this manner the moricless pursuer seemed to stride along the sea with fearful rapidity, while his brilliant coat sparkled and flashed in the sun quite splendidly. As he fell headlong on the water at the end of each huge leap, a series of circles were sent far over the still surface, which lay as smooth as a mirror; for the breeze, although enough to set the royals and top-gallant studding sails asleep, was hardly as yet felt below.

The group of wretched flying fish, thus hotly pursued, at length dropped into the sea; but we were rejoiced to observe that they merely touched the top of the swell, and scarcely sunk in it, at least they instantly set off again in a fresh and even more vigorous flight. It was particularly interesting to observe that the direction they now took was quite different from the one in which they had set out, implying but too obviously that they had detected their fierce enemy, who was following them with giant steps along the waves, and now gaining rapidly upon them. His terrific pace, indeed, was two or three times as swift as theirs—poor little things!

The greedy dolphin, however, was fully as quick-sighted as the flying fish which were trying to elude him; for whenever they varied their flight in the smallest degree, he lost not the tenth part of a second in shaping a new course, so as to cut off the chase, while they, in a manner really not unlike that of the hare, doubled more than once upon their pursuer. But it was soon too plainly to be seen that the strength and confidence of the flying fish were fast ebbing. Their flights became shorter and shorter, and their course more fluttering and uncertain, while the enormous leaps of the dolphin appeared to grow only more vigorous at each bound. Eventually, indeed, we could see, or fancied we could see, that this skillful sea-sportsman arranged all his springs with such an assurance of success, that he contrived to fall, at the end of each, just under the very spot on which the exhausted flying fish were about to drop! Sometimes this catastrophe took place at too great a distance for us to see from the deck exactly what happened; but on our mounting high into the rigging, we may be said to have been in at the death; for then we could discover that the unfortunate little creatures, one after another, either popped right into the dolphin's jaws as they lighted on the water, or were snapped up instantly afterwards.

It was impossible not to take an active part with our pretty little friends of the weaker side, and accordingly we very speedily had our revenge. The middies and the sailors, delighted with the chance, rigged out a dozen or twenty lines from the jib-boom-end and spritail yard-arms, with hooks baited merely with bits of tin, the glitter of which resembles so much that of the body and wings of the flying fish, that many a proud dolphin, making sure of a delicious morsel, leaped in rapture at the deceitful prize.

It may be well to mention, that the dolphin of sailors is not the fish so called by the ancient poets. Ours, which, I learn from the Encyclopædia, is the Coryphæna hippurus of naturalists, is totally different from their Delphinus phocæna, termed by us the porpoise. How these names have shifted places I know not, but there seems little doubt that the ancient delphin of the poets, I mean that on the back of which Daedalus took a passage when he was tossed overboard, is neither more nor less than our porpoise.* For the rest, he is a very poetical and pleasing fish to look at, affords excellent sport in catching, and, when properly dressed, is really not bad eating.

It happened in a ship I commanded that a porpoise was struck about half an hour before the cabin dinner; and I gave directions, as a matter of course, to my steward to dress a dish of steaks, cut well clear of the thick coating of blubber. It so chanced that none of the crew had ever before seen a fish of this kind cooked, and in consequence there arose doubts amongst them whether or not it was good or even safe eating. The word, however, being soon passed along the decks, that orders had been given for some slices of the porpoise to be cooked for the captain's table, a deputation from forward was appointed to proceed as near to the cabin door as the etiquette of the service allowed, in order to establish the important fact of the porpoise being eatable. The dish was carried in, its contents speedily discussed, and a fresh supply having been sent for, the steward was, of course, intercepted in his way to the cook. "I say, Capewell," cried one of the hungry delegates, "did the captain really eat any of the porpoise?"

"Eat it!" exclaimed the steward, look at that!" at the same time lifting off the cover, and showing a dish so well cleared as if it had previously been freighted with veal cutlets, and was now on its return from the midshipmen's birth.

"Ho! ho!" sung out Jack, running back to the fore-castle; "if the skipper eats porpoise, I don't see why we should be nice; so here goes!" Then pulling away the great clasp-knife which always hangs by a cord round the neck of a seaman, he plunged it into the sides of the fish, and, after separating the outside rind of blubber, detached half a dozen pounds of the red meat, which, in texture and taste, and in the heat of its blood, resembles beef, though very coarse. His example was so speedily followed by the rest of the ship's company, that when I walked forward, after dinner, in company with the doctor, to take the post mortem view of the porpoise more critically than before, we found the whole had been broiled and eaten within half an hour after I had unconsciously given, by my example, an official sanction to the feast.

Porpoises almost invariably go in shoals, and sometimes in such vast numbers as to partially cover the whole visible extent of the sea. They appear to delight exceedingly in playing round a ship when one falls in their way; for they will ever deviate from their own course, and accompany hers for some time; and such is their speed, that however fast a vessel may be sailing, they can shoot ahead, dart athwart hause, and even go repeatedly round her, though her rate be ten knots an hour, and all apparently with the utmost ease. Their gambols on these occasions are sometimes very amusing. I have often seen them leap high out of the water, and, while in the air, twirl themselves completely round. I am not quite sure that I have not seen them make what is called a somerset in the air, by turning tail over head. Their form appears very graceful when seen in the water; and I remember, when a midshipman in the old Leander, on my first voyage, (in 1802,) being persuaded by one of the lieutenants that these porpoises were salmon—sea salmon, as he called them.

* Ovid. Fasti, lib. ii. 117. Encyclopædia Britan. vol. v. p. 339.

The porpoises appear to have some very rapid method of communication amongst themselves; for they not only proceed in myriads in one straight course, but often amuse themselves by leaping in considerable numbers out of the water, with such perfect identity of time in all their movements, that on hearing them fall we might fancy them but one fish. For hours at a time I have leaned over the gangway railing, when the ship has been going at the rate of ten or eleven miles, merely to watch them gliding alongside of us in pairs, leaping simultaneously out of the water. At night this companionship is always particularly striking; but most so when the sea, either from some inherent phosphorescent property, or from the presence of animalcule, possesses the quality of giving out light upon being agitated. On such occasions, when the foam dashed off from the ship's bows resembles molten silver, and the train in her wake stretches far astern along the sea, like the tail of a comet across the sky, the track of the porpoise is likewise marked in the most beautiful style that can well be imagined. Besides trailing behind this long unbroken line of fire, each fish is surrounded by a sort of halo, or glow of bright bluish sparks, and the form of its head and body can then be distinctly seen, or even the slightest movement of the tail discovered fully better than in daylight. The lustre of this mysterious illumination is at times so great, that one may read off the seconds-hand of a watch by its help alone. Indeed, the light caused by the foam of the lee-side of a ship, when much pressed with sail, and the agitation of the water becomes considerable, often casts a distinct glow on the bulge, or belly of the courses, and reaching as far up as the foot of the topsails, may almost be detected on the foot topgallant-sails in a very dark night.

There is a popular belief amongst seamen, that the wind may be expected from the quarter to which a shoal of porpoises are observed to steer; but I suspect their capacity as meteorologists is about on a par with that of geese, the value of whose flights is held by many worthy and venerable matrons to be pretty nearly as well established as the fact of hogs actually seeing the wind. So far, however, from our respecting the speculations of these submarine philosophers, every art is used to drag them out of their native element, and to pass them through the fire to the insatiable Molochs of the lower-decks and cockpits of his majesty's ships, a race amongst whom the constant supply of the best provisions appears to produce only an increase of appetite.

One harpoon, at least, is always kept in readiness for action in the fore part of the ship. The sharpest and strongest of these deadly weapons is generally stopped, or fastened, to the fore-tack bumpkin, a spar some ten or twelve feet long, projecting from the bows of a ship on each side like the horns of a snail, to which the tack or lower corner of the foresail is drawn down when the ship is on a wind. This spar, which affords good footing, not being raised many feet above the water, while it is clear of the bow, and very nearly over the spot where the porpoises glide past, when shooting across the ship's fore-foot, is eagerly occupied by the most active and expert harpooner on board, as soon as the report has been spread that a shoal, or, as the sailors call it, a "school" of porpoises are round the ship. There is another favourite station which is speedily filled on these occasions, I mean alongside of the slight-looking, but strong, and not ungraceful apparatus projecting perpendicularly downwards from the end of the bowsprit. This spar is not inaptly called the dolphin-striker, from its appearing to dash into the waves as the ship pitches; perhaps, it may have acquired its name from its being so capital a position from which to strike that fish. The lower end of the spar is connected with the outer end of the jib-boom by means of a stout rope, which, after passing through its extremity, extends to the ship; and it is upon this guy that the fortunate person who wields the harpoon fixes himself. Any picture of a ship will make this description intelligible; but it may assist the imagination to mention, that the purpose of this rope is to keep the end of the jib-boom from springing up, precisely as a martingal holds down the head of a horse; which analogy, no doubt, has led sailors to give the name of martingal-stay to the guy in question.

The harpoon, is a triangular, or rather a heart-shaped, barbed weapon, somewhat larger than a man's hand, and in the centre about as thick as his knuckles. Its point and edges are made of iron so soft that they can easily be brought to a rough edge by means of a file. Until I read Captain Scoresby's most interesting account of the Arctic Regions, I always fancied that the point of the whale-harpoon, which is exactly the same as that used by us to take the porpoise, was made of steel; but he explains that it is left purposely soft, that it may be sharpened, even by scraping it with a knife. This javelin-head, or, as it is technically called by whalers, the "mouth," is connected by a slender arm or shank, terminating in a socket. The barbed head, or mouth, is eight inches long, and six broad; the shank, with its socket, two feet and a half long. The shank is not quite half an inch in diameter; and as this part is liable to be forcibly and suddenly extended, twisted, and bent, it requires to be made of the toughest and most pliable iron.

"That kind," says Scoresby, "which is of the most approved tenacity is made of old horse-shoe nails, or stubs, which are formed into small rods, and two or three of these welded together; so that should a flaw happen to occur in any one of the rods, the strength of the whole might still be depended on. Some manufacturers enclose a quantity of stub-iron in a cylinder of best foreign iron, and form the shank of the harpoon out of a single rod. A test sometimes used for trying the sufficiency of a harpoon, is to wind its shank round a bolt of inch iron, in the form of a close spiral, then to unwind it again, and put it into a straight form. If it bears this without injury in the cold state, it is considered as excellent. The breaking of a harpoon is of no less importance than the value of a whale, which is sometimes estimated at 1000*l.* sterling. This consideration has induced many ingenious persons to turn their attention towards improving the construction and security of this instrument; but, though various alterations have been suggested, such as forming the shank of plies of wire, and adding one or two lateral barbs, they have all given place to the simplicity of the ancient harpoon."—Scoresby's Arctic Regions, vol. ii. p. 225.

Having described the harpoon, we may resume our fishing operations, which possess a remarkable degree of interest when the shoal of porpoises is numerous. Half the ship's company are generally clustered about the bowsprit, the head, and any other spot commanding a good view of the sport. When a mid, I have often perched myself like a sea-bird at the fore-yard-arm, or nestled into the fore-topmast staysail netting, till I saw the harpoon cast with effect by some older and stronger arm. A piece of small but stout line, called, I think, the foreganger, is spliced securely to the shank of the harpoon. To the end of this line is attached any small rope that lies handiest on the fore-castle, probably the top-gallant clewline, or the jib down-haul. The rope, before being made fast to the foreganger, is drove through a block attached to some part of the bowsprit, or to the foremost swifter of the fore-rigging; and a gang of hands are always ready to take hold of the end, and run the fish right out of the water when pierced by the iron.

The harpooner, it will be understood, has nothing to attend to but the mere act of striking his object; and there are few exploits in which the dexterity of one person is more conspicuous over that of another, than in delivering the harpoon. I have heard Captain Scoresby say, that when a whale is struck, it is an object of importance to drive the weapon socket-deep into the blubber, or outer rind, of the floating monster; but in the case of the porpoise, the true point of skill appears to lie in the aim alone; for the mere weight of the instrument, with its loaded staff, is sufficient to lodge the barbs in the body of the fish, and in many cases to carry it right through to the other side.

The strength of the porpoise must be very great, for I have seen him twist a whale harpoon several times round, and eventually tear himself off by main force. On this account it is of consequence to get the floundering gentleman on board with the least possible delay after the fish is struck. Accordingly, the harpooner, the instant he has made a good hit, bawls out, "Haul away! haul away!" upon which the men stationed at the line run away with it, and the struggling wretch is raised high into the air, as if still in the act of performing one of his own gambols. Two or three of the smartest hands have in the mean time prepared what is called a running bowline knot, or noose, the nature of which may be readily described by saying that although it slips up, or renders, very easily, it is perfectly secure, without being subject to jamming, as that embarrassing entanglement is called when a knot or bend becomes inextricably fixed. This running bowline, of which several are always made ready beforehand, is placed by hand round the body of the porpoise, or it may be cast, like the South American lasso, over its tail, and then, but not till then, can the captive be considered quite secure. I have seen many a gallant prize of this kind fairly transfixed with the harpoon, and rattled like a shot up to the block, where it was hailed by the shouts of the victors as the source of a certain feast, and yet lost after all, either by the line breaking, or the dart coming out during the vehement struggles of the fish.

I remember once seeing a porpoise accidentally struck by a minor description of fish-spear, called a grains, a weapon quite inadequate for such a service. The cord by which it was held being much too weak, soon broke, and off dashed the wounded fish, right in the wind's eye, at a prodigious rate, with the staff erected on its back, like a signal post. The poor wretch was instantly accompanied, or pursued, by myriads of his own species, whose instinct, it is said, teaches them to follow any track of blood, and even to devour their unfortunate fellow fish. I rather doubt the fact of their cannibalism, but am certain that whenever a porpoise is struck and escapes, he is followed by all the others, and the ship is deserted by the shoal in a few seconds. In the instance just mentioned, the grains with which the porpoise was struck had been got ready for spearing a dolphin; but the man in whose hands it happened to be, not being an experienced harpooner, could not resist the opportunity of darting his weapon into the first fish that offered a fair mark.

The dolphin, the bonito, and the albacore, are sometimes caught with the grains, but generally by means of lines baited either with bits of tin, or with pieces of the flying-fish, when any are to be had. In fine weather, especially between the tropics, when the whole surface of the sea is often covered with them, a dozen lines are hung from the jib-boom end and spirit-sail yard, all so arranged, that when the ship sends forward, the hook, with its glittering bait, barely touches the water, but rises from it when the ship is raised up by the swell. The grains spoken of above resembles nothing so much that I know of as the trident which painters thrust into the hands of Daddy Neptune, when it pleases them to represent the god of the sea, sitting all ready for a swim (sans culottes, as he ought to be,) in his dolphin-drawn cab. If my nautical recollections, however, serve me correctly, this spear has five prongs, not three, and sometimes there are two sets, placed in lines at right angles to one another. The upper end of the staff being loaded with lead, it falls down and turns over the fish, which is then drawn on board on the top of the grains, as a potatoe or a herring might be presented on the point of a fork.

The dolphin is eaten and generally relished by every one, though certainly a plaguy dry fish. It is often cut into slices and fried like salmon, or boiled and soured in vinegar, to be eaten cold. The bonito is a coarser fish, and becomes not very bad eating only by the copious use of port wine. Any thing, say the cooks, may be made palatable by rich sauces; a maxim we tried hard to illustrate in the midshipman's berth with such slender means as we possessed; and many a time have I feasted on what was but too correctly called mock-turtle soup, designated, in the choice dialect of the cockpit, Pig's-head negus.

On the 24th of May, the day before crossing the equator, I saw the grandest display of all these different kinds of fish which it has ever been my fortune to meet with. In my journal written on that day, I find some things related, of which I have scarcely any recollection, and certainly have never again witnessed in the twenty years which have elapsed since. A bonito, it appears, darted out of the water after a flying-fish, open mouthed, and so true was the direction of his leap, that he actually closed with the chase in the air, and sought to snap it up; but owing to some error in his calculation, the top of his head striking the object of pursuit, sent it spinning off in a direction quite different from that which his own momentum obliged him to follow. A number of those huge birds, the albatrosses, were soaring over the face of the waters, and the flying fish, when rising into the air to avoid their natural enemies the dolphin and bonito, were frequently caught by these poaching birds; to the very reasonable disappointment of the sporting fish below, on whose manner they were trespassing. These intruders proceeded not altogether with impunity, however, for we hooked several of them, who, confident in their own sagacity and strength of wing, swooped eagerly at the baited hooks towed far astern of the ship, and were thus drawn on board, screaming and flapping their wings in a very ridiculous plight. To render this curious circle of mutual destruction quite complete, though it may diminish our sympathy for the persecuted flying-fish, I ought to mention, that on the same day one dropped on board in the middle of its flight, and in its throat another small fish was found half swallowed, but still alive!

All this may be considered, more or less, as mere sport, serving to relieve the tedium of a long calm, or contributing, in a small degree, to the scanty luxuries of the table or a protracted voyage. But in the capture of the shark, a less amiable, or, I may say, a more ferocious spirit is sure to prevail. There would seem, indeed, to be a sort of perpetual and hereditary war waged between sailors and sharks, like that said to exist between the Esquimaux and the Indians of North America, where, as each of the belligerents is under the full belief that every death, whether natural or violent, is caused by the machinations of the other side, there is no hope of peace between them, as long as the high conflicting parties shall be subject to the laws of mortality.

In like manner, I fear, that in all future times, as in all times past, when poor Jack falls overboard in Madras roads, or in Port Royal harbour, he will be liable to be crunched between the shark's quadruple or quintuple rows of serrated teeth, with as merciless a spirit of enjoyment as Jack repays the compliment withal, when, in his turn, he catches his enemy on his decks. Certainly, I have never seen the savage part of our nature peep out more clearly than upon these occasions, when a whole ship's company, captain, officers, and young gentlemen inclusive, shout in triumphant exultation over the body of a captive shark, floundering in impotent rage on the poop or fore-castle. The capture always affords high and peculiar sport, for it is one in which every person on board sympathises, and, to a certain extent, takes a share. Like a fox-chase, it is ever new, and draws within its vortex every description of person. The lunarian, busy taking distances, crams his sextant hastily into its case; the computer, working out his longitude, shoves his books on one side; the marine officer abandons his eternal flute; the doctor starts from his nap; the purser resigns the Complete Book; and every man and boy, however engaged, rushes on deck to see the villain die. Even the monkey, if there be one on board, takes a vehement interest in the whole progress of this wild scene. I remember once observing Jacko running backwards and forwards along the after part of the poop hammock-netting, grinning, screaming, and chattering at such a rate, that, as it was nearly calm, he was heard all over the decks.

"What's the matter with you, Master Mona?" said the quarter-master; for the animal came from Teneriffe, and preserved his Spanish cognomen. Jacko replied not, but merely stretching his head over the railing, stared with his eyes almost bursting from his head, and by the intensity of his grin bared his teeth and gums nearly from ear to ear.

The sharp curved dorsal fin of a huge shark was now seen, rising about six inches above the water, and cutting the glazed surface of the sea by as fine a line as if a sickle had been drawn along.

"Messenger! run to the cook for a piece of pork," cried the captain, taking command with as much gloom as if it had been an enemy's cruiser he was about to engage.

"Where's your hook, quarter-master?"

"Here, sir, here!" cried the fellow, feeling the point, and declaring it as sharp as any lady's needle, and in the next instant piercing with it a huge junk of rusty pork, weighing four or five pounds; for nothing, scarcely, is too large or too high in favour for the stomach of a shark.

The hook, which is as thick as one's little finger, has a curvature about as large as that of a man's hand when half closed, and is from six to eight inches in length, with a formidable barb. This fierce looking grappling-iron is furnished with three or four feet of chain, a precaution which is absolutely necessary; for a voracious shark will sometimes gobble the bait so deep into his stomach, that but for the chain he would snap through the rope by which the hook is held, as easily as if he were nipping the head off an asparagus.

A good strong line, generally the end of the mizen-top-sail-hauler, being made fast to the chain, the bait is cast into the ship's wake; for it is very seldom so dead calm that a vessel has not some small motion through the water. I think I have remarked, that at sea the sharks are most apt to make their appearance when the ship is going along at a rate of somewhat less than a mile an hour, a speed which barely brings her under command of the rudder, or gives her, what is technically called, steerage-way.

A shark, like a midshipman, is generally very hungry; but in the rare cases, when he is not in good appetite, he sails slowly up to the bait, smells to it, and gives it a poke with his shovel-nose, turning it over and over. He then edges off to the right or left, as if he apprehended mischief, but soon returns again, to enjoy the delicious haut goût, as the sailors term the flavour of the damaged pork, of which a piece is always selected, if it can be found.

While this coquetry, or shyness, is exhibited by John Shark, the whole afterpart of the ship is so clustered with heads, that not an inch of spare room is to be had for love or money. The rigging, the mizen-top, and even the gaff, out to the very peak; the hammock-nettings and the quarters, almost down to the counter, are stuck over with breathless spectators, speaking in whispers, if they venture to speak at all, or can find leisure for any thing but fixing their gaze on the monster, who as yet is free to roam the ocean, but who, they trust, will soon be in their power. I have seen this go on for an hour together; after which the shark has made up his mind to have nothing to say to us, and either swerved away to windward, if there be any breeze at all, or dived so deep that his place could be detected only by a faint touch or flash of white many fathoms down. The loss of a Spanish galleon, in chase, I am persuaded, could hardly cause more bitter regret, or call forth more intemperate expressions of anger and impatience, than the failure of hooking a shark is always sure to produce on board a ship at sea.

On the other hand, I suppose the first symptom of an enemy's flag coming down in the fight was never hailed with greater joy than is felt by a ship's crew on the shark turning round to seize the bait. The preparatory symptoms of this intention are so well known to every one on board, that, the instant they begin to appear, a greedy whisper of delight passes from mouth to mouth among the assembled multitude; every eye is lighted up, and such as have not bronzed their cheeks by too long exposure to sun and wind to betray any change of colour, may be seen to alter their hue from pale to red, and back to pale again, like the tints on the sides of the dying dolphin.

It is supposed by seamen that the shark must of necessity turn on his back before he can bite any thing; and, generally speaking, he certainly does so turn himself before he takes the bait. But this arises from two circumstances; one of them accidental, and belonging to the particular occasion, the other arising out of the peculiar conformation and position of his mouth. When a bait is towed astern of a ship that has any motion through the water at all, it is necessarily brought to the surface, or nearly so. This, of course, obliges the shark to bite at it from below; and as his mouth is placed under his chin, not over it, like that of a Christian, he must turn nearly on his back before he can seize the floating piece of meat in which the hook is concealed. Even if he does not turn completely round, he is forced to slue himself, as it is called, so far as to show some portion of his white belly. The instant the white skin flashes on the sight of the expectant crew, a subdued cry, or murmur of satisfaction, is heard amongst the crowd; but no one speaks, for fear of alarming the shark.

Sometimes, at the very instant the bait is cast over the stern, the shark flies at it with such eagerness, that he actually springs partially out of the water. This, however, is rare. On these occasions he gorges the bait, the hook, and a foot or two of the chain, without any mastication or delay, and darts off with his treacherous prize, with such prodigious velocity and force, that it makes the rope crack again as soon as the whole coil is drawn out. In general, however, he goes more leisurely to work, and seems rather to suck in the bait than to bite at it. Much dexterity is required in the hand which holds the line at this moment; for a bungler is apt to be too precipitate, and to jerk away the hook before it has got far enough down the shark's maw. Our greedy friend, indeed, is never disposed to relinquish what may once have passed his formidable batteries of teeth; but the hook, by a premature tug of the line, may fix itself in a part of the jaw so weak, that it gives way in the violent struggle which always follows. The secret of the sport is, to let the voracious monster gulp down the huge mass of pork, and then to give the rope a violent pull, by which the barbed point, quitting the edge of the bait, buries itself in the coils of the victim's throat or stomach. As the shark is not a personage to submit patiently to such treatment, it will not be well for any one whose foot happens to be accidentally on the coil of the rope, for, when the hook is first fixed, it spins out like the log-line of a ship going twelve knots.

The suddenness of the jerk with which the poor devil is brought up, when he has reached the length of his tether, often turns him quite over on the surface of the water. Then commence the loud cheers, tams, and other sounds of rage and triumph, so long suppressed. A steady pull is insufficient to carry away the line, but it sometimes happens that the violent struggles of the shark, when too speedily drawn up, snaps either the rope or the hook, and so he gets off, to digest the remainder as he best can. It is, accordingly, held the best practice to play him a little, with his mouth at the surface, till he becomes somewhat exhausted. During this operation, one could almost fancy the enraged animal is conscious of the abuse which is flung down upon him; for, as he turns and twists and flings himself about, his eye glares upwards with a ferocity of purpose which makes the blood tingle in a swimmer's veins, as he thinks of the hour when it may be his turn to writhe under the tender mercies of his sworn foe!

No sailor, therefore, ought ever to think of hauling a shark on board merely by the rope fastened to the hook; for, however impotent his struggles may generally be in the water, they are rarely unattended with risk when the rogue is drawn half way up. To prevent the line breaking or the hook snapping, or the jaw being torn away, the device formerly described, of a running bow-line knot, is always adopted. This noose, being slipped down the rope and passed over the monster's head, is made to jam at the point of junction of the tail with the body. When this is once fixed, the first act of the piece is held to be complete, and the vanquished enemy is afterwards easily drawn over the taffrail and flung on the deck, to the unspeakable delight of all hands. But although the shark is out of his element, he has by no means lost his power of doing mischief; and I would advise no one to come within range of the tail, or thrust his toes too near the animal's mouth. The blow of a tolerably large-sized shark's tail might break a man's leg; and I have seen a three-inch hide tiller-rope bitten more than half through, full ten minutes after the wretch had been dragged about the quarter-deck, and had made all his victors keep at the most respectful distance. I remember hearing the late Dr. Wollaston, with his wonted ingenuity, suggest a method for measuring the strength of a shark's bite. If a smooth plate of lead, he thought, were thrust into the fish's mouth, the depth which his teeth should pierce the lead would furnish a sort of scale of the force exerted.

I need scarcely mention, that when a shark is floundering about, the quarter-deck becomes a scene of pretty considerable confusion; and if there be blood on the occasion, as there generally is, from all this rough usage, the stains are not to be got rid of without a week's scrubbing, and many a growl from the captain of the after-guard. For the time, however, all such considerations are superseded, that is to say, if the commander himself takes an interest in the sport, and he must be rather a spoony skipper that does not. If he be indifferent about the fate of the shark, it is speedily dragged forward to the fore-castle, amidst the kicks, thumps, and execrations of the conquerors, who very soon terminate his miserable career by stabbing him with their knives, boarding pikes, and tomahawks, like so many wild Indians.

The first operation is always to deprive him of his tail, which is seldom an easy matter, it not being at all safe to come too near; but some dexterous hand, familiar with the use of the broad-axe, watches for a quiet moment, and at a single blow severs it from the body. He is then closed with by another, who leaps across the prostrate foe, and with an adroit cut rips him open from snout to tail, and the tragedy is over, so far as the struggles and sufferings of the principal actor are concerned. There always follows, however, the most lively curiosity on the part of the sailors to learn what the shark has got stowed away in his inside; but they are often disappointed, for the stomach is generally empty. I remember one famous exception, indeed, when a very large fellow was caught on board the Alceste, in Anjeer Roads at Java, when we were proceeding to China, with the embassy under Lord Amherst. A number of decks and hens which had died in the night, were as usual thrown overboard in the morning, besides several baskets, and many other minor things, such as bundles of shavings and bits of cordage, all which things were found in the huge sea monster's inside. But what excited most surprise and admiration was the hide of a buffalo, killed on board that day for the ship's company's dinner. The old sailor who had cut open the shark stood with a foot on each side and drew out the articles one by one from the huge cavern into which they had been indiscriminately drawn. When the operator came at last to the buffalo's skin, he held it up before him like a curtain, and exclaimed, "There, my lads; d'ye see that! He has swallowed a buffalo, but he could not digest the hide!"

I have never been so unfortunate as to see a man bitten by a shark though in calm weather, it is usual to allow the people to swim about the ship. It would seem that they are disturbed by the splashing and other noises of so many persons, and keep at a distance; for although they are often observed swimming near the ship both before and after the men had been bathing, they very rarely come near the swimmers. I remember, once, indeed, at Bermuda, seeing a shark make a grab at a midshipman's heel, just as he was getting into the boat alongside. This youngster, who, with one or two others, had been swimming about for an hour, was the last of the party in the water. No shark had been seen during the whole morning; but just as he was drawing his foot into the boat, the fish darted from the bottom. Fortunately for my old messmate, there was no time for the shark to make the half turn of the body necessary to bring his mouth to bear; and thus my friend escaped, by half an inch, a fate which, besides its making one shudder to think of, would have deprived the service of an active young officer, now deservedly in the higher ranks of his profession.

CHAPTER XXV.

CROSSING THE LINE—A MAN OVERBOARD!

The strange and almost savage ceremonies used at sea on crossing the equator have been so often described, that a voyager, at this time of day, may be well excused for omitting in his narrative any minute account of such wild proceedings.

If the circumstances which a traveller falls in with abroad happen to be essentially curious in themselves, or if they be characteristic of any particular set of men or stage of manners, it does not seem to matter where the scenes are laid, nor how often they have been described. Perhaps it may even prove, that when things are possessed of much intrinsic interest, the very multiplicity of previous descriptions will rather help than stand in the way of subsequent accounts, provided these be written with a degree of skill worthy of the subject. If, indeed, such things, no matter how well known to us, can once more be brought home, as it is well called, to the feeling and understanding of the reader, by some of those graphic touches which are not the result of chance, but which true artists alone can command, and if the subject he has got hold of be good in itself, it will generally be all the better for the last writer that it should have been marred by previous daubers. We may even, I think, go further, and assert, that in the case supposed, it will be in favour of the writer who knows what he is about, that his topic should have been not only repeatedly but well treated by previous authors. Who can doubt, for instance, that the Diary of an Invalid owes its chief interest to the hackneyed nature of the topic? We are enchanted to recognise incidents and scenes the most familiar to our thoughts trimmed up for fresh inspection by a scholar and a gentleman, who to much knowledge of his subject, and of the world generally, superadds a rare felicity of expression, and the happy knack of giving new interest to all he touches, especially to those things with which we are already most familiarly acquainted.

On the same grounds, if a man of genius, minute and varied local information, and correct taste, were to write a book, and call it "London," it would assuredly outrun in freshness of interest, in the opinion even of the Londoners themselves, all other books of travels. Whatever talents, in short, an author may possess, their most touching and popular exercise will generally be found to lie in those departments with which his readers are most familiar. When Taglioni descends from her pirouettes, and dances the Minuet de la Cour or the Gavotte, or Paganini leaves off his miracles of sound, and plays some simple air which is well known to every one, we feel, not indeed the same astonishment as before, but ten times more real pleasure. Thus, too, such a novel as Pride and Prejudice probably derives its greatest charm from the characters and incidents being such as we are already well acquainted with, either from personal observation, or from a thousand previous descriptions.

Many writers, however, fall into the mistake of imagining that every thing will bear this degree of handling, and forget that, while the ductility of fine gold is almost infinite, every other metal has its limit. This analogy will hold in all the fine arts, and perhaps in none more than in the art of composition, whether in prose or verse. When will the poets exhaust the good old topics of love and beauty? or painters fail to discover, in mountain scenery, and in the sunsets of summer, varieties of tints, and lights, and shades far beyond all their power of colouring? On the other hand, has not the whole strength of one celebrated school of painting been unequal to impart true interest and what has been termed graceful pleasure to vulgar images? Has not even the mighty Childe Harold compelled us to withdraw much of our respect for his genius by seeking to describe what is essentially vicious and degrading?

It is on this account, I suspect (to go from great things to small), that no author, except perhaps one, whom I have ever had the fortune to meet with, has contrived to impart the smallest degree of genuine interest to those absurd scenes which take place on board ship when crossing the line. The whole affair, indeed, is preposterous in its conception; and, I must say, rather brutal in its execution. Notwithstanding all this, however, I have not only permitted it to go on in ships which I commanded, but have even encouraged it, and set it a-going when the men themselves were in doubt. Its evil is transient, if any evil there be; while it certainly affords Jack a topic for a month beforehand, and a fortnight afterwards; and if so ordered as to keep its monstrosities within the limits of strict discipline (which is easy enough), it may even be made to add to the authority of the officers, instead of weakening their influence.

I am hardly classic enough to compare these equatorial shaving matches, as they are called, with the Saturnalia of Rome; but I know that some crews are most improperly permitted by the captain, even in ships of war, to take great liberties with the officers. So far, indeed, had this grown into a custom, that I can perfectly well remember the time when such license was regarded almost as a right by the sailors. In many merchant vessels, and even in some regular East India ships, it is still, I believe, more or less so considered; but I should hope that in no ship of war having the smallest pretensions to good order, would any such doctrine be now maintained; or if asserted, as it sometimes is, by one party, would it not be instantly and peremptorily denied. There is perhaps, some advantage in making naval seamen feel that they are living under a very different regime from what they have been accustomed to in the merchant service; and if, in the wildest stages of these extravagant proceedings, when they are grating the skin from off one another's faces, sousing the unfortunate novices in tubs of dirty water, and kicking up the most Cherokee sort of antics, they can still be made to respect the authority even of the littlest boy on board who wears a uniform, they will certainly be less likely to depart from established usage at other seasons, when not so excited.

In a well-regulated ship, within one hour from the time when these scenes of riot are at their height, order is restored, the decks are washed and swabbed up, the wet things are hung on the clothes' lines between the masts to dry, and the men, dressed in clean trousers and duck frocks, are assembled at their guns for muster, as soberly and sedately as if nothing had happened to discompose the decorous propriety of the ship's discipline. The middies, in like manner, may safely be allowed to have their own share of this rough fun, provided they keep as clear of their immediate superiors as the ship's company keep clear of the young gentlemen. And I must do the population of the cockpit the justice to say, that when they fairly set about it, manure their gentlemanlike habits, aristocratical sprinklings, and the march of intellect to boot, they do contrive to come pretty near to the honest folks before the mast in the article of ingenious ferocity. The captain of course, and, generally speaking, all the officers, keep quite aloof, pocketing up their dignity with vast care, and ready, at a moment's warning, to repress any undue familiarity. As things proceed, however, one or two of the officers may possibly become so much interested in the skylarking scenes going forward, as to approach a little too near, and laugh a little too loud, consistently with the preservation of the dignity of which they were so uncommonly chary at first starting. It cannot be expected, and indeed is not required, that the chief actors in these wild gambols, stripped to the buff, and shying buckets of water at one another, should be confined within very narrow limits in their game. Accordingly, some mount the rigging to shower down their cascades, while others squirt the fire engine from unseen corners upon the head of the unsuspecting passenger. And if it so chances (I say chances) that any one of the "commissioned knobs" of the ship shall come in the way of these explosions, it is served out to him like a thunder-storm—"all accidentally," of course. Well; what is he to do? He feels that he has indiscreetly trusted himself too far; and even if he has not actually passed the prescribed line, still he was much too near it, and the offence is perhaps unintentional. At all events, it is of too trifling a nature; and, under the peculiar circumstances of the moment, to make a complaint to the captain would be ridiculous. Having, therefore, got his jacket well wet, and seeing the ready means of revenging himself in kind, he snatches up a bucket, and, forgetting his dignity, hurls the contents in the face of the mid who had given him a sousing but two seconds before! From that moment his commission goes for nothing, and he becomes, for the time being, one of the biggest Billy-boys amongst them. The captain, observing him in this mess, shrugs his shoulders, walks aft, muttering, "It's all your own fault, Mr. Hailtop! you've put yourself amongst these mad younkers; see how they'll handle you!"

Nothing, I confess, now looks to me more completely out of character with our well-starved discipline than a "staid lieutenant" romping about the booms, skulling up the rigging, blowing the grampus, and having it blown upon him by a parcel of rattle-pated reekers. But I remember well in the Volage being myself so gradually seduced by this animating spectacle of fun, that, before I knew where I was, I had crossed the rope laid on the deck as a boundary between order and disorder, and received a bucket of cold water in each ear, while the spout of a fire-engine, at the distance of two feet, was playing full in my eyes. On turning my head round to escape these cataracts, and to draw breath, a tar-brush was rammed half-way down my throat!

Far different was the scene, and very different, of course, my deportment, four or five years afterwards on the same spot, when, instead of being the junior lieutenant, I was the great gun of all, the mighty master-knob of the whole party—that is to say, the captain himself. I was then in command of the Lyra, a ten-gun sloop-of-war; and after the shaving operations were over, and all things put once more in order, I went on board the Alceste frigate to dine with my excellent friend and commanding officer, the late Sir Murray Maxwell. Lord Amherst, the ambassador to China, was on board, and in great glee with the sight of what had been enacted before him; for although, as I have always said, these scenes are not of a nature to bear agreeable description, they certainly are amusing enough to see—for once.

We soon sat down to dinner; and there was, of course, a great deal of amusement in telling the anecdotes of the day, and describing Father Neptune's strange aspect, and his still stranger looking family and attendants. I ventured to back one of my figures against all or any of theirs, if not for monstrosity, at least for interest of another kind. Our dripping Neptune in the Lyra was accompanied, as usual, by a huge sea monster, representing Amphitrite, being no other than one of the boatswain's mates dressed up with the main-hatchway tarpaulin for a cloak, the jolly-boat's mizen for a petticoat, while two half wet swabs furnished her lubberly head with ringlets. By her side sat a youth, her only son Triton, a morsel of submarine domestic history ascertained by reference previously made to Lempriere's Dictionary. This poor little fellow was a great pet amongst the crew of the brig, and was indeed suspected to be entitled by birth to a rank above his present station—so gentle and gentlemanlike he always appeared. Even on this occasion, when disfigured by paint, pitch, and tar, copiously daubed over his delicate person to render him fit company for his papa old Neptune, he still looked as if his ill-favoured parents had stolen him, and were trying in vain to disguise their roguery by rigging him up in their own gipsy apparel.

It was very nearly dark when I rowed back to the Lyra, which had been hanging for the last half hour on the frigate's weather quarter, at the distance of a cable's length, watching for my return. The wind was so light, and the brig so close, that no signal was made to heave to; indeed I had scarcely rowed under the Alceste's stern, on my way back, before it was necessary to call out, "In bow!" The rattle of the oar on the thwarts gave the earliest notice of my approach to the people on board the little vessel, and I could hear the first lieutenant exclaim in haste, "Attend the side! Where are the side's-men?"

Scarcely had these words been spoken, when I heard a splash in the water, followed by a faint cry of distress and despair. In the next instant the brig was hove about, and the stern boat lowered down, accompanied by all the hurried symptoms of a man having fallen overboard. I made the people in the boat tug at their oars towards the spot; but though we pulled over and over the ship's wake twenty times, the water was every where unruffled and unmarked by any speck. At length I rowed on board, turned the hands up to muster, to ascertain who was gone, and found all present but our poor little Triton! It appeared that the lad, who was one of the side's men, fatigued with the day's amusement, had stretched himself in the fore-part of the quarter-deck hammock-netting and gone to sleep. The sharp voice of the officer, on seeing the gig almost alongside, had roused the unhappy boy too suddenly; he quite forgot where he was, and, instead of jumping in-board, plunged into the sea never to rise again!

There are few accidents more frequent at sea than that of a man falling overboard; and yet, strange to say, whenever it happens, it takes every one as completely by surprise as if such a thing had never occurred before. What is still more unaccountable, and, I must say, altogether inexcusable, is the fact of such an incident invariably exciting a certain degree of confusion, even in well-regulated ships. If this evil be remediable, it is really very curious that such a reproach should be allowed to continue, in the midst of a system of discipline so exact as that of the navy, in which almost every other contingency is foreseen and carefully provided for; and it is highly reprehensible, to say the least of it, because it leads to the unnecessary loss of many lives. If the state of confusion, doubt, and alarm, which generally takes place, especially at night, when a man falls overboard, were the necessary consequence of the accident, we should merely lament as it an additional source of regret, and only consider a sea life still more dangerous than it is generally reckoned to be. In point of fact, however, there seems to be no technical and inevitable necessity whatever for the occurrence of this disorder; and if the remedy be quite within the reach of ordinary discipline, it can hardly be denied, I should conceive, that an officer who neglects to make such application of the means in his power, has the life of any man to answer for, who falls overboard and is drowned; that is to say, if his loss can be traced less to the accident itself than to the want of some previously established and systematic arrangement suited to the peculiarities of an occurrence of such frequency.

After all that has been said of the exact nature of a man-of-war's discipline, and the degree of foresight, preparation, and habits of resource, which enable officers to act promptly and vigorously in the midst of difficulties, it is truly wonderful to see men of experience so completely at a loss as the oldest officers sometimes are, when the cry is given that a man is overboard. I have beheld brave and skilful men, who could face, unmoved, any other sort of danger, stand quite agast on such occasions, and seem to lose all their faculties just at the moment of greatest need. But although it be difficult to explain this, it is quite easy to understand how the ship's company should be thrown into confusion at such moments, if their officers are at a loss. Whenever I have witnessed the tumultuous rush of the people from below, their eagerness to crowd into the boats, and the reckless devotion with which they fling themselves into the water to save their companions, I could not help thinking that it was no small disgrace to us, to whose hands the whole arrangements of discipline are confided, that we had not yet fallen upon any method of availing ourselves to good purpose of so much generous activity.

Sailors are men of rough habits, but their feelings are not by any means so coarse; and if they possess little prudence or worldly consideration, they are likewise very free from selfishness; generally speaking, too, they are much attached to one another, and will make great sacrifices to their inmates or shipmates when opportunities occur. A very little address on the part of the officers, as I have before hinted, will secure an extension of these kindly sentiments to the quarter-deck. But what I was alluding to just now was the cordiality of the friendships which spring up between the sailors themselves, who, it must be recollected, have no other society, and all, or almost all, whose ordinary social ties have been broken across either by the chances of war, or by the stern decrees which, I fear, will always render imprisonment absolutely unavoidable, or by the very nature of their roving and desultory life, which carries them they really know not where, and care not wherefore.

I remember once, when cruising off Terceira in the Endymion, that a man fell overboard and was drowned. After the usual confusion, and long search in vain, the boats were hoisted up, and the hands called to make sail. I was officer of the fore-castle, and on looking about to see if all the men were at their stations, missed one of the foretop-men. Just at that moment I observed some one curled up, and apparently hiding himself under the bow of the barge, between the boat and the booms. "Hillo!" I said, "who are you? What are you doing here, you skulker? Why are you not at your station?"

"I am not skulking, sir," said the poor fellow, the furrows in whose bronzed and weather-beaten cheek were running down with tears. The man we had just lost had been his messmate and friend, he told me, for ten years. I begged his pardon, in full sincerity, for having used such harsh words to him at such a moment, and bid him go below to his berth for the rest of the day.

"Never mind, sir, never mind," said the kind-hearted seaman, "it can't be helped. You meant no harm, sir. I am as well on deck as below. Bill's gone, sir, but I must do my duty."

So saying, he drew the sleeve of his jacket twice or thrice across his eyes, and mustering his grief within his breast, walked to his station as if nothing had happened.

In the same ship, and nearly about the same time, the people were bathing alongside in a calm at sea. It is customary on such occasions to spread a studding sail on the water, by means of lines from the fore and main yard-arms, for the use of those who either cannot swim, or who are not expert in this art, so very important to all sea-faring people. Half a dozen of the ship's boys, youngsters sent on board by that admirable and most patriotic of naval institutions the Marine Society, were floundering about in the sail, and sometimes even venturing beyond the leech rope. One of the least of these urchins, but not the least courageous of their number, when taunted by his more skilful companions with being afraid, struck out boldly beyond the prescribed bounds. He had not gone much further than his own length, however, along the surface of the fathomless sea, when his heart failed him, poor little man! and along with his confidence away also went his power of keeping his head above water. So down he sank rapidly, to the speechless horror of the other boys, who, of course, could lend the drowning child no help.

The captain of the fore-castle, a tall, fine-looking, hard-a-weather fellow, was standing on the shank of the sheet-anchor with his arms across, and his well-varnished canvass hat drawn so much over his eyes that it was difficult to tell whether he was awake, or merely dozing in the sun, as he leaned his back against the foretopmast back-stay. The seaman, however, had been attentively watching the young party all the time, and rather fearing that mischief might ensue from their rashness, he had grunted out a warning to them from time to time, to which they paid no sort of attention. At last he desisted, saying that they might drown themselves if they had a mind, for never a bit would he help them; but no sooner did the sinking figure of the adventurous little boy catch his eye, than, diver-fashion, he joined the palms of his hands over his head, inverted his position in one instant, and urging himself into swifter motion by a smart push with his feet against the anchor, shot head foremost into the water. The poor lad sank so rapidly that he was at least a couple of fathoms under the surface before he was arrested by the grip of the sailor, who soon rose again, bearing the bewildered boy in his hand, and, calling to the other youngsters to take better care of their companion, chucked him right into the belly of the sail in the midst of the party. The foresheet was hanging in the calin, nearly into the water, and by it the dripping seaman scrambled up again to his old birth on the anchor, shook himself like a great Newfoundland dog, and then, jumping on the deck, proceeded across the fore-castle to shift himself.

At the top of the ladder he was stopped by the marine officer, who had witnessed the whole transaction, as he sat across the gang-way hammocks, watching the swimmers, and trying to get his own consent to undergo the labour of undressing and dressing. Said the soldier to the sailor, "That was very well done of you, my man, and right well deserves a glass of grog. Say so to the gun-room steward as you pass; and tell him it is my orders to fill you out a stiff unweester."

The soldier's offer was kindly meant, but rather clumsily timed, at least so thought Jack; for though he inclined his head in acknowledgment of the attention, and instinctively touched his hat, when spoken to by an officer, he made no reply till out of the marine's hearing, when he laughed, or rather chuckled out to the people near him, "Does the good gentleman suppose I'll take a glass of grog for saving a boy's life?"

It is surely very odd that there should ever be such a thing as a sailor who cannot swim. And it is still more marvellous that there should be found people who actually maintain that a sailor who cannot swim has a better chance than one who can. This is really a paradox so outrageous, that, on writing it down, I feel almost humiliated to think how often I have heard it maintained by officers in whose hands the country has entrusted many valuable lives. This strange doctrine, as may well be supposed, derives but slender support from any well established facts. It is merely asserted that, on some occasions of shipwreck, the boldest swimmers have been lost in trying to reach the shore, when they might have been saved had they stayed by the ship. This may be true enough in particular cases, and yet the general position grounded upon it utterly absurd. The most skilful horsemen sometimes break their necks, but this is hardly adduced as an argument against learning to ride.

Without, however, discussing such nonsensical points, it cannot surely be denied by any rational person, that the art of swimming must be of great value to every man who lives on the water, and who is liable at any moment to tumble overboard, to be upset in a boat, or to be placed in situations where, for this power, he might perish of want or cold; or, which is more important still, he might be unable to save others from such a fate. Obvious though all this be, but little pains are generally taken by captains to see that their people learn to swim. I suppose there is not an officer in the service, certainly not one who has reached the rank just named, who has not seen many men, and, solely from not being able to swim; that is, because they had not learned a very simple art, of which, under his official injunctions, and aided by due encouragement, they might readily have acquired a sufficient knowledge. My own conscience, I am much ashamed to say, is not quite clear on this score, whatever that of my brother officers may be; and certainly, when I again take the command of a ship, I shall use every exertion, and take advantage of every opportunity, at sea or in harbour, to encourage the men and officers to acquire this invaluable accomplishment. Would it be unreasonable to refuse the rating of A. B. (able seaman) to the ship's books to any man who could not swim? If it be our duty to ascertain that a sailor can "hand, reef, and steer," before we place against his name these mystical letters, might we not well superadd, as a qualification, that he should also be able to keep his head above water, in the event of falling overboard, or that he should have it in his power to save another's life, if required to leap into the sea for that purpose by the orders of his superior? At present, in such an emergency, an officer has to ask amongst a dozen persons, "Which of you can swim?" instead of saying to the one nearest him, "Jump overboard after that man who is sinking!"

This, then, seems the first material step in the establishment of an improved system of that branch of seamanship which relates to picking up men who fall overboard. I call it the first step, because it will obviously have a direct tendency to lessen the horror and alarm which such an accident must ever excite, and which nothing can ever quite remove, even were that desirable. There can be no doubt, indeed, that highly excited feelings always stand in the way of exact discipline, and especially of that prompt, hearty, and thoroughly confiding obedience to the officer under whose orders we are serving. Such obedience is necessary on this occasion, above all others, (except, perhaps that of the ship being on fire), and is essentially required, in order to accomplish the purpose in view.

Different officers will, of course, devise different plans for the accomplishment of the same end. But I should expect all reflecting persons to agree in one or two points; such, for instance, as the following:—that every officer, man, and boy on board should be perfectly aware beforehand of what his particular duty is when the alarm of a man being overboard is given;—that he should know precisely not only where to go, but what to do when he reaches his station;—and, above all, that he should not presume to exceed the measure of his appointed duty, unless expressly ordered by his superior. Every one who has been exposed to the misery of seeing a man fall overboard must remember that by far the greatest difficulty was to keep people back, there being always ten times as many persons as are required, not only ready, but eager to place themselves in the situations of greatest risk. In executing the duties of a ship-of-war, there should never be any volunteering allowed, either on this, or on any other occasion. Every man ought to have a specific duty, or a set of duties to perform at all times. But these duties, in the case of a man falling overboard, must, of course, vary with the hour of the day or night, with the circumstance of its being the starboard or the larboard watch on deck, with the weather being fine or tempestuous, or with the course the ship is steering relatively to the wind, the quantity of sail, and so on. All these varieties, therefore, ought, as far as possible, to be the subject of distinct and repeated explanation. That is to say, the crew of every ship should be exercised or drilled, if not as frequently, at least as specifically, in the methods of picking up a man, as they are trained in the exercise of the great guns and small arms, or in that of reefing topsails.

I hope I shall not be misunderstood as laying down any scale of comparison between the importance of these different exercises; but I feel well assured that every experienced officer will agree with me, that by no other method except carefully stationing the men, and now and then practising them at those stations, can we ever hope to prevent the disgraceful confusion and noise which at present almost always take place when a man falls overboard. Whatever be the nature of the proposed exercise, the people should never be taken by surprise, or cheated into the belief that a man really has fallen into the water; for the feelings which such an incident excites are not of a description to be trifled with. Notice, indeed, should be formally given that no false alarm will ever be sounded; but when it is determined to go through the manoeuvre in question, intimation may usefully be circulated beforehand, that at such and such hours it will be practised, or a peculiar pipe by the boatswain might prepare the people for the evolution. When all was ready, something might be dropped overboard on purpose, and the exercise would then commence. At first, there would probably be no small degree of confusion and loss of time; but, surely, this would afford the most forcible practical evidence of the necessity of such drilling. When, by sufficient practice, the people had been rendered tolerably familiar with their duty in the day-time, or in fine weather, it might be then tried at night, or in a gale of wind. If they learned quickly all that was right to be done, there would be little trouble, and no great loss of time; but if, on the contrary, it cost much pains and a considerable interval to teach them how to conduct themselves to the best purpose, under the supposed circumstances, that would only show how much more necessary these precautions really were than officers generally suppose them to be.

Having said thus much to expose the evil, and to allude in general terms to the remedy, I feel bound to contribute likewise, as far as I am able, towards the practical details of the subject. I shall do so, however, with the most sincere diffidence; for the truth is, I have not studied so much as, perhaps, I ought to have done, what is called the seamanship part of my profession, but have, I fear, allowed both its scientific and more popular branches to engage a disproportionate share of my attention.

Every one who has been much at sea must remember the peculiar sounds which pervade a ship when a man is known to have fallen overboard. The course steered is so suddenly altered, that as she rounds to, the effect of the sails is doubled; the creaking of the tiller ropes and rudder next strike the ear; then follows the pitter-patter of several hundred feet in rapid motion, producing a singular tremor, fore and aft. In the midst of these ominous but too well understood noises may be heard over all the shrill startling voice of the officer of the watch, generally betraying in its tone more or less uncertainty of purpose. Then we discover the violent flapping of the sails, and the mingled cries of "Clear away the boats!" "Is the life-buoy gone?" "Heave that grating after him!" "Throw that hencoop over the stern!" "Who is it, do you know?" "Where did he fall from?" "Can he swim?" "Silence!" An impetuous, and too often an ill-regulated rush now succeeds to gain the boats, which are generally so crowded, that it becomes dangerous to lower them down, and more time is lost in getting the people out again than would have manned them twice over, if any regular system had been prepared, and rendered familiar and easy by practice beforehand.

I could give a pretty long list of cases which I have myself seen, or have heard others relate, where men have been drowned while their shipmates were thus struggling on board who should be first to save them, and instead of aiding so laudable a cause, were actually impeding one another by their hurry-scurry and general ignorance of what really ought to be done. I remember, for example, hearing of a line-of-battle ship, in the Baltic, from which two men fell one evening, when the ship's company were at quarters. The weather was fine, the water smooth, and the ship going about seven knots. The two lads in question, who were furling the fore-royal at the time, lost their hold, and were jerked far in the sea. At least a dozen men, leaving their guns, leaped overboard from different parts of the ship, some dressed as they were, and others stripped. Of course, the ship was in a wretched state of discipline where such frantic proceedings could take place. The confusion soon became worse confounded; but the ship was hove aback, and several boats lowered down. Had it not been smooth water, daylight, and fine weather, many of these absurd volunteers must have perished. I call them absurd, because there is no sense in merely incurring a great hazard, without some useful purpose to guide the exercise of courage. Now, these intrepid fellows merely knew that a man had fallen overboard, and that was all; so away they leaped out of the ports and over the hammock-nettings, without knowing whereabouts the object of their quixotic heroism might be. The boats were obliged to pick up the first that presenting themselves, for they were all in a drowning condition; but the two unhappy men who had been flung from aloft, being furthest off, went to the bottom before their turn came. Whereas, had their undisciplined shipmates not officiously and most improperly gone into the water, the boats would have been at liberty to row towards the men who had fallen accidentally, both of whom, in that case, might to all appearance have been saved.

I remember a bitter kind of story which was current in the navy when I first entered it, nearly thirty years ago. In those days, naval punishments were not only more severe than they now are, but they were inflicted with less solemnity than is at present deemed essential to their salutary effect. In a frigate, commanded by a well-known Tartar, as the martinet of the service are generally denominated, one of the crew, I forget from what cause, took it in his head to jump overboard, for the purpose of drowning himself. When he began to sink, he discovered that a salt-water death was not quite so agreeable as he had reckoned upon; so he sung out lustily for a rope. The ship being brought to the wind, the man was picked up, with some difficulty. The matter was investigated instantly; and as soon as it appeared that he had gone overboard intentionally, the hands were turned up, the gangway rigged, and the offender seized up. "Now," said the captain, "I shall punish you under the sixteenth article of war, which is as follows:—Every person in or belonging to the fleet, who shall desert, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as the circumstances of the case shall deserve." And then, turning to the boatswain, he said, "You will punish this man for desertion, or, which is exactly the same thing, for going out of the ship without leave."

"Now, sir," resumed the captain to the trembling culprit, "if you have any longer a desire to go overboard, you have only to ask the first lieutenant's leave. He has my instructions to grant you permission; while I shall take very good care that you are not again picked up."

I shall not stop to consider whether this gangway levity is the very best preventive of nautical suicide; but I am quite sure that there can be no offence more deserving of punishment, as a matter of discipline, and in order to prevent its recurrence, than the practice of leaping overboard after a man who has fallen into the water. There are cases, no doubt, in which it would be a positive crime in a swimmer not to spring, without waiting for orders, to the rescue of a fellow-creature whom he sees sinking in the waves, at whatever hazard to himself or to others; but I speak of that senseless, blindfold style in which I have very often witnessed men pitch themselves into the water, without knowing where the person who had fallen overboard was likely to be found.

Even in highly-disciplined ships this will sometimes take place; and the badness of the weather, darkness of the night, or other circumstances which increase the danger, seem only to stimulate the boldest spirits to brave the risk. I conceive there is no method of putting a stop to the practice but by positively enjoining the people not to go overboard, unless expressly ordered; and by explaining to them, on every occasion when the ship's company are exercised for this purpose, that the difficulty of picking a man up is generally much augmented by such indiscreet zeal.

I was lately told of some incidents which occurred in a frigate off Cape Horn, in a gale of wind, under close-reefed maintopsail and storm staysails. At half-past twelve at noon, when the people were at dinner, a young lad was washed out of the lee fore-channels. The life-buoy was immediately let go, and the main-topsail laid to the mast. Before the jolly-boat could be lowered down, a man jumped overboard, as he said "promiscuously," for he never saw the boy at all, nor was ever within half a cable's length of the spot where he was floundering about. Although the youth could not swim, he contrived to keep his head above water till the boat reached him, just as he was beginning to sink. The man who had jumped into the sea was right glad to give up his "promiscuous" search, and to make for the life-buoy, upon which he perched himself, and stood shivering for half an hour, like a shag on the Mewstone, till the boat came to his relief.

At four o'clock of the same day, a man fell from the rigging; the usual alarm and rush took place, the lee-quarter boat was so crowded, that one of the topping-lifts gave way, the davit broke, and the cutter, now suspended by one tackle, soon knocked herself to pieces against the ship's side. Of course, the people in her were jerked out very quickly, so that, instead of there being only one man in the water, there were nearly a dozen swimming about. More care was taken in hoisting out another boat, and, strange to say, all the people were picked up, except the original unfortunate man, who, but for the accident, which might and ought to have been prevented, would in all probability have been saved. Neither he nor the life-buoy, however, could be discovered before the night closed; and it is most distressing to think, that, perhaps, he may have succeeded in reaching this support only to perish before the long winter night of those dreary regions could be one quarter over!

The life-buoy at present in use on board His Majesty's ships, and, I suppose, in all Indiamen, as well as, I trust, in most merchant ships, has an admirable contrivance connected with it, which has saved many lives, when otherwise there would hardly have been a chance of the men being rescued from a watery grave.

This life-buoy, which is the invention of Lieutenant Cook of the navy, consists of two hollow copper vessels connected together, each about as large as an ordinary-sized pillow, and of buoyancy and capacity sufficient to support one man standing upon them. Should there be more than one person requiring support, they can lay hold of rope beackets fitted to the buoy, and so sustain themselves. Between the two copper vessels there stands up a hollow pole, or mast, into which is inserted, from below, an iron rod, whose lower extremity is loaded with lead, in such a manner, that when the buoy is let go, the iron rod slips down to a certain extent, lengthens the lever, and enables the lead at the end to act as a ballast. By this means the mast is kept upright, and the buoy prevented from upsetting. The weight at the end of the rod is arranged so as to afford secure footing for two persons, should that number reach it; and there are also, as I said before, large rope beackets through which others can thrust their head and shoulders, till assistance is rendered.

On the top of the mast is fixed a port-fire, calculated to burn, I think, twenty minutes, or half an hour; this is ignited most ingeniously by the same process which lets the buoy fall into the water. So that a man falling overboard at night, is directed to the buoy by the blaze on the top of its pole or mast, and the boat sent to rescue him also knows in what direction to pull. Even supposing, however, the man not to have gained the life-buoy, it is clear that, if above the surface at all, he must be somewhere in that neighbourhood; and if he shall have gone down, it is still some satisfaction, by recovering the buoy, to ascertain that the poor wretch is not left to perish by inches.

The method by which this excellent invention is attached to the ship, and dropped into the water in a single instant, is, perhaps, not the least ingenious part of the contrivance. The buoy is generally fixed amidships over the stern, where it is held securely in its place by being strung, or threaded, as it were, on two strong perpendicular iron rods fixed to the taffrail, and inserted in holes piercing the frame-work of the buoy. The apparatus is kept in its place by what is called a slip-stopper, a sort of catch-bolt or detent, which can be unlocked at pleasure, by merely pulling a trigger. Upon withdrawing the stopper the whole machine slips along the rods, and falls at once into the ship's wake. The trigger, which unlocks the ship-stopper, is furnished with a lanyard, passing through a hole in the stern, and having at its inner end a large knob, marked "Life-Buoy;" this alone is used in the day time. Close at hand is another wooden knob, marked "Look," fastened to the end of a line fixed to the trigger of a gun-lock primed with powder; and so arranged, that when the line is pulled, the port-fire is instantly ignited, while, at the same moment, the life-buoy descends, and floats merrily away, blazing like a light-house. It would surely be an improvement to have both these operations always performed simultaneously, that is, by one pull of the string. The port-fire would thus be lighted in every case of letting go the buoy; and I suspect the smoke in the day time would often be as useful in guiding the boat, as the blaze always is at night.

The gunner who has charge of the life-buoy lock sees it freshly and carefully primed every evening at quarters, of which he makes a report to the captain. In the morning the priming is taken out, and the lock uncocked. During the night a man is always stationed at this part of the ship, and every half hour, when the bell strikes, he calls out "Life-buoy!" to show that he is awake, and at his post, exactly in the same manner as the lookout-men abaft, on the beam, and forward, call out "Starboard quarter!" "Starboard bow!" and so on, completely round the ship, to prove that they are not napping.

After all, however, it must be owned, that some of the most important considerations, when a man falls overboard, have as yet scarcely been mentioned. These are:

First, the quickest and most effectual method of arresting the ship's progress, and how to keep her as near the spot where the man fell as possible.

Secondly, to preserve entire, during these evolutions, the general discipline of the ship, to maintain silence, and to enforce the most prompt obedience, without permitting fool-hardy volunteering of any kind.

Thirdly, to see that the boat appointed to be employed on these occasions is secured in such a manner that she may be cast loose in a moment, and, when ready for lowering down, that she is properly manned, and fitted, so as to be efficient in all respects when she reaches the water.

Fourthly, to take care in lowering the boat neither to stove nor to swamp her, nor to pitch the men out.

And, lastly, to have a sufficient number of the sharpest sighted men in the ship stationed aloft in such a manner as to give them the best chance not only of discovering the person who is overboard, but of pointing him out to the people in the boat, who may not otherwise know in what direction to pull.

It is conceived, that all these objects may be accomplished with very little, if any additional trouble, in all tolerably well-disciplined ships.

Various opinions prevail amongst officers as to the first point; but, I think, the best authorities recommend that, if possible, the ship should not merely be hove aback when a man falls overboard, but that she ought to be brought completely round on the other tack. Of course, sail should be shortened in stays, and the main yard left square. This plan implies the ship being on a wind, or from that position to having the wind not above two points abaft the beam. But, on one tack or the other, this will include a large portion of the sailing of every ship.

The great merit of such a method of proceeding is, that, if the evolution succeeds, the ship, when round, will drift right down towards the man. And, although there may be some small risk in lowering the boat in stays, from the ship having at one period stern way, there will, in fact, be little time lost if the boat be not lowered till the ship be well round, and the stern way at an end. There is more mischief done, generally, by lowering the boat too soon, than by waiting till the fittest moment arrives for doing it coolly. And it cannot be too often repeated, that almost the whole depends upon the self-possession of the officer of the watch. This important quality is best taught (like every thing else of the kind) by experience, that is to say, by a thorough and familiar practical knowledge of what is right to be done under all circumstances. It may be permitted for every other person in the ship to feel alarmed and shocked when the sounds reach his ears indicating that a man is overboard; but the officer in command of the deck ought to let it be seen and felt, by his tone of voice, and by the judicious promptitude of his orders, that he, at last, is perfectly master of himself, and knows distinctly what course it is best to adopt.

If the ship be running before the wind, or be sailing large, and under a press of sail, the officer must exercise his judgment in rounding to, and take care, in his anxiety to save the man, not to let the mast go over the side, which will not advance, but defeat his object. If the topgallant sheets, the topsail and topgallant-halyards, be let fly, and the head yards braced quickly up, the ship, when brought to the wind, will be nearly in the situation of reefing topsails. Under these circumstances, it will hardly be possible to bring her about, for, long before she can have come head to wind, her way will be so much deadened that the rudder may have ceased to act. Still, however, I am so strong an advocate for the principle of tacking, instead of merely lying-to, when a man is overboard, that, even under the circumstances above described, as soon as the boat was lowered down and sent off, and the extra sail gathered in, I would fill, stand on till the ship had gained head-way enough to render the evolution certain, and then go about, so as to bring her head towards the boat. It must be recollected, that when a ship is going well off the wind in the manner here supposed, it is impossible to round her so quickly as to replace her on the spot where the man fell; to reach which a great sweep must always be made. But there seems to me no doubt, that in every possible case, even when going right before it, the ship will always drift nearer and nearer to that spot, if eventually brought to the wind on the opposite tack from that on which she was luffed up.

It will conduce greatly to the success of these measures, if it be an established rule, that, whenever the alarm is given of a man being overboard, the people, without further orders, fly to their appointed stations for tacking ship; and that only those persons who shall be specifically selected to man and lower down the boats, and for other duties, shall presume to quit the places assigned to them on going about. It so happens, that when the men are in their stations for tacking, they are almost equally in their stations for shortening sail, or for performing most other evolutions likely to become necessary at such moments.

The excepted men should consist of at least two boats' crews in each watch, and of others whose sole duty it should be to attend to the operation of lowering the boat or boats, into which no men but those expressly appointed should ever be allowed to enter. These persons, selected for their activity, strength, and coolness, should belong to the afterguard, main and mizen-top, and gunner's crew, men whose duties lie chiefly abaft or about the main-mast. Midshipmen in each watch should also be named to the different boats; and their orders ought to be positive, never to allow more than the proper crew to enter; nor on any account to permit the boat to be lowered till fully and properly manned. I grant that it requires no small nerve to sanction the delays which attention to these minute particulars demands. But the adequate degree of faith in their utility will bring with it the requisite share of decision, to possess which, under all circumstances, is, perhaps, one of the most characteristic distinctions of a good commanding officer.

I could give anecdotes by the dozen of the mischief arising from these precautions not being attended to. I was lately told of a good case in point. A line-of-battle ship, during the war, was lying at anchor off Oleron in a hard gale of wind. A cutter had been sent to the senior officer on some service, but, not being able to pull to windward, she returned. All the men were called out except four, and the boat hoisted up. Through some inattention on the part of the boatswain's mate not piping belay in time, or from the tackle-fall being worn out (a frequent but most inexcusable neglect,) one of the falls gave way, just as the boat reached the davit. The consequence was, all the four men were precipitated overboard. The stern-boat was instantly lowered down, with a midshipman and four hands in her; but, owing to the want of some efficient system being previously established to meet such cases, three out of this precious boat's crew of volunteers could not pull a stroke! Two of the men who had been pitched out of the cutter, accordingly sunk before the boat could reach them, though she was not her own length from them. One man was pulled in, but the fourth could not be seen at all, and was supposed to have perished likewise. The men in the boat, not knowing how to use the oars, soon became terrified with their situation; and had it not been for the able assistance of the rescued man, though he was half drowned, and the activity of the young midshipman, the boat must soon have been swamped, and all hands in her have gone to the bottom. As it was, they contrived, by great exertion, to keep her head to the sea, and in the ship's wake, till a rope, with a buoy to it, was veered to them.

On being pulled under the stern, and just as they were hooking the tackles which were to hoist them up, they discovered the fourth man who had fallen overboard from the cutter clinging to the rudder chains. The poor fellow was almost exhausted, by being soured over head and ears every time the ship pitched. He was secured by the boat-hook, and pulled in, more dead than alive.

It is not enough that care is taken to prevent the boat being overcrowded, and that the crew which are to manage her know their business, or that an officer accustomed to command be in charge of her, and that she be deliberately lowered into the water by men who understand how to execute this rather difficult and delicate operation in bad weather; for there are still one or two apparently minor points which should not be neglected. The boat's plug, for example, ought in every case to be fastened to the bottom board with a stout lanyard. I have seen the want of this very small article, which might prove the loss of the whole boat's crew, cause the greatest trouble and danger.

Much of the man's chance of being picked up will depend, in the day-time at least, upon the goodness of the look-out for him which is kept, by persons properly stationed in the rigging and elsewhere. At night, alas! the chances against the unhappy man are always greatly increased; and I shall never forget the melancholy which spread instantaneously over the ship when the boat returns, and to the eager cry of "Have you got the man?" it is answered, "We could see nothing of him; we heard him splashing in the water and calling out for a rope, but before we could reach the spot he had sunk. Here is the poor fellow's hat, which we picked up just when we had heard the sound of his voice." When Lieutenant Cook's life-buoy is used, indeed, the chances of saving the man at night are much greater; but still it is, at best, but a fearful chance even for an expert swimmer.

There ought, in every ship, to be selected a certain number of the sharpest sighted persons, who should be instructed, the instant the alarm is given, to repair to stations appointed for them aloft. Several of these ought to plant themselves in the lower rigging, some in the topmast shrouds, and one, if not two, might advantageously be perched on each of the cross-trees. These persons, whose exclusive duty is to discover the man who is overboard, should be directed to look out, some in the ship's wake, some on either side of it, and to be particularly careful to mark the spot near which the ship must have been when he fell, in order that, when she comes about and drifts near the place, they may know where to direct their attention, and also to take care that the ship does not forge directly upon the object they are seeking for. The chief advantage of having look-out men stationed aloft in this manner consists in their commanding a far better position compared to that of persons on deck, and still better when compared to the people in the boat. Besides which, having this object alone to attend to, they are more likely to be successful. Moreover from their being in considerable numbers, and scattered at different elevations, their chances are, of course, much increased of discovering so small an object as a man on the surface.

The people in the boat possess no such advantages, for they are occupied with their oars, and lose between the seas all sight of the surrounding objects near them, while they can always see the ship's mast; and as soon as they detect that any one of the look-out men sees the person who is overboard, and points in the proper direction for them to pull, they can shape their course accordingly. Presently another look-out, instructed by the first where to direct his eyes, also discovers the man; then another sees him, then another, and so on, till all who are aloft obtain sight of the desired object, and join in pointing with their hands to where it is to be found. The officer in the boat, thus instructed by innumerable pointers, rows at once, and with confidence, in the proper direction, and the drowning man is often rescued from his deep-sea grave, when, had there been no such look-outs, or had they been fewer in number, or lower down, he must have perished.

I quite forget what officer it was who first told me of this plan, which, from frequent trial, I know to be most useful in practice. I shall certainly be most happy to publish the name of the inventor of this ingenious idea if by any means I can recover it. The thing itself, I should imagine, requires only to be stated to insure its universal adoption. We wonder, indeed, how a measure of so much simplicity and obvious utility should not before have struck every one who has turned his attention to this subject;—and what commanding officer is there who has not? I shall be very glad to find myself mistaken in supposing that this plan is not as yet generally pled; and I trust in no great length of time it will be, in every ship, an integral part of an organised and understood system of regulations, exclusively directed to the important purpose of saving the lives of who fall overboard.

It is quite obvious, indeed, the greater the number of men that can be employed in search of such a speck as an's head presents, the better chance there will be of finding it; and accordingly, as many men as possible should always be sent aloft to look out in the first instance; not fewer in any case than six or eight to each boat. As soon as the ship is fairly round, the sails are lowered, and the boat lowered down, at least the whole of the watch ought to be sent aloft, and scattered up and down the rigging, at the mast-heads, and on the yard-arms; for it is impossible to say from what spot the man can best be seen, or who shall be the fortunate individual to catch the first glimpse of him. I have even seen a stupid, gummy-eyed fellow, who never before had credit for seeing much further than a mole, have the good luck to discover a boat at a great distance, long before the others could distinguish any thing floating on the water.

It is curious to observe the electric sort of style in which the perception of an object, when once pointed out, flashes along from man to man. As each in succession catches sight of his shipmate, he exclaims, "here he is! there he is!" and holds out his hand in the proper direction for the guidance of the boat. Indeed, I have seldom witnessed a more interesting sight than that of eighty or a hundred persons, stationed aloft, keeping their eyes to keep sight of a poor fellow who was struggling for his life, and all eagerly extending their hands towards him, as if they could clutch him from the water. To see these hands drop again is inexplicable, not from its indicating that the unfortunate man is no longer distinguishable. One by one the arms fall, reluctantly, as if it were a signal that all hope was over. Presently the boat is observed to range about at some distance—the look-out men aloft, when repeatedly hailed, asked, "if they see any thing like him?" are all silent. Finally, the boat's recall flag is hoisted—sail is made on the ship—the people are piped down—their tragical little episode in the voyage being concluded, every thing goes on as before.

CHAPTER XXVI.

ON BOARD A MAN-OF-WAR. MUSTERING BY DIVISIONS.

The first article of war runs as follows:—"All commanders, captains, and officers, in or belonging to any of His Majesty's ships or vessels of war, shall cause the worship of Almighty God, according to the liturgy of the Church of England established by law, to be solemnly, and reverently performed in their respective ships, and shall take care that prayers and preaching, by chaplains in holy orders of the respective ships, be read diligently; and that the Lord's Day be observed according to law."

The precision with which these injunctions are attended to, depend chiefly on three things:—The personal attention of the captain; the nature of the service upon the ship is employed; and the state of the weather. "There is a will there is a way," according to the saying; so that the question depends ultimately, in most cases, very much on the commander himself. It is in his power, or nearly always, to make the Sunday of rest to the people committed to his charge, under it one of extra trouble and irritation to them. Or later, he is sure to reap the fruits of his decision in this matter, and is inevitably made to feel, that if he has either to command the respect or to win the love of his crew, so that their united and strenuous exertions may be reckoned upon, at moments of need, he takes care to show them, on all ordinary occasions, that he is himself under the guidance of right principles, but likewise that he is sincerely concerned in their influence over others. In the same spirit, authority will be strengthened by every touch of consistency with which the inevitable sternness of his rule is softened; and the more he manages to impart to the indulgences the character of routine, or matters of constant usage, so much the better. We feel that to a person who confers almost any favour upon us, if this favour be one of daily or weekly occurrence, each time of its concession, we are reminded of the weight of our obligation, all kindness is in danger of being removed from it, and we would sometimes rather buy than hold the advantage by a tenure thusly capricious.

The captain of sense and feeling, therefore, avoids all show, or palaver, as it is called, when granting such relaxations. He makes it his business, in the first place, to find out what is right and proper, consistently with the rules of the service generally, and then to ascertain how far the peculiar nature of the employment upon which the ship is engaged will admit of a further extension of indulgences, or requires their abridgment. Having settled with himself what is possible to be done with propriety, he should grant it neither as a matter of personal favour, nor as a matter of right on the part of the people, but simply because it is fitting in itself. It may, perhaps, afterwards suit his views to withdraw, or to intermit these indulgences, either because they prove hurtful to the service, or because he may find it necessary to let his power of punishing be felt in this negative way, when his intentions have been misapprehended and his indulgence turned to bad purpose; but in every case it seems advisable, as I have said, to allow all such things to fall as much as possible into a consistent routine. There can be little doubt that the pain of executing laborious and disagreeable duties is often materially lessened by their strictly periodical recurrence; for in time their nature and duration come to be so correctly measured and allowed for, that the joys of the leisure moments which intervene are always greatly enhanced. By a similar and very beautiful, I had almost said ingenious arrangement of our nature, it happens that the innocent pleasures of life, so far from palliating by regularity, are actually much increased by it. I have frequently remarked with surprise the intense interest with which the sailors, like children, returned day after day exactly to the same amusement. On the other hand, I have seldom failed to observe how exceedingly they were put out of their way by losing indulgences, apparently of the most trivial kind, but to which they had become habituated.

People often fancy, that, because the life of a seaman is one of constant change of place and occupation, he cannot fall into any regularity of habits; but on board a man-of-war it is really quite the reverse. He becomes there so much the creature of habit, that, by a little management, he may be moulded to almost any purpose. There is no man more docile than Jack, I might say no child; but then the hand that guides him must be tempered by discretion, by kindness, and, above all, by uniformity, or, as it is called aboard, by system. There may be bad systems as well as good ones; but I am half inclined to say, that even the worst system, if strictly adhered to, is better than the wretched uncertainty of purpose which clings to ill-regulated and vacillating discipline, though every single act may be dictated by good-will and the sincerest wish to do right.

These observations, which apply generally to the whole course of naval affairs, will, I think, be found to bear with such peculiar force on the arrangements of our Sunday, that if any one wished to learn, from a single day's observation, what was the probable state of discipline on board a particular ship, I should say let the enquirer ascertain how the first day of the week is got through, and he may guess pretty correctly as to all the rest.

It is not possible, at sea, to comply to the letter with the fourth commandment; but we have no right on that account to dispense with its spirit, which is at all times, and in all places, within every man's reach. The absolute necessity, however, of performing some work, appears a sufficient reason with many people for doing away with the ordinance of Sunday altogether, and converting it into a day of hard and irksome toil, instead of a season of at least comparative rest. On the other hand, some officers, from a mistaken sense of duty, or from an exaggerated enthusiasm, either allow essential public interests to be neglected which ought to be attended to, or they harass their people by exacting more attention, or, I should rather say, devoting more time, to religious observances than the poor sailors can bestow with any chance of profit. Which of these courses is the worst, I really cannot say. If Sunday be made a working day, and no attention whatever is paid to its appropriate duties, the crew are by no means satisfied, and but too readily contract, by degrees, the habit of neglecting their obligations both to God and man. On the contrary, if the day be entirely taken up with devotional exercises, to the fatigue of their minds and bodies, they are exceedingly apt, after a time, to vote the "whole concern," as they call it, a bore, and to make up for this forced attention by the most scandalous indecencies, when out of sight of their "psalm-singing captain."

It will not always answer, merely because a thing is proper in itself, to follow rigorously the most straightforward course, regardless of what is said or thought to the right and left. If we sincerely desire to do good, we must not only condescend to work with such tools as we have in our hands, but resolve to employ them in a manner suited to the materials we wish to fashion to a certain purpose. Of this, at all events, we may rest assured, that unless we contrive, by some means or other, to gain the sympathy of the people on board our ship, and to carry them along with us, we may preach to them till doomsday without in the smallest degree influencing their habits, or turning their minds towards the channels we so anxiously desire them to fall into. In what particular way the sailors are to be won to think and feel as we wish them to do, must depend, in every individual case, on its peculiar circumstances; and its management will be modified by the good-will and sagacity of the commander.

Great care must be taken to overdo nothing, and, as far as may be, to allow all such matters to grow into habits. For, in this way the minds of men are most certainly brought into proper train at the fittest moments for considering any subject we wish to impress upon them. And although it may be said that too great an attention to an exact order has the effect of substituting mere external observances for the true sentiments of which these ought only to serve as the index, yet we seldom see an instance in which a judicious pastor, whether dressed in a surplice or rigged in a uniform, may not avail himself of his authority (human or divine) to much greater purpose, by the assistance of established formalities.

I would accordingly recommend every officer in command of a ship to bring as many of the arrangements of his Sunday as possible into a jog-trot order, not to be departed from unless there should arise an absolute necessity for such deviation. Nineteen Sundays might, indeed, pass over without any express or apparent advantage being gained from this uniformity, but on the twentieth some opportunity might occur of infinite value to all concerned, which opportunity might, in all probability, prove unavailing but for the previous preparation. To borrow a professional illustration of the most familiar kind, it may be asked, how many hundred times do we exercise the great guns and small arms for once that we fire them in real action? And why should it be supposed that, for the useful application of our mental energies to the most important of all warfare, habitual training is less necessary?

There is, of course, nothing new in all this; but I am not aware that these maxims have been sufficiently attended to as an express point of naval discipline, which certainly is to be regretted; for sailors, with all their faults, are very willing, poor fellows, if duly managed, to submit to legitimate persuasion. The opportunities for engaging their attention to good account are numberless, and their predisposition is, upon the whole, so favourable, that I am convinced, if adequate means of instruction were always at hand, and in every ship, the condition of our seamen in these respects might be changed greatly for the better, not only for themselves, but for the country they serve.

I must beg, therefore, to repeat once more, that I live in great hopes of some day seeing a regular chaplain on board every one of his Majesty's ships. I do not mean a person who shall come amongst us for a time, and who shall merely make the service a stepping-stone to church preferment on shore. What I hope to see is a set of clergymen educated with a view to the clerical duties of a ship's ministry, and who shall be ordained expressly and exclusively for the navy, without the prospect of quitting it for other preferment. That there are formidable practical difficulties in the way of this scheme, I am well aware; but surely all these might be overcome, as they have been already conquered in the analogous instance of the colonies. Of course (as I have before endeavoured to explain at length,) it would be requisite greatly to improve the present situation of chaplains, in order to induce men of talents, and educated at the universities, to devote their lives to duties involving so many privations. The retiring salary, in particular, ought to be made considerable, as well as the emoluments for long service; and if, as I have also endeavoured to explain, to the duty of clergymen that of schoolmaster were united, the benefits conferred on the naval profession could hardly fail to be very great. The character of the man-of-war seaman might thus be gradually improved under the constant operation of such an addition to the ordinary discipline of the fleet. The change would, I dare say, be very slow, and for a long time almost imperceptible; but I imagine it would be all the better on that account, and, in due season, a general amelioration in the habits of all the other sailors of the country might follow these improvements in the navy.

Without going needlessly deep into these speculations, we may observe, in the meantime, that, even in the least-regularly disciplined ships, there is now a marked difference between Sunday and any other day in the week.

Although the grand object seems to be, to have every thing as clean as possible, and in its most apple-pie order, great part of the labour employed to produce this result is over before Sunday arrives. The decks, for instance, receive such a thorough allowance of holy-stoning and scrubbing on Saturday, that mere washing, with perhaps a slight touch of the brushes and sand, brings them into the milk-white condition which is the delight of every genuine first lieutenant's heart. All this is got over early in the morning, in order that the decks may be swabbed up and the ropes nicely flemished down before seven bells, at which time it is generally thought expedient to go to breakfast, though half an hour sooner than usual, in order to make the forenoon as long as possible. I should have mentioned that the hammocks are always piped up at seven o'clock. If they have been slung overnight, they are as white as any laundress could have made them; and, of course, the hammock-stowage takes more than ordinary care to place them neatly in the nettings, with their bright numbers turned inwards, all nicely lashed up with the regulated proportion of turns, each hammock being of a uniform size from end to end.

While the people are at breakfast, the word is passed to "clean for muster," in any dress the commanding officer may think most suitable to the climate or weather. Between the tropics, the order for rigging in frocks and trousers is generally delivered in these words:

"Do you hear, there! fore and aft! Clean for muster at five bells—duck frocks and white trousers!"

In cold regions, it is "Blue jackets and trousers;" and in rainy, cold, or blowing weather, the following order is sung out along the lower deck, first by the husky-throated boatswain, and then in a still rougher enunciation by his gruff satellites, the boatswain's mates:

"D'ye hear there! Clean shirt and a shave for muster at five bells!"

Twice a week, on Thursdays and Sundays, the operation of shaving is held to be necessary. These are called "clean-shirt days." Mondays and Fridays are the days appointed for washing the clothes.

It is usual to give the men three quarters, instead of half an hour to breakfast on Sundays, that they may have time to rig themselves in proper trim before coming on deck. The watch, therefore, is called at a quarter past eight, or it may be one bell, which is half past. The forenoon watch bring their clothes bags up with them, in order that they may not be again required to leave the deck before muster. The bags are piled in neat pyramids, or in other forms, sometimes on the booms before the boats, and sometimes in a square mass on the afterpart of the quarter-deck of a frigate. It strikes my recollection, that in most ships there is a sort of difficulty in finding a good place on which to stow the bags.

As soon as the forenoon watch is called, the between-decks, on which the men live, is carefully cleaned, generally by what is called dry holy-stoning. This is done by rubbing the deck with small smooth pieces of freestone, after a layer of well-dried sand has been sprinkled over it. This operation throws up a good deal of dust; but it makes the deck white, which is the grand point aimed at. The wings, the store-rooms, and the cockpits, undergo a similar dose of rubbing and scrubbing; in short, every hole and corner of the decks, both above and below stairs, as folks on shore would say, is swept, and swept again, on a Sunday morning, till the panting sweepers are half dead; indeed, the rest of the ship's company are worried out of all patience, from eight o'clock to half-past ten, with the eternal cry of "Pipe the sweepers!" followed by a sharp, interrupted whistle, not unlike the note of a pet canary.

What with cleaning the decks and cleaning themselves, the watch below have fully enough to do to get all ready by five bells. It must be remembered, too, that they have had the morning watch to keep, since four o'clock, and the whole trouble of washing the upper decks, shaking out the reefs, stowing the hammocks, and coiling down the ropes, all easy matters of routine, it is true, but still sufficiently tiresome when multiplied so often.

At the appointed hour of half-past ten, to a single stroke of the bell, the mate of the watch, directed by the officer on deck, who again acts in obedience to the captain's orders, conveyed to him by the first lieutenant, calls out, "Beat to divisions!"

It should have been stated, that before this period arrives, the mate of the decks, and the mate of the hold, the boatswain, gunner, and carpenter, have all severally received reports from their subordinates, that their different departments are in proper order for inspection. Reports to the same effect being then finally made to the first lieutenant by the mates and warrant officers, he himself goes round the ship to see that all is right and tight, preparatory to the grand inspection. I ought also to have mentioned, that the bags of the watch below are piped up at ten o'clock, so that nothing remains between decks but the mess-tables, stools, and the soup and grog kiddy. Long before this hour, the greater number of the whole ship's company have dressed themselves, and are ready for muster; but the never ending sweepers, the fussy warrant officers' yeomen, the exact purser's steward, the slovenly midshipman's boy, the learned lublolly boy, and the interminable host of officers' servants, who have always fifty extra things to do, are often so sorely pressed for time, that at the first tap of the drum beating to divisions, these idlers, as they are technically much misnamed, may often be seen only then lugging their shirts over their heads, or hitching up their trousers in all the hurry skurry of a lower deck toilet. I ought to have recorded, that in the ship's head, as well as on the fore part of the main-deck, and likewise between the guns, chiefly those abreast of the fore hatchway, there have been groups assembled to scrape and polish themselves ever since breakfast time, and even before it. Some are washing themselves; others cutting, and combing, and trimming their hair; for, now-a-days there are none of those huge long tails, or club ties, which descended along the back of the sailors who fought with Bonbow and Rodney. The dandyism of Jack has now taken another turn, and the knowing thing at present is to have a parcel of ringlets hanging from the temples almost to the collar-bone. Some of the youngest and best looking of the fore-topmen would also very fain indulge in the feminine foppery of ear rings. In the merchant service, many sailors "disgrace their persons," as we allege, in this style, and in all foreign services the odious practice exists; but in the British navy it is absolutely forbidden.

I remember once, on the beach of Madras, witnessing an amusing scene between Sir Samuel Hood, then commander in chief in India, and the newly promoted boatswain of a sloop of war belonging to the squadron. The admiral, who was one of the bravest, and kindest, and truest-hearted seamen that ever trod a ship's decks, was a sworn foe to all trickery in dress-work. The eye of the veteran officer was directed earnestly towards the yeast of waves, which, in immense double rows of surf, fringe and guard the whole of that flat coast. He was watching the progress of a Massallah boat, alternately lost in the foam, and raised in very uncertain balance across the swell, which, though just on the break, brought her swiftly towards the shore. He felt more anxious than usual about the fate of this particular boat, from having ordered on shore the person alluded to, with whom he wished to have some conversation previous to their parting company. This boatswain was a young man, who had been for some years a follower of the admiral in different ships, and to whom he had just given a warrant. The poor fellow, unexpectedly promoted from before the mast to the rank of an officer, was trigged up in his newly bought, but marvellously ill-cut, uniform, shining like a dollar, and making it wearer, who for the first time in his life had put on a long coat, feel not a little awkward.

As soon as the boat was partly driven up the beach by the surf, and partly dragged beyond the dash of the breakers by the crowd on shore, this happiest of warrant officers leaped out on the sand, and seeing the admiral above him, standing on the crest of the natural glacis which lines the shore, he took off his hat, smoothed down the hair on his forehead, sailor fashion, and stood uncovered, in spite of the roasting sun flaming in the zenith.

The admiral, of course, made a motion with his hand for the boatswain to put his hat on; but the other, not perceiving the signal, stood stock still.

"I say, put on your hat!" called the commander in chief, in a tone which made the newly created warrant officer start. In his agitation he shook a bunch of well trimmed ringlets a little on one side, and betrayed to the flashing eyes of the admiral a pair of small, round, silver ear rings, the parting gift, doubtless, of some favoured and favouring "Poll or Bess" of dear, old, black-guard Point Beach, the very ninth heaven of all light hearted sailors. Be this as it may, the admiral, first stepping on one side, and then holding his head forward, as if to re-establish the doubting evidence of his horrified senses, and forcibly keeping down the astonished seamen's hat with his hand, roared out,

"Who the devil are you?"

"John Marline, sir!" replied the bewildered boatswain, beginning to suspect the scrape he had got himself into.

"Oh!" cried the flag-officer, with a scornful laugh. "Oh! I beg your pardon; I took you for a Portuguese." "No, sir!" instinctively filtered out the other, and the admiral expected some reply.

"No! Then, if you are not a foreigner, why do you hoist false colours? What business has an English sailor with these d—d machines in his ears?"

"I don't know, sir," said poor Marline. "I put them in only this morning, when I rigged myself in new togs, to answer the signal on shore."

"Then," said Sir Samuel, softened by the comical look of his old shipmate, and having got rid of a greater portion of his bile by the first explosion; "I will now proceed to unrig yourself of this top heavy as fast as you can; pitch them into the surf, if you do but never, as you respect the warrant in your pocket let me see you in that disguise again."

When the drum beats the well-known "general" the ship's company range themselves in a single file along both sides of the quarter deck, the gangway, and all round the fore-castle. In a frigate, the whole crew may be thus spread out on the upper deck alone, but in line of battle ships the numbers are so great, that similar ranges, each consisting of a division, are likewise formed on the opposite sides of the main-deck. The marines, under arms, and in full uniform, fall in the after part of the quarter-deck, while the ship's boy under the master at arms, with his ratan in hand, enters on the fore-castle.

In some ships the men are sized, as it is called, the tallest being placed at the after end, and so on down to the most diminutive, who is fixed at the extreme. But this arrangement being more of a military than of a naval cast, is rarely adopted now-a-days. It will seldom happen, indeed, that the biggest and heaviest fellows in a ship's company are the heaviest men. They may chance, indeed, to be poulterers, with extra weight only to make sweepers off, persons who, after a three years' station, barely know the stem from the stern, and could no more steer the ship than they could take a lunar distance. Nothing, therefore, can be more ridiculous, than judging of the men by their stature, or putting such lubberly persons as these just alluded to over the heads of thorough-bred able-seamen, chosen of the tops or fore-castle, hardy sailors, whose wisdom, knowledge, or trustworthy vigilance, and long practical experience, in spite of diminutive stature, may very severely have placed them in the foremost rank amongst the crew. Officers, however, on first joining a ship, are very apt to be guilty of some injustice towards the people by judging of them too hastily by their appearance alone. We are insensibly so much prejudiced in favour of a fine, tall, good looking sailor, and prejudiced against a grizzled, crooked, little fellow, that if both happen to be brought before us for desertion, we almost instinctively commit the innocent condemning the ugly fellow, and acquitting the good looking one, before a tithe of the evidence has reached our ears.

This recalls to my recollection how multitudes of the sore entanglements in which a captain's judgment may, on these occasions, be caught, and his reason warped to the side of injustice, when he is called upon the time he is truly executing his duty. I have many times suspected, on looking back, that I once committed a disputed case rather unfairly, in which one of the parties spoke the broadest Scotch patois of my native land. I may have been influenced by the unworthy feeling of being thought partial to my countrymen, and thus gave the case more against poor Saunders than he deserved. But let no person who has never been placed in the trying situation of a judge, pretend to estimate the difficulties of that most responsible and useful of all offices. "What will people say?" is a question nearly always a very shabby question, but one which too many public men ask themselves when brought as to how they shall act, forgetting that the only questions ought to be: "What is really and truly right? what will men of experience and virtue think? and shall I have eventually to say to my own conscience, 'The subject?'"

Leaving these speculative questions, however, for the present, let us return to the divisions, which are ranged along the deck, not as formerly by some, in the proper way, by the watch bill. The fore-castle, of course, comes first, as they stand so in the fore part by which they are mustered at night by the main-deck watch; then the fore-top-men, and so on to the main-deck after-guard, and waisters. Each division is made up of a lieutenant, who, as well as the midshipmen of the division, appears in full uniform. The people of the entered by the young gentlemen, and then carefully inspected by the officer of the division, who sees that every man is dressed according to order, and that he is otherwise in proper trim. It is also usual in hot climates for the surgeon and his assistants to pass along the lines, to ascertain, partly by the men's looks, and partly by an examination of their limbs, that no traces of scurvy have begun to show themselves. I have often seen illness which, had they not been thus taken hold of at the very commencement, and cured at once, might have confined men for weeks or months to their hammocks, or conducted their bodies in no great space of time over the standing part of the foresheet.

While the mustering and inspecting of the divisions going on, the captain paces the quarter deck, in company with the first lieutenant. No other voices are heard except theirs, and that of the midshipmen calling out the names of the men, or the officers putting some interrogatory about a spot of tar on a pair of duck trousers, or an ill-mended hole in the sleeve of a shirt. A few minutes even these sounds are hushed, and nothing is distinguishable fore and aft but the tread of the respective officers on their way aft to report to the captain on the quarter deck that all are present, properly dressed, and clean, at their different divisions. The surgeon likewise makes a report of his party, and of his equipments. The first lieutenant now turns to the captain, takes off his hat, and says:

"All the officers have reported, sir."

To which the other replies:

"We'll go round the ship, then, if you please;" and they trudge, after leaving the deck in charge of the second lieutenant, or the master, as may be determined on at the moment.

A pin might now be heard, if let fall any where on board; but for the sound of the wind amongst the cordage, the stroke of a slack rope against the mast, or the occasional shake in the weather leach of a lofty sail braced her too fine, and except for the rippling sound of the water about the bows, and the creaking caused by her sliding over under the pressure of the wind, the ship might be supposed to be unmanned, and lying dismantled in the basin of Portsmouth dock-yard.

As the captain approaches the first division, he is received by the officer commanding it, who touches his hat, and then falls into the train behind. Of course, the next the skipper appears, the men along the whole line take off their hats, smooth down their locks, make any clumsy efforts to stand erect, fumble interminably in the waistband of their trousers, and shuffle, to no real or less purpose, according to the motion of the captain, to maintain their toes exactly at the line or seam in the deck along which they have been cautioned twenty times they are to stand. The captain, as he moves slowly past, eyes each man from head to foot, and lets his frown pass of which he disapproves. The officer of the division is ready to explain, or to take a note of what correction is required; but supposing all to be right, not a syllable is spoken, and at the end of the division the captain again touches his hat to the officer, who returns salute and remains with his people.

He then proceeds to the fore-castle, at the break of which he is received by the three warrant officers, the lawain, gunner, and carpenter, in their best coats, cut in the fashion of the year one, broad tailed, musty, full of creases from bad packing and little use, and rising from top to bottom with a double-tiered battery of buttons of huge dimensions. Behind these worthy onagers, who seldom look much at home in their uniform, stands the master at arms, in front of his troop of scampers; not the young gentlemen, but the troupe of small fry known by the name of the ship's boys, dressed in good time to be sailors, and perhaps amongst the best and truest that we ever number in our crews. As these lads are bred up exclusively amongst merchant men, they gradually acquire, naturally and by all the habits, as well as the sentiments, of his master's service; besides which they have nothing to learn, as merchant seamen invariably have to do when, by impressment or by volunteering, they are brought amongst naval persons.

It may also be remarked, that it is a great mistake to suppose that able seamen cannot be as thoroughly bred on a man of war as in any collier, which is proverbially the best school. We have, to be sure, in the navy, a greater number of hands on board in proportion to the quantity of work to be done; and as there are really amongst them plenty of men well qualified to do the duties required by seamen, those who are not yet thoroughly taught are seldom as directly called to learn a seaman's trade as they would be were they in a short-handed merchant ship. But this state of things furnishes no excuse, I conceive, for those officers who fail to consider it part of their business to see that every man and boy in their ships be trained as far as possible in all points of a sailor's calling. The opportunities are always at hand, the instructors numerous and competent; and it may readily be made not only the duty but the interest and pleasure of the older seamen to teach what they themselves know to those who are less informed. In the process of this useful schooling it will almost invariably come out, that many of those hands who hailed for able seamen, merely upon their own showing, had obtained higher ratings on the ship's books than they were entitled to. One person is perhaps a good helmsman, but is ignorant of the marks on the lead-line; while another may be expert as a leadman, and yet be any thing but trustworthy at the weather wheel. Or a sailor may steer a ship admirably, and call the soundings correctly from the chains in the darkest night, who might cut but a sorry figure at the weather earing in a snow storm. In short, it is a most important, and almost an imperative duty, on the officers of every man of war, to ascertain, by actual investigation, how far their people are entitled to the ratings they claim. If we do not see to this, we are perpetually misapplying the resources of the nation, by mistaking their true quality.

It soon becomes apparent amongst the crew of a man of war, as it does in every other situation in the world, that one of the most speedy and certain methods of instructing a person in any art, is to impose on him the duty of a teacher of others. In this way the whole of a man of war's ship's company may be taught as much of the art of seamanship as they could possibly have learned in the same time in a collier, or in any other ship that swims.

I should have mentioned, that before leaving the upper deck the captain proceeds to inspect the marines, who are drawn up across or along the quarter deck abaft. Most captains think it both judicious and kind to inspect the marines first, before going round the sailors' divisions: and I have never seen this practice adopted without manifest advantage. The marines are excellent fellows, well trained, hardy, and cheerful, duly respecting themselves, and proud of their service; while, from belonging to a fixed corps, and from not being liable (like the seamen) to be perpetually disbanded and scattered, they acquire a permanent interest, or an inherent esprit de corps, as well as a permanent footing in the navy. In like manner, the marine officers constitute one of the most gentlemanlike bodies of men in the king's service. They are thoroughly imbued with all the high sentiments of honour belonging to the military character; and they possess, moreover, in a very pleasant degree, the freedom of manner and versatility of habits peculiar to those who go down to the sea in ships, but which cannot be taught by any other method than practice, and pretty long and tough practices too.

The utility of this important body of men on board a man-of-war is so great, that it becomes the duty of every lover of the profession to support all its ranks and classes by every means in his power, and especially to render their situation when afloat one of respectability, happiness, and contentment. In speaking of the utility of the jolly marines, as they are kindly enough called by the sailors, who, in spite of all their quizzing, really esteem their pipe-clayed shipmates, I refer less to their services in action, either on board, or in the event of co-operation with the military on terra firma, than to their inestimable value in sustaining the internal discipline of the service. The manner in which this is brought about forms one of the most interesting peculiarities in the whole range of naval affairs; but it deserves to be treated of separately, and at length.

The two divisions ranged along the main deck, supposing the ship's company so distributed, next engage the captain's attention. I think it is usual to take that first which stands on the starboard side of the deck, with the after end, or its left, as military men would say, close against the bulk-head of the captain's cabin, while the foremost men of the division extend under the fore-castle. On arriving at the galley, or kitchen, the captain is received by the cook (or as much as may be left of him, according to the Greenwich Hospital joke,) behind whom stands his mate, generally a tall, glossy, powerful negro, who, unlike his chief, has always a full allowance of limbs, with a round and shining face about as moist as one of the tubfuls of huge suet puddings, tied up in bags along-side of him. The cook, aided by "Quamino," lifts the lids off the coppers, that the captain may peer into them, and ascertain whether or not all is clean and nice. With the end of his wooden leg the cook then gives a twist to the cock of the coppers, to let some of the pease-soup in preparation run off and show itself for the noble commander's inspection. The oven doors are next opened, the range or large fire stirred up, and every hole and corner exposed to view; the object of the grand visitation being to see that this essential part of the ship is in the most perfect state of cleanliness and good order.

Still further forward, before the galley, in the very nose of her, as the foremost nook or angle of the ship is called, and a little on one side, lies the sick bay or hospital; at the door of which the surgeon, backed by his assistants, receives the captain and his double the first lieutenant, and his double the mate of the main-deck. In their march, all in a row. The captain takes care not to pass any invalid's hammock without dropping a word of encouragement to its pale inmate, or begging to be informed if any thing further can be done to make him comfortable. Only those men who are very unwell, however, are found in their beds, and the rest being generally seated on the chests and boxes placed round the bay, a part of the ship, which, I need scarcely mention, is kept, if possible, more clean, airy, and tidy than any other. If a speck of dirt be found on the deck, or a gallipot or phial out of its place, woe betide the lolly boy, the assistant-surgeon's assistant, and the constant attendant upon the hospital. This personage is generally a fellow of some small knowledge of reading and writing, who, by overhearing the daily clinical lectures of the doctor, contrives to pick up a smattering of medical terms, which he loses no opportunity of palming off upon his messmates below as sublime wisdom sucked in at alma mater.

Just before leaving the sick-bay, the captain generally turns to the surgeon, and says, as a matter of course, "Doctor, mind you always send aft at dinner-time for any thing and every thing you require for the sick;" and I have frequently remarked, that his whole tone and manner are greatly softened during this part of the rounds, perhaps without his being conscious of any difference. A very small share of attention, on the part of a commanding officer, on such occasions, if kindly and unaffectedly exercised, leaves a wonderfully favourable impression, not only among the invalids, to whom it is more particularly addressed, but seldom fails to extend its salutary influence over the rest of the ship's company, and thus, of course, contributes materially to strengthen and to maintain his authority. Such expressions of sympathy never fail to act like drops of oil on the machinery of discipline, making all its wheels work smoothly and sweetly.

The lower deck is next examined. The bags have been carried on deck, so that, as I mentioned before, nothing remains but the people's mess-tables and mess things, their kids and crockery. As Jack is mighty fond of a bit of show in his way, many of the births or mess places exhibit goodly ranges of tea-cups and regiments of plates worthy of the celebrated Blue Posts tavern, occasionally flanked by a huge tea-pot, famously emblazoned with yellow dragons, and imitation Chinese. The intervals between the shelves are generally ornamented with a set of pictures of rural innocence, where shepherds are seen wooing shepherdesses, balanced by representations of not quite such innocent Didos weeping at the Sally Port, and waving their lily hands to departing sailor boys. On the topmost shelf stands, or is tied to the side, a triangular piece of a mirror, three inches perhaps by three, extremely useful in adjusting the curls of our nautical coxcombs, of whom one, at least, is to be found in every birth.

The mess-tables, which are kept so bright you would suppose them whitewashed, are hooked to the ship's side at one end, while the other is suspended by small ropes covered with white canvass. Against these lines rest the soup and grog kids, shining in a double row along the deck, which is lighted up, fore and aft, for the captain's visit, by a candle in each birth. In frigates, it is usual, I believe, to let the people have a certain number of chests, besides their bags. These not only form convenient seats for the men at meals, and couches on which to stretch their worn-out limbs during the watch below, but they afford a place in which the sailors may stow away some part of their best attire, deposit their little knick-knacks, and here and there a book, or, mayhap, a love-letter, or some cherished love-token. A chest, in short, or the share of a chest, even though it be only a quarter, or a sixth part, is always so great a comfort, that this indulgence ought to be granted when it can possibly be allowed. In single-decked ships, I conceive it may generally be permitted; in a line-of-battle ship, hardly ever. In a frigate, as there are no guns on the lower deck, where the people mess and sleep, there is nothing to clear away on coming into action; but in a ship of the line the men pass their whole lives amongst the guns, by night as well as by day, and as it is absolutely necessary to keep every part ready for action at an instant's warning, nothing can be allowed to remain between the guns but such articles as may be carried out of the way in a moment. It is sometimes nonsensical, and even cruel, to carry this system into a frigate, where the same necessity for keeping the space unencumbered does not exist. Doubtless, the mate of the lower deck, and often enough the first lieutenant, and sometimes even the captain, will be anxious to break up all the men's chests, in order to have a clear-looking, open, airy, between-decks, to make a show of. But with proper care it may be kept almost as clear and quite as clean with a couple of chests in each birth as without. Even were it otherwise, we ought, I think, rather to give up a little appearance to secure so great a share of comfort to those who at best are not overburdened with luxuries.

As the captain walks aft, along the lower deck, he comes to the midshipmen's birth, or room, in which the youngsters mess. It is the foremost and largest of a range of cabins built up on each side, and reaching as far aft as the gun-room, or mess place of the commissioned officers. It is only in line-of-battle ships that the midshipmen in the cockpit; while in frigates they not only mess but sleep in the part of the lower deck called, I know not why, the steerage. I ought to have mentioned, that before the cabins of the officers, and abaft those of the sailors, lie the births of the marines; but, of course, these mess places of the men are not partitioned off, being merely denoted by the tables and shelves. The boatswain, gunner, and carpenter, have their cabins in the steerage.

The captain looks into each of these dens as he moves along. In that of the midshipmen he may probably find a youth with the quarantine-flag up; that is, in the sick-list. His cue, of course, is always to look as miserable and woe-begone as possible. If he have had a tussle with a messmate, and one or both his eyes are bunged up in consequence, it costs him no small trouble to conceal his disorderly misdeeds. It would be just as easy, indeed, to stop the winds as to stop the use of fusty-cuffs amongst a parcel of hot-blooded lads between thirteen and nineteen, although, of course, such rencontres are held to be contrary to the laws and customs used at sea, and are punishable accordingly. The captain, pretending ignorance, however, merely grins: and, without exposing the boy to the necessity of getting up a story, remarks:

"I suppose, Master Peppercorn, you fell down the after-hatchway ladder, and struck your eye against the corner of a chest! Didn't you? And, what is odd enough, I dare say, when I cross to the starboard birth, I shall find Mr. Mustardseed, who has fallen in with exactly the same accident about the same time. What do you think? Eh?"

"I don't know, sir," answers the badgered youngster; "Mr. Mustardseed and I are not on speaking terms."

"Very likely not," chuckles the skipper, as he proceeds to thrust his nose curiously into the warrant-officers' little boxes. On arriving at the gun-room, he merely glances, with a well-bred air of assumed indifference, at the apartment of the officers, with whose habits and arrangements he scarcely ever ventures to meddle. He next dives into the cockpit, which, in a frigate, is used only for the purser's store-room, leading to the bread-room, both of which he examines carefully. The spirit-room hatchway, too, is lifted up for his inspection, as well as that of the after-hold. He then takes a survey of the cable tiers, which are lighted up for the occasion; as also different store-rooms of the boatswain, gunner, and carpenter; all of which ought to be objects of his particular care, for it is of great consequence that every article they contain should not only have an assigned and well known place, but that it should actually be kept in that place. It is, indeed, quite wonderful how much may be done in the way of stowage by dint of good management. In a well-regulated ship, there is not a bolt or a bar, nor any kind of tool belonging to the carpenter, nor a single rope, great or small; canvass fine as duck, or coarse as No. 1, belonging to the boatswain; nor any description of warlike store in charge of the gunner, which cannot instantly be laid hold of, and conveyed in half a minute to any part of the ship, low or aloft.

At length, when every square inch of the holds, tiers, sail-rooms, and all the cabins and births below, have been examined, the visitation party return to the quarter-deck, after a full half-hour's ramble. As the captain reascends to the different decks in succession, the men, who have never budged from their divisions, again pluck off their hats, the marines carry arms the moment his head shows above the coamings, and all the officers stop instantaneously in the middle of their walk to salute the commander, as he once more treads the quarter-deck.

"And now, sir," says the captain, turning to the first lieutenant, "if you please, we will rig the church."

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE SHIP CHURCH.

The carpenters and the watch on deck soon carry aft their benches and mess-stools; but as these are not sufficient to afford accommodation for all hands, as many capstan-bars as may be required are likewise brought up and placed athwart the quarter-deck, with their ends resting on match-tubs and fire-buckets, or on the carronade slides. These seats occupy the whole of the space from the break of the quarter-deck and the belaying bits round the mainmast, as far as the companion-hatch-way. Chairs from the cabin and gun-room are also placed abaft all, for the captain and officers, and on the lee side for the warrant officers and midshipmen; for, it need scarcely be mentioned that due subordination is made to keep its place even in our church.

The pulpit stands amidships, either on the after-gratings, or on the deck immediately before the hatchway. In some ships, this part of the nautical church establishment consists of a moveable reading-desk, made expressly for the purpose, but brought up from the carpenter's store-room only when wanted; sometimes one of the binnacles is used for this purpose; and I remember a ship in which the prayer-book was regularly laid on a sword-rack, or stand, holding six dozen naked cutlasses. The desk is covered over with a signal-flag, as well as the hassock for the chaplain to kneel upon, which is usually a grape or canister shot-box, surmounted by a cheese of great-gun wads, to make it soft.

All this implies that the weather is fine, the awnings spread overhead, and the curtains stretched fore and aft, to keep out the heat and glare. In rainy or blustering weather, the church is rigged under the half-deck, much in the same way, except that the pulpit is placed between two of the guns, and generally on the larboard side, as nearly abreast of the quarter-deck ladder as may be.

When all is ready, the bell is tolled by one of the quarter-masters, and the crew, quietly clustering aft, occupy the bars, stools, planks, and gun-slides, prepared for their accommodation. The marines range themselves on the front seats, while the officers take their places, of course not avowedly in the order of date in their commissions, but, more or less, they do fall into their respective stations according to seniority. The chaplain is now informed that every one is assembled; or, if there be no clergyman on board, the report is made to the captain, who generally officiates in that case. When the service begins, if there be any other ship in company, a pendant, such as men-of-war carry at their mast-head to distinguish them from merchant ships, is hoisted at the mizen peak, to show that the ship's company are at prayers. This signal, which is kept flying during the performance of divine service, is respected by every other ship, whether commanded by a superior officer or not.

Besides the prayers, which, as I have already mentioned, are "according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, established by law," the chaplain gives a short discourse, not exceeding at most twenty or twenty-five minutes in length. Some captains are in the habit of reading a sermon; but more commonly, when there is no clergyman on board, the prayers are deemed sufficient. These points, as may be supposed, become frequent matters of discussion in the fleet. I shall not enter into them further just now than by observing, that the majority of right-thinking officers appear to agree, that if the church service on board ship be not "solemnly, orderly, and reverently performed," according to the terms and in the spirit of the first article of war, it is either useless or worse than useless. It ought, therefore, to take place as regularly and habitually as the nature of the ship's duties will allow of. In the next place, it seems clear, that if the service be rendered so long, or be otherwise so conducted, as not to arrest the attention of the crew, or not to maintain it alive when once fixed, it is too long.

I will venture to say, there is rarely to be met with any where a more orderly, or a more attentive congregation, in all respects, than on board a man-of-war.

But, notwithstanding all Jack's decorum and his discipline, to say nothing of his natural inclination, when duly encouraged, to reflect seriously and properly on any subject, as he is made of ordinary flesh and bones, his eyes will sometimes refuse to keep open under the infliction of a dull or ill-delivered discourse; so that if the person who officiates happens not to read very well, his best chance for securing any useful attention consists in the brevity of his prelections. If the quality, rather than the quantity, of instruction be his object; or, if he measure the good he hopes to do, not so much by what his lips give out as what the ears of his congregation are willing to take in, he should be exceedingly careful not to fatigue his hearers. The inverse rule of proportion obtains here with such mortifying regularity, that a captain will almost inevitably discover, by some of the thousand and one methods he has of knowing what is felt amongst his crew, that the longer he make the church service beyond the mark of agreeable and easy attention, the more certain will he be of missing his point. The analogy—not to speak it profanely—between overloading a gun and overloading a discourse, applies especially to ship preaching. Sailors are such odd fellows, that they are nowise moved by noise and smoke; but they well know how to value a good aim and always love and honour a commanding officer who truly respects their feelings, ministers in a gentlemanlike way to their peculiar tastes and habits, and neither bullies them in the course of their ordinary duty, nor by means of long-winded and ill-timed discourses (or what they irreverently call Psalm-singing) interferes too much with their religious concerns.

It grieves me heartily to own, that while I could speak with confidence of the good which may be effected on the minds of the midshipmen, I feel scarcely any thing but despair on turning to the case of the sailors. They are such a strange set of beings, generally so entirely uneducated, and although, as I have repeatedly mentioned before, by no means naturally irreligious, often so totally destitute of any thing deserving the name of principle, or even of any ground-work of habitual reflection, upon which alone such a superstructure can be raised, that I really cannot venture even to conjecture how people of such very loose habits and dissipated minds are to be turned permanently to right thinking on this matter. Unfortunately, too, at the end of every three or four years, when at length the discipline of a ship has been perfected, and the empire of order so fully established that the influence of authority might, if ever, be expected to produce something out of these rough materials, the crew are not only paid off, but turned absolutely adrift into the worst holes and corners, the very sinks of society, where every thing good they have been taught, and every thing good they may have hoped or wished to learn, is speedily taken from them, and all sorts of iniquity poured into their place! In one moment are rudely swept away all their habitual veneration for authority, their cheerful unreflecting dependence on others, together with every nascent feeling of self-respect which during several years had been growing up together, and rather inviting than repelling the final and pervading influence of religion. Thus the unhappy sailor is suddenly left at the close of his long toil in a state of destitution fully worse than at first. In a few days, perhaps hours, after landing, he is pillaged of his money and every rag of clothes except the jacket on his back; and after being forced into drunkenness and every kind of debauchery and vice, he finds himself worn out with disease and intemperance, and becomes literally an outcast from society, amidst the most heartless and profligate of his species, helpless, useless and hopeless!

However melancholy, therefore, the reflection may be, it is in vain to conceal from ourselves, that unless both officers and men can be embodied more or less as a permanent corps, every ship that is commissioned merely furnishes a sort of fresh experiment in naval discipline. The officers are brought together without any previous acquaintance with one another; and many of them, after a long residence on shore, have lost most of their naval habits. The sailors, being collected hither and thither, we can get hold of them, are too frequently the off-scourings and scum of society. With such a heterogeneous crew, the first year is employed in teaching them habits of cleanliness and common decency; and it is only in the third year of their service that the ship becomes really efficient. Just as that point has been reached, all hands, as I said before, are turned off, to make room for another experiment. If a few active men of the crew have become better sailors, they generally go into the merchant service for higher wages; while the officers are again laid on the shelf. Something has been done lately to retain the petty officers in the navy, but perhaps not enough. It has been suggested, that instead of giving men pensions for long servitude, it might be more useful to allow their wages to increase gradually year by year, at some small rate, and at the end of fourteen years, give them half pay of the rating to which they had reached, if they chose to retire.

There are various other circumstances which I have not touched upon, that, I suspect, will for ever prevent the navy being rendered a permanent embodied corps; and perhaps, upon the whole, it may be questioned whether this would be advantageous to the country, or quite the contrary. This topic, however, is of far too great extent to be treated incidentally.

In returning to the subject of the church, it must be remembered that the circumstances of wind and weather will often interfere with the regularity of our Sunday service. To which it may be added, that the public duty upon which the ship is employed must often modify these observances very much, in spite of all our endeavours. In some parts of an Indian voyage, for instance, it may be safely calculated that no interruption will take place, while there occur other stages of the passage when divine service must of necessity be stopped, to shorten sail or trim the yards. In peace-time, or in harbour, or in fine weather at sea, no such tensing interference is likely to arise; but in war, and on board a cruising ship, the public service frequently calls a ship's company to exchange smartly their bibles and prayer books for the sponges and rammers. The collect in which they have petitioned to be defended from the fear of their enemies, and that their time might be passed in rest and quietness, may hardly have passed their lips, before they are eagerly and joyfully scampering up the rigging to shake the reefs out in chase of an enemy, with whom, in the next hour, they will perhaps be engaged in hot fight!

I remember once in a frigate, cruising deep in the Bay of Biscay, just as the captain had finished the Litany, and the purser, whose greatest pleasure it was to officiate as clerk, had said Amen, that the man at the main royal-mast head screamed out,

"A strange sail, broad on the lee bow!"

The first effect of this announcement was to make the commander turn round involuntarily to the man at the wheel and exclaim, "Put the helm up!" He then closed the book with a degree of energy of which he was made somewhat ashamed when the sound was echoed by that of the rapidly closing volumes all around him.

"My lady," said he quickly, but not without solemnity, "our duty to our king is our duty to God; and if, as I hope, this sail turn out to be the ship we have been so long looking after, you will not give a worse account of her to the country, I am sure, for having applied in good earnest for assistance from aloft." After which, suddenly changing his tone and manner, he sung out loudly and clearly,

"Hands, make sail! Let go the bow-lines! Round in the weather braces! Mast-head there, let me know when the strange sail is right ahead!"

Then leaping on the hammocks, and resting his glass against the after-swivel of the main rigging, he swept the horizon impatiently for the stranger. Meanwhile, the rattling of the chairs, capstan-bars, match tubs, and hot boxes, gave token of the rapid demolition of our antical church. The studding-sail booms shot out like pears from the yard-arms, and the sails which these pars were to expand hung dangling and flapping in the air, as if the canvass had been alive, and joined in the ageriness of the chase, while the gay ship herself, trembling fore and aft under these fresh and spirit-stirring pulses, dashed away at the rate of ten and a half.

Such are the incidents which happen on board single frigates, those rattling, joyous, fly-along, Salee-rover sort of cruisers, which range at large over the wide ocean, scour every coast, and keep the war famously alive. A much more stately ceremonial is observed on board ships of the line, whether at sea, blockading a port, or lying in harbour. The ships of the different divisions, or squadrons, sit till the admiral hoists at his mizen peak the signal indicating that divine service has commenced. The ill is then tolled in each of the other ships, the usual nodant is displayed, and the first article of war (already noted) is complied with, not only to the letter, but often, as may be hoped and trust, fully up to the spirit. At all events, I have heard many clergymen declare, that they never beheld any congregation in which more attention and decorum prevailed than in our ship churches.

At sea, both in fleets and on board single ships, the lagoon of Sunday is generally a season of rest and quietness; but in harbour it is often the most annoying riot of the whole week. There is nothing for the men to do, and the time hangs terribly heavy on their hands; which, it must be added, that our ships are too often fested by some of the vilest contaminations of the shore. Bad as these influences are, at any time or place, believe they may be considered at their worst when they come afloat; so that whenever it can possibly be done without injury to the service, portions of the ship's company should be allowed to go on shore in turn, albeit their proceedings when "on liberty," as they call it, are none of the most commendable. But we must let that pass.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

SAILORS' PETS.

A dog is the most obvious and natural pet for a gentleman; but still, a dog, with all his familiarity, is a selfish sort of companion, for he generally bestows his whole sociability either upon his master, or his master's servant who feeds him, or upon his master's friend who accompanies him to the fields. To all others he is not only cold, but often surly and impertinent. This, indeed, would matter little if there were not unfortunately a proverb extant, which has led perhaps to more squabbles, duels, and other uncharitableness, than most other causes of dispute. This pugnacious proverb, "Love me, love my dog," being interpreted, signifies, "If you kick my dog, I kick you." Then follows, if not the kick, words which hurt honour quite as much, and in the end too often draw away the life-blood of warriors who, but for some mangy cur, might have fought themselves into companionship in public usefulness and famine with "Duncan, Howe, or Jarvis."

No dog, therefore, can ever become a very general favourite of the crew, for it is so completely his nature to be exclusive in his favours, that were a whole pack of hounds on board, they would not be enough, nor afford a tenth part of the amusement, I may almost call it occupation, which a single monkey serves out to a ship's company. I take good care, accordingly, never to be without one in any ship I command, on the sheer principle of keeping the men employed, in a good-humoured way, when they chance to have no specific duty to attend to. It must be recollected, that we are often exposed to long periods of inaction, during which mischief is very apt to be brewed amongst the people.

But if a good monkey be allowed to run about the ship, I defy any one to continue long in a bad humour. Jacko is an overmatch for the demon of idleness, at least if light hearts and innocent diversions be weapons against which he cannot long contend. Be this as it may, I make a rule of entering a monkey as speedily as possible after hoisting my pendant; and if a reform takes place in the table of ratings, I would recommend a corner for the "whip's monkey," which should be borne on the books for "full allowance of victuals," excepting only the grog, for I have observed that a small quantity of tippie very soon upsets him; and although there are few things in nature more ridiculous than a monkey half seas over, yet the reasons against permitting such pranks are obvious and numerous.

It requires some decision on the part of the captain to carry through a point of this importance, and fairly to establish Jacko on board. The first lieutenant, who is, or ought to be, a sort of demi-god afloat, generally sets his face against all pets, and swears vengeance against the whole tribe of parrots, squirrels, rabbits, pigeons, mongoooses, dogs, monkeys, cats, and I am ashamed to say, he occasionally extends his anathemas even to lady passengers! Supposing, however, that the captain has authority and strength of mind enough to establish a monkey on board, the rogue will not have been ten minutes "entered" before he sets to work at some mischief; for he is the only truly known instance of perpetual motion.

When Lord Melvin, then first lord of the admiralty, to my great surprise and delight, put into my hands a commission for a ship going to the South American station, a quarter of the world I had long desired to visit, my first thought was, "Where now shall I manage to find a merry rascal of a monkey?" Of course, I did not give audible expression to this thought in the first lord's room; but, on coming down stairs, had a talk about it in the hall with my friend, Mr. Nulland, who laughed, and said,

"Why, sir, you may buy a wilderness of monkeys at Exeter 'Change."

"True! true!" and off I hurried in a cab—or more probably in a chariot, for this was some years before the glorious era of cabs. Mr. Cross not only agreed to spare me one of his choicest and funniest animals, but readily offered his help to convey him to the ship, and thus removed a difficulty which had troubled me not a little as I rattled along the Strand. The idea of taking a monkey in a post-chaise, even had I been travelling in that magnificent style, was not very agreeable: and it was quite clear, that either as an outside or an inside passenger in a stagecoach, the tricks of master Jacko would soon have got himself and his owner into a scrape with the other passengers. I mentioned my dilemma to Mr. Cross.

"Lord, sir!" said he, "there is not an animal in the whole world so wild or fierce that we can't carry about as innocent as a lamb; only trust to me, sir, and your monkey shall be delivered on board your ship in Portsmouth harbour as safely as if he were your best chronometer going down by mail in charge of the master."

I had some curiosity to see how this purpose was to be accomplished, and returned again some days afterwards to be present at the ceremony of removal. My chattering purchase was thrust, not without many violent struggles and horrible grins, fairly into a deal box, and nailed down. A number of holes had been bored in the top and sides, not large enough for our gentleman to poke his paw through, but sufficient to furnish him with air, and enable him to discover what was going on in the external world. In this predicament he looked about as miserable as possible, even at home amongst his kith and kindred of the ancient menagerie at Exeter 'Change, now, alas! demolished. When his box or cage was hoisted on the top of the Rocket, that fastest and safest of stage coaches, poor St. Jago, as the sailors called him afterwards, was in such an agony of terror, that I half repented of my cruelty in forcing him to emigrate.

Off he went, however, for the coast: and being left without provisions or water, except a few nuts, he was in a famous condition for his breakfast next morning, when the waterman ferried him off from Common Hard to the hulk on board which the officers had just assembled. As the ship had been only two or three days in commission few seamen had as yet entered; but shortly afterwards they came on board in sufficient numbers; and I have sometimes ascribed the facility with which we got the ship manned not a little to the attractive agency of the diverting vagabond recently come from town, the fame of whose tricks soon extended over Portsea. He certainly was the most amusing fellow on board, but also the most mischievous; and, I fairly grant, as such he became at times a real nuisance.

I need not dwell on the common-place tricks of a nautical monkey, as they must be well known to every one; such as catching hold of the end of the sail-maker's ball of twine, and paying the whole overboard, hand over hand, from a secure station in the rigging; or his stealing the boatswain's silver call, and letting it drop from the end of the cat-head; or his getting into one of the cabin ports, and tearing up the captain's letters, a trick at which even the stately skipper is obliged to laugh.

One of our monkey's grand amusements was to watch some one arranging his clothes in his bag. After the stowage was completed, and every thing put carefully away, he would steal round, untie the strings, and, having opened the mouth of the bag, would draw forth in succession every article of dress, first smell to it, then turn it over and over, and lastly fling it away on the wet deck. It was amusing enough to observe, that all the while he was committing any piece of mischief, he appeared not only to be under the fullest consciousness of guilt, but living under the perfect certainty that he was earning a good sound drubbing for his pains. Still, the pleasure of doing wrong was so strong and habitual within him, that he seemed utterly incapable of resisting the temptation whenever it fell in his way. When occupied in these misdeeds, he continued alternately chattering with terror, and screaming with delight at his own ingenuity, till the enraged owner of the property burst in upon him, hardly more angry with Jacko than with his malicious messmates, who, instead of preventing, rather encouraged the pillage.

All this was innocent, however, compared to the tricks which the blue jackets taught him to play upon the jolly marines. How they set about this laudable piece of instruction, I know not; but the antipathy which they established in Jacko's breast against the red coats was something far beyond ordinary prejudice, and in its consequence partook more of the interminable war between cat and dog.

The monkey, who entered with all the zeal of a hot partisan into the designs of the blues, showed no mercy to the red faction, against whom he had not, in fact, the slightest shadow of a real quarrel. As that trifling circumstance, however, seemed, as in graver cases of quarrel, only to aggravate the hostility, every new day brought a new mode of attack upon the unhappy soldiers, who were never safe. At first he merely chattered, or grinned contemptuously at them; or, at worst, snapped at their heels, soiled their fine pipe-clayed trowsers, or pulled the cartridges out of their cartouch boxes, and scattered the powder over the decks, feats for which his rump was sure to smart under the rattan of the indignant sergeant, to whom the 'party' made their complaint. Upon these occasions the sailors laughed so heartily at their friend Jacko, as he placed his hands behind him, and, in an agony of rage and pain, rubbed the seat of honour, smarting under the sergeant's chastisement, that, if he could only have reasoned the matter like a statesman, he would soon have distrusted his advantage in this offensive but not defensive alliance with the Johnnies against the Jollics. Sometimes, indeed, he appeared to be quite sensible of his absurd position, caned by his enemy, and ridiculed by his friends, in whose cause he was suffering. On these occasions he often made a run, open-mouthed, at the sailors; in return for which mutinous proceeding he was sure to get a smart rap over the nose from his own party, which more than counterpoised the anguish at the other extremity of his person, giving ludicrous occupation to both his hands, and redoubling the shouts of laughter at his expense. In short, poor St. Jago literally got what is currently called monkey's allowance, viz. "more kicks than half-pence."

In process of time, as Mr. Monkey, by dint of that bitter monitor, experience, gained higher knowledge in the art of marine warfare and ship diplomacy, he became much more formidable in his attacks on the "corps," and generally contrived to keep himself well beyond the reach of the sergeant's merciless ratan. One of the favourite pranks of the sailors was to place him near the break of the fore-castle, with a handspike, taken from the bow-chaser gun, in his paws. It was quite as much as he could carry, and far more than he could use as a missile against the royals; but he was soon instructed in a method of employing it, which always grievously annoyed the enemy. Theoretically speaking, I presume poor Jacko knew no more of the laws of gravitation, when applying it to the annoyance of the marines than his friends the seamen did of centrifugal action, when swinging round the hand-lead to gain soundings by pitching it far forward into the water; but without such scientific knowledge, both the monkey and his wicked associates knew very well that if a handspike were held across the top of the fore-castle ladder, and let go down when a person was about half way down it, the heels of the said individual would be sure to bring up, or stop the bar. The unhappy marine, therefore, who happened to be descending the steps when Jacko let his handspike fall, generally got the skin taken off his heels, or his instep, according as his rear or his front was turned towards the foe. The instant Jacko let go his hold, and the law of gravitation began to act, so that the handspike was heard to rattle down the ladder, off he jumped to the bow of the barge, overlooking the spot, and there sat, with his neck stretched out, his eyes starting from his head, and his lips drawn back, till his teeth, displayed from ear to ear, rapped against one another like a pair of castanets in a bolero, under the influence of the most ecstatic alarm, curiously mixed up with the joy of complete success. The poor wounded Gulpin, in the mean time, rubbed his ankles, as he fired a volley of imprecations, the only effect of which was to increase the number of his audience, grinning and laughing in chorus with the terrified mischief-monger.

I remember seeing a marine, of more than usual activity, and who had before been served this trick, catch hold of the end of the weather middle stay-stail sheet, hanging from the booms, and, before Jacko knew what he was about, succeed in giving him such a cut across his scone as the animal never forgot or forgave. Next morning the monkey stowed himself away behind the pumps, till the same marine passed; he then sprung out, and laid hold of him by the calf of the leg; and, in spite of sundry kicks and cuffs, never once relaxed his jaws till the teeth met amongst what the lolloloy boy, in the pride of his anatomical knowledge, called the "gastrocnemii muscles" of his enemy's leg. The cries of murder! from the soldier, brought the marines, and many of the sailors, under the half deck, to the poor fellow's rescue, while the author of the mischief scuttled off amongst the men's feet, chattering and screaming all the way. He was not again seen during two or three days; at the end of which, as the wounded "troop" was not much hurt, a sort of truce was proclaimed between the red and blue factions of the ship. Doubtless, the armistice was all the better kept in consequence of some tolerably intelligible hints from the higher powers, that the peace of the ship was no longer to be invaded to make sport for those who were evidently more idle than they ought to be, and for whom, therefore, a little additional work might possibly be found.

Old Jacko, however, like one of the weaker states of Europe, whose fate and fortunes are settled by the protocols of the surrounding political giants, was no party to these treaties; and having once tasted the joys of revenge, he could not keep his teeth quiet, but must needs have another bite. Upon this occasion, however, he kept clear of the corps, and attacked one of his oldest and dearest friends, no less a personage than the captain of the foretop. It was in warm weather, and the men, as usual, were dining on the main deck; the grog had been served out, and the happy Johnnies were just beginning to sip their darling beverage, when Mr. Mischief, incessantly occupied in his vocation of doing wrong, and utterly incapable of resisting any good opening to get himself into a scrape, saw the grog-kid of the captain of the top's mess standing by the fore hatchway. So he paced round, as if seeking for a bit of bread, but all the while keeping his face turned just so far from the fated grog vessel, that no one suspected his design. On reaching the spot his heart began to fail him, but not his wickedness; indeed, his was the very beau ideal of that character described in the satire of Junius, which, "without courage enough to resist doing a bad action, has yet virtue enough to be ashamed of it." Whether or not these mixed motives influenced old Jacko, I cannot pretend to say; but there he sat, chattering, screaming, and trembling, as if the sergeant's cane had been within an inch of his hide.

"What ails you, my dear Mr. Saint James?" said the captain of the top, playfully addressing the monkey. "What are you afraid of? Nobody is going to hurt you; we are all sailors and friends here, man. Not a royal marine is within hail of you!"

At this stage of the colloquy the sly rogue, having mustered all his energies, fairly grasped the grog-kid in his arms, and, making a clean spring from the deck, placed himself, at the first bound, beyond the reach of the horror-stricken seaman. This exploit was not so adroitly performed as it might have been if Jacko had been less agitated, and one half of the delicious nectar in the sailor's cup was jerked out.

"Yon bloody thundering rascal of a monkey," belowered the astounded topman; "let go the kid, or I'll shly this knife at your head!"

The threat was no sooner uttered than executed, for the sailor, without waiting to see the effect of his summons, threw the knife; and had not his saintship ducked his head, there would have been an end of monkey tricks for that cruise. As the glittering steel passed before the wicked scamp's eyes, the flash deprived him of all recollection of the mischief in hand; with a loud yell he leaped on the booms, and in his terror let the prize slip from his grasp. It fell on the coaming of the hatchway, hung for one instant, and then dashed right down into the cockpit, to the infinite astonishment of the boatswain's yeoman, a thirsty soul, and familiar with drink in all its shapes, but who declared he never before had tried grog in a shower bath.

Up started the enraged party of seamen on their feet. "All hands catch monkey!" was the cry; and in ten seconds the whole crew, including the cook with his ladle, and his mate with the tormentors in his hand, were seen scrambling on deck. Jacko scampered like lightning up the main-stay, and reached the top before any of the men, who had mounted the rigging, were half a dozen rattlines above the hammocks. The officers rushed to the quarter deck, naturally fancying, from the bustling sounds, that a man was overboard; but they were soon undeceived by the shouts of laughter which resounded from every part of the ship, low and aloft.

For a few moments Jacko sat on the main cap, chattering at such a rate that, had it been dark, one of the men said, you could have seen the sparks of fire from his teeth. I do not quite believe this; but certainly I never witnessed such an expression of fear. A dozen men were soon pouring into the top, while two others were stealing up the stay, and four or five had got into the topmast shrouds, to cut off his retreat in that direction; finally, an active fellow leaped from the rigging to the topmast, and sliding down the well-greased spar, almost plumped on the devoted head of this master of the revels. It was now absolutely necessary for Jacko to do something; so he made a clear run down the main lift to the lower yard arm. The gunner's mate, foreseeing this manœuvre, had sprung to guard his department, and had already lain out as far as the inner boom iron, with a gasket in his hand, and quite certain of catching the chase. Not a bit! "A gunner's mate catch a monkey?" The fable of the Tortoise and the Hare affords but a feeble simile to characterise such a match; and before old hard-a-weather and his gasket had reached the yard-arm, our nimble Mono had trotted half way up the leech of the top-sail, and was seated as familiarly on the bridle of the maintop-bowline, as if he had been perched on the feathery branch of a cocoa-nut tree, enjoying the sea breeze, in his native island, amongst the beautiful Cape de Verdes.

The sailors were now fairly baffled, and still more so when the expert rogue chose to climb a little higher, and then to walk deliberately along the standing part of the main-top-sail brace to the mizen-topmast head; whence, as if to divert himself, or force his pursuers to mingle admiration with their rage, he made a flying leap down wards to the peak haulyards, scampering along the single part till he reached the end of the gaff. There he sat laughing at a hundred and fifty men and boys, employed in the vain attempt to catch one monkey!

Sailors are certainly not men to give up a pursuit lightly; but after an hour of as hard labour as I ever witnessed, they were all obliged to relinquish the chase from sheer fatigue, and poor Jacko was pardoned by acclamation. The captain of the foretop, however, a couple of days afterwards, more out of fun than from any ill-will on the old grog score, gave the monkey's ear a pinch, upon which the animal snapped at his thumb, and bit it so seriously that the man was obliged to apply to the doctor. When this was reported to me by the surgeon, I began to think my four-footed friend was either getting rather too much license, or that too many liberties were taken with him, so I gave orders that in future he should be let alone. Nevertheless, Jacko contrived to bite two more of the people, one of whom was the sergeant, the other the midshipmen's boy. These were all wounded in one day, and when the surgeon came to me next morning, as usual, with the sick-list in his hand, he was rather indignant.

"Really, sir," said he, "this does seem rather too much of the monkey. Here are no fewer than three persons in my list from bites of this infernal beast."

"Three!" I exclaimed, and straightway got angry, partly at my own folly, partly at the perversity of my pet, and also somewhat nettled by the tone not very reasonably assumed by the doctor. "Send Black, the quarter-master, here directly!" He soon came.

"Don't you take care of the monkey?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, I do. You gave me charge of him."

"Well! and why don't you prevent his biting the people?"

"I can't prevent him, sir."

"No! Then throw him overboard!" I cried—"Over with him at once! There he stands in charge of the corporal and two marines; pitch him right over the le gangway. I will not have the ship's company killed and wounded at this rate. Over with him, I say!"

The quarter-master moved off to the lee gangway, and took the terrified animal in his arms; while, on his part, the poor creature seemed conscious of its approaching fate, and spread out its arms over the seaman's bare breast as if to supplicate his mercy. The old sailor, who looked mightily as if he were going to melt upon the occasion, cast a petitioning glance to windward every now and then from under the edge of his straw hat as I paced up and down the deck, still fuming away at the doctor's demi-official reproach. As I saw the fellow wished to say something, I at length asked him whether he had any proposal to make respecting his wicked and troublesome pet. The old man's face brightened up with this prospect of a respite for his favourite; and, after humming and hawing for a minute, he said,

"It is all owing to these two great teeth, sir, if they were out, he would be as harmless as any lamb."

"I tell you what it is," I replied, catching at this suggestion, "I positively will not have the whole ship's company driven one after another into the sick-list by your confounded monkey; but if you choose to draw those wild-boar tusks of his, you may let him live."

Few reprieves were ever hailed at the foot of the gallows with more joy by the friends of a felon than this announcement of a commutation of Mr. St. Jago's sentence was received by his affectionate companions. Even the marines, though constitutionally predisposed against him, were glad of the change; and I heard the mastery at the cabin door say, "I knew the captain had too much regard for the animal to do him an injury."

Injury, indeed! I question whether poor Jacko thought the alternative any favour. At all events, his friends seemed grievously puzzled how to fulfil the conditions of his exemption from a watery grave; for I could perceive a council of war going on upon the lee side of the main deck as to the best method of proceeding in the affair of the tusks, "Who'll hold the monkey?" said one.

No answer was made to this. It was like the old story of belling the cat; but there was no Douglas so bold as to try the experiment on Master Jacko, who, at any time, was a powerful animal, and who, it was naturally inferred, would make a tenfold effort when his teeth were the objects of attack.

"Even suppose we could tie the poor unfortunate victim," said the quartermaster, "who knows how to pull out these great big teeth? We might break his jaw in the operation."

There was a long pause.

"I dare say," at length cried one of the party, "that the doctor's mate, who is a good-natured gentleman, would be so kind as to tell us how we can manage this affair."

A deputation of the monkey's friends was accordingly despatched to present a humble petition to the surgeon's assistant, praying that he would be graciously pleased to lend his professional aid in saving the jaw, and perhaps, the life, of one of the most diverting vagabonds in his majesty's service.

Fortunately, the assistant medico was not one of those priggish puppies who, having little professional knowledge to balance their own inherent stupidity, fancy it necessary to support their dignity by the agency of etiquettes alone. He was, on the contrary, a young man of skill, good sense, and right feelings, who cared nothing at all about his dignity when he could be of any use; or rather, who left it to take care of itself without thinking of any thing but his business. To tell the truth, he was so much a lover of his art, that he felt secretly tickled with the idea of a new operation, and experienced on the occasion that peculiar pleasure, known, it is said, only to the faculty, when a complicated and difficult case falls into their hands. He had just mixed a glass of grog, after the day's work was done, and was eyeing the beverage with that sort of serene anticipation which the sober certainty of waking bliss is sure to produce, when the deputation made their appearance, having first sent in the boy, whose arm was still in a sling from the bite of the monkey.

"Are you in a hurry?" said the doctor, on hearing the novel petition; for he had nestled himself into the corner of the berth, with one foot on the bench, the other on the table, and his glass of "half-and-half" glowing like amber between his eye and the solitary glim of those profound regions—those diamond mines from which the Hoods and the Hardys of times past and times present have been drawn up to the very tip-top of their profession.

"Yes, sir," replied the spokesman of the party. "There is no time to be lost; for the captain, who is in a great rage, says, if we don't extricate the monkey's grinders, overboard he goes, to a certainty."

"Extricate is not the word, you blockhead; extract, I suppose, you mean. Besides, I fancy it is not his grinders which the captain has ordered to be removed, but his eye-teeth, or tusks, as they may fairly be called."

"Well, sir," said the impatient seaman, "just as you please, tusches or high teeth, if you'll only be kind enough to come and help us out of this plaguery mess, and save the poor dumb animal's life."

The quick clatter of feet up the ladders gave the signal that the successful deputation were returning to the anxious party assembled between the two guns just abaft the gangway-ladder, and nearly abreast the after-hatchway.

"Stop a little, my men!" exclaimed the assistant-surgeon. "How the deuce am I to operate on that beast unless he be held? and who is to hold him?"

"Oh, I'll lend a hand!" cried one. "And I, and I!" said a dozen voices. But when the attempt was made, and Jacko began to learn that mischief was brewing against him, he struggled, and snapped, and squealed at such a rate, that all chance of a successful result was out of the question; while the doctor stood by, laughing, and declaring that he was quite ready, as soon as the patient was willing to submit to the operation; but of this there seemed to be very little chance.

It happened that the day before we had split the jib in a squall, and the sail-makers were at that moment in the act of putting in a fresh cloth. Their usual working place, under the half-deck, was close to the scene of the monkey's intended extrication, as the sailors persisted in calling it, in spite of the doctor's repeated corrections of their technology. The sailmaker had just sent for more canvass; and as the boatswain's yeoman, the very individual on whom the monkey had bestowed a shower-bath of grog, delivered the roll of sail-cloth, one of the men said,

"Why should not we parcel him up in a strip of canvass, and so make a regular built mummy of him; just as I have heard tell the old Egyptians, in the times of Moses and the Plagues, used to serve their favourite cats?"

This valuable piece of historical lore was instantly acted upon; and the sail-maker having lent the bolt of canvass, poor unfortunate Saint Jago del Cabo Verde was enveloped in the folds, which were passed round and round his body, legs, and neck, till nothing appeared beyond the package but his rueful countenance. He was now laid on the deck, quite helpless, and more like a log of wood than a living thing.

While these preparations were going on, the learned doctor had leisure to consider the case more attentively; and it occurred to him that it would be needless cruelty to draw the poor beast's tusks, and therefore he exchanged that too well-known instrument, the dentist's key, for a pair of bone-nippers, with which he proposed merely to break off the points.

"I don't exactly know about that," said the perplexed quarter-master, when the assistant-surgeon explained his views of the matter. "The captain said to me, 'draw those wild bear's tusches out of him;' and I am afraid, if they are only broken, the monkey may still have a chance for going astern."

"Nonsense—nonsense!" interrupted the judicious doctor. "Can you suppose the captain wished that any thing should be done to the animal but just enough to prevent his biting the people?"

And, suiting the action to the word, he closed the fatal pincers, and nipped away the ends of the offending tusks, it is to be hoped without causing him any great pain. But although poor Jacko probably did not suffer much, his rage knew no bounds; and no sooner was the canvass unfolded than he sprang towards the afterhatchway, and catching the sergeant's hand in his mouth, closed his jaws with all his force. Instinctively the soldier's cane was in the air; but a dozen voices roared out, "he can't bite! He has got no tusches left! Don't hit him!" And, sure enough, although Mr. St. Jago gnawed and struggled, he could make no impression on the well-tanned fist of the veteran; but at length slunk off quite abashed amidst the shouts and laughter of the crew.

When the ship came to England, and was paid off, I turned over the monkey to the boatswain, who always remains in the ship, along with the two other warrant officers, the gunner and carpenter. This worthy personage used to place his pet in the bow of his little punt, as a boat keeper, when he himself went on shore at Common Hard. So exhibited, the animal soon attracted notice; and a Jew took such a fancy to him, that the golden bribe which he offered in exchange was too strong for the boatswain, and Master Jacko once more touched terra firma. But the Israelite, as may be supposed, having no other purpose in this transaction beyond the limits of gain, Saint Jago was not long in finding his way back to his old haunts in Exeter Change, after an absence of nearly three years. The keeper did not recognise him; nor was it likely that Jacko should claim acquaintance with his former master. I happened, however, one day, not long after the ship was paid off, to be in attendance upon a party seeing the wild beasts, when one of the monkeys set up such a chattering in his cage that he attracted the attention of every person present, and, amongst the rest, of the keeper of the establishment.

"That animal seems to know you, sir," said he to me; and upon going nearer, I discovered my old and mischievous friend grinning with delight. I must own, indeed, that my heart smote me a little as I looked at the broken teeth, while the poor fellow held out his paw to catch my hand, in the spirit of perfect kindness and forgiveness.

A far different fate, I am sorry to record, befel another monkey of mine, in another ship, and in a very different quarter of the globe. I was then in command of the Lyra, on the homeward voyage from China, after the embassy under Lord Amherst had been concluded. We touched on our way to Calcutta at the Philippine Islands, and, amongst other live-stock, laid in a monkey which had seen the world. He was born, they assured us, at Teneriffe, bred at Cadiz, and had afterwards made the voyage across the Pacific Ocean, via Lima and Acapulco to Manilla. This splendid bay is the chief station of the Spaniards in the eastern world, and has long formed one of those links in the vast colonial chain which enabled that once powerful nation to boast with truth that the sun never set on their dominions. Our extensive traveller had made good use of his time and opportunities, and was destined to see a good deal more of men and manners, indeed almost to make out the circuit of the globe. We brought him with us through the Straits of Malacca to Poole Penang, and from thence carried him across the Bay of Bengal to Calcutta and Madras. We next visited together the Isle of Franco; the Cape; and, lastly, St. Helena, at the very time the Ex-empereur of the world resided there.

This distinguished monkey differed in one important point from the last, whose adventures have just been related; for he had a particular liking for the marines, who caressed and fed him, and sometimes even ventured to teach him to play off tricks on Jack, which the sailors promised one day to pay back with interest on the soldiers. In so diminutive a vessel as a ten-gun brig, there is but a small party of marines, merely a sergeant's guard, and no commissioned officer, otherwise I hardly think the following trick would have been attempted.

It has been already mentioned, that on Sundays the ship's company are mustered at divisions, ranged on either side of the deck. Every man is then dressed in his very best togs, shaved, and trimmed up as gaily as possible. The marines, of course, sparkle as brightly as polished metal, scarlet cloth, and the eternal pipeclay, can make them. When all are reported present, the captain walks slowly and solemnly round, eyeing each man from head to foot, to detect a spot of dirt, or a thread opening at a seam, and peering under the breast of every gun to discover some neglected delta of unwashed-away sand; in short, to see that all is right and tight, or "ship-shape and Bristol fashion," a term, by the way, of which I know not the origin.

One day, while going these formal rounds, I came to a figure which at first sight puzzled me not a little. This was no other than our great traveller the monkey, dressed up as a marine, and planted like a sentry on the middle-step of the short ladder which, in deep-waisted vessels, is placed at the gangway, and reaches from the deck to the top of the bulwark. The animal was dressed up in a complete suit of miniature uniform, made chiefly of the coloured bunting used for flags, with sundry bits of red braise purloined from the carpenters. His regimental cap was constructed out of painted canvass; and under his lower jaw had been forced a stock of pump-leather, so stiff in itself, and so tightly drawn back, that his head was rendered totally immovable. His chin, and great part of the cheeks, had been shaved with so much care, that only two small curled mustachios and a respectable pair of whiskers remained. His hair behind being tied back tightly into a queue, the poor devil's eyes were almost starting from his head; while the corners of his mouth being likewise tugged towards the ears by the hair-dresser's operations, the expression of his countenance became irresistibly ludicrous. The astonished recruit's elbows were then brought in contact and fastened behind by a lashing, passed round and secured to the middle step of the ladder, so that he could not budge an inch from his position. One of the ship's pistols, fashioned like a musket, and strapped to his shoulder, was tied to his left hand, which again had been sewed by the sailmaker to the waistband of his beautifully pipeclayed trowsers; in short, he was rigged up as a complete sea-soldier in full uniform.

As the captain and his train approached, the monkey began to tremble and chatter; but the men, not knowing how their chief might relish the joke, looked rather grave, while, I own, it cost me no small official struggle to keep down a laugh. I did succeed, however, and merely said, in passing, "You should not play these tricks upon travellers; cast him loose immediately." One of the men pulled his knife from his breast, and cutting the cord which fastened the poor Spaniard to the ladder, let him scamper off. Unluckily for the gravity of the officers, however, and that of the crew, Jacko did not run below, or jump into one of the boats out of sight, but made straight for his dear friends the marines, drawn up in line across our little hurricane-house of a poop. Unconscious of the ridicule he was bringing on his military patrons, he took up a position in front of the corps, not unlike a fugleman; and I need hardly say, that even the royals themselves, provoked though they were, now joined in the laugh which soon passed along the decks, and was with difficulty suppressed during the remainder of the muster.

A day or two afterwards, and while the monkey was still puzzled to think what was the matter with his chin, he happened to observe the doctor engaged in some chemical process. As his curiosity and desire for information were just such as ought to characterise a traveller of his intelligence, he crept gradually from chest to chest, and from bag to bag, till he arrived within about a yard of Apothecaries' Hall, as that part of the steerage was named by the midshipmen. Poor Mono's delight was very great as he observed the process of pill making, which he watched attentively while the ingredients were successively weighed, pounded, and formed into a long roll of paste. All these proceedings excited his deepest attention. The doctor then took his spreader, and cut the roll into five pieces, each of which he intended to divide into a dozen pills. At this stage of the process, some one called the pharmacopoliast's attention to the hatchway. The instant his back was turned, the monkey darted on the top of the medicine-chest, snapped up all the five masses of pill stuff, stowed them hastily away in his pouch, or bag, at the side of his mouth, scampered on deck, and leaped into the main rigging, preparatory to a leisurely feast upon his pilfered treasures.

The doctor's first feeling was that of anger at the abstraction of his medicines; but in the next instant, recollecting that unless immediate steps were taken the poor animal must inevitably be poisoned, he rushed on deck, without coat or hat, and knife in hand, to the great surprise and scandal of the officer of the watch.

"Lay hold of the monkey, some of you," roared the doctor to the people. "Jump up in the rigging, and try to get out of his pouch a whole mess of my stuff he has run off with."

The men only laughed, as they fancied the doctor must be cracked.

"For any sake," cried the good-natured physician, "don't make a joke of this matter. The monkey has now in his jaws more than a hundred grains of calomel, and unless you get it from him, he will die to a certainty."

Literally, the quantity Jacko had purloined, had it been prescribed, would have been ordered in these terms:

R Hydrargyri submuriatis, 3ij. (Take of calomel 120 grains.)

This appeal, which was quite intelligible, caused an immediate rush of the men aloft; but the monkey, after gulping down one of the lumps, or twenty-four grains, shot upwards to the top, over the rail of which he displayed his shaven countenance, and, as if in scorn of their impotent efforts to catch him, plucked another lump from his cheek, and swallowed it likewise, making four dozen grains to begin with. The news spread over the ship; and all hands, marines inclusive, most of whom had never been further in the rigging than was necessary to hang up a wet shirt to dry, were seen struggling aloft to rescue the poor monkey from his sad fate. All their exertions were fruitless; for just as the captain of the main-top seized him by the tail, at the starboard royal yard-arm, he was cramming the last batch of calomel down his throat!

It would give needless pain to describe the effects of swallowing the whole of this enormous prescription. Every art was resorted to within our reach in the shape of antidotes, but all in vain. The stomach-pump was then, unfortunately, not invented. Poor Jacko's sufferings, of course, were great:—First he lost the use of his limbs, then he became blind, next paralytic; and, in short, he presented, at the end of the week, such a dreadful spectacle of pain, distortion, and rigidity of limb, that I felt absolutely obliged to desire that he might be released from his misery by being thrown into the sea. This was accordingly done when the ship was going along for the British Channel, at the rate of seven or eight knots, with a fine fair wind. Very shortly afterwards it fell calm, and next day the wind drew round to the eastward. It continued at that point till we were blown fifty leagues back, and kept at sea so much longer than we had reckoned upon, that we were obliged to reduce our daily allowance of provisions and water to a most painfully small quantity. The sailors unanimously ascribed the whole of our bad luck to the circumstance of the monkey being thrown overboard. I had all my nautical life been well aware that a cat ought never to be so treated; but never knew, till the fate of this poor animal acquainted me with the fact, that a monkey is included in Jack's superstition.

In the same vessel, and on the same voyage to China, the sailors had another pet of a very singular description; viz. a pig—literally a grunter: nor do I believe there ever was a favourite more deeply cherished, or more sincerely lamented after her singular exit. On our sailing from England, six little sows, of a peculiarly fine breed, had been laid in by my steward. In the course of the voyage five of these fell under the relentless hands of the butcher: but one of the six, being possessed of a more graceful form than belonged to her sister swine, being kept as clean as any lap-dog, was permitted to run about the decks, amongst the goats, sheep, dogs, and monkeys of our little ark. The occurrence of two or three smart gales of wind off the Cape of Good Hope, and the unceremonious entrance of sundry large seas, swept the decks of most of our live stock, excepting only this one pig, known among the crew by the pet name of Jean. During the bad weather off the Bank of Aguilhas, her sow-ship was stowed in the launch on the booms, and never seen, though often enough heard; but when we hauled up to the northward, and once more entered the trade-winds, on our course to the Straits of Sunda, by which entrance we proposed to gain the Java Sea, Miss Jean was again allowed to range about the decks at large, and right happy she seemed, poor lady, to exchange the odious confinement of the long-boat for the freedom of the open waist.

In warm latitudes, the men, as I have mentioned before, generally take their meals on deck, and it was Jean's grand amusement, as well as business, to cruise along amongst the messes, poking her snout into every bread-bag, and very often she scalded her tongue in the soup-kids. Occasionally, the sailors, to show the extent of their regard, amused themselves by pouring a drop of grog down her throat. I never saw her fairly drunk, however, but twice; upon which occasions, as was to be expected, she acted pretty much like a human being in the same hoggish predicament. Whether it was owing to this high feeding, or to the constant scrubbing which her hide received from sand, brushes, and holystones, I know not, but she certainly grew and flourished at a most astonishing rate, and every day waxed more and more impudent and importunate at the dinner hour. I saw a good deal of this familiarity going on, but had no idea of the estimation Jean was held in, till one day, when we were about half way across the China sea, and all our stock of sheep, fowls, and ducks, was expended, I said to the steward, "You had better kill the pig, which, if properly managed, will last till we reach Macao."

The servant stood for some time fumbling with his hair, and shuffling with his feet, mumbling something to himself.

"Don't you hear?" I asked. "Kill the pig; and let us have the fry, to-day, the head, with plenty of port wine, as mock-turtle soup, to-morrow, and get one of the legs roasted for dinner on Saturday."

Off he went; but in half-an-hour returned, on some pretence or other, when he took occasion to say,

"Did you say Jean was to be killed, sir?"

"Jean! Who is Jean?—Oh, now, I remember; the pig. Yes, certainly. Why do you bother and boggle so about killing a pig?"

"The ship's company, sir—"

"Well; what have the ship's company to say to my pig?"

"They are very fond of Jean, sir."

"The devil they are! Well; what then?"

"Why, sir, they would take it as a great kindness if you would not order her to be killed. She is a great pet, sir, and comes to them when they call her by name, like a dog. They have taught her not to venture about the mainmast; but if you only call her, you'll see that what I say is true."

"Indeed! I'll soon try that experiment;" and seized my hat to go on deck.

"Shall I tell the butcher to hold fast?" asked Capewell.

"Of course!" I exclaimed. "Of course!"

Off shot the steward like an arrow; and I could soon distinguish the effect of the announcement, by the intermission of those horrible screams which ever attend the execution of the pig tribe, all which sounds were instantly terminated on the seizings being cut that tied poor Jean's legs.

On reaching the quarter-deck, I told what had passed to the officer of the watch, who questioned its propriety a little, I thought, by the tone of his answer. I, however, called out "Jean! Jean!" and in a moment the delighted pig came prancing along. So great, in fact, was her anxiety to answer the call, as if to show her sense of the trifling favour I had just conferred upon her, that she dashed towards me, tripping up the officer's heels, and had I not caught him, he would have come souse on the deck. Even as it was, he indulged in a growl, and muttered out,

"You see, sir, what your yielding to such whims brings upon us."

I said nothing, and only took care in future to caution my friends to mind their footing when Jean was summoned aft, which, I allow, was very often, for there was no resisting the exhibition to all strangers of such a potent pet as this. To the Chinese in particular our comical favourite became an object of the highest admiration, for the natives of the celestial empire soon recognised in this happiest of swine the celebrated breed of their own country. Many a broad hint I got as to the acceptable nature of such a present, but I was deaf to them all; for I felt that Jean now belonged more to the ship's company than to myself, and that there was a sort of obligation upon me neither to eat her nor to give her away.

Under this tacit guarantee she gained so rapidly in size, fat, and other accomplishments, that on her return to China, after visiting Loo Choo and other islands of the Japan Sea, the gentlemen of the factory would hardly credit me that this huge monster was the same animal. In talking of Jean's accomplishments, I must not be understood as describing her as a learned pig, for she could not play cards, solve quadratic equations, nor perform any of those feats which enchant and astonish the eyes of the citizens of London and elsewhere, where many dogs and hogs are devoutly believed to be vested with a degree of intelligence rather above than below the average range of human intellect. Far from this, honest Jean could do little or nothing more than eat, drink, sleep, and grunt; in these respects she was totally unrivalled, and the effect of her proficiency in these characteristic qualities became daily more manifest. At first, as I have mentioned, when her name was called from any part of the ship, she would caper along, and dash impetuously up to the group by whom she was summoned. But after a time she became so excessively fat and lazy, that it required many a call to get her to move, and the offer of a slice of pineapple, or a handful of lychees, or even the delicious mangoes, was now hardly enough to make her open her eyes, though in the early stages of the voyage she had been but too thankful for a potato, or the skin of an apple. As she advanced in fatness, she lost altogether the posture of walking, and expected the men to bring the good things of their tables to her, instead of allowing her to come for them. This was cheerfully done; and though the only show of gratitude was a grunt, it was taken as a full recompense for all trouble on her account.

At the time of Sir Murray Maxwell's attack on the batteries of Canton, the Lyra, under my command, was lying at Macao, and during our stay the brig was visited by many of the Chinese authorities. We were also watched by a fleet of men-of-war junks, and had some reason to suppose that we might have had a brush with them. In that event, I think, our worst chance would have consisted in the enthusiasm with which the Chinese admiral, captains, and crews, would have fought to have put themselves in possession of such a prize as Jean, an object of infinitely greater attraction to them than any thing else we had on board, though by this time the good dame had lost sundry of her faculties. Both her eyes were bunged up by huge bolsters of fat, which admitted only a slender chink of light between them. As she had long lost the power of locomotion, she generally lay flat on her side all day long, giving out a low sort of grunt for more food about once every hour. At this stage of her happiness, two of her legs only touched the deck, the others being rigged out horizontally; but as she became fatter and fatter, the upper pair of legs gradually formed an angle with the horizon, and eventually assumed the position of 45°. The lower legs next began to leave the deck, as the rotundity of her corporation became greater, till, at length, all four legs were erected towards the heavens, and it became a source of discussion amongst the curious as to which side she was actually lying upon.

While things were in this interesting position, I received orders to get under weigh, and run up the Canton river to Wampoa. Off we set, escorted by these Chinese fleet of a dozen sail of junks. The wind was against us, but we soon beat up to the Bogue, and passed, unharmed, the batteries, which, to use Lord Nelson's expression, Captain Maxwell had made to look very like a plum-pudding. The water in the enormous river of Canton was as smooth as that in the Pool abreast Rochester. The country on both sides being a dead flat, with the sun bright and hot, though it was mid-winter, we appeared to be navigating amongst rice fields and cane brakes, almost as if we had been towed along a huge canal in a wild and swampy country. There was no wind, so that our sails could avail nothing; but the tide was draining upwards, and, as a number of the Indiamen's boats assisted in towing us, we reached our anchorage before night. During this gentlest of all navigations, even the slight motion caused by bracing the yards about, as the faint puffs of wind came to us over the paddy-fields, seemed to disturb the rest (very nearly being eternal) of poor old Jeany. A hollow, difficult, feeble moan, hardly a grunt, gave token of her impatience when a rope came too near her, or when a party of the sailors, running away with the jib-haulyards, tripped over her huge carcass.

We had scarcely anchored at Second Bar, in the midst of the grand fleet of tea ships, when we were boarded by a host of Chinese mandarins and Hong merchants, wearing all the variety of buttons by which ranks are distinguished in that well-classified land. This was not to compliment us, or to offer us assistance, or even to enquire our business. One single object seemed to engage all their thoughts and animate the curiosity of half the province of Quantung. The fame of our fat sow Jean, in short, had far outrun the speed of the Lyra, and nothing was heard on every hand but the wondering exclamations of the natives, screaming out in admiration, "High-yaw! High-yaw!"

We had enough to do to clear the ship at night of these our visitors, but we were by no means left in solitude; for the Lyra's anchorage was completely crowded with native boats. The motive of all this attention on the part of the Chinese was not merely pure admiration of Jean, as we at first suspected; for when the decks came to be washed next morning, and two or three dead ducks were thrown overboard, a rush of a dozen boats took place towards the spot, and there was a battle royal on the river for the precious property. Upon enquiry, we found that foreign ships were always surrounded by the boats from Canton, where the state of want appears to be so great that the people eagerly seek after the smallest morsels of food, and struggle with the keenest avidity to catch dead stock of any kind thrown overboard.

This at once explained the marvellous degree of attention which we had been honoured with; for the acute Chinese, skilled especially in hog's flesh, saw very well that our pet pig was not long for this world, and knowing that, if she died a natural death, we should no more think of eating her than one of our own crew; and having guessed also that we had no intention of "killing her to save her life," they very reasonably inferred, that one long this glorious bonne bouche would be at their disposal.

Our men, who soon got wind of this intention on the part of the Chinese, became quite outrageous against Fukee, as the natives are called, and would hardly permit any visitors to come near their favourite, lest they should accelerate her inevitable fate by poison. At length poor dear Jean gave token of approaching dissolution; she could neither eat, nor drink, nor even grunt; and her breathing was like that of a broken bellows: in short, she died! Every art was taken to conceal the melancholy event from the Chinese, but some how or other it got abroad, for the other English ships were deserted, and long before sunset a dense mass of boats, like a floating town, was formed astern and on both quarters of the Lyra.

The sailors now held a grand consultation as to what was to be done; and after much discussion, and many neat and appropriate speeches, it was unanimously resolved that the mortal remains of the great sow now no more should be deposited in the mud of the river of Canton, in such a way that the most dexterous and hungry inhabitant of the celestial empire should not be able to fish her up again.

As soon as it was quite dark, and all the Chinese boats sent, as usual, beyond the circle limited by the ship's buoys, the defunct pig's friends set to work to prepare for her obsequies. The chief object was to guard against the ravenous natives hearing the splash as she went overboard; and next, that she should not afterwards float to the surface. The first point was easily accomplished, as will be seen presently; but there was a long debate, in whispers, amongst the men, as to the most expedient plan of keeping the body of their late pet from once more showing her snout above the stream. At length it was suggested by the coxswain of one of the boats which had been sent during the morning to sound the passage, that as the bed of the river where the brig lay consisted of a deep layer of mud, it would be a good thing if Jean's remains could be driven so far into this soft stratum as to lie below the drags and hooks of the Chinese.

This advice was much applauded, and at once acted upon with that happy facility of resource which it is the pride of the profession to have always in store for small as well as for great occasions. The dead sow was first laid on its back, and then, two masses of iron ballast, being placed one on each side of the cheek, were lashed securely to the neck and shoulders in such a manner that the ends of the kentledge met across her nose, and formed, as it was very properly called, an extra snout for piercing the mud.

When all was ready, the midship carronade was silently dismounted, the slide unbolted, and the whole removed out of the way. Jean's enormous corporation being then elevated, by means of capstan bars and handspikes, was brought on a level with the post-sill. A slip-rope was next passed between her hind legs, which had been tied together at the feet, and poor Miss Piggy, being gradually pushed over the ship's side, was lowered slowly into the water. When fairly under the surface, and there were no fears of any splash being caused by letting her go, one end of the rope was cast off, upon which the well-loaded carcass shot down perpendicularly at such a rate that there could be no question of its being immersed a fathom deep, at least, in the mud, and, of course, far beyond the reach of the disappointed Chinese!

CHAPTER XXIX.

ISLAND OF JOHANNA.

It was not till about ten days after we had rounded the Cape of Good Hope, and struggled hard against baffling easterly winds, that we at length reached the tail of the south-west monsoon, in latitude $27\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ S. and longitude 37° E. This was on the 21st of July, off Delagoa Bay, near the southern entrance of the great Mozambique Channel, which lies between the Island of Madagascar and the coast of Africa. It was delightful to feel ourselves spinning along at the rate of nine and a half, with the ship's head at last fairly looking towards our port, Bombay; especially after having been detained more than a fortnight off the Cape, during which period we had advanced hardly so much as we might have done in four days with a favourable breeze. But nothing passes more quickly off the cheerful mind than the recollection of adverse winds and bad weather. As we hoist away the studding-sails, ease off the sheets, and luxuriate in the prospect of a clear blue sky, we fancy we shall have a fair wind and pleasant weather all the rest of the voyage. On this occasion it proved pretty much as we anticipated; for on the 25th of July we came in sight of Johanna, one of the Comoro Islands, and anchored next day, without having seen either Africa on the left, or Madagascar on the right. The narrowest part of the Mozambique Channel is not short of two hundred miles across, and at most places is more than twice as wide: consequently, as we kept near the middle, we had no chance of seeing the land on either side, and to all appearance we were still on the wide ocean.

The well known massacre of Madagascar in Robinson Crusoe, fable though it be, and fifty other stories from the same source, rivet themselves on the imagination with such tenacity, that I have never found myself near the imaginary scenes of that celebrated voyager's adventures without longing to have a scuffle with his savages, or to try my own hand at some of his thousand-and-one resources. It is this charming facility in combining difficulties, backed by unwearied ingenuity in devising remedies for evils which cannot be altogether avoided, that, I suspect, gives De Foe's work its chief interest in the eyes of sailors. In fact, I have often, in the course of my professional life, had occasion to know the value, not exactly of those very resources, but of similar devices, suggested by Robinson's successful example. He also teaches most admirably, that there is a consolation, if not a complete remedy, for almost every thing: and that by honourable means and manly exertions there are few difficulties which may not be surmounted.

We anchored in Johanna Bay, a few hundred yards from the shore, abreast of a long grove of tall cocoa-nut trees, forming a fringe, as it were, to a narrow belt of snow white beach, composed apparently of bits of broken coral. This beautiful little roadstead, or cove, lies on the north side of the island; and the best situation in which to moor a ship is just off a little rivulet bearing about south, with the high volcanic looking peak south by east half east, the Mahometan mosque east, and not more than a quarter of a mile from the shore. It was the first time I had ever beheld the gorgeous scenery of the eastern hemisphere; for although I had seen cocoa-nuts and other trees of the palm tribe at Antigua and St. Christopher's, the Caribbee islands seemed much less striking than those of the Mozambique, chiefly, perhaps, from the West Indian landscape being disturbed by images not quite in character with the tropics. I allude to the European sort of houses of the planters, to the English-looking boats, the numerous white people, and even to the style of agriculture in the West. But at the Comoro Islands, where all is primitive and oriental, the eye of the traveller is not provoked with sights it has ever rested on before; all that he sees is new, and as thoroughly tropical as heart can desire. The natives, though not jet black, like negroes, are sable enough, being of a very deep bronze colour; and the climate being tolerably hot, neither they nor their African slaves are much encumbered with dress. Most of them can chatter a little English, picked up from the Indiamen which call for fruit and vegetables; and what is particularly comical, these islanders have appropriated the titles of English noblemen, or other distinguished personages, which names they retain and are known by amongst themselves, as well as by visitors.

On steering towards the anchorage, a pilot came off who announced himself as Lord Gibbon. We knew the way perfectly, but accepted his services for the fun of the thing, on his producing a handful of certificates of his qualifications. We were even more interested with his canoe than with himself, for we had never before seen such a thing. Had he rowed off in a boat, instead of paddling off in a canoe, the disappointment must have been considerable; for nothing, perhaps, is more teasing, on coming to a new place, than to find things not different enough from those we have left. No boat, however, could well be more characteristic of the region we had got into than this picturesque little vessel, which was rudely fashioned out of the trunk of a tree, thirty or forty feet long and only one and a half wide, sharp like a wedge at both ends, and, being without a keel or bearings of any kind, it would have upset with the smallest load, or even without a load, had there not been a couple of very long outriggers placed across, and extending both ways. To the extremities of these spars was attached, by means of short uprights, a plank, or rather beam, one on each side, which just touched the water, and by their floating at the end of these long levers or outriggers, kept this most ticklish of barks from turning over.

It is obvious, that a canoe so fitted could not come alongside of a ship, at least in the usual way; so our friend Lord Gibbon was obliged to run stem on, when, by planting himself in the bow, he hoped to catch hold of the side ropes, and so scramble up. The ship was stealing through the water at the rate of a couple of knots only; nevertheless, although the surface of the bay was as smooth as oil, the six black paddlers bungled their operation, and missed the gangway. The leadman in the main-chains seeing the pilot adrift, called in at one of the quarter-deck ports for a rope, and the end of the cross-jack brace being handed to him, he threw it to the natives. Lord Gibbon was standing in the bow of his canoe in a long flowing white robe and a Turkish-like turban, altogether an amusing contrast to his crew, whose united wardrobe would scarcely have made a couple of pocket handkerchiefs. His lordship caught hold of the line, and made a flying leap towards the ship, but, alas! without the desired effect. Either the rope was slack, or the unwonted entanglement of his robes bamboozled his feet, for soon he went over head and ears into the water, out of which he was dragged by our laughing rogues, who planted him apparently in a woful condition on the quarter-deck. He seemed very indifferent, however, to appearances, and presented his dripping certificates with a good grace, adding, in tolerable English, the King of Johanna's compliments, and offers of all that his island afforded. The ambassador was without shoes or stockings, and we thought he must have lost them in the scramble; but our enquiries on this head were diverted to the state of his mouth, which we feared had been cut by the fall, for it seemed to be bleeding. He soon relieved us from this anxiety, by showing that what we took for blood was the effect of chewing the betel-nut, another consequence of which was the jet black colour of his teeth.

We had expected to have been surrounded by the natives in their canoes the moment the anchor was down, but not one appeared besides the pilot, who told us, that the king, having the most entire want of confidence in the honesty of his subjects, and being extremely desirous of keeping the peace, had given orders for no one to come near us. We, of course, begged this interdict might be removed, assuring the messenger that we should take good care of our property, and not fail to preserve the peace likewise. As soon as the ship was secured, all the officers except one or two were kindly allowed by the captain to have a run on shore. One of the passengers, two of the mid, and I, made a party, and set off in quest of adventures, towards the town, which lay at the distance of a mile and a half from the ship, and rather up the hill. On landing, we found ourselves in a delightful cocoa-nut grove, of which the underwood consisted of plantains, bananas, oranges, lime trees, and, I believe mangos. The cocoa-nuts shot up to the height of seventy and sometimes eighty feet: we were told that a hundred feet is not uncommon, but I think we saw none so high. The fruit grows in immense clusters at the top of the stem, close up to the branches. The tree from top to bottom is surrounded by a series of rings, doubtless the traces of former circles of branches which have successively flourished, decayed, and fallen off. The rings are very distinct near the top; but lower down, the trunk becomes so smooth that the natives are obliged to cut notches to assist them in getting up, either to pull the fruit, or to tap the tree of its juice, which is called toddy by the English.

The method used by the natives of the east in performing this feat of climbing, which is really a curious one, may be easily described. In the first place, they unite their feet, either at the great toes or the ankles, by a thong or strap about ten or twelve inches in length. This lies across the steps or notches cut in the tree, and is strong enough to support the whole weight of the body. A flat broad belt is then made to pass round the tree, and also round the man's middle, enclosing both in one ring, as it were, the body being at the distance of a foot or so from the tree. The climber commences by placing the strap which ties his feet together across the first or lowest step, while he adjusts the belt embracing him and the tree so as to be horizontal. He then plants his hands firmly against the stem, and a foot, or a foot and a half, below the belt. By now leaning back and tightening the body belt, he divides his weight between it and his arms, so as entirely to relieve the foot-strap of all strain. The legs are next drawn up quickly, till the foot strap lies across the second notch. The climber now removes his hands from the tree, and grasps the body belt, which becomes quite slack on his throwing his body forward till it almost touches the stem—his whole weight meanwhile resting on the foot-strap. By a sudden movement he then jerks the slackened belt about a foot and a half further up the tree. After this he once more rests his hands on the stem, relieves his feet of the weight, and draws them up as before till the next notch receives the foot-strap, and so on till he reaches the top. He carries along with him an earthen pot slung round his neck, and a huge knife at his girdle. With this he cuts away the young sprouts, and draws off the toddy, which appears to be the sap intended by nature to form the fruit. When freshly taken from the tree, in the cool of the morning, it forms a delicious drink, not unlike whey in appearance, with a slightly acid taste, and a pleasant sweetness, as well as a sharpness or briskness not very dissimilar to that of ginger-beer, only more racy and peculiar in its flavour. When allowed to stand for some hours, it ferments, and resolves itself into a liquor somewhat intoxicating, as I had often occasion to discover afterwards in India to my sorrow, not precisely in my own case, but in that of many a boat's crew, who (plague take them!) when once they got the fascinating toddy-pot to their heads seldom let it down while a drop remains.

I cannot describe the capital of Johanna with any hope of conveying a just notion of its burlesque fortifications, which a jolly boat's crew could readily escalate and take possession of, with no better arms than their stretchers. The houses are built of rude lumps of lava; and the streets run so narrow, that three persons find it rather inconvenient to walk side by side. The dwellings, as we could easily discover by standing on tip-toe, are all flat topped, and not a single one did we see with a window to it. The entrance is by a small door leading from the street to a square court, on one side of which is a broad rude portico conducting to the lower rooms, which are as dark and gloomy as need be. The floors are of mud, with appropriate walls of naked masonry, and here and there a bamboo sofa. Over some of these huts are rigged light, open balconies, or galleries, which must be agreeable enough in the cooler periods of the day. These are the mansions of the upper classes, the titled aristocracy of Johanna. The democracy, that is, the slaves, arrange matters with more convenience, taste, and comfort than their masters, although their huts, or hovels, are much smaller. These unpretending abodes are disposed in neat little squares round the stone buildings, and made chiefly of branches of the cocoa-nut tree, after the following fashion. Several stakes are first driven into the ground, at the distance of five or six feet from one another, and of the height to which it is intended to carry the walls, say six or eight feet. Between each pair of these posts there are then placed two or three of the long, feather-like branches of the cocoa-nut, with their centre parts, or that from which the leaves spring, upright. These leaves, which grow at right angles from the centre of the branch to the length of four or five feet, are then wattled, or, more properly speaking, plaited together into a kind of mat. As this is done with considerable care, the appearance of these walls is remarkably striking, perhaps from being so perfectly symmetrical, a circumstance almost invariably productive of a pleasing effect in architecture, whatever be the materials out of which the combination is formed. The texture of these verdant walls, of course, is not quite close, openings being purposely left, sufficiently wide to admit both light and air, although, it is said, the natives can weave their materials so closely as even to exclude wet. The roofs of these simple dwelling-places are thatched with plantain leaves intermixed with reeds, and fastened down by a very long kind of grass, growing every where on the island in great luxuriance. The entrance is by a space left blank in the work, generally about three feet high by two wide; and in lieu of a door, a prickly pear bush answers the purpose not amiss. Two or three of the principal inhabitants, however, did sport a door of basket-work; but this was evidently a luxury beyond the taste or the means of the society at large. The interior of these huts is divided into two compartments; the inner one, being the chief room, contains a sofa made of bamboo, with cocoa-nut leaves laced tightly across it. In the outer chamber the natives cook their calavances and wild-peas. The principal squares in the fashionable part of the town measured from seven to eight paces across, and as we entered two, or three of them, one after the other, we were received by such uproarious squallings and howlings of multitudes of children, that we were fain to back out again more speedily than we entered. I need scarcely mention, that while the grown-up portion of the community at Johanna content themselves with less than a square yard of clothing a-piece, on an average, the small fry are left pretty much as they came into the world. Generally speaking, these urchins are hugely pot-bellied, and not very pretty, nor are any of them so graceful or well-formed as most of their seniors.

I fell into conversation at one place with a half-blind little body of a granny, nursing, or pretending to nurse, a very small jet-black child. Upon my asking her some question, which she did not understand, she held out the infant, and begged me to take hold of it, that I might see how pretty it was, apparently cheapening her goods. I had no thought of becoming a purchaser, but could not refuse this soft appeal altogether, and having taken the frog of a thing in one hand, held it out at arm's length, as I might have done a blacking-brush, which, in fact, it resembled not a little in size and colour. The house was in the same Lilliputian style, being exactly four feet high by seven square; nor do I immediately remember to have seen a less comfortable human dwelling-place, except, perhaps, in some remote parts of a dear little Green Island, not quite so far off as the Mozambique, but which shall be nameless.

Having satisfied ourselves with this domiciliary visit to the suburbs, which are inhabited entirely, as it appeared, by the negro or slave part of the population, we requested our guide, who was called Mahomet, to conduct us to the king's palace. We had engaged this fellow as our cicerone, partly from his name, so classical in oriental story, and partly from his bearing in his hand a most official-like rod, painted red, which he assured us was a symbol of authority. It did not prove sufficient, however, to gain for us the immediate audience we desired with his majesty of Johanna. His influence carried us no farther than the waiting-room, a little square apartment, resembling exceedingly a small over-crowded dog-kennel. The heat soon became intolerable, in spite of the exertions of sundry attendants, who fanned the company with broad dry leaves of a huge palm, the name of which we did not know; but, if I mistake not, it is the talipot of Ceylon. At length, we were actually forced to seek refuge in the open air from a temperature somewhat above 100°, until the monarch should be ready to see us, and, under Mahomet's directions, we proceeded to the mosque, the first I had ever seen in my life.

Not to slander this building, it looked marvellously like a poultry roost, with a pigeon-house steeply erected over it, open on all sides but one, and shaded by a piazza. Objections were made to our entrance, but the glitter of a small silver coin broke down the laws of the prophet, if indeed there be any law against the entrance of Christians, which, I believe, there is not. At all events, we entered the mosque, after pulling off our shoes, at the desire of the priest; for while the English uncover their heads on entering a church, the Mahometans bare their feet. But we suffered no inconvenience, for the floor was laid with soft and clean mats. At the inner end stood the altar, or what we took to be such, a low sort of open box, rudely fashioned into Gothic cusings at top. Various oriental manuscripts lay about, and I observed, with great interest, some of the identical inscriptions in Arabic characters described by Sir William Jones, in his account of Johanna, as extracts, I believe, from the Alcoran. The pleasure which this great oriental scholar experienced, and has so well described, on first meeting with these writings, and being able to interpret them on their native spot, must have been very great. I remember feeling something more or less akin to this, in a small way, on first seeing the St. Michael orange actually growing at the Azores, and still more when, long afterwards, a set of genuine tea brushes were pointed out to me by a native Chinese in a field near Canton.

We next proceeded to our guide's house, where he introduced us, not indeed to his wives, for all these ladies were stowed away behind a screen of mats, but to some of the males of his family, and, amongst others, to a queer copper-coloured gentleman, who styled himself in his communications with us, "the Duke of Devonshire," and begged very hard to be allowed the honour of having our linen to wash. His grace was a little dumpy fellow, who stooped considerably, wore neither shoes nor stockings, and exhibited so little of a nose, that when you caught his countenance in profile, the facial line, as the physiognomists call it, suffered no interruption when drawn from the brow to the lips. The poor duke little knew the cause of the laughter which his countenance, title, and the contrast of looks, excited in those of our party who had seen his grace's noble name on the opposite hemisphere.

Our host presented us with some cool toddy, fresh from the tree, and mantling in a large pot, rudely fashioned from the shell of a cocoa nut; after which, pretending to become a little bolder in our cups, we made an attempt to peep behind the envious screen which divided us from the ladies, whose loud tittering we heard from time to time. Our impertinence, however, was repaid, as it deserved, only by a glance at a most severe old hag, wisely placed in the front ranks, as a sort of Gorgon shield to defend the more youthful damsels behind. The Mussulmen did not appear to relish our curiosity; but they were readily appeased by our ascribing the liberty we had taken to the effects of the potent beverage with which we had been entertained, and still more by our insisting upon paying a monopoly price for the toddy. Our host pocketed the affront and the cash with a glance towards the screen, and a laugh, which seem to imply, that for half the money we might have carried off the old lady herself.

It was now time to return to the palace; so we rose and stooped our way out of the door, glad indeed to get again into the clear and beautiful air of that celestial climate, and to behold, all round and above us, one of the richest and most gorgeous landscapes that human eyes could wish to rest upon. It now appeared even more contrasted than before with man and all his works; indeed, our attention was often most painfully excited during the day's ramble to this sad want of keeping between the occupants and the scenery.

"Where all save the spirit of man is divine."

The foliage, which, of course, varies in tint as the mountain rises, and as different kinds of vegetation succeed one another, extends in those latitudes, nearly in all its luxuriance, to the very top of the highest peaks, which are not less completely clad than the most sheltered glades or shelves of the low grounds, quite down to the water's edge. This feature of tropical islands, perhaps the most characteristic of any, is certainly amongst the most grateful to the eye of a stranger. At Madeira and the Azores, the vegetation is confined to a rich broad belt round the base; and even in the West Indies, the summits of the mountains are mostly barren.

The island of Johanna, like Madeira and all other volcanic islands I am acquainted with, is indented, or cut downwards nearly from top to bottom by deep ravines, which are sharp, ridgy, and distinctly marked by lines of sunshine at the sides, but are generally lost in darkness in the middle parts, along which, in the rainy season, the torrents must dash in grand style. At the time of our visit to Johanna, we discovered only one stream, which aspired to none of the hurly burly attributes of a mountain cataract, but tripped its sparkling and scarcely audible way pleasantly enough from ledge to ledge, from the distance, I dare say, of half a mile of perpendicular altitude, where its source was occasionally visited by a passing cloud. The lower end of this pretty stream was at length lost in silence in a winding flat shelf of ground, through which it gained the bay, after reappearing and crossing a white sandy platform, or strip of level beach at the base of the hill. This flat belt forming the shore was thickly covered by a picturesque grove of cocoa nut trees, growing quite close to one another.

After muniting about the streets for some time, we fell in with the governor of the place, a fine looking tall Arab, of a deep olive colour, unmixed with any touch of the fatal African hue—that melancholy and almost hopeless stain which is the cause of so much crime, and so much misery in the world! His excellency had planted on his head, for the occasion, a huge white turban, and cast over his shoulders, not without grace, a splendid robe of scarlet, matching rather comically with his worship's naked legs and feet. Our colloquy with this worthy functionary was cut short by a summons from the king; and as our desire to see his majesty had been rather increased than diminished by an acquaintance with his subjects, we lost not a moment in presenting ourselves.

The palace, which might have been stowed away in a moderate sized breakfast parlour, was built as nearly in the form of a ship as stones and mortar could be made to assume such unwonted shapes. The architects of the government, it seems, had vehemently resisted this strange whim, but the royal taste was not to be disputed; and strange work the poor builders of Johanna had made of it. The king, I suppose, was not quite satisfied with the result; for, in order to secure his point as to the imitation intended, which the masonry but poorly supplied, his majesty inserted a bowsprit at that end of the building which he meant for the head, and underneath ingeniously blocked out two round spaces as for hawse holes for the cables, devices which, as good courtiers, we failed not to applaud as extremely natural and proper.

The court of Johanna, in spite of these fancies, has its etiquettes as well as that of palaces in other parts of the globe; and instead of our being ushered at once into the royal presence, we were told that the king, fatigued by the long audience he had given to the captain of the Volage, and to our passenger Sir Evan Nepean, the governor of Bombay, had lain down, and was not, on any account, to be disturbed for twenty minutes. We held ourselves in some luck to get off so well; and, after a good deal of squeezing, we made our way, by the help of the lord chamberlain, whose paucity of dress we envied with all our souls, to a sort of antechamber up stairs, or rather up a ladder, for the room, had it belonged to any thing but a palace, might have passed for an honest cockloft. In a few minutes the great officers of state filled up the apartment to the edge of the trap door by which we had entered; and it soon became so hot and close, that the black hole at Calcutta occurred frequently to our thoughts. A remonstrance to our friend the red tick in waiting, produced a slight relaxation, at the cost of much of our popularity; for the parties sent down the grand staircase, could not, or would not, understand that we were likely to be suffocated.

These Orientals, however, like the Spaniards, even in their least courteous moments, seem never to forget the eternal of good breeding; and we saw upon this occasion, some of us for the first time, the graceful salam of the East. It is performed by bringing the fingers of the pen right hand to the forehead, while in the act of bowing. I have observed in India, when a peculiar degree of respect is to be shown, that the person making the salam first touches the ground with his hand, and then brings it to his brow; thereby intimating, as I conceive, that he has virtually performed an act of prostration. And surely no one who has witnessed that humiliating remonny, without any such conventional qualification, will deny that this substitute is better than the genuine tow, as the Chinese call it, where the head is actually locked on the ground.

Most of the natives of Johanna, even the negro slaves, like a little English; but the best examples of persons possessed of such acquisitions were found, where they ought to be, amongst the grandees of the island. The following is a fair specimen of the conversation of the kings and earls at the capital of the Comoros.

"How do you do, sir? Very glad see you. D—n our eyes! Johanna man like English very much. God—n! That very good? Eh? Devilish hot, sir! What's? Hope your ship stay too long while, very. D—n eye! Very fine day."

After which, in a sort of whisper, accompanied by a set insinuating smile, his lordship, or his grace, as the ink of the party might be, would add: "You want nge? You want goat? Cheap! I got good, very. You send me your clothes; I wash with my own hand—clean! fine! very! I got every thing, plenty, great, much! God—n!" And then, as if to clench the favourable opinion which these eloquent appeals had made, the speaker was sure to produce a handful of certificates from mates of Indian men, masters of American brigs, and middies of men of war; some written in solemn earnest, some quizzically, but all declaring his lordship, the bearer, to be a pretty good washerman, but the sort of person not to be trusted far out of sight, as he would certainly walk off with your clothes-bags if he could safely do so.

We had exhausted most of the topics, and all the English words of our friends of the fashionable world of Johanna, excepting the oaths, which their profligate visitors appear to have been particularly successful in sowing amongst them, when the king was graciously pleased to rise from his bamboo couch, and summon us to his presence. The audience chamber might have measured twelve feet long, and eight wide, with a window at one end made to slope like the stern post of a ship. Under the light sat the king, with his crown on his head; an appendage which, I must say, seems quite proper; and if it were always observed elsewhere, it would save many a bitter disappointment to children and nurses, as I can answer from actual experience in my own family, at the Tuileries, and elsewhere. But, in place of a sceptre in one hand, and a globe in the other, which he ought by rights also to have wielded, his majesty leaned both his hands on the hilt of a monstrous rusty sabre, or ship's cutlass, stuck perpendicularly between his legs, while his elbows rested on the sides of a clumsy, wooden armchair, exchanged probably with some master of a merchant ship for a bullock or two. The crown was amazingly grand, being stuck all round with stones, precious enough, I dare swear; and over all was thrown, not inelegantly, an Indian shawl, which dropped on either side nearly to the elastic bamboo floor, covered with ratan mats. Under the shawl we could observe a cumbersome black velvet robe, strangely ill cut, streaked across with gold lace, and garnished with a whole regiment of huge buttons. The folds of the robe concealed from our view the cut and quality of his majesty's small clothes; but certes he wore no covering below the knee, nor any thing on his feet, except a pair of sandals, consisting of a slip of deal, half an inch thick, tied to the great toe, and laced over the instep by small bands, made of the long grass of the island. This load of finery well nigh concealed a round, fat, good-humoured, elderly personage, whose countenance gave no great promise of intellect beyond what we had found amongst his subjects below stairs. With the instinctive readiness of high station, however, he gave the conversation a turn which interested his company, by asking us if we had ever seen an Arabic almanac. Upon our replying in the negative, and expressing the expected degree of curiosity, he drew forth a roll of papers from his chair, and read us the names of the months, giving to each what he doubtless considered an English translation. While I was enacting the good courtier by wondering at his majesty's knowledge of these subjects, he suddenly asked me in what constellation the sun then was? I had not the least idea, and felt rather put out to be asked such a question in full court; but his majesty kindly supplied my ignorance by saying, with a triumphant air, "Sun now in Leo." Indeed, I suspect that I gratified him far more by leaving this exploit to him, than if I had answered the question myself.

However this may be, his sable majesty followed up his question by asking me to make him a dial, saying, that the only instrument of the kind he possessed gave him very little satisfactory information as to the hour of the day. I began to think I was in a second scrape; for, although I had some faint idea of the principles of dialling, I felt by no means up to the task of constructing such a thing on the spot, and without reference to books. A dial, however, was produced, and the poor king's inability to make it work was sufficiently explained by a note engraved on the plate, "Lat. 51½ N.;" whereas Johanna lies in 12½ S.! On my trying to explain this to him, he remarked, that when the question related to sun dials, the discussion ought to be in the open air; so, after giving each of us a glass of cocoa nut toddy, he adjourned the audience to the street. I suspect, however, that the king's chief object in making this move was to call our attention to the beauty of his palace, and to expatiate on his own taste and skill in giving it a form as unlike any house in his dominions, or any where else, as it was possible to accomplish by means of such materials.

The truth is, that the island of Johanna lies directly in the track of ships proceeding to India by the Mozambique Channel, and being rich in supplies of fruit, vegetables, and fresh meat, becomes an important place of call for ships on a long voyage. Almost every vessel passing that way gives the king something to keep him in a good humour. This precaution is quite necessary, for his authority is said to be so absolute, that he fixes the price of every article the moment a ship anchors in the bay. In general he goes on board to market for himself, when he is propitiated with a present of gunpowder, muskets, and pistols; or possibly he may be indulged in his fancy for an old coat, or a pair of tarnished epaulettes. In short, nothing comes amiss to his majesty.

When we returned to the beach, after a famous scramble along the steep sides of the mountain, the bay exhibited a much more busy scene than when we left it in the morning. The ship was by this time completely clustered round with canoes, and her sides, hammock nettles, and rigging studded over with the natives, who clung to her as shell fish fasten themselves to the roots of the mangrove in the rivers of India. Meanwhile, many hundreds of the negroes, accompanied by their wives and swarms of little round things, more like hedgehogs and blackberries than children, were assembled in numerous chattering groups under the trees, by the side of great pyramids of all sorts of fruits, vegetables, eggs, and fish, which they were willing to sell for money, or to barter for knives, needles, looking-glasses, or trinkets of any kind. For a quarter of a mile along the shore there was such a jabbering, peddling, squalling, laughing, and bargaining, that we had trouble enough to force our way through the market to the beach. Even when we got afloat, there was scarcely room for the oars of our boat, so great was the crowd of native canoes. The ship, as we expected, was pretty nearly in possession of these merry folks, amongst whom we found some on the quarter deck arrayed in tawdry finery almost as grandly as their king, being toggued out with old gorgets and epaulettes, remnants of lace, heaps of buttons, and all kinds of odds and ends which they had purchased from the ships sweeping through their channel on the way to India.

As long as it was daylight, nothing short of force would have cleared our decks, but as the night fell the natives gradually paddled away. Many of them, indeed, having lost sight of the canoes which brought them from the shore, made their salam to us, and tumbled themselves overboard, with as much unconcern as if they had been natives of the sea, and never touched the firm land all their lives. By the time it was quite dark, every native had left us, and, though we could still hear a slight murmur along the beach, and discover a fire here and there under the trees, it was evident the great mass of the population which had been assembled during the day from all parts of the island, had returned to sleep in their own villages.

As soon as the first air of the damp land wind breathed faintly off to us from the side of the mountain, we quietly tripped our anchor, selected home the sails, and glided, probably quite unperceived, out of the bay. Long before the next morning dawned, we were twenty leagues to the northward of the island, spinning away towards India before a fresh south-wester.

THE END.

Extract from Montgomery's Lectures on Poetry.

There is a limit beyond which poetry and music cannot go together; and it is remarkable, that from the point where they separate, poetry assumes a higher and more commanding, as well as versatile character; while music becomes more complex, curious, and altogether artificial, incapable (except as an accompaniment to dancing) of being understood or appreciated by any except professors and amateurs. In this department, though very imperfectly intellectual or imaginative, to compose it requires great power of intellect, and great splendour, fertility, and promptitude of imagination. Handel, Hadyn, Beethoven, Mozart, as inventors of imperishable strains, both vocal and instrumental, may be not unworthily ranked with the first order of poets. To be an accomplished performer, however, though it requires talent and tact of a peculiar kind, no more implies the genius to compose music, than to be a consummate actor implies the ability to write tragedies. The mental exercise in each case is essentially as different as invention and imitation are. A skilful violinist may lead the oratorio of the Messiah as Handel himself could not have led it; Kemble could not have written the part of Hamlet, nor could Shakespeare have performed it as Kemble did.

INTRODUCTION.

The author of the following pages served for many years as an officer in the armies of South America; in his "Campaigns and Cruises" he has given a general description of the countries through which he passed, and anecdotes of the celebrated chiefs under whom he served. At the conclusion of this narrative of his service he remarks, "As the mass of available matter which the author had accumulated appeared to him so copious, that he feared, were he to embody it all in his narrative, he might be accused of plagiarism, or of the still less venial offence against many readers, the 'bestowing all his tediousness upon them,' he has been induced to give his stray anecdotes, and sketches of scenery and manners a local habitation and a name, in the annexed tale of Venezuela." A tale with the scene laid in Caracas is a novelty, but it is not on that account alone that we have selected it for publication. The language is excellent and the delineation of manners, we are assured, is most accurate, while the story itself is pathetic and natural. We have read it repeatedly, each time with renewed gratification, and trust it will communicate equal pleasure to our numerous subscribers. The customs, habits and manners of South America are almost a sealed book to us, in consequence of the few travellers who have described them.

In the course of the story the scene changes to the West Indies, where a friend qualified by actual inspection to judge, informs us the whole delineation is admirably true to nature. With these few remarks we submit the "Earthquake of Caracas" to the judgment of the public, in the belief that the verdict will be eminently favourable to the author; whose name we have not been so fortunate as to learn. He dates his preface from "Bath, England."

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.—THE NOVICE.

It rarely happens that historians agree in their views of the same subject, when attempting to point out the causes which have contributed to bring about any remarkable event recorded in their pages. If they collect their materials from contemporary sources of information, they will inevitably be confused and misled by the partial and contradictory assertions of rival partisans; while, on the other hand, if they resolve to suspend their judgment, until the fever of party spirit has been cooled by time, they must, in many instances, be guided by conjecture, in filling the indistinct outline vaguely traced by tradition.

It has thus been the fate of the Spanish colonies in South America, that the motives, by which they were influenced to commence the late revolution, have been, for the most part, as imperfectly appreciated by the advocates of that startling measure, as they have been misrepresented by its declared enemies. Among the former, the Northern inhabitants of the same great continent bestow unqualified praise, very naturally, on the act of separation from the mother country; and applaud the abolition of regal dominion, without any reference to the circumstances which effected this change in the opinions of their southern brethren. Many ultra-royalists, meanwhile, whether of Spain or elsewhere, do not hesitate to reprobate in the strongest terms so violent a wrench from the bonds, (no matter whether of fraternity or slavery,) which had so long connected the Trans-Atlantic states with Europe. At the same time, neither the injudicious partisans, nor the prejudiced adversaries of América Libre, appear to be sufficiently aware that, instead of "seeking the day of this dislike," in reality

"Rebellion lay in her way and she found it."

Few European nations in any age, and certainly none in modern times, afford such striking instances of exalted fidelity to their sovereigns, as the neglected and calumniated Criollos of South America had shown for centuries to the haughty race of Bourbon;—monarchs who never bestowed a thought on their vast colonies, but as connected with the supply of those enormous revenues the failure of which has at length, by an admirable and not unusual retribution, entailed debility and ruin on the land so long accustomed to look indolently to them, as its only means of support. Bitter as was the cup of tyranny, which the viceroys compelled their Indian vassals to drain,—glaring as was the corruption, and flagrant the consequent injustice, exercised on the devoted creoles by the Oidores sent over from Spain to decide all colonial causes,—and painfully mortifying as was the contempt with which their petitions were thrown aside, and their memorials neglected, in the bureaux at Madrid,—still the very name of "El Rey" (the king) was held sacred by them. They blindly persisted in attributing their wrongs to any hand, but that of their adored sovereign; and clung fondly, through evil and good report, to the delusive idea that he needed only to be made acquainted with their injuries to redress them.

While the youthful monarch, whom they all but idolised, was a prisoner at a foreign court, and deprived for a season of his throne, neither the machinations of the usurper's emissaries, nor the contradictory and oppressive edicts of the rival Juntas of Asturias and Sevilla, had power to shake the fidelity of the South Americans. At the very time when Venezuela was branded with the name of an insurgent province, and declared in a state of blockade, by the impotent malice of the Regencia at Cadiz, all classes and parties in that country were uniting to contribute largely, in proportion to their means, and in addition to the weight of taxes and imposts under which they groaned, for the service of that very despot, who made the first use of his freedom to convince the world, that nothing was farther from his thoughts than to afford his colonies the protection they implored.

The first blows struck by the unpractised warriors of Venezuela, who learned the lessons of conquest in the school of defeat, were actually aimed in defence of absolute monarchy. They unanimously and strenuously opposed Monteverde, Morillo, and other champions of the Spanish constitution; resenting it, in common with the ultraroyalists of the peninsula, as a degrading concession, wrung from their adored sovereign by the untoward circumstances of the times. They fought their first battles under the fullest persuasion that they were thereby acting the part of loyal subjects, in resisting all attempts at shackling by restrictions that despotism, which was hallowed by long prescription, and associated in their earliest recollections with their ideas of regal pomp and splendour. The proclamation of the Regencia, however, so ill-timed under the existing circumstances of Spain, aroused them from their day-dreams of loyalty, to the conviction that they had been shedding their blood in a thankless cause; for the sole purpose of rivetting still closer those chains, which they had, for the first time, a favourable opportunity of bursting. They resolved, in the excitement of the moment, and with arms in their hands, on a step which had not been previously contemplated in any part of the colonies;—that of separating themselves at once and for ever from Spain, and renouncing their allegiance to a king, who was confessedly as unwilling, as he was unable, to redress the wrongs under which they laboured, or to protect them against future aggression.

A year had nearly elapsed, since the citizens of Caracas, in conjunction with the deputies from those districts of Venezuela, which were comprehended in the confederation of 1811, had solemnly sworn at the high altar of their principal church, to observe the newly promulgated constitution, and to maintain inviolate, at the expense of their lives and fortunes, the independence of their native land. A few days only remained until the solemn festival of Jueves Santo; and magnificent preparations had been made, in public and private, to celebrate that day in the manner it deserved, both as one of the principal fiestas of the Roman Catholic church, and as the anniversary of signing the first declaration of independence. A spacious platform, decorated with olive wreaths and myrtle garlands, was erected in front of the altar mayor of the cathedral, on which the civil magistrates, and principal military officers of the infant republic, were to renew their oaths of fidelity and devotion. That the ceremony of high mass, to be performed on the occasion at the convent chapels, might be more impressive, those novices, who were to exchange the white for the black veil, had selected this day of universal rejoicing, at their own desire, (or, as was more frequently the case, compelled by the authority of their parents and guardians,) to ratify the vows of poverty and seclusion, which were to separate them for ever from their homes and from the world.

It has been invariably the policy of the Romish church to adorn these victims for the sacrifice, and to stifle in their bosoms the voice of nature, by an appeal to their personal vanity. The solemn act of renouncing the pomps of the world is rendered little less than theatrical, by the profusion of wealth and splendour in which the novice appears decorated for the last time. Then, when unrobing to receive the coarse dark vestments of the cloister, she throws each jewel aside with an air of disdain, perhaps unaffected, until she is shorn by the hands of the Madre Abadeza of those brightest ornaments, the flowing ringlets of hair, in which she must no longer take as innocent pride. In most parts of South America, the parents of each novice, who is on the point of professing, are enjoined to exhibit to her the world, from which she is soon to be divorced, in its gayest and most enchanting points of view. The last month of her sojourn with them is dedicated to a round of entertainments, such as she had probably never before witnessed, or even anticipated; and her relations and friends vie with each other in heightening the effect of this ordeal of balls, tertulias, and plays, through which, as through a necessary probation, every nun must pass.

The bigoted partisans of monastic seclusion refer triumphantly to this regulation, as a convincing proof that the minds of the novices are left perfectly free; and boast that the profesadas have had sufficient experience of the pleasures they renounce, and that they despise them on a full and mature conviction of their worthlessness. Let them rather candidly confess, that the inexperienced girls are intoxicated with the novelty of their situation, in which they find themselves for the first time the "admired of all admirers;" and that they are supported in their resolution to endure what is, in the majority of cases, unavoidable, by the air of heroism they assume, and by the fond belief that they shall be remembered with regret and emulation by their former associates, long after they have been immured in the cells of a convent.

Besides this powerful motive, it must be remembered, that the odious and unjust system of mayorazgo, (primogeniture) which existed in its fullest and most arbitrary form in the colonies, previously to the revolution, entailed the bulk of every family property, almost exclusively, on the eldest son. His younger brothers were thereby reduced to the level of dependents, as no learned or otherwise genteel profession was open to creoles; and his sisters were consigned, either to an ill-assorted marriage, as that must generally be where wealth or rank is exclusively on one side, or to the cloister. As the latter fate was usually contemplated as inevitable, and in conformity with the usual course of events, novices in general were in a great measure reconciled to it. From the resignation of despair, therefore, arose the calmness of their manner, too frequently but ill according with the quivering lip and tearful eye, at the celebration of the last ceremony.

Among the number of these fair devotees, who appeared at this time in bridal apparel, and surrounded by admiring friends, on the promenade of the Alameda, and in the palcos of the theatre, Maria del Rosario Peñuela was conspicuous for the apparent cheerfulness of her smile, and exuberance of her mirth, as she fluttered from one gay scene to another. Don Beltran, her father, was a wealthy creole merchant, who had devoted his whole life to the acquisition of riches, with which it had been originally his intention to purchase a Spanish patent of nobility;—a common object of ambition among the natives of the colonies. He had unluckily deferred from year to year, putting this his favourite scheme into execution, until the distracted state of affairs on the peninsula speedily followed by the revolution in Venezuela, obliged him to postpone, at least for the present, all negotiation on the subject at the court of Madrid. He, therefore, determined to avail himself of the law of mayorazgo, for the purpose of enriching an only son; and scrupled not to condemn his daughter to the seclusion of a convent, without having made the slightest attempt to ascertain how far her feelings on the subject coincided with his own.

Joaquin Peñuela, the son for whom Don Beltran anticipated those honours, which he saw no immediate prospect of being able to enjoy in his own person, had gone through the usual routine of education, prescribed by custom in the colonies. This was certainly by no means calculated to excite the envy, or arouse the jealousy, of the Spanish Hidalgos, among whom his father's ambition panting to enrol him. He had been duly instructed, by Don Beltran's steward, in that unvarying hieroglyphic scrawl, dignified by the name of writing, which has been handed down by tradition from the first settlers of the country,—men whom we may easily suppose, from their warlike habits, to have formed their letters "like spear-heads, or sword-blades,"—and is still usually learned, as it were by rote, without the least reference to the alphabet of any known language, ancient or modern. He also learned to decipher printed characters, by a separate effort of memory; for it must be understood, that in many instances, at the time we speak of, the acquirement of writing did not necessarily pre-suppose a knowledge of reading. He was thus enabled in process of time, by dint of application, to read the lives of San Antonio de Padua, and San Francisco de Paula; as also a voluminous work, well known in the colonies, entitled "Hechos Celebres," in which those who have faith in modern miracles may be edified by sundry passages of monastic lore, rather inclining to the marvellous. Here, for example, he read, how the pretensions of the first and only South American female saint,—Santa Rosa de Lima,—to canonisation, were stoutly denied by the Pope, who exclaimed—"India y Santa! así como lueven rosas!"—"Indian and saint! as much so, as that it rains roses!" and how, as the legend declares, "a miraculous shower of roses began instantly to fall in the Vatican, and ceased not, until the incredulous pontiff retracted his slander." With these and similar works, permitted to be read in the country, the youth used to beguile the tedious hours of listless inactivity, to which he was doomed in his father's house, previously to its being determined, as has been already hinted, that he was to be a Don.

"Some are born great," quoth Malvolio, "and some have greatness thrust upon them." This last was precisely Joaquin's case; and, that he might be properly qualified for the distinguished part he was to be hereafter called on to play, Don Beltran procured him a tutor, in the guise of a Monigote of San Francisco. Fray Diego was strongly recommended to his attention by the prior to that monastery, on the score of his humility and temperance; both which virtues were of no small account in the opinion of his new patron, who was at once overbearing and avaricious. In them, to say the truth, the young friar had been tolerably well disciplined, during the time when, in the humble situation of lay-brother, he used to perform all the menial offices required by his superior, besides begging alms for his convent at his leisure hours; and he had, in requital, been taught a smattering of the humanities, and finally admitted to the tonsure.

Under such an instructor, it will readily be supposed, that the embryo Don made no very striking progress in the politer branches of literature. Nevertheless, as his father now considered it expedient to allow him a provision for his private expenses, proportioned to his prospects in life, but far exceeding his most sanguine expectations, he soon formed acquaintances, who initiated him into the mysteries of the truco table and the cock-pit, while he acquired from the Monigote Diego a proficiency in the monastic games at cards, called briscas and tenderete. His ignorance was accompanied and rendered more prominent, (as is not infrequently the case,) by a proportionate share of self-conceit; and, to finish the picture, his selfishness was such, that he contemplated with indifference, or rather with secret complacency, the sacrifice which was about to be made of a sister's happiness to his aggrandizement.

CHAPTER II.

CHAPETONS.—A LOVER.

While Maria del Rosario's nearest relatives were thus combined to immure her in the oubliettes of a convent, there was one, who suffered more severely at the prospect of her irremediable loss, than he dared to avow, even to himself. Carlos Sepulveda's father was a native of San Ildefonso, near Segovia, in Spain, and had emigrated to Caraccas, early in life, with no fortune, but a tolerable education and unwearied industry, and no other recommendation, besides an unblemished Castilian descent, and the honour of accounting himself "as much a Don as the King." He married a criolla, of the small village of Maracay, with whom he received a portion, by no means considerable in amount, but sufficient as a foundation, on which the skilful and preserving Spaniard built an ample fortune.

The success of the Chapetons,—as all European settlers were formerly styled,—is indeed proverbial in South America, where the light-hearted and improvident natives used formerly to be astonished at the rapidity with which a mere merca-chifte, or pedlar, would amass such sums as were dazzling, even in this land of precious metals.

The "Graculus esuriens" of former days, and his modern resemblance, so accurately portrayed by our English Juvenal, are neither of them worthy to be compared with the Chapeton, in the science of money-making. Although the influx of needy Spaniards has been somewhat diverted from its usual channel by the revolution, still the prisoners of war, who were permitted towards the close of the contest to survive the "guerra á la muerte," (war to the death,) are invariably to be found established as shopkeepers, tallow chandlers, and innkeepers. This is more particularly the case in the sea-ports on the coast of the Pacific, where they, in a great measure, monopolize those professions; and in the large towns of the interior, as Bogota, Popayan, and Santiago, where they swarm almost to the exclusion of the native tradesmen.

Don Ramon Sepulveda, who lived in the comparatively tranquil times of Venezuela, towards the latter end of the last century, found much less difficulty in enriching himself, than would be experienced at the present day, by any one who might feel inclined to try the experiment. A Spaniard, meanwhile, never forgets his native land, under any circumstances. Don Ramon, having converted all his disposable property, except a small plantation at Maracay, into hard dollars, embarked for Cadiz, in the year 1800, with his wife, Doña Gertrudes, and his only son Carlos, then a boy about ten years of age, the care of whose education was one of his father's chief inducements to undertake the voyage. He arrived with them in safety at San Ildefonso, where he was fortunate enough to meet with an opportunity of purchasing an estate which had formerly belonged to his ancestors. The measure of his happiness now appeared full; especially as young Carlos, for whom he had taken care to provide the best instructors in every polite accomplishment, as well as in most branches of liberal education, was all that the fondest parent could desire.

A melancholy reverse of fortune took place, which blighted all these fair prospects. On the invasion of Spain by the armies of Napoleon, in 1808, Don Ramon, with all the enthusiasm of a parvenu who is eager to distinguish himself in the country, armed and disciplined a body composed of his tenants and peons, at the head of whom he joined the guerrilla, commanded by the celebrated partisan, Pablo Morillo. But being unfortunately wounded and made prisoner, near Palencia, in a rencontre with a skirmishing party of Marmont's cavalry, he was tried by a French military commission, and shot as a traitor to his new sovereign, Joseph Buonaparte. His estate was, of course, confiscated to "Uncle Joe," as customary in similar cases. His widow, almost heart-broken at his loss, was enabled by the fidelity of the peasants to make her escape to Cadiz with her son Carlos; having saved, from the wreck of her husband's property, barely a sufficiency to obtain a passage to Caraccas. Thither she determined to return, and cherish the remembrance of her misfortunes, in the solitude of her plantation at Maracay.

Don Gabrino, her brother, who was the Señor Cura of the village, a man of superior talent and information, found in his young nephew a pleasing companion, as well as an intelligent pupil; and, in the few years that elapsed, immediately before the revolution, employed himself, most agreeably and successfully, in perfecting his education as far as was in his power. At the time of the declaration of independence, a period in which talent of every description was called into action, and met with flattering and effectual encouragement from the new government, the Cura of Maracay, whose sentiments as a patriot, and eminent abilities as an orator, were well known, was invited to the capital on the recommendation of General Miranda, with whom he had been formerly on intimate terms. Through his interest, Don Gabrino was appointed to fill a vacant stall in the cathedral, as canónigo, and was named chaplain to the Junta Suprema of Caraccas. At his earnest request, but more particularly with a view to her son's advantage, Doña Gertrudes accompanied her brother to the city; and shortly after, Carlos Sepulveda entered the regiment of Cazadores de Aragoa, with the rank of alférez. Having distinguished himself in several engagements with the royalist forces, on the frontiers of Coro, he was promoted, according to the rapid ascenso of the time, through the intermediate steps, to the command of a troop in the Huzares de Caraccas, and was selected by Miranda to fill a vacancy in his staff, as aide-de-camp.

In the latter capacity, he necessarily passed the greater part of his time at head-quarters, in the capital, where he became acquainted with Señor de Peñuela, who was distantly related to his mother. Don Beltran was well known to be a bitter opponent of his country's independence, and the more inveterately so, as it was affected by means of a revolution, which had blasted his long-cherished hopes of ennobling himself. He was, at the same time, exceedingly anxious to be on good terms with the existing government, hoping by that means to escape the suspicion under which he laboured, (not unconscious that he deserved it,) of furnishing secret intelligence* to the royalist General Monteverde, at Cartagena. He therefore eagerly courted the friendship of a chaplain of the Junta, although he had looked down with disdain on the humble and unimportant Cura of Maracay; taking especial pains to conciliate the good opinion of Doña Gertrudes and her son, as he was well aware, that he should, through them, pay most effectual court to the canónigo. Doña Gertrudes, far from suspecting him of any ulterior views in the flattering advances he made, felt pleased by his attention to Carlos; and, on that account, readily admitted the apologies and excuses he had invented for not having earlier acknowledged the relationship. Her son, too, although by no means captivated by his manners, which were anything but prepossessing, could not help being grateful, for the lively interest he appeared to take in the welfare of his family.

Maria del Rosario Peñuela was, at this period, a boarder at the convent of Santa Clara, where Doña Gertrudes became a constant visitor, taking a maternal interest in the lovely affectionate girl, who had lost her mother at a very early age, and who had evidently never known a father's tenderness. Don Beltran, indeed, seldom if ever visited her; having committed her entirely to the care of the Madre Abadéza, (Mother Abbess,) who was as indulgent towards her as could be expected from one of an order of devotees, by whom all natural affection is considered a crime. As for her brother Joaquin, she scarcely knew him, nor had she even seen him since they were both children. Carlos accompanied his mother in her daily visits to the convent; at first, from a natural feeling of curiosity, to ascertain what she could possibly find to interest her so warmly in the sister of so repulsive a being, as he could not but consider Joaquin to be. He was charmed by her unadorned youthful beauty; and his admiration of her unaffected loveliness ripened at each succeeding interview, into the purest and most ardent love.

Maria del Rosario also loved him, she believed, as a brother. When summoned by the *Hermana Escucha of the week to the grated window of the parlour, she hurried, with greater eagerness than usual, on the days she expected to see him. If he chanced not to accompany his mother, which was but seldom the case, and then only when the unavoidable duties of his profession detained him, she would enquire for him with such undissembled earnestness, that Doña Gertrudes, although far from being particularly clear sighted or suspicious, could not avoid observing that the young novice felt such an interest in Carlos, as might one day prove fatal to her peace of mind. To warn her on the subject appeared impossible; for Doña Gertrudes well knew and respected the delicacy of her feelings, and dreaded to inflict on them an undeserved and needless wound. It was, at the same time, sufficiently obvious, that it had become indispensably necessary to attempt, by the temporary removal of the beloved object, to erase the impression he had unfortunately made: for she was too well aware of Don Beltran's intentions with respect to the aggrandizement of his son, to hope that he could be prevailed on to forego them in favour of a youth, whose paternal estate was so small, that he might almost be said to depend on his sword alone for his future fortunes. The very circumstance of his having accepted a commission in the service of La Patria, was also decidedly against his pretensions: for, although Don Beltran took especial care to disguise his principles, he was notoriously addicted to the Godot cause, as could not but be surmised, from his constant and familiar intercourse with the avowed as well as secret emissaries of Joseph Bonaparte, of whom there were many at the time in Caraccas. Besides, he and his son had invariably evaded, under different frivolous pro-

† All European Spaniards were known in South America by the soubriquet of Godos, or Goths, in allusion as well to their Gothic descent, as to the barbarous and overwhelming devastation, with which they appeared to delight in laying waste the finest country in the world. The same name was, subsequently to the revolution, used indiscriminately to designate all royalists, whether Spaniards or Criollos.

tences, being enrolled in the Guardia Cívica, or any other of the numerous provincial corps, which had been raised from time to time in support of the independence of Venezuela; although to be a member of them was then considered, in some measure, a test of patriotism.

Don Carlos did not fail soon to perceive, that his mother no longer invited him to accompany her in her visits to the novice of Santa Clara; and that she evidently took pains to evade his proposals of calling at the convent. Doña Gertrudes was at length obliged partly to explain her motives; and flattered herself at the moment, from his silence and apparent acquiescence, which were in reality effects of his surprise and astonishment, that he would find no difficulty in suppressing, and by degrees totally overcoming, his growing attachment. She even began to doubt, from the calmness with which he heard her, whether, in reality, it ever existed. Her son, indeed, resolved to be guided by her advice; and determined on making an effort to forget, in the duties and animating exercise of his profession, that he had ever seen Maria del Rosario;—

"But he who stems a stream with sand,
And fetters flame with flaxen band,
Has yet a harder task to prove,—
By firm resolve to conquer love!"

Let those who have studied to forget any object,—be it what it may,—of love, ambition, hope, fear, or the meaner pursuits of this "working-day world,"—let them say, how the very endeavour serves but to imprint it yet more forcibly on the memory; and how the resolution to think no more of it, recalls it more vividly and incessantly to the recollection.

In his mother's earnestness, while she attempted to impress on him the necessity of his forbearing to visit the convent, she had unadvisedly, and almost without being aware of what she said, hinted at the too probable effect of his frequent attentions to her young friend. Carlos, in his subsequent reflections on this communication, felt the full import of her words, and dwelt on them with fond and secret exultation. He had no suspicion that the novice was to end in the cloister; and flattered himself that nothing but his want of fortune (which ever appears to a youthful lover an insuperable impediment) could prevent the eventual accomplishment of the wishes he permitted himself to form. He therefore indulged, without scruple, in seductive day-dreams, which enchanted his imagination with honours to be won in the field, and the prospect of elevating himself, by the help of his sword and lance, to a pinnacle of martial glory, from whence he might venture, without fear of refusal, to offer his hand where he felt his heart to be irrevocably devoted. Animated by these delusive hopes, he engaged with renewed ardour in the career of fame; and, in the few short visits which he paid to the convent, on his return from the succeeding campaigns, he commanded himself so far, as to obtain the warmest praise from his mother for his self-denial, and even to deceive Maria del Rosario into a belief, that he regarded her with indifference or aversion.

At length, on his return from an expedition in which he had accompanied Miranda, he unexpectedly heard that she was to take the veil on the festival of Jueves Santo following; and the truth flashed on him at once, in all its melancholy certainty. With a sudden resolution, inspired by despair, he sought out Don Beltran, and disclosed to him his long cherished hopes; imploring him to pause were it but for another year, before he crushed them for ever. Don Beltran listened to him with composure, but, as Carlos fancied, with a smile of fiendish exultation. He coolly answered, that nothing would have given him greater pleasure than the alliance of a family, which he had every reason to respect; but that circumstances, which could not be controlled or altered, imperiously demanded the seclusion of his daughter. He farther observed, that as the parties could not, in all probability, have seen much of each other, he had no doubt but that the momentary disappointment would leave no lasting trace, when once her monastic vow had rendered all regret unavailing. He concluded, by demanding of Don Carlos, as a man of honour, that he would abstain, if possible, from seeing his daughter; and that, at all events, he would pledge his word not to make the least attempt at influencing her determination, which he declared to be decidedly in favour of the cloister.

Sepulveda, irritated beyond the bounds of forbearance, by the calm contemptuous tone in which his proposal was rejected, renewed his expostulations, with a heat that gave Don Beltran all the advantage over him he could desire. In fact, Peña was so conscious of the unnatural and arbitrary nature of the measure he had resolved on, that he was glad of a pretence for quarrelling with any one who ventured to oppose it.

The conference having ended in a most unsatisfactory manner for Sepulveda he hurried to the society of his brother officers, with the intention of shaking off, in their agreeable company, if possible, the sense of degradation he could not help feeling, when he reflected on his having stooped to solicit the alliance of one, whom he had now every reason to dislike. Not even to his mother did he relate the mortifying occurrence; for he was well aware that the disappointment of his hopes could not fail to affect her deeply. His honourable feelings still more forcibly forbade him to reveal his hopeless love to its unconscious object; and he firmly resolved to carry the secret with him to his grave, rather than embitter her existence in the seclusion to which she was doomed, by an unnecessary disclosure.

Don Beltran, on his side, felt himself equally interested, although from very different motives, in concealing all that had taken place at their interview; so that Doña Gertrudes still continued her visits at his house, and with greater frequency during the month of temporary freedom his daughter enjoyed, between the expiration of her novitiate, and the day of her taking the veil. She also so far conquered her habitual reluctance to mixing in society,—for Maria del Rosario's sake, and at her earnest request,—that she accompanied her young friend to all the public places, as well as private entertainments, at which it was usual to appear, while treading the round of gaiety prescribed by custom to those in her situation.

Doña Gertrudes could not help observing, that her son studiously avoided attending her on these parties of pleasure; and that, when they happened accidentally to meet in company, his manner was more constrained than was natural to him, and he invariably found some excuse for retiring. Her young protégée also saw it, and was sensibly grieved at a conduct she could not but consider unkind. Far from suspecting his secret motive, she attributed his evident unwillingness to join any society, of which she formed a part, to a coldness of which he could by no means be justly accused; and piqued by his apparent indifference, she affected a gaiety which deceived every one but herself.

CHAPTER III.

THE ALAMEDA.—THE CAZIQUE.—THE CHINGANERA.

The vigil of Jueves Santo, at Caraccas, was one of those enchanting evenings, peculiar to tropical climates, in which the hour of sunset is hailed with delight by all classes of animated beings, as a refreshing and invigorating relief from the scorching heat felt during the day. Although the twilight was so short as to be almost imperceptible, the peculiar lustre of the moon, and brilliancy of the stars, amply supplied the sun's place, on his sinking out of sight behind the mountains of Maracay, with that mild placid light which cannot weary.

The whole population of Caraccas began to pour out of the crowded city, through the different avenues leading to the open country; and the public walks were rapidly filled with groups of laughing creoles, who appeared to have reserved their gaiety until this hour. The day had been unusually and oppressively sultry; and, as the numerous parties of friends and acquaintance passed each other, they paused to remark, that the cool mountain breeze had never wafted such perfume from the neighbouring plantations. The tops of the stately almoces planted along the suburbs sparkled with innumerable fire-flies, which, as they flitted from tree to tree, might almost have been mistaken for the scarcer brilliant meteors, that appear to fall from every quarter of the heavens, during the still nights preceding and following the hot days of summer near the line. The shrill notes of the mocking-bird, and the Virginian nightingale, were clearly distinguished above the busy hum of the multitude; while, at intervals, the tinkling of a mule's bell was heard, as the leading machos of a large drove passed drowsily by, on their way to the savanna, followed by the muleteers, either chanting their Llanero songs in the monotonous recitative of the low country, or carelessly touching the strings of their vihuelas,* as they rode slowly past.

At the lower end of the principal promenade, called, from the superior size and beauty of the poplars by which it was bordered, La Alameda, a large semicircular spot of ground was railed off, and surrounded with marble seats, carved to resemble sofas and ottomans. Here two military bands were stationed, as usual in summer evenings, occasionally relieving each other in performing such national and patriotic airs, as had already been composed in Venezuela, or adopted from the music of other countries. The concourse attracted by the musicians was, of course, greater here than in any other part of the Alameda; and as the seats were exclusively occupied by the mothers and daughters of the principal families, few of the parties, which preferred pacing the broad centre walk to listening to the music, approached this spot without pausing for a few moments, to look with interest and admiration on the fair Caraqueñas.

* The vihuela, or triple, is a species of small guitar, in general use among the peasantry of the colonies. It is frequently constructed of the half of an oval gourd, with a cedar sound-board.

The saya and basquina, in which the Criollas invariably appear when abroad, form a dress peculiarly well adapted to display to the best advantage the faultless symmetry of their fine forms; and they are not unconscious how well the dark colour, in which they delight to clothe themselves, is suited to their lovely brunette complexions. The South American females live in so mild a climate, that they find it unnecessary to cover their heads, when taking the air. They are consequently remarkable for the neatness and simplicity with which their glossy black hair is at all times braided; its sole ornament being usually a carnation, or a single rose bud.

The ciudadanos, who strolled along beneath the popular trees, were far more various, and even showy in their dress. A middling class in society was then almost unknown. It did not begin to assume any degree of consequence, until several years of independence had permitted a country, which had hitherto known no intermediate degree between masters and slaves, to resolve itself into a more liberal arrangement of its inhabitants. The pueblo, in which were comprehended, at the time we speak of, all those who were not entitled by birth, station, or wealth, to be considered as cavalleros, did not intrude on this promenade. They were, however, to the full as happy, if not more so, on the Arrayan, or in the different boulevards of the suburbs, where the crowded fundangos, and extensive open sheds appropriated to the music and dancing of the Chinganeras, re-echoed with the sound of guitars and viñeles. But along the Alameda were to be seen the sleek and portly dignitaries of the church, in their peculiar and striking costume, loudly and earnestly discussing disputed topics in the politics of the day. With these were mingled officers of all ranks, belonging to the different patriot corps stationed at head-quarters, or to the staff; glittering in every possible variety of splendid and theatrical dress,—for it could not in strictness be called uniform,—that their fancy inclined them to adopt, before years of repeated and destructive reverses had sobered the judgment of the republican soldiers, and reduced to distress and penury the wealthiest of the land.

These, with a few civilians of distinction, who either held, or aspired to, the highest places in the newly established government, were almost the only occupiers of the principal promenade; while the side walks were slowly paced by friars from different monasteries, either in the white and gray habits of the Dominican and Franciscan orders, or in the dark cowl and broad black belt, worn by the brotherhoods of San Augustin or San Juan de Dios. These cenobites scorned, with true monastic pride, to associate with the pueblo, and were withheld by the spirit of party, (being all violent Godos), as well as unfitted by the gaucherie and moroseness acquired in the cloister, for joining the society of the more liberal, as well as better educated secular clergy, or of the military. They therefore wandered about with a discontented and suspicious air, anxiously endeavouring, as they glided unnoticed behind the poplars, to catch the import of the enthusiastic harangues, with which the unpractised but zealous advocates of independence were, by turns, entertaining their hearers. These monigotes were of the royalist party, with scarcely an exception; and, as many of them as the Spanish general Monteverde thought it worth his while to bribe, were indefatigable spies, employing themselves, without intermission, in procuring and transmitting him information.

Among the numerous young officers who amused themselves on the Alameda, one while by listening to and commenting on the sage remarks of their seniors, and the next by criticising the style of beauty and dress of their fair countrywomen, was Carlos Sepulveda. His numerous acquaintance had in vain endeavoured to engage him in his usual lively strain of conversation, and had at last abandoned him to his melancholy reflections; each accusing him of ill-humour, and repeating the same exclamation of "What the deuce is the matter with Carlos?"

He had seen Doña Gertrudes pass by, with her protégée, to the seats at the end of the walk; and as he well knew that this was the last night that he should see Maria del Rosario on the Alameda, he had resolved to approach her, and at least bid her farewell, if he could, with composure. He had repeatedly advanced with this determination, but had as often drawn back irresolute; and was leaning against one end of the alamos at a short distance from the music, unconsciously gazing on the crowd before him, when his reverie was suddenly interrupted by a friendly voice, the tones of which were familiar to his ear,—"Apropos, friend Carlos! you appear to have turned musical amateur to-night."

Sepulveda hastily turned and recognised his old comrade Lorenzo Tovar, a lieutenant in the Cazadores de Aragon, who had that moment arrived from La Guayra, where his regiment was doing duty;—as might be known by his high boots and spurs, broad palm leaf sombrero, and military capote, covered with the dust of the road.

"The very friend I could have most wished to see!" exclaimed Don Carlos; "I am truly rejoiced at your arrival, camarada Tovar! but how have you contrived to obtain permission to visit the capital during the festival of our anniversary? I know Miranda's instructions to the colonels of regiments have been such, as most strictly forbid any leave of absence being granted before next week; for the Junta Gobernativa is apprehensive of too great a concourse collecting here, to witness the ceremonies of renewing the oath."

"True, Carlos; and although I made all the interest possible with el Tio Comandante for leave to come up and see you, he was inexorable. However, the governor of the port fortunately had important despatches to send, as well as verbal communications to make, to the Excelentísima Junta; and, as I was in some measure the occasion of a discovery being made, to which they refer, I was selected as the messenger. But you seem to forget that I am almost a stranger in Caraccas. You must be my guide as well as host; and, in the first place, I must send my Indian friend here to your quarters."

"By all means. Let him enquire at our barrack gate for my ordenanza, who will take every care of him for the credit of the corps."

As he spoke, he turned round to look for the Indian whom his friend had mentioned, and saw the tall spare form of a Cachiri,* who had retired a few paces from where the young men stood, to avoid listening to them; private conversation being usually held sacred by the untaught honour of the native tribes, and more especially by those which are commonly reputed least civilised. He was a man far advanced in years, as was evident, rather from the wrinkles in his dark red brow, and the few grey hairs that might be seen in his long and loose, but neatly combed, black hair, than from any stoop in his gait, or emaciation in his limbs; the firmness and well rounded contour of which evidently belonged to a hunter rather than a labourer. His only clothing, and that he had adjusted on entering the city,—was the dark brown woollen ruana, or cloak, which served him, alternately, as a horse-cloth by day, and a blanket by night, wrapped loosely round his waist, and barely reaching below his knees, leaving his broad chest, seamed with numerous scars, fully exposed to view. His thick straight hair hung down over his muscular shoulders without the least appearance of a curl; being parted in the front, and confined backwards by a narrow rod fillet, so as to show his high forehead, and small ears, in which he wore silver ear rings in the shape of a crescent. These were his only ornament, excepting a rosary of black shining berries, with padre-nuestros and a cross of gold. He also wore a double scapulary of Nra Señora del Carmen, to the string of which were suspended two or three small bags containing Indian charms, and the indispensable utensil among the South Americans, a tooth pick, made of a condor's quill. He had no weapon but the usual cuchillo cachiblanco, a long double-edged knife, with a white carved handle made of alligator's bone. His knees, legs, and small finely turned feet, (a distinguishing mark of his race), on which he wore light sandals, plaited from the white fibres of the aloe, would have been valuable models for a sculptor. His arms were stained with the deep blue dye of indigo, in a neat waving pattern extending as far as the wrists, where broad stripes, in close imitation of network bracelets, were painted of the same colour.

* The Cachiri Indians, most of whom are mountaineers, are reputed the most noble tribe in Venezuela; (called by them Coquibacoa.) They are also the most warlike of the existing aborigines; and are much respected by the Guagivias, Caribis, and other rival tribes. Bolívar's favourite rallying cry in battle was—"Firmes Cachiries!"

His head was thrown back with rather a haughty air of assumption; and a thoughtful frown, evidently proceeding from the habitual melancholy of his race, rather than from sullenness or ill-humour, gave that intelligent expression to his handsome, though strongly marked, Indian features, which such are eminently capable of assuming. Don Lorenzo addressed him twice before he heard; so earnest was his gaze on the circle of Caracqueñas surrounding the music.

"Holla! compadre Pichiloncoy! take our horses to the barracks of the Huzares, behind the palace, and enquire for Captain Sepulveda's servant. He will show thee where to tie them up, and find thee a bed, and probably something better to eat than that coca,* which thou art eternally chewing."

The Indian glanced his eagle eye on the officer; and said, as he drew the horses towards him and prepared to mount, "No barrack for me to-night, compadre Tovar. I shall take the horses out to the savanna, and sleep there myself."

"Come, man,—they will be far better off in the cavalry barracks, with plenty of maize and cane-tops for forage, than with the coarse alfalfa of the plantations, and mosquitoes innumerable tormenting them all night."

"No matter, compadre! The last time I suffered my horse to be tied under a shed in one of your barracks, he lost more blood by the morciegalos,† in one night, than three months' savanna feeding could replace. Besides, there was no sea-breeze all this day; and the wells on the road are dry. We shall have an earthquake to-night, or to-morrow morning at farthest, compadre! and better the light leaves of the forest, than the rough tiles of the town overhead, when the spirit of the Andes starts in anger from his slumbers."

Having thus said, he sprang, with scarcely the appearance of an effort, on his shaggy wild looking animal; and disappeared in an instant, leading with him Tovar's horse.

"Where did you pick up your new attendant?" enquired Sepulveda; "One would be tempted to observe, that you might clothe him a little better, amigo Lorenzo! now that you have brought him from his native wilds; especially when paying a visit at head-quarters."

"You do me far too much honour, camarada, to suppose him an attendant of mine. The Cacique Pichiloncoy would scorn to attend even on his very catholic majesty Don Fernando, unless indeed on terms of equality. Be it known to you that, if he favours me so far as to look after my horse, or even to cook occasionally for us both, when on a journey, it is merely as a compadre, and under the fullest conviction that I would do the same for him were he to require it. Clothe him, saidst thou? truly I wasted more arguments and rhetoric on him this afternoon, before I could persuade him even to wrap his cloak decently round him, that he might be in some sort fit to appear in the streets of a city, than would have set me up as a lawyer. You have seen him here,—in a place to which he has a mortal dislike, as indeed he has to all towns and even villages,—simply because he is a most devoted friend and ally of mine, and has taken a fancy to do me every good turn in his power."

"Allow me, Señor de Tovar, to congratulate you on so important an acquisition. Pray how have you contrived, with all your wildness, to get into the good graces of so serious a being as an Indian? and, above all, a Cachiri?"

"Faith! for no other reason, that I could discover,

* The coca leaf resembles that of the citron in shape and colour. It has the property of enabling those who chew it, to undergo violent and long continued exertion, with little or no other sustenance. The mountain Indians constantly use it, when on their toilsome journey over the Cordillera, where provisions are not to be procured, nor can be conveniently carried. It is chewed with lime made from shells, and with ashes of the molle root.

† The morciegalo, or large bat of South America, is exceedingly destructive to cattle, and sometimes to human beings, when sleeping in an exposed situation. It repeatedly happened, during the campaigns of the revolution, that the greater part of the horses belonging to an army were so copiously bled during one night, as to be incapable of marching for several days:—many of them even dying on the spot, in consequence of excessive phlebotomy.

than that he saved my life at the lagoon of Maracay, in my childhood, when my canoe upset as I was fishing. Last year, too, at Puerto Cavallo, when the barber surgeon of our regiment gave me over in the calentura, my compadre heard of it, and came to my assistance with his deer skin wallet full of herbs and barks, with which he soon set me on my legs. But he is now the principal cause of my being detached to the city. The whole tribe of Cachiris, you well know, are stanch patriots, and of course at war with the Guagivias, who are leagued with the Godos. It appears that one of these last, who was entrusted with private intelligence for Monteverde from his spies in Caraccas, fell into an ambush of the Cachiris. Pichiloncoy, having obtained possession of the despatches, which he rightly conjectured to be of importance, brought them to me, that I might get whatever credit was to be obtained from the Junta by the discovery. But my compadre took care, according to the laudable custom of his nation, to make his prisoner confess, (by no gentle means you may suppose,) every thing he knew relative to his employers. The governor of La Guayra, therefore, sent him with me here; he has been already examined before the Junta; and I left that sage body, just now, in close deliberation on his intelligence, and on the contents of the intercepted correspondence. And now that I have answered all your questions, tell me, Carlos, will you be my vaguedna? Will you take me to see Doña Gertrudes? and introduce me to all the fair Caracqueñas of your acquaintance? It is, I doubt not, very extensive; for you Señores of the staff have great advantages over your comrades of the line, in that instance."

"Willingly, camarada; I believe my mother is at this moment seated near the music. But, as for any farther introductions, you must be greatly altered indeed from the wild fellow I remember you, if you cannot dispense with that ceremony."

The two friends encountered some difficulty in making their way through the press; for a wandering Chinganera* had just commenced a wild tonadilla of the hill country, which had attracted the attention of all within hearing. She accompanied her song, which was the old plaintive air of "La Montonera," on a small vihuela formed of a hollow gourd; and the young men, having paused to listen, caught the following words:

"A Montonera's life I lead!
I'll ne'er disown the name;
Though village maids and city dames
May lightly hold our fame.
From Buenos Ayres' boundless plain
The Montonera comes;
And o'er the mighty Andes' heights
In liberty she roams.

"What hand e'er tried in empty space
To arrest the morning star?
The Montonera's freeborn mind
To enslave is harder far.
Free o'er the Cordillera's peaks,
The lordly condor stalks;
As freely, through her native wilds,
The Montonera walks."

While the Chinganera was singing these verses, another of her tribe, dressed in the picturesque garb formerly worn by the aborigines of Coquibacoa, and crowned with the brilliant feathers of the loro and tucán, had been collecting in a gaily stained calabash the contributions of the audience. On seeing Don Carlos and his friend muffled in their capotes, she addressed the "Señores tapados" with the usual mysterious speeches, which those of her profession so well know how to adapt to all possible circumstances, and which are purposely rendered so vague, that they seldom fail to "keep the word of promise to the ear." Her quick and practised eye caught the look of interest with which, in spite of himself, Sepulveda heard her oracular hints; and from the amount of his contribution, which she could pretty accurately guess at as it fell into the calabash, she was prompted to address him immediately with a dispedida, such as used then to be sung at farewell serenades by despairing lovers.

When Raymond unwillingly turned to depart, And to leave fair Eliza, the girl of his heart,

* The Chinganeros are a peculiar race of wandering creole minstrels, whose habits, and even whose appellation, strikingly resemble those of the Zinganes, or Eastern gypsies. They claim for themselves pure Indian descent; but this is denied by the aborigines. They are all good dancers and musicians; and, above all, fortune tellers, supposed sorcerers, and improvisatori.

She cried while her voice was impeded by woe;
"Wilt thou ever forget me? Ah no, Raymond, no!"

"If passion alone can true passion repay,—
If none ever loved thee as I have,—Ah! say,
Canst thou e'er to Eliza ingratitude show?
Wilt thou ever forget me? Ah no, Raymond, no!"

The youth dried her tears, as he faltered "Adieu!"
And in agony cried, as he rushed from her view,
"Forget what thou wilt, but my love and my woe!
Can Eliza forget her fond Raymond? Ah no!"

The applause which had greeted the first of these songs, was renewed on hearing the dispedida. It appeared so peculiarly adapted to Carlos Sepulveda's actual situation and feelings, that he was almost induced to believe himself known and recognised by the Chinganera; and he actually fancied that she had, in some inconceivable manner, penetrated the secret of his hopeless passion. Under this impression he took his friend Tovar's arm, and attempted to lead him from the circle; but Don Lorenzo laughing declared, that he was determined to hear his fortune in his turn. Having accordingly dropped his offering into the calabash, the Indian minstrel, who had little difficulty in divining, from the cheerful tones of the light-hearted soldier, that

"From love's weak childish bow he lived unharmed," took the vihuela from her companion, and playing the lively air of "La Zambullidora," sang the following verses:

"Youth! this magic ring receive,
The Chinganera's fairy spell;
Swift the city ramparts leave,
Nor heed the wakeful sentinel.
Come! beloved of my soul,—
To the depths of ocean fly;
Where the dark blue billows roll,
Fearless plunge, nor fear to die.

"To the wild savanna fly!
Empty pomp of cities scorning;
There, beneath the vault of sky,
Rest in safety till the morning.
Come! beloved of my soul,—
To the sands of ocean come;
There no sounds shall meet thine ear,
Save curlew's pipe, or bittern's drum.

"Hark! the wakening earthquake's cry
Echoes on the startled ear;
To the city ramparts fly,
Youth! for death awaits thee here.
Come! beloved of my soul,—
Fly we to the desert waste,
There, where the lake's blue waters roll
A fairy pen by wizards placed,
Lies for thee to write a scroll
Such as Montezuma* traced."

"I believe the whole race of Indians has conspired to drive me from Caracas," cried Tovar, "before I have time to see any thing of the city. My compadre Pichiloncoy would fain have had me sleep in the savanna; and again, how confidently the Chinganera has predicted an earthquake. It is fortunate for me that I am not superstitious. There is positively more witchcraft in the dark downcast eyes of that novice, whom thou hast been so earnestly gazing on, amigo Carlos, than in all the Indian wizards between the sea and the Cordilleras. Who is she, pray? for I am convinced you are acquainted with her."

Sepulveda started from a fairy dream of happiness, to which the dispedida had given rise. He muttered something, almost unintelligible, about a protégée of Doña Gertrudes, who was to take the veil the next day; and immediately led Tovar to his mother, anxious to escape all further question on the subject. Don Lorenzo was a native of Maracay, and consequently well known to Doña Gertrudes, who expressed much pleasure at seeing him again after so long an absence. When she introduced him to Doña Maria, Carlos, who attentively watched his friend's looks, observed that he started on hearing the name of Peñuela, and that he appeared so much embarrassed, as scarcely to be capable of addressing her in his usual easy strain of compliment.

The hour having now arrived for the military bands to retire to their respective barracks, and there commence

* Montezuma, or rather Mohenzuma, is the Indian, and probably the correct method of pronouncing the name of the unfortunate Mexican monarch.

the tattoo, the company began to disperse in different directions. As Doña Gertrudes was about to leave the Alameda, she remarked to Tovar, that she considered herself fortunate in having secured two such excellent recruits, as himself and her son, for the ball that was to be given at Don Beltran's house that night, at which she was to preside. Tovar hastily replied, that they would both certainly have the honour of escorting her as far as the house; but that, for his part, the urgent business which had brought him to the capital, and would keep him employed the greater part of that night, must be his excuse for declining her invitation. Sepulveda also, guessing, by the alteration in his friend's manner, that he was privy to some secret connected with the family of Peñuela, pleaded a particular engagement at General Miranda's house. Maria del Rosario heard this refusal with ill-concealed pain. "He loves me not,"—thought she,— "he flies to business, pleasure, any where to avoid meeting me, even this last night that I may be seen in the world. But why should I think of him more? to-night it is vain; to-morrow it will be sinful."

She then turned, with a sigh of regret, to the cheerful group which had assembled to conduct her home; and, leaning on Doña Gertrudes, was soon enabled by the elastic spirits of youth to recover her composure. Sepulveda seeing the party sufficiently numerous to render his escort unnecessary, stood aside as they retired. When they had disappeared, his friend Tovar took his arm in silence, and the young men walked a turn on the deserted Alameda, without exchanging a word; the one evidently pondering on some unexpected and embarrassing discovery, and the other anticipating some interesting disclosure, on the subject that engrossed his mind. At length Don Lorenzo suddenly stopped, and, grasping his friend's hand exclaimed, "It is in vain for you to dissemble, Carlos;—you are deeply interested for the Señorita Peñuela; perhaps you love her. I pity you from my soul, if it is really the case; and I am sincerely sorry for her."

"You alarm me, Lorenzo! her fate is indeed deeply to be lamented; but you speak far more seriously than is your usual manner. Surely there is nothing new, or extraordinary, in a novice taking the veil, even though it were against her will; and we are not so certain that such is her case."

"I heartily wish that were all, amigo," said Tovar; "but you must know,—for I can safely trust you with the secret,—that her father, Don Beltran Peñuela, is the very traitor to his country, whose secret correspondence with the enemy has been intercepted by Pichiloncoy. He will be seized to-night, by order of the Junta; and, unless something very extraordinary occurs to prevent it, he will suffer death as a spy. His property will be confiscated to the use of the state; and his children will be reduced to beggary."

"Madre mia! can it be possible? Tovar, I must save the man for his daughter's sake. Another time you shall learn how ill he deserves it at my hands; but, for his innocent daughter's sake, let me give him a hint of his danger."

"Not for the world, Sepulveda! remember it was in strict confidence that I acquainted you with what I ought, perhaps, to have kept a profound secret. All you can possibly do for him, or rather for his daughter, will be to make use of your interest with Miranda, to get the sentence of death commuted into banishment for life from Venezuela. The traitor richly merits an exemplary punishment, and must not be permitted to escape. Meanwhile, let us hasten to the palace of the Junta, where we shall probably hear what has been determined."

CHAPTER IV.

THE BALL-ROOM.—THE ARREST.—THE COURT-MARTIAL.

The magnificent residence of Don Beltran Peñuela, in the Calle de los Capuchinos, was this night easily distinguishable from all others in that retired and quiet street, by the blaze of lights which shone through the viranda windows, and by the sound of musical instruments, as well under the fruit trees in the patio, as in the principal sala set apart for dancing. Variegated lamps were suspended in festoons from the pillars supporting the upper corridor, and from the orange and citron trees, under which throngs of tapaditas,—uninvited guests, who had come masked or otherwise disguised,—were trying the patience of their acquaintance by sportive raillery, and exercising their ingenuity in fruitless attempts to discover them.

The lower suite of apartments was occupied by card-players and politicians; and the rooms above stairs, all of which communicated with each other by large folding doors, were appropriated to dancing, music, and the tertulia. The merry minstrelsy of harps and guitars, stationed under the awning of the viranda, animated the younger part of the guests to exert themselves in the contra-danza of Spain, and in the national dances known by the name of el bambuco and la solita; while, at intervals, the graceful valza, in which the South Americans excel, would detach several couple of dancers spinning in giddy circles through the rooms, in which the elder and more sedate part of the company were engaged in conversation. Flowers of the brightest hues were scattered around; and china vases filled with a mistura composed of jasmine, orange, and citron flowers, mingled with fresh-gathered violets and rose-buds, and sprinkled with fragrant essences, were placed in every recess of the apartments.

Don Beltran, unconscious of his detection and impending disgrace, appeared to think of nothing but promoting the mirth and festivity of his guests. He seemed to multiply himself, so incessantly did he bustle from room to room, in his eagerness to "win golden opinions" from the company he had assembled. During a pause in the dancing, while the attendants were offering the refreshments of ice and orchata, a noise, as of a party of horse, was heard approaching along the unfrequented street; and some of the guests, who had been induced by curiosity to look out of the viranda, announced that a detachment of carabineers was drawn up in front of the house. Don Beltran turned pale as death, while he fastened his belief, that it could only be the night patrol, which had probably halted to listen to the music. A sudden silence ensued in the laughing circle, and the eyes of all were turned anxiously on the doors opening into the corridor, in expectation of they knew not what dreadful occurrence.

The heavy measured tread of soldiers, and the sound of their sabres, was heard distinctly ascending the broad staircase. All drew back as the plumed and vested troops entered the saloon, and an officer, advancing at the head of a few files of dismounted dragoons, slightly saluted the company. He observed, that the nature of his duty called for no apology; and demanded to see Don Beltran Peñuela. The master of the house stepped forward, and the officer, briefly informing him that he was arrested by order of the Junta Suprema, on a charge of treason, ordered him to be taken into custody. At the ominous sound of treason, all the guests shrunk back from the prisoner, as if they apprehended contamination from his touch. His daughter alone sprang forward and clung to him; exclaiming, "he is my father! nothing but death shall part us."

The officer respectfully but firmly acquainted her, that his orders were most strictly to forbid every person whatever to hold communication with the prisoner. He moreover requested the astonished company to retire forthwith, as the corregidor was in waiting below with his alguazils, to make the customary search for papers, and to secure the doors with the government seal. Don Beltran had been thunderstruck by the suddenness of the arrest; but now recovered sufficient composure to reassure his daughter and his guests. He affected to treat the whole as a mistake, or as the consequence of some false information laid before the Junta by a secret enemy, whom, he said, he already guessed at, and would take care to expose. He exhorted Maria del Rosario to take courage, and gave her in charge to Doña Gertrudes, whom he requested, if he should not be set at liberty in the morning, that she would deliver over her protégée to the Madre Abadeza of the Monjas Claras, before early mass; and that the ceremony of taking the veil might proceed exactly as if he were present. He then, having embraced his daughter, and taken leave of his guests, lamenting this unceremonious interruption of their amusement, declared his readiness to accompany his guards. They surrounded and led him down stairs, where a horse was provided, on which he was conducted by the escort to the palace of the Junta Suprema.

A military tribunal had been previously assembled in the Sala de Justicia, (hall of justice,) in readiness for that summary mode of trial, and immediate sentence, so essentially necessary for the support of a newly established revolutionary government. On arriving at the outer court of the palace, the prisoner was conducted, without a moment's delay, into a small but tolerably furnished apartment; which having been used, during the time of the Spaniards, as a temporary place of confinement for the better sort of prisoners, still retained the massive gratings at the windows, and heavy bolts at the door.

The Juez Fiscal, attended by a single secretary, was seated at a small table with lights and writing materials, evidently in expectation of Don Beltran's arrival. When his escort retired, and closed the door, the Juez (whose office nearly corresponds to that of a judge-advocate), read over to him a series of questions which had been previously prepared, demanding a direct and explicit answer to each in turn. This is in strict conformity to Spanish martial law, which receives a prisoner's confession, as the best and most conclusive testimony of innocence or guilt; indifferent whether he criminate himself, provided the ends of justice are answered by his avowal; and considering his refusal to reply to questions thus put, as an unequivocal proof of conscious guilt. After about an hour's close examination, the ministers of justice rose, and left Peñuela in no very enviable situation. Nevertheless, as not the slightest hint had been dropped relative to the intercepted correspondence, he flattered himself into a belief, that nothing but suspicion had as yet attached to him.

While he was ruminating on the charges, to which he considered himself most liable, and framing such answers as he thought would best suit the character of conscious innocence, which he had determined to assume, he heard the jarring sound of the bolts by which his prison door was secured, and the officer who had arrested him in his house appeared, and commanded him to follow. Immediately on his leaving the room, two carbiners who were in waiting stepped forward; and placing themselves one on each side of him, proceeded with him to the Sala de Justicia. The gloominess of the spacious corridors, through which he had to pass, faintly lighted at each turning by a solitary lamp, and the hollow echoes which repeated the heavy tread of his conductors, struck dismay into the heart of the prisoner. But, when the door of the Sala was thrown open, and he found himself in the presence of his judges, he was so appalled by the consciousness of his guilt, as to be totally unable to support his assumed character; and he hung his head before them, with the air of a self-convicted criminal.

After a pause, during which his guards withdrew, a commanding voice, which he recognised as that of General Miranda, directed him to advance to the foot of the table, and listen to the charges that had been brought, and were about to be substantiated against him. At this summons, he compelled himself to look up, and saw the long council board surrounded by officers of rank and consideration in the patriot army, with most of whom he was personally acquainted. This, however, instead of encouraging him, served but to embitter his present feelings of terror and confusion; for he knew them all to be enthusiastically attached to their country's cause, and enemies "to the knife," of the party with which he had leagued himself. He saw the gaze of each individual fixed on him, with various expressions of contempt and detestation; and again cast his eyes on the ground, in shame and despair.

The Juez Fiscal, who was seated on a stool at the left hand of the president, then rose, in obedience to a sign made him by Miranda; and read, in a distinct voice, the questions which had been already put to Don Beltran, and his answers. The prisoner was asked by the president, in the customary form, whether he wished to explain or retract any part of his declaration; and having answered in the negative, the deposition of the Cacique Pichiloncoy was read to him, in which the detention of the Indian messenger, and his confession of having been employed by the prisoner, was circumstantially detailed. Don Beltran was again called on by Miranda to answer to this accusation. Believing that his written communication had escaped detection, he mustered resolution to look up, and exclaimed against the injustice of receiving such dubious evidence in a cause, on the result of which depended his life, and that which he held far dearer, his honour. He begged to remind the court, that the Cachiri tribe was notoriously in the habit of torturing the Guagivis, as often as any of that persecuted race fell into the hands of the former; and submitted, that an extorted confession of this nature, totally unsupported by proof, or collateral evidence of any description, ought not for a moment to weigh with the honourable court, against the character of a respectable citizen.

"Besides," said he, gradually gaining confidence as he proceeded, from the attention with which he was heard; "an Indian's oath is not admissible in any court of law; nor ought it to be considered deserving of credit, when opposed to the simple asseveration of a white man."

At these words, General Zaraza, the aged guerilla chief, who was seated at the president's right hand, lost all patience, and exclaimed, regardless of the decorum usually observed on a court-martial, "Dares the traitor treat an Indian's word with contempt? What are we all, or what ought we to be, but Indians? I would to heaven we were half as true and honest as a nation! His very sentiments proclaim him to be a Godo."

Here Zaraza was interrupted by the president, who said, "Softly, softly! the prisoner must on no account be interrupted in his defence. Perhaps he will explain to the court how it happens, that he has been enabled to divine the very tribe to which the intercepted messenger belonged. It was not once alluded to, if I mistake not, in the deposition which has just been read to him."

Peñuela immediately recollected the error, into which he had fallen, in the confusion of his defence. He attempted to explain it away, by saying, that on hearing the name of Pichiloncoy mentioned, and knowing his accuser to be a Cachiri, it was a natural supposition for him to make, that any prisoner, made by that cazique, must necessarily belong to the tribe with which his warlike nation was at constant variance. No remark was elicited from the court by this explanation; but Peñuela, who now watched with anxious vigilance the looks of his judges, augured but ill of its success, from the incredulous smile which he could discover on their lips.

The Juez Fiscal then handed him the envelope of a letter, directed to the Spanish General Monteverde at Cartagena; and premising that the court had already carefully compared it with several manuscripts bearing his signature, which had been found in his study, demanded of him whether he acknowledged it to be his writing. He could not avoid owning, on examination, that the resemblance was striking; but boldly disclaimed all knowledge of its contents. At the same time, recollecting that the envelope which had been produced might possibly have been found in his house, and that in that case an unqualified denial would be prejudicial to his cause, he submitted to the court, that even if he had written on private business to a relation who was in the province of Coro, and had forwarded his letter under cover to the Spanish general,—as he might very innocently have done,—no one could with justice blame his conduct in that respect.

Lastly the Juez Fiscal, having once more demanded if he had any explanation to give the court, on the subject of the heavy charge brought against him, and having received no answer, proceeded to read aloud, as the last and damning proof of treason, the intercepted letter which had been enclosed in the envelope. The prisoner started on hearing the first few words, and trembled so violently, that the president desired him to take a seat, and compose himself, so as to listen with attention to the document under consideration. The letter most completely established the truth of the Indian's testimony, and exposed Don Beltran's treason beyond a shadow of doubt. It contained accurate intelligence respecting the numerical force and disposition of the patriot troops, as well as important advice relative to an expedition which, it appeared, the royalists were preparing against Caracas. It also referred to prior communications which had passed, proving, beyond a doubt, that this had not been his first essay in the dishonourable capacity of a spy. To crown the whole, although a feigned name had been affixed to the body of the letter, the full signature of Beltran Peñuela was, by some strange but not unusual inadvertence of the writer, to be found at the close of a postscript.

When the Fiscal had concluded, Miranda demanded of the prisoner, in the same calm unaltered tone, what he had to offer in his defence. Peñuela, starting as it were from a hideous dream, loudly reiterated his denial of the crime with which he was charged. He solemnly declared that the letter was a forgery, and asserted his innocence in incoherent expressions; while at the same time, with the usual inconsistency of guilt, he entreated for pardon, and supplicated the court, in the most abject terms, to be merciful to his first offence.

When he was at length silent, exhausted by the violence of his emotions, the president rose, and informed him, that the court had already made up their minds as to his guilt. They had come to this conclusion, he said, principally by means of the letter, which they could not but consider an irrefragable proof, supported as it was by the evidence of his messenger, and his own vacillating declarations. He had been sent for to the Hall of Justice, to give him an opportunity of explaining, had it been in his power, the unfavourable circumstances which appeared to condemn him; but he had, by his demeanour, left his judges without the shadow of a doubt, had it been possible for them to entertain one in his favour. Miranda advised him to consider, in the solitude of the dungeon to which he was about to be removed, whether he had any witnesses to call, or evidence to offer, which might avert the sentence that would otherwise be read to him the next day, after the ceremonies of the fiesta should have been celebrated.

The president then rang a small bell; the carbiners again entered, and conducted Don Beltran through a corridor, which turned off at right angles from that by which he had been brought to the sala. Having crossed a paved court, they came to a low iron-studded door, which was opened on his conductor's giving the password to some one within. The party entered, and Peñuela found himself in the interior of the carcel, which had been made, by the policy of the Spaniards, to communicate secretly with the government house in every principal town and city.

The carcelero, a stout square-built Gallego, with sandy hair and a sinister expression of countenance, who had been continued in his employment, on the change of government, in consequence of the repugnance of creoles to accepting the office, received Peñuela from the escort. He was preparing, with the alacrity of one who delights in the duties of his profession, to fit him with a ponderous pair of irons, when he was stopped by the officer who had hitherto accompanied Don Beltran;—"Halt there, Maestro Rodil! no order has been issued for the prisoner to wear grillos. You are merely to confine him in a strong cell; and let it be as comfortable as possible."

"Midnight is no time for picking and choosing cells, Señor Oficial. The hidalgo, if he be one, must be content with the first that is ready for him. I suppose it will be only for a night or so;—few who enter by that gate make any long stay here. But he may as well have his esposas riveted on at once, to save trouble in the morning; for doubtless the order is only forgotten. Who ever heard of a criminal,—sent from the palace by night, without being clapped into irons the moment he arrived?"

"Silence, Señor verdugo! and do as you are ordered; if you wish to keep your own ankles free. Abúr, Don Beltran! I wish you well through your misfortunes."

The carcelero led the way with a torch to the cells, evidently mortified and incensed at the flagrant breach of prison etiquette of which he was reluctantly compelled to be guilty; and muttering the proverb which consoles a Spaniard under every species of forced submission;—

"Do quieren los reyes,
Van las leyes!"

Don Beltran followed him down a flight of mouldering stone steps, leading to a range of subterranean dungeons, whose iron-studded doors were scarcely to be distinguished from the walls, on each side of a vaulted gallery; in the damp air of which the torch burned dim, as if about to expire. These, the jailor informed him, were formerly the state prisons, "quando el Rey," and had frequently been lent to the inquisition, when the cells of the Casa Santa were occupied.

"But since this revolution," added he with a sigh, "these have generally been empty; and more is the pity, for they are the strongest and most compact dungeons I ever kept the keys of, except indeed the casamatas at Bilbao in the old country."

So saying, he unlocked with difficulty the farthest in the whole range, and entered with the prisoner, whom despair and astonishment had hitherto kept silent. He then shook up some straw on a sort of rude stone couch that was built into the wall; and set himself to light a rusty lamp, which hung by a mouldering chain from the roof. While he was grumbling over the dampness of the wick, which baffled his endeavours to kindle it, Don Beltran recovered from the state of stupor into which he had fallen, and earnestly entreated that he might be confined in a more habitable prison; or at least, that he might be removed to one above ground. He offered his jailor at the same time, several doubloons, as the readiest means of enforcing his request; and Rodil received them, as is usual among those of his profession, without the slightest acknowledgment, or visible relaxation in the stern rigid muscles of his countenance. When he had succeeded in lighting the lamp, he declared that nothing could possibly be done until the morning; but then—as he graciously promised,—he would remove him to the condemned cell in the upper prison. That, he said, was far more comfortable; being well ventilated, and provided with a brazier for the use of Fray Nicolas, who always confessed the prisoners before execution.

"Meanwhile," said he, "you must content yourself with this berth, which has afforded a night's lodging to many a worthy caballero, since I have had the honour to hold the office of carcelero. The last tenant at will was Don Jose Maria Palomarez,—he of the gold-mines of Beta-rica,—and he spent his time, short as it was happily enough. Caspiroléta! he thought, because he had justice on his side, that he was sure to slip his neck out of the collar; so he refused to compromise the matter, notwithstanding the hints of the Audiencia; and was found guilty of being too rich to live. Take my advice, 'nor Beltran! whatever scrape you have got into, be not too sparing of his majesty's pictures."

Having given the prisoner this piece of advice, which it may be readily believed, was any thing but disinterested, Rodil kindled his cigarillo at the lamp, and disappeared, closing, double-locking, and bolting the dungeon door, with the usual superfluous and ostentatious accuracy. Don Beltran, though he loathed his surly jailor's presence, half rose, as he closed the wicket, to call him back, for he felt that even his company would be preferable to his own thoughts. While he hesitated, Rodil shut the grating at the head of the stone stairs, and cut off all further chance of society for that night.

CHAPTER V.

THE CONVENT CHAPEL.—THE EARTHQUAKE.

The morning of Holy Thursday was calm and cloudless, portending one of the hottest of the tropical summer days. The heavy mists, which had risen slowly from the cacao plantations, curled in white wreaths around the neighbouring hills, without a breath of air to disperse them, until they melted by degrees under the powerful rays of the sun. The city of Caraccas exhibited a scene of the gayest excitement and hilarity. A salute of artillery was fired at day-break, to announce the anniversary of the day that had for ever separated Venezuela from Spain; and the bells of the numerous churches and convents, which had commenced ringing at that signal, had not paused for a moment in the joyful repiques, that pealed from the belfry turrets in every possible tone and measure.

The streets of the capital were crowded with citizens in their holiday attire, mingled with campesinos from the valleys of Aragoa, and Indians of different tribes, in their graceful many-coloured ponchos and ruanas. All these were mounted on their small but elegantly formed native horses, descended from the Andalusian breed, with which the first Spanish settlers stocked the country. The housings and trappings of these animals were as various as the costume of their riders. The Cerranos, or mountaineers, might be known by their stout active ponies, whose long projecting hoods were well calculated for climbing the Cordillera; their lofty demi-pique saddles, covered with panther or jaguar skins; and their ample embossed stirrups of wood or bronze, formed so as to protect the feet in rocky passes. The Llaneros, or men of the savannas, were mounted on nimble well-trained coursers, far taller and handsomer than the little shaggy mountain ponies. They used a light fuste, resembling a hussar's saddle-tree, covered with a fur chabraque, made either from the skin of the large red baboon, or of the wild asses' colt, jet black with a silvery white border; and their stirrups, steel or silver, of a triangular pattern, were barely large enough for the point of the sandal to enter.

The soldiers, belonging to the different regiments in garrison, were pouring out of their barracks, clad in new uniforms, and following their respective bands to the general parade ground on the Alameda; in front of which the hussars of Caraccas, the lancers of the east, and the flying artillery, were already formed in line. As the hour drew near for the celebration of high mass in the different churches, the tumultuous repiques ceased by degrees; and the solemn tolling of the larger bells warned the inhabitants that the appointed time for devotion was at hand.

General Miranda, attended by his aides-de-camp, and followed by an escort of the Carabineros de la Guardia, appeared on the Alameda; and was received, as he rode slowly along the line, with presented arms, and the Venezuelan march played by all the bands. He called the comandantes to the front, and gave them instructions as to the churches to which they were to march their men; informing those of the cavalry, that a temporary altar had been erected at the end of the Alameda, at which the chaplain of the Junta would officiate for them, as they could not that day attend the churches, on account of being mounted. The troops filed off in different directions, and Miranda, attended by his staff, took his way to the principal square.

When they had given their horses to the orderlies who followed them, and were ascending the marble steps leading to the principal entrance of the cathedral, Carlos Sepulveda took advantage of the crowd which had assembled to witness the ceremony of the anniversary, and escaping unobserved from the general whom it was his duty to attend, hastened down the street leading to the convent of Santa Clara. High mass had already begun, when he entered the small but richly adorned chapel; and he approached by degrees between the side pillars, until he stood so near the railing encircling the high altar, that he could distinctly see whatever passed behind the lattice-work on the right side of the chancel, which separated the veiled sisterhood from the strangers who filled the nave and aisles. The profusion of wax tapers, with which the inner choir was illuminated, enabled him to see the stately dignified figure of the madre abedeza, seated, in front of the nuns of her order, on a species of richly decorated throne; and on cushions, at her feet, were four youthful novices, who were that day to take the veil.

Close to the lattice, and in full view of the spectators, was placed the semblance of a funeral bier covered with black velvet, on which each novice was to be laid in turn during the chanting of the "Miserere;" as a mournful intimation, to herself and all present, that she was from thenceforth to be considered as dead to the affections and pleasures of this world. The four Carraqueñas were equally lovely, and adorned with similar magnificence: Carlos, nevertheless, beheld but one, who looked as pale as monumental marble, and appeared unconsciously to listen to the solemn tones of the organ, and the melodious chant of those whom she was soon to embrace, as sisters. A tear occasionally glittered on her cheek, and fell unheeded; but her thoughts were far from the convent, and with her father in his dungeon. If they sometimes wandered, unbidden, to him she was about to renounce for ever, it was only in the hope that his situation, with respect to government, would enable him to plead successfully for her unfortunate parent. She knew not,—or how could she have preserved the semblance of resignation to her fate?—how little Don Beltran deserved any sympathy from her kinsman Carlos. But yet, if her father had deprived her of the consolation of knowing that by one, at least, she would be deeply regretted, his duplicity was mercy to her. For if there be one pang more keen than that inflicted by the sense of unrequited love, it is that which a generous heart feels, when it is forbid to return the affection with which it is sought.

The service of high mass was soon concluded; and the ceremony of consecrating the new nuns commenced. Sepulveda's heart throbbed intensely, as he saw the abbess rise, and lead Maria del Rosario forward to the atahud. Her bracelets, her necklace, and all her ornaments, were taken from her by turns, and laid aside as an offering to the shrine of Santa Clara; her hair was unbound, and fell in luxuriant beauty down her lovely neck. Carlos gazed in breathless agony, as the abbess grasped it, and prepared to cut off those flowing ringlets, for the least of which he would have given his life; when her hand was arrested by a hollow sound, as of distant thunder. It came nearer, and all present turned their shuddering gaze on each other; for they too well recognised the first symptoms of an approaching earthquake.

The assembled multitude was so far paralysed by alarm, that the first undulating motions were distinctly felt, before they made any attempt to retire from the chapel. Then suddenly recollecting themselves, they rushed towards the door in wild dismay, trampling under foot the weak and aged, and those who were still kneeling at their devotions or in penance. Nevertheless, so rapidly did the dread convulsion of nature attain its height, that the walls began to rock, and the roof to fall in, before they could reach the open air. Amid the screams of the terrified devotees in the chapel, answered by those of the nuns in the choir, the roaring of the subterranean thunder, and the crush of falling towers, Sepulveda thought only of her whom he had just been on the point of losing for ever. With a desperate effort, he seized and tore down the latticed screen, and caught up the fainting novice, as she lay insensible on the atahud. He staggered through the winding passages, while the heaving earth rose and fell beneath his tread; and reached the convent garden, just as the cloister sunk into a heap of ruins behind him. The fearful sound still continued, as though the force of mighty waters were rending the abyss asunder; crash pealed on crash, as the loftiest edifices first bowed beneath the awful power which shook the solid earth to its centre; while the groans of dying thousands mingled in dreadful unison with the shrieks of the terrified survivors. The air was obscured by clouds of dust, and the sky darkened by rising smoke, proceeding from the flames which had burst forth from the ruins of thatched cottages, that had shared the fate of the churches and palaces.

A momentary respite from the first violent convulsions ensued; and Sepulveda again raised his lovely charge, who had recovered for an instant, but to relapse into a still deeper swoon of terror. As he pursued his hazardous way towards his mother's house, which was in the open ground near the Alameda, his blood was chilled by the sights of horror that he encountered at every step. Not a single building remained totally free from injury; and, near every church or convent, mangled bodies were lying senseless, or writhing in the agonies of death. Groups of wretched beings, of every age and condition, were crowded together in the centre of the squares and plazuelas; or were flying, they knew not whither, in the madness of despair, to meet the fate they dreaded under the tottering walls, which each slight shock served to overthrow.

Don Carlos at length succeeded, by means of extraordinary and persevering exertions, in gaining the Alameda, over the ruins of houses, and through flower gardens, no longer fenced by walls, nor guarded with the care due to domestic retreats. The stone seats, on which Carraqueñas has listened to the Chinganera's minstrelsy the preceding evening, were laid low; and the broad gravel walk was rent into numerous fissures, which gaped to a fearful depth. Sepulveda hurried through the crowd, without attracting any attention by the singularity of his appearance; although his forehead was bleeding profusely from a cut, which he had received by the fall of a fragment of the convent roof, and a female with dishevelled hair, in the white dress of a novice, was lying apparently lifeless in his arms. But those who met him were mothers, calling in tones of agony for their children; and wives, distractedly seeking for their husbands.

As he approached his home, and saw the shattered roof and ruined walls of what had been a neat cottage, he thought for the first time with terror on his mother. Had she escaped? or had he her loss to lament? A moment more and he was in the garden, where he faltered thanks to heaven, on seeing Doña Gertrudes and her brother on their knees in the act of devotion. She had been so deeply affected by parting with her protegee that morning, that she had found herself incapable of remaining to witness the ceremony of her taking the veil; and had therefore returned home from the convent immediately after the service of La Alca. Don Gabrino, her brother, owed his safety, in all probability, to his having been appointed to perform mass for the cavalry in the open air.

They turned, on hearing Sepulveda enter the garden, and his mother rushed into his arms. He committed his recovered treasure to her care, briefly relating the circumstances under which he had saved her life; and then took his leave, declaring his anxiety for the fate of his general, and the troops which were in the churches during the earthquake. As he hastened away, he once more reminded his mother, that the novice had not yet pronounced the irrevocable vows.

CHAPTER VI.

SEDITIONARY PRIARS.—AN INSURRECTION.

As Sepulveda returned through the ruined streets of the city, he found that the Rotozcos,—the Lazzaroni of South America—had taken advantage, as usual, of the general confusion that prevailed; and had formed themselves into regular organised bands, for the purpose of depredation. Emboldened by their rage for plunder, they were already ransacking the tottering houses, and adding to the horrors of the scene of devastation, by the ferocity with which they strove against each other for the spoil united in offering the most desperate opposition to those inhabitants who attempted to rescue their prosperity.

When he reached the Plaza mayor, he found the cathedral and palace, as he had anticipated, piles of ruins; but could see none of the troops which had marched by that morning, in all the pomp and circumstance of a festival day. The elevated platform in front of the cathedral was occupied, at several points, by bearded Caporin friars, whose order was almost exclusively inimical to the cause of the patriots. They were haranguing with loud vociferation, enforced by violent and theatrical gestures, a mixed assemblage of citizens and peasants, who were listening with attention, and evident interest, to their enthusiastic and inflammatory exhortations.

Sepulveda could distinguish, among other exclamations of these agitators, those of "Long live the King!" "Down with the insurgents!" &c., which were repeated from different parts of the assembled multitude; and he acquired of a wounded soldier, who had crept from beneath the ruins to the fountain in the centre of the square, what this commotion meant, and where the general was. He learned that Miranda and his staff, with the greater part of the detachment of carbiniers which were in the cathedral, had made their escape into the Plaza, on feeling the first shock of the earthquake; but that the Capuchins and Franciscans had immediately commenced haranguing the panic-struck multitude, on the signal interposition of Providence, in selecting the anniversary of the revolution in Venezuela, as the day of punishment to that nation, for the crime of rebellion against its lawful sovereign. The wounded man said, that Colonel Simon Bolivar, at the head of the surviving carbiniers, had attempted to disperse the assembly; but that on his striking with the flat of his sabre one of the most audacious of the Capuchins, the mob had been incensed to such a pitch of frenzy, as to drive the military out of the Plaza with stones and cuchillos. He recollected having heard Miranda direct the troops, on ordering them to disperse, to rendezvous in the Egido, and to bring with them all their fellow-soldiers, either of infantry or cavalry, whom they should meet on the way.

As he spoke, Sepulveda found that one of the friars had perceived him, and had pointed him out to the audience he was haranguing, as an object of vengeance. The infuriate mob immediately burst into exclamations of "Death to the rebels!" and were proceeding to execute sanguinary threats, by throwing stones and other missiles, when Don Carlos caught a cavalry horse, which was drinking at the fountain, by the bridle, and hastily mounting, galloped off towards the Egido. He was repeatedly compelled to deviate from the direct road, for the purpose of avoiding the parties of rioters who were rambling about the streets. They were armed with the muskets and bayonets of the unfortunate soldiers, who had perished under the ruins of the churches and barracks, or had been intercepted and massacred, in their flight to the open country, by the ferocious mob of the enthusiasts; and were headed by fanatic friars, who stimulated them to the slaughter of all such as refused to join in their rallying cry of "The King and our Faith!"

Sepulveda found the open suburb, known by the name of El Egido, a scene of confusion, forming a melancholy contrast to the appearance usually offered by the same spot of ground, on former field days. Then, the soldier-like appearance of the numerous corps, composed of tall active creoles, inspired confidence into the citizens of Caracas; who used to throng around; and watch with pride and admiration their proficiency in military manoeuvres. But now, the skeleton regiments which appeared there, disordered by the unequal numbers of their companies, and the irregular sizing of their ranks, resembled the first muster of a defeated army after a rapid retreat. It was also observable, by an experienced spectator, that in many instances subalterns were commanding battalions; and serjeants, or civilians in plain clothes, were doing officers' duty; so numerous were the "killed, wounded, and missing." The cavalry and artillery alone appeared to have sustained little or no loss; and were evidently prepared to repel an apprehended attack. The lancers and hussars had taken open order, at the further end of the small plain, and were standing at their horses' heads, waiting for the order to mount; and a slow-march, which was burning behind each light field-piece, showed that the artillery was also in readiness to act at a moment's warning.

Miranda was busily engaged dictating despatches to two or three officers, who sat on the ground doing the duty of secretaries; and he delivered them, as they were written and signed, to orderly dragoons, who were waiting to convey them to different garrison towns throughout the republic. Colonel Bolivar, as field-officer of the day, was receiving reports from the respective regiments formed around, and ordering pickets to be stationed at such points of the outskirts, as he considered most necessary to be guarded. At a little distance, groups of citizens, who were all more or less implicated in the declaration of independence, and had therefore very sufficient motives for dreading a counter-revolution, listened with consternation to the shouts of the riotous multitude in the city; and whispered to each other with looks of the deepest dejection, as they turned their eyes on the sadly diminished array of the patriot army.

Sepulveda's appearance was scarcely noticed, except by a silent grasp of the hand, as he passed any of his intimate friends; so fully occupied was every one with the preparation necessary to be made on the spur of the moment, to crush the unexpected insurrection, or at least to hold out in the Egido, until the arrival of reinforcements from other parts of the confederate provinces. Among those who surrounded Miranda, were Lorenzo Tovar, and his Indian friend Pichiloncoy, waiting for passports to return to La Guayra. The former joined Sepulveda; and expressed his joy at finding that he had escaped the fate, which had befallen so many thousands of their companions in arms.

"By the way," said he, "what think you now of my compadre's warning last night? The Chinganera, too, was right; and I am inclined to believe that there is something after all, in their pretensions to witchcraft, more than is usually supposed. But tell me, camarada, how you had the good fortune to escape? for I saw nothing of you in the Plaza, when the mob rose at the instigation of those rascally monigotes, and drove us before them with sticks and stones. And yet I well remember you was close to me, when we dismounted at the cathedral door, just before mass."

Sepulveda briefly informed him, that he had been induced by curiosity to attend mass at the chapel of the Monjas Claras, where he had been so-fortunate as to save the life of the novice, whom they had seen the night before on the Alameda. He also accounted for his farther delay, by mentioning his having conveyed her to his mother's house.

"You are a lucky fellow, friend Carlos!" said Tovar; "I never in my life had an opportunity of signalling my knight-errantry, although I seldom miss an Alameda, or a bull fight, if there happens to be one in the neighbourhood of my quarters; whereas you cannot attend mass at an obscure convent chapel, without encountering an adventure. I sincerely hope, for your sake, that Don Beltran may expiate his treason, on the old Spanish gibbet in the Recoveco, as soon as Caracas is a little more quiet; unless, indeed, the earthquake has already cheated the hangman of his fee, as is most probable. You will then have a clear stage and no favour; as, of course, I take it for granted that the father is the only obstacle, according to the established rule in every romance of real or imaginary life."

"Allow me to hope my future father-in-law,—since you will have it so,—may meet with better fortune. Meanwhile, tell me what Miranda has determined on; and whether he designs to let those Godo friars and their turbulent followers keep possession of the capital. The consequences will be serious, should Monteverde receive intelligence of the schism in La Patria."

"No fear of that, Sepulveda;—Miranda has despatched couriers to Valencia, Victoria, and Barquizimeto, to order up troops to his assistance; and Zaraza has galloped off to collect his Guerilleros from the valleys of Aragoa. The old general vows that on his return he will not leave a single friar to preach sedition in the country; and Bolivar complains bitterly of our not joining him to cut down the monigotes, who were haranguing the mob to day in the Plaza. He insists on it, that Venezuela must be cleared of crowns and hoods before we can expect any thing like tranquillity among us."

Here Tovar was called forward to receive his passport; and Miranda observing Sepulveda in conversation with him, directed Don Carlos to set off immediately for La Guayra, and to bring him back a particular statement from the military governor, of the condition in which the port and garrison were, in the event of its being necessary to retire thither from the capital. The two friends lost not a moment in taking the road to the coast, and soon passed the suburbs at a rapid pace, attended by the Cazique Pichiloncoy; who gazed in silence, and with his usual air of melancholy gravity, on the groups of women and children seated by the road side. The mothers were viewing with sorrowful resignation their ruined cottages; while their children, unconscious of the extent of their loss, were playing about over the fallen walls, evidently pleased at the novelty of their situation, and delighted at the prospect of sleeping and living under the fruit-trees in their gardens.

After several hours riding at so rapid a rate, as to render conversation almost impossible, they reached the mountain pass half way between Caracas and La Guayra. As their horses were fatigued, and had been without food all the day, the travellers agreed to rest for awhile at the Tambo, or public caravanserai, on the summit of the mountain. This had been converted of late years into an inn for the accommodation of travellers.

CHAPTER VII.

THE INN—THE CAZIQUE'S TALE.

On riding into the inn-yard, the travellers could see, at the first glance, that the ravages of the earthquake had not been confined to the capital. The mud walls of the posada were cracked in several places from top to bottom, although too low and solid to be overthrown; and the roof of the dwelling-house, as well as that of the stables and other offices, had fallen partly within, partly outside the walls. The corral, or cattle pen, had been broken down by a drove of bullocks which were confined there, and had been so terrified by the earthquake, as to break their way through the enclosure; and the goats belonging to the farm had established themselves on the ruins of the buildings, where they were feasting on the palm-leaf thatch.

The owner of the mountain inn, a corpulent elderly mulatto, was seated on a heap of pack-saddles, smoking his churumbela, and gazing indolently on the setting sun, which was sinking into a dense bank of livid clouds;—an unusual and portentous spectacle, at this time of year, in a climate where the weather changes only at each equinox. The peons of the inn were enjoying the supreme bliss of idleness, in imitation of their master. Some were lounging on skins, comfortably wrapped up in their ponchos; and others had assembled round a game of paro y pinto with dice, in which the by-standers apparently took at least as much, if not more, noisy interest than those who were playing.

"Why! mine host," cried Tovar, "you take things coolly. Some maize, and grass for our horses, and that quickly, for we are in haste."

"I have none!" drawled out the imperturbable host, and applied himself again to his pipe.

"Barley, then;—or clopped straw, if you have nothing better."

"None of those either," groaned the lazy mountaineer.

"What hast thou then in thine inn?" cried Tovar, beginning to lose patience, as the indolent host persisted in his denials.

"Nothing!" was the comprehensive answer.

"Rascal!" exclaimed Tovar, half drawing his sabre, "I will teach thee to trifle with officers on government duty!" and was proceeding to put his threat in execution, by beating him soundly with the flat, when his hand was held by the Indian, who interposed with—"Stop a little, friend! I know maestro Bautista Nuñez will oblige me, for old acquaintance sake. Dost thou remember me, 'nor Bautista? Or must I pay thee a visit some winter night at the head of my Cachiris, to refresh thy recollection? This is a lonely mountain pass for an inn, friend! Remember that the tambo, which once stood here, was the work of my tribe."

"What! art thou there, Cazique Pichiloncoy? Why didst thou not speak at first, man? Here, Pancho! Pepe! Tadeo! ye lazy knaves;—take the horses from these caballeros; and reach me a crow-bar; I must break through the back wall of the stable, to get straw and barley. Do thou, Perrucho, kill a kid, and bruise some maize, for bread. There is plenty of chicla in the house, if the earthquake have not broken the jars."

So saying, the host bustled about with more alacrity than his corpulence appeared to promise; and the name of Pichiloncoy produced a similar effect on the peons. They started to their feet, girt their ponchos round their waists, and stumbled over each other in their eagerness to receive the horses. While preparations were making for the travellers' meal, Carlos, Lorenzo, and their Indian companion, lighted their cigars, and strolled to the brow of the hill, which commanded a most extensive and varied prospect. Behind them they had left the valley of Caracas, thickly spread with cane and cacao plantations, which were darkening in the shades of evening; while on the horizon to the north was seen the Caribbean sea, gilded with the last rays of the setting sun.

As they sat here, enjoying the cool evening breeze, Tovar laughingly complimented his Indian friend on his address in managing the innkeeper, who was well known on that road, as a more intractable brute than any one of his mules;—in short, a genuine zambo;—and enquired how he had contrived to acquire such influence over him. The Cazique replied, that the story contained nothing very new or interesting; but that if they desired to hear it, he would relate it while their host was preparing supper.

THE CAZIQUE'S TALE.

"The tambo of Aynepan was founded on this mountain by my ancestors, many ages before the white men introduced their inhospitable inventions of inns and taverns, where the rich alone can find food or shelter. The tribe of Cachiris, as being the most noble, had from time immemorial the charge of all public resting places in the district of Coquibacoo, now called Venezuela. Twice every year, immediately before and after the season of rains, the tribe used to assemble and hold a feast in each of the tambos by turns. At such times they used to repair the thatch and walls, make earthen ollas and water pitchers, and provide dried deer's flesh and fuel for the use of travellers.

"I can well remember the last of these merry meetings held on this hill; although I was then but a boy. My grandsire Pichimandura assembled nearly a thousand of his tribe; whereas I could now scarcely muster two hundred fighting Cachiris, between the sea and the Cordillera. But he was well aware that it was destined to be the last feast of the kind, and he resolved that it should be the most famous that had been seen in the country. Cattle were by no means so numerous in Coquibacoa at that time as they are now; nevertheless he bought forty bullocks in the plains below Ortiz, and killed them himself for the tribe on this very spot of ground. Antelopes and vicuñas, on the contrary, were far more abundant then; and we had fifty or more of them roasted whole that day.

"As my grandsire had foreseen, the Governor of Caracas sent an alcalde up to our tambo, escorted by a strong party of cavalry, to warn the tribe against any future assemblies on this mountain; for a posada was to be built where our tambo then stood. When the alcalde had read the proclamation, Pichimandura explained it to his people; for few of us, in those days, would stoop to learn a foreign language. The Cachiris rose up as one man, and declared that they would never suffer their tambo to be injured, threatening to destroy any building whatever, which the white men should venture to erect there; but my grandsire commanded silence, and obliged my father first, and after him the rest of the tribe, to swear by his head, that they would offer no resistance to the decree of the Spanish Government.

"The tambo was accordingly pulled down, and the posada was erected in its place, and put up for sale to the highest bidder at Caracas. A Gallego, by name Diego Alarcon, was the first occupier of the inn; and, although our tribe looked on him at first with evil eye, he behaved for some years in so friendly a manner, that we could find no pretence for resenting his intrusion. Bautista Nuñez, the tambo who now keeps the inn, was at that time a lad employed as mozo de mulas to the posada; and well remembers that his master used every year to feast the Caziq, and several elders of the tribe, on the days which were previously set apart for repairing the tambo. Alarcon, moreover, then never refused shelter and refreshment to any of our nation, who happened to be benighted on the mountain. But as his wealth increased, his avarice incited him to close his doors against his Indian friends. He first discontinued the annual feasts, which he had been in the habit of giving; and came by degrees to refuse even food and shelter to travellers, unless they were such as could pay for his hospitality.

"Our warriors again proposed to destroy the posada; but my grandsire constantly opposed their design, and exhorted them rather to despise such ungenerous conduct, than to punish it. As for himself, he would never stop to rest here, when obliged to pass this mountain on a journey; but invariably passed on to the low country, lest he might appear to solicit assistance from the churlish host. One rainy season, however, when he was become feeble and decrepid through extreme age, he was on his way from the sea-coast to the valleys, with no attendant but myself, then a youth of seventeen, to carry his grass hammock, and his alforjas with provisions. He was suddenly taken ill, just as we had reached this pass of the mountain; it rained heavily at the time; and, as the old man had been for some months ailing, I strove to persuade him to seek shelter at the posada; but he would not hear of it. I wrapped him in his poncho and mine, and having laid him under the shelter of that shelving rock, I sat down close to him, waiting anxiously for day light, and the arrival of some of our tribe who were on the road, that they might assist me to carry him to the nearest friendly hut.

"The wind blew keenly from the north; and a thunder-storm burst with all its wintry violence on the mountain. As I held the aged caziq in my arms, I could distinguish his countenance at intervals by the blue flashes of lightning; and saw the cold damps of death gathering on his brow. I thought it too hard for him to die unsheltered, like a houseless dog, with the ruins of the tambo of his ancestors so near; and regardless of his injunctions, I laid him softly down, and flew to the posada, where I knocked loud and long, until the Gallego rose and inquired, who was there at that late hour. I answered, that the Caziq Pichimandura was on the mountain, and demanded shelter from the storm; for I could not bring myself to beg his life, as it were, from a Spaniard, by describing the extremity he was in. Alarcon scornfully ordered me to begone; saying, that he kept no lodgings for wandering Indians. If the life of my whole tribe had depended on it, I could not have again pleaded for admission; so I turned my back on the posada, and hurried to the rock where I had left my grandsire. The old man lay so still, that I at first believed he slept; but when I took his hand, I felt it was too deadly cold for that of a living being. It dropped heavily from me; and I knew that Pichimandura was no more.

"My father was then in the forest of Curunaquel, with the rest of his family; and I determined to carry my grandsire thither without delay. Although he had formerly been accounted the tallest and stoutest warrior of his tribe, he was shrunk by old age and disease to a skeleton; so that, when I had carefully shrouded him in his cloak, I raised him with ease on my shoulders, and set off on my journey to the forest. Caracas was not so extensive a city in those days as it now is. I passed round it with ease before day-break, and lay hid in a ravine, on the other side of the suburbs, lest any one might meet me on the road, and see the caziq of the Cachiris carried to the grave, without a bier or attendance. When I reached my father's hut, on the following night, I entered in silence, and laid the corpse on my father's bed. There was no time to be lost; I therefore returned immediately, in search of as many Cachiris as I could collect at so short a warning; and when I appeared at day-break, at the head of a hundred warriors, we found a grave already dug beneath the roof which had so often sheltered the caziq when living, and was now to be his temporary abode after death.

"When he was laid in the earth, I hastened to console my father, and the warriors who were present, by the prospect of vengeance, which my relation of Alarcon's conduct to the old Caziq suggested; and we immediately set off, with the clay of the grave on our foreheads, for the posada which had risen on the ruins of our tambo. Notwithstanding my precautions to avoid observation, I had been seen the preceding night on the road, with my grandsire's corpse on my shoulders. The Gallego had been informed of the circumstance; and his conscience warned him to expect a fearful retribution at the hands of the tribe. He had therefore solicited and obtained the assistance of soldiers from the garrison at Caracas, and had concealed them in the outhouses; so that when my father, at the head of his warriors, commenced an attack on the posada, a volley of musketry stretched him and several others mortally wounded on the ground. My father exclaimed, with his last breath, "Firmes, Cachiris! revenge your caziq!"

"Some of us had fortunately brought with us our bows and arrows. We surrounded the posada, sheltering ourselves as we best could behind rocks and walls, from the deadly aim of the soldiers, which we had no means of returning; and wrapping pieces of lighted yezca round the points of our arrows, we shot them into the palm-leaf thatch. The mountain breeze soon fanned the yezca matches into a blaze: and, as the inmates of the house attempted to escape, we brought them down with our unerring reeds, and knocked them on the head with our war clubs. They died, to a man, except the zambo youth. He, though severely scorched, escaped through the circle of warriors, to the spot where I knelt examining my father's wounds; and clasping my knees, implored mercy in my father's name.

"I spared his life, and saved him from the unsatisfied vengeance of the tribe, by adopting him as a brother on the spot. He lived in my family some years; and, as no one ventured to occupy the tambo after our signal vengeance on the Gallego and his household, I advised Bautista Nuñez to offer himself to government as ventero. I lent him a sufficient sum, from the treasure of the tribe, which was now at my disposal as caziq, to set him up in the inn; and, although surly and disobliging to others, he has never been known to turn an Indian from his door."

"As Pichiloncoy concluded his tale, the ventero appeared with several of his peons, bearing joints of roast kid on wooden spits, which they planted upright in the turf, before the travellers. Then laying an undressed deer-skin on the ground, they covered it with roasted plantains and aracaça roots, together with arepas of yellow maize. Bautista himself brought a capacious calabash full of fermented cane juice, with three neatly carved cocoa-nut goblets; and retired with his peons, leaving his guests to enjoy themselves undisturbed.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE DUNGEON—THE CONFESSOR—THE ESCAPE.

The jailer had been mindful of his promise to Don Beltran, and had removed him from the subterranean bovedas (vault) to a comparatively comfortable cell, which was, however, by no means so well ventilated as Maestro Rodil had boasted. The only aperture by which air was admitted, was a small window about a foot square, situated so far from the ground, that a prisoner from within could see nothing whatever outside it, except the deep blue tropical skies, and the palm trees in the adjoining Dominican convent garden. It was, moreover, almost totally closed by the massive iron grating, which secured it, apparently, against all possibility of being forced.

Contrary to the jailer's expectation,—if not hope,—no order had as yet arrived for the prisoner to be fettered. Peñaola continued to pace his narrow cell in melancholy meditation, on the sentence which he dreaded but saw no means of averting. One while, he muttered imprecations on the carelessness of his Indian messenger, in falling into the Cachiris' ambush; and the next moment he listened, in breathless and torturing anxiety, to the frequent grating of dungeon doors; while fancy anticipated the arrival of the Juez Fiscal, who was to read the sentence of the court-martial.

The merry ringing of the church bells reached his prison; but were far from dispelling the gloom that oppressed his spirits. He reflected how little sympathetically the busy world without had with him; and shuddered at the idea, that even so would they ring, when the sentence of the court had been executed on him in its fullest rigour. This, however, he could scarcely as yet bring himself seriously to contemplate. Immediately after the bells had commenced tolling for mass, he heard the sound of heavy footsteps approaching his cell; and he felt himself turn pale, as the key slowly turned in the rusted lock. He again breathed more freely, on perceiving that the visitor, whom the jailer ushered in, was not the thin, ascetic Fiscal, but the portly dominican, Fray Nicolas, whom he had long known intimately, and who was universally welcome throughout Caracas;—except, indeed, when he came in his present capacity of confessor to the jail.

"Ave Maria, son Beltran!" he exclaimed, "can this be you? I had no idea, when niño Rodil came for me to the convent this morning, that so dear a friend as you could be in want of spiritual consolation; otherwise I would have made more haste. But come, my son! be not cast down. You know the old refrain says,

"A todos la muerte Les viene de suerte!"

and you should therefore take every reverse of fortune philosophically, as you see me do. I have parted, in this very cell, with many a dear friend, who has been led out in pursuance of his sentence; but I thank my patron, Santo Domingo, that I have never lost sight of my equanimity, on any such trying occasion. My motto is

"Siempre parado
A cualquier estado;"

and let it also be yours, my son. You know not what consolation it will afford you on any unforeseen contingency."

As worthy Fray Nicolas was proceeding in this strain of well meant consolation, and was more particularly insisting on the absolute necessity of being at all times resigned, and prepared for the worst; the hollow roaring of the earthquake, speedily followed by a concussion which shook the prison to its foundation, interrupted the self-complacency of his harangue. He tottered to the door, as fast as his agitation and the vibratory motion of the earth would permit; and, finding that the jailer had double locked the cell, on leaving him to his tête à tête with the prisoner, he made the most violent efforts to burst his way. Finding that it was in vain, he strained his voice, in unison with Don Beltran, to make himself heard by the jailer and ejaculated many an oath.

Rodil, however, was far enough out of hearing. He had fled precipitately into the Plaza at the first alarm, and, with the usual recklessness of a jailer, had left his unhappy prisoners to their fate. The solid masonry of the carcel resisted for some moments the violence of the earthquake; but by degrees, the walls began to give away in various parts, either falling in on the helpless inmates of the cells, or outwards into the courts of the prison. As the repeated crashes were heard by Fray Nicolas, who had thrown himself on the dungeon floor exhausted by his previous exertions, he exclaimed, "Curses on that monster of iniquity, who has left me here to perish! and a thousand on my own folly, in trusting myself within the walls of a prison on any account whatever! A silver candlestick,—two candlesticks of solid silver do I vow to Santo Domingo! let us but escape in safety from this extremity of danger."

Don Beltran, meanwhile, was by no means free from serious apprehensions; for callous indeed must be the heart, which sinks not at the appalling scene displayed by an earthquake such as this. Yet the agony of his previous state of suspense, while in momentary expectation of the arrival of his sentence, was so intolerable, that any change of circumstances was welcomed as a reprieve. Even this awful convulsion of nature was, to him, far preferable to the stillness of his solitary cell, with the attendant horrors of reflection on approaching death, by the hands of the executioner. A ray of doubtful hope gleamed through his mind, on hearing the fall of the adjoining walls; and it brightened into exultation, as he saw the arch of the dungeon window give way and fall outwards, together with the iron grating which had been interposed between him and liberty. Without a moment's delay, he dragged the heavy table from the centre of the cell, where it stood, to the wall beneath the window; springing hastily on it, he forced himself through the opening, regardless of the imminent danger of being crushed, in his passage, by falling stones and rubbish. Fray Nicolas eagerly called on his former penitente to assist him in making his escape; but Don Beltran turned a deaf ear to his confessor's entreaties. Letting himself drop into the inner court of the prison, he passed unchallenged through the gateway, which Rodil had omitted to secure, and mingled with the crowd in the Plaza.

Far different were Peñuela's feelings, at that moment, from those of the affrighted multitude. He scarcely heard their piercing cries of "Misericordia!" he scarcely noticed the ruined buildings, which were even then falling around him. His thoughts were occupied by his miraculous preservation from an ignominious death, by the very means which had made so many widows and orphans in the same moment of time. He could scarcely believe that his escape was any thing but a dream, until he unexpectedly found himself close to Miranda, so lately his judge; but who now, awe-struck by the calamitous event, which had converted the anniversary of triumph into a day of mourning, either saw him not, or wasted not a thought on him as he passed. Don Beltran was aroused, by this rencontre, to a sense of the necessity for his immediate concealment, and flight from Caracas, nay even from Venezuela, if it were practicable. He therefore hurried, through the most unfrequented streets, towards the Calle de los Capuchinos, with the intention of securing as much gold and other valuables as he could conveniently carry away; and then, of making his escape from some of the small ports on the coast, to the Havana, or any West Indian island to which he could most readily obtain a passage.

When he reached his house, he stood for some moments as it were panic-struck, and scarcely capable of recognising it, so completely was it reduced to ruins. Although he might have been prepared for such a sight, by the universal destruction he had witnessed elsewhere, it had made scarce any impression on his mind, occupied as it was with exultation for his escape. As he made his way with difficulty through the corridors, towards a subterranean apartment in which he kept his iron chest, he was surprised to see his son Joaquin's horse standing saddled in the inner court; and a stout carriage mule, with a baggage saddle, tied to one of the orange trees. He listened, in expectation of hearing voices, supposing that the Rotozos had already found their way hither in search of plunder. Hearing nothing, however, he was proceeding to disinter his concealed treasure; when he distinguished the heavy blows of a hammer, echoing along the deserted corridors. He advanced to the entrance of the vaulted closet, and looking in, saw his son Joaquin busily employed in the endeavour to burst open the lid of the iron chest.

Young Peñuela started on seeing his father; but immediately explained to him that, supposing him to be still in the prison, he had thought it expedient to remove the property as soon as possible to a place of security. This, he observed, was doubly necessary, both as a precaution against robbers, and against confiscation by order of the Junta, which there was sufficient reason to apprehend. Don Beltran commended his prudence, but intimated his desire that the chest itself should be conveyed to a solitary ravine in the neighbourhood of the city; and disclosed his design of escaping from the mainland as soon as possible. He therefore sought out his most important papers, and a casket of valuable jewels, which were concealed in a private recess in the vault. Having secured them in the chest, he placed it on the mule with his son's assistance, and lashed it tightly to the pack-saddle with a halter that lay near; covering it carefully from the curiosity of passengers, with a covering of tanned hide. The staircase, leading to the rooms above, had fallen in; but Don Beltran contrived to reach the upper corridor, with the assistance of a bamboo ladder, which he brought from the out-houses. Having entered the bed-rooms, he filled two travelling trunks with his own clothes, mingled indiscriminately with those of his son and daughter, and lowered them by a rope into the court-yard. He then ordered his son to bring another mule and horse from the garden, whither they had all escaped on the falling of the stable; which, however, being a mere bamboo shed, had not injured them materially. When he had loaded the second mule, he disguised himself in a peon's poncho, which he found in the corridor; and, mounting his horse, took the road to the country, leading the mules, and followed by his son.

It was nearly sunset before they reached the retired quebrada, in which Don Beltran proposed to conceal his treasure until his departure. After unloading the mules, and depositing the iron chest, in the bushes, he directed Joaquin to remain there until his return. He then rode to Caracas in quest of provisions for their journey; as well as to make enquiries concerning the fate of his daughter.

He was determined to make her a companion of his flight, provided she had not yet taken the veil; and this he believed by no means improbable, considering the time at which the earthquake occurred; for it must, in all likelihood, have interrupted the ceremony of initiation. For this purpose, he rode, directly on reaching Caracas, to the house of Doña Gertrudes; who, he concluded, would be more capable than any other person of giving him the required information.

He found that a temporary shed had been erected, with the assistance of the neighbours, in the garden among the fruit trees; and had been rendered as comfortable as possible, under existing circumstances, by such articles of furniture, belonging to the house, as had escaped damage. Don Gabrino, the chaplain, who not only considered himself in peril from the fanatic followers of the royalist monks, but was also apprehensive that his presence might endanger his sister, had fled to the army in the Egido. Miranda had formed a bivouac there; and had been joined by the members of government, and all civilians who were favourably inclined to the cause of La Patria.

Doña Gertrudes and her protégée ran eagerly out of the shed, on hearing the trampling of a horse in the garden, supposing Don Carlos had returned; but they paused on seeing Peñuela, whom they scarcely knew under his disguise. He thanked his kinswoman, drily and formally, for the care she had taken of his daughter; and declared that his object, in disturbing her at that unseasonable hour, was to relieve her of a burthen, which must necessarily be embarrassing to her, in the present state of the country.

"Surely," said Doña Gertrudes, "you will not separate us! Whatever may be your views for yourself, your daughter can be no where safer than with me. Far be it from me to advocate disobedience in a child; but at her age she requires a mother's care, and permit me, at least until more favourable circumstances,—"

"It is impossible, Doña Gertrudes!" interrupted Peñuela; "the arbitrary and tyrannical conduct of the existing government renders it inexpedient for me to reside in Venezuela; and I think it my duty to take my children with me, wherever I may wander, that they may be educated in the principles of loyalty, which could never be instilled into them here. When my native land returns to its allegiance,—and I trust the time is not far distant,—I may again revisit it; but not until then. Meanwhile, you must excuse me, if I insist on preserving that subordination in my own family, which, I grieve to say, has been completely subverted throughout Venezuela."

Maria del Rosario heard with sorrow, but with acquiescent humility, his determination thus arrogantly asserted; and tears, which she in vain strove to repress, flowed fast as she turned to embrace Doña Gertrudes. While Peñuela went in search of a pillion for his daughter, she gave vent to her feelings without restraint. Her kind friend, although deeply sympathising in her affliction, reminded her of the necessity of obeying her father's will without a murmur; and encouraged her to hope for a speedy meeting, under happier circumstances. She failed in her attempt to console her; but succeeded in calming her agitation, and enabling her, on her father's return, to prepare to accompany him with composure, and little apparent reluctance.

The females of South America then invariably made use of pillions on a journey; and the custom is still continued in many parts of that country. Maria del Rosario was therefore mounted in this manner behind her father, closely muffled in a capote; and soon found herself, for the first time, in the lonely environs of the city after night-fall. Don Beltran spurred forward in silence; and in a short time left the level high-road, and crossed the uneven country towards the ravine, in which he had left his son Joaquin. The moon was rising; otherwise it would have been difficult, even for an experienced guide, to have found the way, after leaving the beaten track. The inequalities of the road were so great, that the horse, although one of the stout active Llanero breed, found considerable exertion necessary, in scrambling up the small eminences. When descending them, he was compelled to slide down on his haunches, bringing with him loose stones and gravel; so that Maria del Rosario, totally unused as she was to travelling in that manner, was kept in constant terror of falling.

They at length reached a wood of lofty caoba trees, beneath which the wild guava bushes grew so thickly, that the travellers could scarcely keep their seat; even by stooping under the branches, and occasionally deviating from the narrow cattle track, which led to the mountain stream. To add to the novice's terror, the forest, of which this wood formed a part, abounded in *javali*s, or wild hogs; and, as the horse started at the small droves, which repeatedly crossed the path in search of wild fruit, her fancy magnified them into panthers and jaguars. The notes of the nocturnal forest birds, also, terrified her with the harshness of their abrupt, ill-omened song. The metallic tones of the darra, or bell-bird, rang through the glades at measured intervals, precisely resembling in sound a small convent bell, tolled for midnight devotion; and the tucúqueri, or eagle-owl, screamed almost articulately from the branches of the congrisa.

The sound of a rivulet was now distinctly heard, as they approached the ravine. The horse suddenly stopped short, snorting as he appeared to reconnoitre an abrupt descent through the dark underwood, which Doña Maria apprehended to terminate in some precipice. Being roused by the spur, he plunged forward, and slid down the bank of the quebrada, for so it proved to be, crashing through the brush-wood and matted creeping plants in his descent. Here Don Beltran dismounted, and lifted his daughter from the pillion; assuring her that she had not far to walk, but that the roughness of the road would render it unsafe to trust any longer to the horse's feet. Maria del Rosario could see that she stood in the gorge of a ravine, through which a considerable torrent foamed in the rainy season; but its place was now merely occupied by a diminutive rivulet, which could scarcely struggle through the rocks and stones, brought down by the annual rains, from the mountains. Huge forest trees, whose roots were partially undermined by wintry torrents, stretched their massive trunks and spreading branches across the ravine, almost excluding the light of the moon; while the lofty and hollow banks, which were in total darkness, resembled caverns, from which the trembling novice half expected to see banditti sally, as she gazed on the mis-shapen rocks that lay piled on heaps in the gloom.

After proceeding for a short distance along this toilsome road, in uninterrupted silence, except when the horse's iron-shod hoofs rang through the hollow glen, as he stumbled over the smooth round shingles, they reached an abrupt angle in the narrow channel of the torrent, where a fire was blazing briskly under a steep rock. Don Beltran, who appeared absorbed in thought, had omitted to prepare his daughter to meet any one in this desolate retreat. It was therefore with no small feelings of surprise that she heard him say, as they approached the cavern,—"Joaquin, I see, has been preparing a comfortable spot for our reception. You have but seldom met your brother, Rosario! since first you entered the convent. It is time you should become better acquainted; for you are about to undertake a long journey together."

The brother and sister had indeed been brought up so completely apart, (as is not unusual in the country,) that she felt even more embarrassed by this abrupt introduction, than if he had been a perfect stranger. He had never visited the convent during her novitiate, and his time had been passed in a totally different circle from that in which she had moved, during the last month, while under the care of Doña Gertrudes. Joaquin, on the contrary, appeared little affected in any way by the meeting. He offered his sister the seat he had been occupying, on a fragment of rock near the fire, as formally as though she had been a mere acquaintance; and immediately turned away to examine the provisions which Don Beltran had brought with him; declaring he had never in his life felt such an appetite. The alforjas were found to contain some slices of dried meat and bread, besides a calabash of that aguardiente, commonly known by the uninviting name of chido, from the flavour it acquires in the goat-skin bottles in which it is kept. Don Beltran advised his daughter to partake of this homely fare, which was all he had been able to procure at so late an hour; acquainting her at the same time, that he designed to proceed on the journey they had before them, as soon as the horses which had brought them thither should be rested. She declined taking any refreshment; but the father and son, whose appetite had not been impaired by the fatigue and anxiety of the day, commenced an attack on the provisions; having occasionally recourse to the calabash, as a valuable auxiliary against the chill night air, which began to be keenly felt.

When they had finished their repast, they again saddled their horses, which had been browsing on the young shoots of the culegui cane under the banks of the ravine. Then, bringing forward the iron chest from its place of concealment, they laid it as before on one mule, and fastened the trunks on the other. Don Beltran seated his daughter once more on the pillion, and mounted before her. Joaquin, looking gloomy and discontented, at the misfortune that had reduced him to the station of a peon, rode forward, leading the two mules, and took the road into the interior of the forest.

CHAPTER IX.

MORNING.—THE INDIAN HUT.—THE CREOLE OF CURAZAO.—THE SCHOONER.

The moon rode high in the heavens, when they left the Quebrada del Tucueri; and as they proceeded farther into the recesses of the forest, they met with less interruption from the underwood. The mahogany trees, also, of which it was chiefly composed, were of a more majestic size, and situated much farther apart from each other, than in the outskirts; for towards these the wood was spreading, and was consequently of a later growth. The mighty monarchs of the forest appeared to disdain all meaner competitors; and the soil in which they grew, exhausted, as it were, by sustaining their gigantic frames, seemed incapable of nourishing a blade of grass, or any thing possessing vegetable life, except enormous fungi and dusky lichens;—the reptiles of botany.

The first gray streaks of dawn became visible, as the travellers emerged from the forest, and entered on a series of grassy glades, surrounded by copse wood, extending between it and the villages of Leon. Numerous herds of red deer were leaving the thickets, and spreading themselves to graze along the borders of the savanna; while the shrill crow of the cock of the wood, and the piercing scream of the wild turkey, were heard from the pomegranate trees. There was, nevertheless, none of that refreshing coolness, which usually renders the morning hour so delightful, even in the hottest climates. Not a breath of air waved the long savanna grass, nor rustled through the leaves of the morichi palm; and, as the sun rose higher, its rays were cast with unmitigated splendour on the unsheltered plain, which the travellers were crossing. The oppressive sultriness, such as generally follows, as well as it precedes, an earthquake, determined Don Beltran to pass a few hours beneath the first shade that should offer itself. The horses and mules gave evident signs of fatigue; and although Maria del Rosario forbore to complain, her father could judge, by her flushed cheeks and parched lips, that some refreshment more suited to her habits than that which he had provided for the journey, and a short siesta in the shade, were absolutely necessary for her.

They were coasting along the edge of an extensive tract of sand and gravel,—which had apparently overwhelmed this part of the savanna at some remote period, swept along, probably, by a long forgotten inundation, or suddenly poured forth, from the bowels of the earth, by some devastating earthquake,—when Don Beltran suddenly broke the melancholy silence that excessive thirst had caused among them.

"Queen of heaven!" he exclaimed; "there is water at last. Keep up your spirits, Rosario! a few minutes longer, and we shall assuage this bitter thirst that oppresses us."

The novice looked in the direction her father pointed; and, though her eyes were inflamed and dim, with the scorching heat of the atmosphere, which had deprived both them and her lips of all moisture, she fancied she saw distinctly a clear pool, scarcely agitated by a gentle breeze, that broke into waving lines the shadows of the neighbouring palm trees. She faltered thanks to her patron saint for this unexpected prospect of relief; and would have wept for joy, but that her tears appeared dried in their source. To reach the spot where the lagoon appeared to be situated, they were under the necessity of turning off from the beaten track, into the heavy sand and shingles round which it wound. The horses and mules, instead of pressing forward instinctively, hung back, in spite of spurs and blows; and, at last, stood obstinately and determinedly still.

Joaquin Peñuela, irritated at this delay, dismounted, and set off on foot to fill their calabash. His father and sister too much fatigued to follow him, watched him with anxious eyes, as he walked slowly towards the lagoon. He appeared to enter it; but did not stop to draw water. He passed on, and walked completely through that which they still believed to be a clear pool; and yet, to their unspeakable surprise, he did not throw himself down eagerly to drink, as they felt that they must have done in his situation. His father called him impatiently, and he turned: but it was to dash the calabash to the ground with gestures of fierce disappointment. He caught up handfuls of sand, which he threw violently from him, to show them that he had at length discovered, on seeing the same delusive appearance before, behind, and around him, that the supposed lagoon was the production of that tantalising illusion, the deceitful mirage of the desert.

Don Beltran now comprehended why the beasts were so determined against proceeding in this direction. Their instinct, a more unerring guide than man's boasted reason, had warned them that, by leaving the path, they would wander farther and farther from their usual halting place, where alone water was to be procured.

He accordingly directed Joaquin to turn with the mules towards a mata of palms, a few miles off the road; and after a tedious journey over the dusty plain, which appeared to lengthen as they toiled along, they discovered a small Indian hut, built among the trees which they were approaching. By the herd of cows that were ruminating in the shade, they knew it to be one of the cancicos attached to some large dairy farm. Their approach aroused two or three stout bony tiger-dogs, of the Cumana breed, from their place of repose beneath the projecting eaves of the cottage. As these guardians of the herd rushed furiously forward, resenting the intrusion of strangers, a little Indian boy, more than half naked, sprang up from a miniature hovel, in which he had been lounging in all the luxury of indolence, together with a whole litter of young brothers and sisters; and hurried to the rescue of the travellers. By means of a small sling, from which he hurled pebbles with true Indian dexterity, he drove the dogs slowly and sulkily back to their lair. From thence they long viewed the strangers askance, couched in the attitude of attack, as that most natural to them, with jealous looks and stifled growls, before they became in some degree reconciled to their unusual appearance.

The mother of the family, who was busied, with her oldest daughter, pressing curds into small round baskets, neatly plaited of palm leaves, came forward on hearing the sound of the horses' hoofs. The usual salutations being exchanged, she welcomed the travellers to her cottage, and invited them to dismount; but previously handed them a capacious calabash of fresh water, which had been hanging in the breeze. She lifted Maria del Rosario from her pillion, kissing her on each cheek, as she led her under the cool roof, which, besides being shaded by the spreading morichis under which it was built, was covered with the broad leaved zapallo and calabash, with golden and white flowers; these useful vegetables having climbed up the posts of the shed, and spread themselves entirely over the thatch. There were no walls to exclude the breeze from the savanna, except round the small apozento, within which a candle was kept constantly burning before a gaudy coloured print of Nuestro Sára del Carmen, surmounted by a small crucifix of brass. The whole of the partition around this shrine was gaily decorated with brilliant feathers, wild birds' eggs, and stuffed humming birds hung in festoons. This division of the cottage, although bearing the name of a bed-room, had never been profaned by being put to that use; and was neatly enclosed by a lattice work of bright yellow canes. It contained, among the other few valuables of the family, a small carved chest of black mahogany; from which their Indian hostess now hastened to take a neat hammock of grass net, as white as cotton, which she hung up for the accommodation of her fair guest.

Don Beltran and his son unsaddled their horses and mules, and entrusted them to the care of the two eldest boys, who volunteered to take them to drink at a neighbouring pool. The urchins mounted with the activity of monkeys, on obtaining permission; congratulating themselves on their promotion to the important post of grooms, with a grin of delight, seldom to be seen even among the younger branches of their saturnine race. The travellers then entered the house, and found their hospitable hostess spreading a low table with plantains, cheese, and milk in small white calabashes; lamenting, at the same time, the absence of her husband, who, she said, would have been proud to assist her in showing attention to her guests. When they had concluded their meal, she pointed out to Don Beltran and Joaquin two swinging beds, made of dressed skins, cut into a sort of net-work, that were suspended beneath the palm; recommending them to refresh themselves by a siesta. She also produced a curtain of woven grass, which she sprinkled with water, and drew close round the hammock in which Maria del Rosario was reclining, to screen her from the sand flies. She then returned to her occupation, which the travellers' arrival had interrupted, under the cool shed she used as a dairy.

Never had the hours of siesta appeared to the novice to pass so rapidly, for never had she felt such need of rest: she was, however, considerably refreshed, when her father again summoned her to resume her journey. Their Indian hostess absolutely refused to accept of any remuneration for her attention, except a few cigars, which Don Beltran left for her husband, and a scallop of Santa Clara which the novice hung round her neck at parting. Another tedious track of savanna land remained to be crossed; and it was not until late in the evening, that they began to ascend the range of low hills, between the level country of Cataveral and the sea-coast.

The port which Don Beltran had selected as being one at which he ran but little risk of interruption in making his escape, was the small fishing village of Los Bagres. It was built on the side of a narrow creek; and was frequented only by coasting piraguas, and small droguers from the neighbouring islands, which used to touch here occasionally for the purpose of trading or smuggling. Both terms were indeed synonymous at the coast of Tierra Firme, except at the larger ports. Although Peñuela had no reason to apprehend pursuit, considering the state of commotion in which he had left Caraccas, the imminent danger he had already undergone induced him to be as cautious as possible. He therefore left his son and daughter in the first cottage at the entrance of the village; and rode on alone, in secret of the captains of some little vessels, whose masts he could see above the huts.

It was not long before he found out the cancha de baile, (which was also the dancing-house and only place of public entertainment in the village,) by the sounds of mirth and revelry that proceeded from it, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour. The cancha itself, with its smooth earthen floor sprinkled with white sand, occupied one end of a large oblong shed, open at the sides, and thatched with leaves. At the farther end of this cancha, was a pulperia, or shop for the sale of sundries;—chiefly aguardiente and tobacco. In the centre, which was by far the largest compartment, was a crowded assembly surrounding a few dancers; who were amusing themselves and the spectators with a fandango, to the music of a harp, two or three vihuelas, and a choir of singers, partly volunteers, partly hired.

Don Beltran called on one side the pulperia who was busily engaged supplying his clamorous guests, in the dancing-shed or the cancha, with calabashes of punch for the men, and copitas of liqueurs for the females. On enquiring if any merchant sailors were there, he was directed to the pulperia, where he found three foreign masters of droguers, seated apart from the natives, smoking long negro cigars, and rivaling each other in copious libations of aguardiente chivato. Two were mulattoes from the island of Trinidad, who had crossed the Boca del Sirpiente in their small sloops, and were returning freighted with cane spirits distilled on the Main. These were then in considerable request at the plantations on the neighbouring islands, for the purpose of making up into rum for the European market. The third was a white, or rather tawny, Dutch creole of Curacao, who had just landed and sold a cargo of dry-goods from his first trader, and was in readiness to return.

Lodewyk Sluiker was exactly the schipper suited to Don Beltran's purpose. The phlegm he inherited from his Teutonic ancestors, had moderated in him the alertness and inquisitiveness of the creole, to a good humoured insouciance, which rendered him the most accomodating being possible, in the way of business. He was ready to do any thing for an employer,—provided it would not give him too much trouble;—and to sail to any part of the West Indies,—where he was in no danger of the custom-house,—without asking inconvenient questions, and “for a consideration.” Peñuela therefore easily struck a bargain with him, for a reasonable sum, to convey himself and two other passengers, with their luggage, to the neutral island of St. Thomas; for no offer could induce Lodewyk to hazard his schooner at any port under the Spanish flag. Don Boltran therefore returned in search of his son and daughter; and Sluiker proceeded to collect his “zwart schelms” of negro sailors, who were enjoying themselves, with all the thoughtless hilarity of their nation and profession, at the fandango. Previously to embarking, Peñuela endeavoured to dispose of his horses and mules; but could meet with no purchaser in the fishing village. He therefore gave them to the skipper, who entrusted them to the care of the pulpero; declaring they would make him an excellent venture to Curacao on his return.

Every thing being prepared for hauling out of the creek, the schooner was brought alongside a small jetty, and the passengers embarked by the light of a lantern, which Kapitein Lodewyk held for their accommodation. The honest skipper, notwithstanding his habitual indifference to every thing which did not immediately interfere with his own affairs, was surprised to see so young and lovely a female about to embark in a craft so void of all accommodation as his; especially in company with men, of whom he could entertain no favourable opinion, from the clandestine manner of their leaving the country. However, the doubloons he had received were good; and the lady, whoever she might be, made no complaint. He therefore prudently determined to say nothing on the subject, except to express his fear in his provincial jargon, half Dutch and half Spanish, that the poor young lady would be but uncomfortably situated on board the droguer.

His apprehensions, to confess the truth, were not without foundation; for the vessel was one of the long Havana schooners, built chiefly for sailing, with but little draught of water, and running away to nothing under the counter. Consequently the cabin, if the little berth abaft the mainmast deserved the name, had barely room for two persons to stretch themselves on the lockers. Lodewyk however insisted, before he would cast loose from the jetty, on accommodating his lady-passenger in the best manner possible. Having wrapped a boat-cloak round her, he seated her on the companion; and jumping down below, handed up a binnacle, a liquor case, and several pea-jackets and foul-weather hats, &c. which lumbered the berth. He then earnestly advised her to go below out of the chill night air; comforting her with an assurance, that as soon as the schooner should be clear of the creek and in the fair-way, he would knock down the bulk-head which separated the cabin from the after-hold. As the latter was empty, she would then have plenty of fresh air, and even room to walk about, if she felt disposed.

He appeared to consider no apologies necessary to Don Boltran and his son; merely warning them, as he saw this was their first passage, to keep their feet out of coils of rope, and their heads from under the boom, when the main-sail jibed. At the elder Peñuela's request, he lowered the iron chest into the hold, making no remark on its weight, which was considerable, except desiring the men to stow it right amid-ships, and close to the keel of the main-mast, for it was enough, he said, to throw the droguer out of trim. He also made room for the trunks, on the cabin floor, under the swinging table.

The tide having begun to ebb, Sluiker sent two hands in the jolly-boat to tow: the lights in the cottages at Los Bagres rapidly receded, and at length totally disappeared. The scene was so perfectly new to the passengers, who had remained on deck, that they exchanged scarcely a word, as they leaned on the companion, gazing at the shores, which were indistinctly seen as the creek widened. Not a sound was heard around, but the slow splash of the oars in the boat ahead; with the occasional “Orrah!” of the negroes pulling, which echoed for a few moments across the surrounding level land, and then died away in the distance. Lodewyk, who stood at the helm, now recommended his passengers to descend into the fore-hold; where, he informed them, they would find a few spare sails, on which they might rough it comfortably enough until day. They gladly followed his advice, and soon forgot the novelty of their situation in repose.

CHAPTER X.

LA GUAYRA.—THE REINFORCEMENT.

Don Carlos and his friend Lorenzo Tovar arrived at La Guayra, soon after the reveilles had ceased beating, on the morning after the earthquake. They found that, although the buildings had shared to the fullest extent in that dreadful visitation, there were, nevertheless, no symptoms of that factious and mutinous tendency in the inhabitants, which threatened the capital with the horrors of civil war, in addition to the fearful misfortune which had already befallen it.

As is generally the case, in sea-port towns on the Spanish Main, there were but few rotos, or idlers of any description, in La Guayra, in comparison to the numbers infesting the inland towns. The majority of the inhabitants, too, being merchants and manufacturers, were personally interested in the maintenance of order, and could at any time command a sufficient force, composed of their immediate dependants and peons, to put down any disturbance, which might threaten mischief to their interests and property. Besides, the garrison was necessarily stronger than that maintained at Caracas, La Guayra being one of the principal ports in Venezuela; while, on the contrary, the friars were few in number, and by no means an influential class among a population, whose habits were decidedly those of military and seafaring men.

The governor, Don Ygnacio Cordovez, his house in the Recova having been destroyed, was lodged under a marquee in the arsenal. He was an active bustling little creole, who had risen by means of the revolution from the desk of a writer, to the dignity of brigadier and military commandant of the port. Conscious of his original insignificance and unimposing stature, (for he was far below the middle size,) he made it his study to conceal these defects, by an affectation of busy importance, and by assuming the airs of a martinet.

The young men found him, notwithstanding the early hour at which they arrived, in full uniform, booted and spurred. He was busily engaged superintending the drill of several awkward squads, which had been assembled for that purpose in the arsenal, that they might be more immediately under his own inspection. Most of the drill sergeants were Spaniards, prisoners of war, who had volunteered into the patriot service, to avoid the casas matas and public works. These men might readily be recognised as veterans, by their scarred and weather-beaten features, as well as the rigid perpendicularity of their figures, and their stern, sonorous enunciation when giving the words of command. Nevertheless, the governor took repeated opportunities of disapproving their mode of drill, and correcting the faulty positions prescribed by the old school of tactics, after which they were modelling the recruits. This species of interference was very little to their satisfaction or edification, it might be presumed, by the ill-dissembled scorn and contempt which they evidently felt for their officious creole instructor.

Don Ygnacio Cordovez desisted from this his favourite occupation, on seeing an aide-de-camp of General Miranda approach him. Returning Sepulveda's salute, with much courteous dignity, he begged to know with what instructions his respected “friend and comrade” had been pleased to favour him. On being fully acquainted with the unpleasant state of affairs at Caracas, he broke out into bitter invectives against the whole fraternity of lay-brothers, whom he characterised as dangerous enemies to tranquillity, and drones of the commonwealth.

“It is fortunate for Venezuela, Señor Edecan!” said he, “that I have uniformly exerted myself to maintain discipline in this garrison. Had it been otherwise, the state of the republic would have been indeed critical. I sincerely hope Miranda will at length take warning, and attend to the advice I have so often had the honour to give him, to banish every cogite-rasgado from the country. Ayudante Nuñez! let the garrison immediately get under arms. I myself will select a reinforcement for the capital.”

While the fort-adjutant was executing his order, the governor invited Don Carlos to his quarters, to refresh himself after his journey; directing Tovar at the same time to join his regiment, which, he observed, was one of those he designed to detach. Notwithstanding the foppiness of the little brigadier, he was a rigid disciplinarian; and before he and his guest had finished their early meal of fish and coffee, to which both brought soldiers' appetites, the adjutant reported the troops in readiness.

Sepulveda now learned, on enquiry, that in consequence of there having been no ceremonial of the anniversary the preceding day, the garrison of La Guayra had left the churches previously to the earthquake; consequently very few were killed; and those chiefly by the fall of barracks and hospitals. He was provided with a fresh horse from the governor's own stables; and accompanied him to the Plaza, which was surrounded by regiments in open column, and marching order. Having wheeled them into line, Don Ygnacio addressed them in a high-flown speech, as was his constant custom, touching their duty as soldiers and patriots; and concluded, by acquainting them with his intention of detaching half the garrison to the assistance of their comrades at Caracas, who were in danger of being overpowered by the intrigues of the friars.

Nothing could be more agreeable to the troops than this declaration. They saw a prospect of exchanging the tedious uniformity of garrison duty, for the excitement and variety to be found in a campaign. As a very strong prejudice against the friars existed among the military, whom they had taken every opportunity of vilifying and reviling in their sermons, the troops entertained hopes of having it in their power to “feed fat the grudge they bore them.” It was, therefore, with exultation that the grenadiers de Barlovento and the Cazadores de Aragoa, heard themselves appointed as part of the reinforcement; and their fellow soldiers secretly envied them, as they marched past to the savanna outside the city, where three corps of cavalry were formed in readiness to accompany them. The governor ordered each horseman to take a foot soldier on behind; and having given the senior colonel his directions, wished the detachment success, and returned into La Guayra.

The soldiers had little or no baggage to encumber them; and the stout, active creole horses, little regarding the extra weight they carried, set off at a brisk trot, which effectually suppressed for a time the inclination which the troops felt, of audibly expressing their joy. But, when they had crossed the level country, and reached the short steep hills of the Corraña, where they were occasionally obliged to dismount, they gave full vent to their glee in national songs, which, as was customary on a march, they sang in alternate chorus, each regiment in turn taking up the wild melody. After a few hours halt on the borders of a wood, situated about half way between La Guayra and the capital, they proceeded with renewed spirits and animation. Towards evening, they reached the heights of El Texar; from whence they could see the groves and plantations round Caracas, and the few remaining spires and turrets of that once splendid city, gilded by the last rays of the setting sun.

From hence Sepulveda, who had hitherto ridden beside Lorenzo Tovar, spurred forward to apprise his general that the reinforcement was approaching. He learned that the scanty remains of the garrison had been attacked, the night before, in their bivouac on the Egido, by the infuriated zealots of the city, whom the friars had stimulated to insurrection. These had been joined by the rotos, who fought solely for plunder; and by the numerous royalist citizens, who had long been desirous of a similar opportunity of reinstating the Spanish government. The patriots had lost their field pieces, on which the mob had thrown themselves in all the irregular and irresistible fury of fanaticism; and Miranda had found himself compelled to retire, with his diminished army, to his own Quinta of Girasol, situated about a league from Caracas, on a gentle ascent towards the hills overlooking the city.

As it was late when Sepulveda arrived, he was detained by a picket of cavalry, stationed at the bottom of the avenue leading to the house, until he was recognised by the commanding officer. As he proceeded in quest of Miranda, he passed through the well known pleasure grounds, so strangely altered from their former rural appearance, in the few hours during which they had been occupied by troops, that he could scarcely be lieve them to be the same. The rose bushes and pomegranates had been cut down and cleared away, in many parts, to make room for the infantry to pile their arms; and the neat white paling, which formerly encircled the lawn, had been broken up for fuel, and lay in heaps near the numerous fires that blazed in every part of the shrubbery. The ornamental summer houses were converted into officers' quarters; and had by that means escaped the general havoc. But the very state of preservation in which they remained, formed a sad contrast to the surrounding scene; and forcibly recalled the idea of former happy meetings held on the same spot, when no sounds intruded but those of the guitar, and the still sweeter voices of the lively Caracqueñas. The lawn, too, in front of the house, so often lightly trodden by the feet of merry dancers, was trampled by the carbineers' horses, picketed in rows, and was littered with heaps of sugar cane and maize leaves, which the foragers had brought in from the neighbouring plantations.

The Quinta, which was spacious, and built after what is usually styled in South America the Italian fashion, was of one story high, and had consequently received but little damage from the earthquake. The wide corridors running round the house were occupied by the staff officers, and principal citizens who had accompanied Miranda. The interior was entirely appropriated to the accommodation of the ladies belonging to patriot families, who had been compelled by the disturbances to fly from the city, and take refuge in the camp. Miranda had been that day invested with the authority, though not the title, of dictator, by the unanimous voice of the Junta Gubernativa. He had, notwithstanding, called a council, composed of all his fellow-citizens of talent and experience who were present, to consult them on the line of conduct to be pursued under the present emergency. The arrival of Sepulveda relieved them from a principal part of their anxiety; for they had been exceedingly apprehensive of a similar popular movement at La Guayra, which would have at once introduced Monteverde and the Spanish army into the heart of Venezuela. They were, therefore, rejoiced to hear, that every thing was tranquil at the port; and Miranda, ordering another of his aides-de-camp to meet the approaching reinforcement, and direct it where to encamp, dismissed Don Carlos, to take the repose of which he concluded he must stand in need.

Among the attendants of the staff, Sepulveda saw his own servant Gaspar, who was loquacious in his expressions of joy, at once more seeing his master; and informed him, that his uncle the chaplain was at the other end of the corridor. Don Carlos found him comfortably seated on his trunk, which he had taken the precaution to bring with him from the city. He was surrounded by a party of young officers, whom he had invited to partake of a plentiful supper, provided him by the foragers; for the creole soldiers uniformly esteemed and respected the secular clergy, as much as they detested and despised the friars. Two of the cavalry picket, stationed at the Quinta, had volunteered their services as cooks and waiters. They were standing in the middle of the upper circle, with carbines slung and sabres by their sides, holding the wooden spits on which they had roasted the abundant contribution made for their chaplain, consisting of several different sorts of fowls, and entire joints of kid. Don Gabriano himself was doing ample justice to the good fare. Animated, rather than depressed, by the novelty of the scene, he was chattering and laughing as merrily as if he had been seated at the head of his own table, at his peaceful curato of Maracay.

On seeing Sepulveda approach, all made room for him with kind greetings. His uncle started up, and embraced him affectionately; insisting on his sitting down and joining them, before he would allow him either to make any enquiries, or to relate any news. When supper was over, and the guests had dispersed to enjoy their cigars, and to rest from the toils of the day, Don Carlos anxiously enquired after his mother. His uncle assured him that she was safe, and comfortably situated in the Quinta; but that she had been so much harassed and fatigued of late that it would not be advisable to disturb her before next morning. While Sepulveda was hesitating, and unable to pronounce the name of her who was ever present to his thoughts, Don Gabriano continued: "In addition to the recent serious alarms my sister has experienced, both from the earthquake and the insurrection in the city, she feels most keenly the sudden separation from her protégée Maria del Rosario. Don Beltran, her father, has escaped from prison in the confusion, and has fled from the fate he richly merited, heaven knows whither, taking his daughter with him. It is a thousand pities the poor girl had not already taken the veil. She would, in that case, have been out of his power; and what can she expect but wretchedness from accompanying an outlawed, self-banished traitor?"

Don Gabriano continued his relation of events which had occurred; but his nephew heard no more. "That banished, that one word banished," sounded like the knell of his long-cherished hopes. Ever since he had last seen Maria del Rosario, he dwelt with delight on every circumstance of his snatching her from such imminent peril, at the chapel of the Monjas Claras;—at so critical a moment, too, when she was on the point of pronouncing the irrevocable words that were to divorce her for ever from the world;—and had suffered himself to believe, that he who had been permitted thus to save her life at the risk of his own, was also destined to protect, and render happy, the life so miraculously preserved. His first thought was, how she might be traced; but he recollected his duty, and the perilous state of affairs, in which his country claimed his best exertions. He, therefore, compelled himself to attend to the worthy chaplain, who, encompassed in a thick cloud of smoke, from his only luxury, a cigarro puro, and deeply interested in the occurrences he was relating, had failed to observe the complete abstraction of his nephew. Don Gabriano continued to descant on the wiliness and treachery of the friars; and the danger to be apprehended from Monteverde, should he receive intelligence of the state of the capital, which the chaplain likened to a house divided against a house.

"Far be it from me," said he, "to think evil of any community; but these monigotes, Carlos! are notoriously dangerous to the well-being, nay, to the existence of a free republic. Their ignorance and superstition stand in need of the support of some paramount authority; without which, the fraternity are conscious that they must every where sink into disrepute and decay. At the same time, the slavish principles of passive obedience, which they have imbibed in their cloisters, render them apt and willing agents to restore, by every species of intrigue, a tyrannical government, such as we have just succeeded in shaking off. Our situation, however, has at length come to a crisis; and Miranda has declared his resolution of banishing from Venezuela these demagogues, as soon as he has assembled sufficient force to attack the mutineers. Troops have already arrived from Valencia and Vitoria; and Zaraza has sent an express to announce his approach with a strong guerrilla. I therefore suppose the attack will be made on Caraccas to-morrow."

"The sooner the better. We have long been inactive; and I desire nothing better than a charge on the Godo canalla, backed by those treacherous friars, who have chosen the hour of Venezuela's greatest distress for their revolt. But surely Miranda overrates their force; or he is far more cautious than usual. For my own part, I should say there are enough men bivouacked on the Quinta,—without reckoning the reinforcement from La Guayra,—to chastise the insurgents."

"You speak like a hot-headed youth, Carlos! The rotozos alone are at least four thousand strong. Add to these the discontented citizens, and concealed Godos, besides the Capuchins, Mercedarios, and Agustinos Descalzos;—I understand the prudent Dominicans stand neutral, as usual;—and you will find that a swarm of wasps has mustered in the city, far more numerous than your wisdom calculates on. They are all armed, from the deserted barracks and arsenal; besides possessing the field pieces they took from us last night. Our reconnoitring parties report, that the principal avenues to the city have been strongly barricaded, for which purpose there are indeed ample materials; so that, come when it may, the struggle will doubtless be sanguinary. Meanwhile, son Carlos, I will detain you no longer from your rest; for we shall both be roused pretty early in the morning with drum and bugle."

Sepulveda took leave of his uncle, and retired to a corner of the corridor, where his servant had prepared him a soldier's couch of straw. He threw himself on it, wrapped in his capote; and his melancholy thoughts long kept him waking; but sheer fatigue, that never failing opiate, at length lulled him to sleep.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BIVOUAC—THE GUERRILLA CHIEFS—THE INSURGENTS.

The Quinta of Girasol, at which were the temporary head quarters of the patriot army, had always been the favourite resort of innumerable singing-birds. They used to find shelter from the sultry heat of noon, so oppressively felt on the plain of Caraccas, in these groves surrounding the spacious pleasure-grounds; and coolness in the rivulet, which murmured through them from the hill above. They were now driven from their accustomed haunts, by the unusual confusion and clamour of troops; and none had dared to welcome the dawn with their cheerful song. In their stead, the trumpets of the carbineer guard, echoing through the corridors, broke the calm silence of morning with their animating reveille; and were answered, by the bugles of the infantry, from the opposite shrubbery. The busy hum of the armed multitude was next heard, as the troops sprang from their rude couch, and formed in lines along the "pleached alleys," and among the clumps of rare flowering shrubs, which ornamented the Quinta.

Miranda mounted his horse and rode out, attended by his aides-de-camp, to visit the neighbouring reinforcements, and to superintend in person the necessary arrangements for the attack, which he designed to make that day. While returning from this tour of inspection, he was met by the veteran General Zaraza, accompanied by three or four subordinate leaders of guerrillas. These chiefs, as well as their venerable looking general, were dressed in the usual costume of the valleys; loose cotton shirts and drawers, dark coloured ponchos wrapped about the middle, broad palm-leaf hats with gaudy plumes of feathers, sandals of raw hide, and heavy silver spurs. Their weapons were carbines and pistols,—silver mounted and plain,—of various patterns, and evidently the spoil of hard fought skirmishes; with old-fashioned Spanish dragon pouches, buckled tight round their waists. Each carried a machete, or short cut-and-thrust sword, in an embroidered belt, slung over the neck and under the left arm. They wore their hair cropped so close on the crown of their heads, that it appeared to have been lately shaved; from which fashion the patriots derived the nick-name of Chocutos, by which they were usually designated in the royalist camp; but it floated loosely over their foreheads in long curls, which were drawn back on each side from the temples, and twisted behind the ears. A large queue, or rather club, of long straight hair, profusely anointed with mantea de cacao, and plaited with the greatest neatness and attention, hung down over their shoulders. Their horses had as wild an appearance as themselves; not a hair of their flowing tails or manes having been thinned, since they were first caught in the savanna. But their clean fetlocks, and slender well formed limbs, showed no symptoms of the clumsiness which might have been expected, on a first view of their untrimmed condition.

On seeing the commander-in-chief, they spurred forward to meet him with a shout of welcome; and reining up their mettled chargers close to him, with a sudden violence that almost threw them backwards on their haunches, they embraced him by turns. They then drew back among the aides-de-camp, who were following, highly entertained at the unceremonious manners of their new associates, and saluted them after the same fashion. Zaraza, who was in some degree more polished, merely raised his sombrero to Miranda: and, as the morning breeze waved his thin gray locks, the old warrior addressed his brother general, with all the animation and hilarity of youth.

"A fine morning this, camarada Miranda! for opening a campaign. I am here, you see, punctual to the very hour I promised to join you; but I have had smart work to collect my guerrilleros. My foot has scarcely been out of the stirrup since we parted; except while changing horses. All my people were scattered among their farms, at the maize harvest; and I had to ride as complete a rodeo, as ever I did on my estate, when driving in young cattle to be branded."

"Welcome, friend Zaraza! you have indeed exerted yourself with your usual spirit. How many, rank and file, have you brought me from the valleys?"

"As near as I can guess, camarada!—for you know we guerrilleros keep no muster-rolls like regular troops—my own mozos from the neighbourhood of Barcelona are about six hundred. Riquelmen, Gutierrez, and Rina, bring from four to five hundred each; and my comrade Zedeño's corps, which was cut up so severely near Barquimeto last year, hardly two hundred. Truly, there may be above two thousand."

"Very well; and now the question is how to victual them; for we have as yet no commissariat."

"It is unnecessary, amigo! We passed a farm belonging to the frailes Capuchinos, on our way; and we took care to supply ourselves with beef enough for to-day. To-morrow we shall have settled the whole affair with the cogote-raspados; and my mozos will separate, every man to his home."

By this time they had reached the Quinta, where Miranda found the troops still under arms, and waiting for his orders. He directed them to leave their ranks, and prepare their morning meal; but to be in readiness to fall in at a moment's warning. While the general was busied in receiving reports, and issuing orders for the day, Sepulveda took the opportunity of enquiring for his mother. He found her in one of the long virandas overlooking the pleasure grounds, in conversation with her brother Gabriano, who was excepted, as chaplain, from the strict order issued, prohibiting the officers from intruding on that part of the Quinta occupied by the ladies. The balconies were filled with Caracaqueños, who looked with interest on the busy scene around them, and chatted merrily with their brothers and cortijos beneath; finding a great source of diversion in the temporary separation to which they were subjected, and the novel bustle and parade of a camp.

The Godo party, meanwhile, which had possession of the city, had taken every possible precaution to ensure the success of the counter revolution they had commenced. They had already despatched messengers to Cartagena, to solicit assistance from Monteverde; who, as they well knew, had lately received a strong reinforcement from Cadiz. In full confidence of being speedily succoured, they resolved to make a vigorous resistance against all attempts to dislodge them. The seditious friars laboured incessantly to keep the enthusiasm of their partisans at its proper pitch, by inflammatory harangues; and the wealthy royalists, many of whom had flocked to the Spanish standard, which was ostentatiously displayed from the ruins of the capital, were lavish in their distribution of money among the populace.

Every man who lives in a revolutionary period, either has been, is, or hourly expects to be, a soldier. Consequently, there was but little difficulty in hastily disciplining the insurgents, few of whom were totally unacquainted with the use of arms, so as to render their services as a body available. Several hundred Europeans were scattered among them, who had formerly belonged to the Spanish armies. They had been permitted, by the mistaken lenity of the patriot government, to settle in Caraccas, and even, in many instances, to hold confidential situations, after having surrendered under capitulation in different parts of the country. These men's military skill and experience in warfare, joined to the national antipathy they, as Europeans, bore the creoles, and the personal feelings of rancorous hatred, which, as conquered royalists, they entertained towards the patriots who had humbled them, eminently qualified them to serve as officers among the motley assemblage, which they encouraged by their presence, and animated by their example.

The friars had also sent emissaries among the neighbouring plantations, for the purpose of stimulating the slaves to a revolt against their masters. This unprincipled measure, which was subsequently productive of the most horrible results, was but partially successful at this early stage of the war; for the slaves on the Main, whose treatment was, by many degrees, milder than that experienced by the same class on the islands, for the most part resisted all attempts to corrupt their fidelity. Nevertheless, a considerable body was collected, among the most worthless and depraved of this degraded race; and was armed with lances, machetes, and long knives, as there was no leisure to drill them to the use of fire-arms.

Although the commanders of the insurgents had ventured to lead out their forces on one occasion, in which they had surprised the patriot troops, they had even then met with so warm a reception, that, although finally successful through overpowering numbers, they were deterred from again trying their strength, in the open field, against their disciplined opponents. They were contented to entrench themselves in the Plaza and the neighbouring ruined convents, in a manner which the friars pronounced impregnable. But the veteran Spaniards shook their heads; and doubted whether the raw recruits, whom they saw around them, would be able to make good such breastworks, when vigorously attacked by regular troops.

The command of the whole had been entrusted, by unanimous consent, to Fray Pablo Oyarzun, a capuchin, well known throughout Caraccas as a factious demagogue. His Herculean limbs would have better become the cuirass and helmet of a dragoon, than the coarse gray tunic and cerquillo of a friar; and his strength of lungs, and vehemence of declamation, had rendered him popular as an orator at seditious assemblies. This sturdy member of the church-militant had not entirely discarded his monastic habits, in assuming the office and authority of general; for he still wore the white sandals and dark-hooded frock of a capuchin. But the latter article of dress had been repeatedly rent, by climbing among the ruins of the city, and by his strenuous exertions while assisting to build the barricades; so that it barely reached down to the knee. Instead of the usual knotted girdle of his order, his tunic was bound round his waist by a broad buff leather belt, which held a horseman's sabre, and a brace of brass-mounted pistols. His shaven crown was covered by a helmet, stripped from one of the patriot carbiniers, who had been killed in the Plaza by the mob, during the first effervescence of the popular commotion. The bushy red beard, which he wore in compliance with the rules of his order, gained him, among the insurgents, the appellation of "el Padre Bastidor," from the resemblance it gave him to a Spanish pioneer.

Powerful as his influence was among those of his party, and little as he scrupled to enforce his authority by the most approved method of "pan y palo," he could not succeed in keeping the rotozos, on whose exertions the cause mainly depended, in such order as was desirable. The number of private houses, with well-stocked cellars, as well as of public chop-houses, which had been abandoned, and to which they had unrestrained access, had given them such favourable opportunities for intoxication, as they could not resist. Patrols of their more sober companions in arms were incessantly employed collecting them from the chicherías and wine-houses, in which they indulged in their Bacchanalian propensities; totally forgetful of the attack there was every reason to expect, so soon as Miranda should have mustered a sufficient force.

The alteration in the clothing of the rotozos was another cause of no small embarrassment to their commandant and his subalterns; for the appearance, at a distance, of an irregular group of them, dressed in their borrowed plumes, frequently alarmed the pickets in the Plaza, with the idea that a party of the enemy had entered the city. Some few were contented with wearing the cavalry and infantry uniforms, which they found in barracks or government stores, and on the bodies of soldiers who had been crushed to death during the earthquake. By far the greater number, however, dressed themselves in the gaudiest suits they could plunder, in the houses belonging to members of the Cabildo, and in the wardrobe of the theatre. Even the gaily embroidered and spangled dresses of the bull fighters had been put in requisition. As these realised the beau ideal of splendid apparel, in the eyes of the mob, they became the cause of many single combats with the knife; and repeatedly changed owners in the course of the day. This prevailing passion for gaudy decorations was confined to adorning their persons from the waist upwards. They preferred the guayuco and loose calzoncillos, far beyond trowsers or pantaloons; and the few among them, who were tempted to wear shoes or boots, soon laid them aside, in despair at the cramping and chafing occasioned by such unnatural incumbrances.

If their appearance was grotesque, their deportment on parade, when they could be persuaded to attend, was such as deeply mortified and scandalised their more saturnine instructors. It was not that they were stupid soldiers; for they caught the manual and platoon exercise, from their drill-sergeants, with apparently intuitive readiness of apprehension; and kept step as correctly as might have been anticipated, from their national fondness for music and dancing. But their utter aversion to remaining steady in one position, and their propensity to whistle, and even to sing "La Cachupina" and "El Fraylejon," while standing in the ranks, perpetually annoyed and insulted their Spanish leaders, both priests and laymen. Nevertheless, as their co-operation was of great importance, until the expected reinforcement should arrive from Cartagena, it was considered expedient to connive at these irregularities, and to keep the rotozos in good humour. Such was the condition of the insurgents within the city, whom Miranda was preparing to attack.

CHAPTER XII.

THE ASSAULT—THE CHINGANERA.

The hour appointed for the assault at length arrived; and the patriot army moved forward, in silence and by devious routes, from all the points in which it had been encamped; so as to enter Caraccas by different parts of the environs. The forces within the city, being chiefly raw recruits, headed by inexperienced officers, had given themselves up to their customary indulgence of the siesta, as Miranda had foreseen. Repose, at that hour, was considered by them such a matter of course, that they never dreamed of the possibility of its being interrupted in a hostile manner. They had reckoned on less securely on the siesta being held sacred, than both contending parties used to calculate, at the commencement of the revolutionary war, on every sabbath and saint's day being observed as temporary cessations of arms.

The Cazadores de Aragon, who attacked by the street leading from the plain of the Egido, in conjunction with the Gronaderos del Barlovento, surprised the first picket they came to; the sentry, who was seated with his musket between his knees, dosing under the shade of a projecting roof, being disarmed before he could spread the alarm. Having secured the prisoners in their own guard-room, the troops proceeded unchallenged along the Calle del Marquez, through solitary streets. They might have supposed the city to be altogether deserted, were it not for the sounds of merriment and singing they occasionally heard, while passing the door of some chicheria, within which a party of rotozos was carousing. As they entered the main street leading to the Plaza, a single shot was heard in an opposite quarter. The leading files halted for a moment, and held their breath to listen. It was followed by a heavy, but irregular discharge of musketry, such as an undisciplined body of men would fire on a sudden alarm; and instantly after, close volleys, as of platoons, pealed in measured time from the same direction.

"Viva la patria!" exclaimed Lorenzo Tovar, who commanded the advanced guard. "Our comrades are hard at it already. Double quick march."

The whole column immediately trailed arms, and advanced at a rapid pace, along the wide Calle Real. The sound of firing was now heard in two different quarters; and the "Vivas" of the assailants were mingled with the cries of the alarmed insurgents. At the same time, the great bell of the Franciscan convent, near the Plaza, which was one of the few large edifices that had escaped with little injury, was tolled in the abrupt startling peal commonly called "Plagaria." The Cazadores were within a hundred yards of the breast-work raised across the corner of the square, when a flash issued from the muzzle of the field piece, which was planted in the centre of the barricade, and the report shook the tottering walls on each side of the street. Fortunately for the assailants, the gun had been elevated above point-blank; and the shower of grape hissed harmlessly over their heads, instead of sweeping the foremost files before it, as the insurgents had designed.

When the smoke cleared away, Tovar found himself close to a small party of Spaniards, who were actively loading the gun for a second shot. He cut down the man who was ramming home the cartridge; and his followers, scrambling over the breast-work, bayoneted those who were defending it. They were soon checked, however, by an unexpected heavy and well directed fire, from a strong body of rotozos, stationed in the rear of the barricade; and they suffered severely, whilst their comrades were swarming up to their support. The smoke of this volley shrouded them for a while; and enabled them to form with little farther loss, except such as was sustained by chance shots. The moment it cleared away, the Cazadores rushed forward with the bayonet, supported by the grenadiers, who had reached the scene of action by a parallel street, and had entered the Plaza at the same moment, over the adjoining breast-work.

The rotozos withstood the charge for a moment; wavered—and broke their ranks; crowding confusedly into the ruined cathedral, where they once made a desperate stand behind the fallen pillars of the aisles. They were closely pursued by the Cazadores; and the sacred walls re-echoed the pealing volleys of musketry, the shouts of the combatants and the shrieks of the wounded. The Spaniards, who had headed the insurgents, alone stood firm. When forced from the spot they had defended, by the press of assailants, who were too eager in pursuit of the fugitives to observe them, they rallied round the fountain in the centre of the square, from whence they kept up a destructive and unobserved fire.

The runaway slaves, on whom little dependence had been placed, and who had not been entrusted with fire-arms, were stationed in the courts of the palace and prison, from whence they at first looked on, with their usual apathy, at the destruction that raged before their eyes. The patriots were pouring in at every corner of the Plaza, and the insurgents were flying in confusion through the ruined buildings, and endeavouring to gain the neighbouring churches and convents. Fray Pablo Oyarzun, who had proved himself in the late melée as able a swordsman as an orator, threw himself into the midst of the slaves, and called to them to follow him; reminding them of the consequences of falling into the power of their enraged masters. This appeal effectually aroused them. Having wrapped their ponchos round their left arms, they drew their long knives, and rushed headlong into the thick of the fight, with a yell of "To the knife!" grappling their antagonists with the ferocity of panthers, and inflicting the most desperate wounds, before the troops were aware of their sudden attack.

The rotos in the cathedral, who fought with renewed confidence from their sheltered position, had succeeded in repulsing the Cazadores. Being supported by the handful of Spaniards, who had collected on the steps of the fountain, they pressed forward on the patriots with a despairing effort, that bid fair to turn the fortune of the day. At that moment, loud shouts of "Alza Zaraza!" were heard; and the aged chief, mounted on a spirited charger, cleared the barricade beside the corner of the palace at a single bound, and galloped into the Plaza at the head of his guerrilla. One charge decided the day; for the rotos instantly threw away their arms and dispersed. As for the revolted slaves, although they fought to the last, and even when trampled beneath the horse's hoofs, stabbed at them with their long cuchillos, they were hemmed in, and fell, one by one, with all their characteristic and ferocious stubbornness.

The patriot troops, maddened by the excitement of the protracted conflict, pursued the fugitives from street to street, and from ruin to ruin, until they reached the Alameda: where the carbiners, and the reinforcement of cavalry from La Guayra, arrested their flight, and completed the havoc of the day. Quarter was neither sued for nor offered; and the slaughter was followed up as unrelentingly, as is usual during civil war. It was remarked by the soldiers, that not a single friar had fallen in the Plaza. When first the firing became general, they had fled through the cloisters of the cathedral to their convents, and had concealed themselves, every man in his cell, from the vengeance of the enraged patriots. Miranda, who entered the square towards the close of the engagement, and observed the exertions of Fray Pablo, whose helmet had been struck off in the conflict, leaving his shaven crown exposed, gave repeated orders to have him taken alive. Nevertheless, he eluded all the soldiers' efforts, exhibiting such prowess, that few dared cope with him single handed; and when he saw the guerrilla arrive, he cut his way to the gate of the cathedral, where his pursuers lost all traces of him.

The bugles now sounded the signal to recall the scattered troops to their respective corps; and by Miranda's orders, the army was marched to the upper end of the Alameda, where it bivouacked. As there was no further duty for him to perform that night, Sepulveda left the party of staff officers, who were eagerly discussing the events of the day, and strolled slowly down the broad walk. The tall dark poplars still overshadowed the path, uninjured by the concussion which had laid towers and palaces low; and appeared silently to assert the superiority of the works of nature over those of art.

With the feeling of melancholy pleasure, which usually attends us when visiting the scenes endeared to us by recollection of former happiness, Sepulveda seated himself on the same rude stone bench, which his mother and the novice had occupied but three nights before. He would have given worlds to recall that evening; and, as he thought of the Indian minstrel's song, he unconsciously repeated in a low voice the refrain—

"No mo olvides nunca! No mo olvides, no!"

Scarcely had he uttered these words, when he started, at hearing a guitar close behind him, repeating the notes of the air, in the same plaintive cadence in which he had so lately heard it played. He turned hastily, and saw the Chinganera who had so particularly addressed herself to him the other evening. She was now clad in the coarse dark poncho, and blue justin, of her tribe, without a trace of the theatrical dress, which she had adopted when he last saw her. Nothing was more common than to see those of her wandering race, at all times, and in all places; and they were well known to affect a mysterious interest in the affairs of any, whom they believed to be kindly disposed towards them; availing themselves of intelligence obtained by their restless curiosity, either for the purpose of fortune telling, or to show their capricious gratitude. Yet her sudden appearance on this spot seemed so closely connected with the subject of his previous thoughts, that Sepulveda waited for some moments, half expecting to hear from her some interesting communication. But, as she stood perfectly still and silent, he addressed a few words to her, in commendation of the presence she had displayed, in warning his companion of the approaching earthquake.

"Such warnings are easily given!" said she; "there is not a child in my tribe, but knows what calm sultry weather, and a sudden falling of the water springs, portend. But no one will place confidence in an Indian's word. The wisest of you all, when assailed by calentura, or wounded by the rattle-snake's fangs, have recourse to us without hesitation. But, as the earthquake rolls by and is no longer remembered, so the fever is cured, the poison is extracted, and the Indian is forgotten. Yet it is not in these alone that we have skill. Will you have a proof, Carlos Sepulveda? I know her, on whom you were this moment thinking; and can tell whither she is gone."

"With my name, at least, you appear well acquainted. But if you have learned any thing of Doña—that is to say, of any one for whom you suppose me to be interested, tell me at once all you know."

"Suppose! I know it well. Did I not watch your looks that evening, as you leaned against yonder alamo? And again, when I sang the dispedida,—could I miss seeing to whom you applied each word? Nay, more;—you saw not me in the chapel of the Monjas Claras, although I knelt beside the same pillar; but I saw you, when you burst through the lattice, and bore away the novice in safety. I escaped death, by following your steps; and I never lost sight of her, as long as her foot was on her native soil."

"Heavens! has she then left Venezuela? Where did you last see her? and with whom?"

"Her father took her from your mother's care. I followed them to the Quebrada del Tucueri, where her brother,—as I judged from the resemblance he bore to her,—was in waiting with horses and mules. From thence I traced them to the conuco of the Indian Jose Chanapas. While they slept the siesta, I crossed the savanna of Cañaveral, in the direction I observed they were taking. I reached the fishing village of Los Bagres before they entered it; and overheard an agreement made by the father with a foreign sailor, to convey them in his bark to Santo Tomas. But whether they are gone to the town of that name on the broad Orinoco, or to an island beyond sea which they talk of on the coast, I could not then learn. Be it which it may, I shall know before we meet again; for nothing can long remain a secret to our wandering race."

"Tell me at least, Chinganera! before you go, whence it is that you take such an interest in me, and in—"

"And in Maria del Rosario Peñañela, you would say. I know it appears incredible to white men, that Indians should remember benefits; and yet they wonder not at gratitude in their dogs. Your alms of the other night were not the first, by many, that I had received from you; and when your mother saw me resting under the trees in her garden, the evening of the earthquake, she did not order me to be turned out, as others would have done, but sent me food. That was a sufficient motive for me to serve her and hers. As for the journey to Los Bagres,—I must have wandered somewhere, for my home is not in cities, but in change of place; so that it mattered little to me which way I turned. And now, farewell! When I next see you, it shall be to warn you, that you are about to become a wanderer, as I am. Last night the moon darkened a bright star in her path. When was that seen, and a revolution in Coquibacoo failed to follow?"

As she spoke the last words, she turned from her attentive auditor, and disappeared among the neighbouring gardens.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DROGUE—THE PIRATE.

Don Beltran and Joaquin Peñañela had been so soundly lulled to rest, after the fatigue of the preceding day, by the gentle motion of the schooner, while crossing the straits of Cubagua, that they did not awake until they had passed the island of Margarita, and were abreast of the Siete Hermanos rocks. The little drogue began to feel the swell of the Caribbean sea, as she cleared the group of lesser Antilles. She now rose in livelier bounds on the waves, which curled under the influence of a light trade wind; and the motion effectually disturbed the passengers' rest; although Kapitein Lodewyk would not have exchanged it for that of the easiest pacing mule on the Spanish main.

When they came on deck, they found Maria del Rosa-rio already there. The schipper, who had ascertained from his cabin-boy that she was awake, had prepared her a seat on a hencoop, covered with his boat cloak, and lashed to windward of the companion, near which he stood at the helm. He had also recollected that there was some Curazao chocolate on board; and having made some himself, he had brought it to her in a silver-mountain cocoa-nut, with some cazada bread; lamenting at the same time, that he had not brought some milk and eggs for her use. The freshness of the sea air, and the novelty of the scene around her, had effectually chased away all the languor and wretchedness she had felt on first embarking. With the elastic spirits of youth, she had reconciled herself to leaving her native land, as to an inevitable misfortune; consoling herself by the reflection, that it was her duty to accompany her father in his exile. Lodewyk Sluiker, notwithstanding his national and professional roughness of manner, could not help feeling interested for her. He endeavoured to entertain her, as he would have amused one of his own children, by pointing out to her the remarkable head-lands as they passed; not forgetting comments on their usefulness, as marks for such and such a harbour. He also called her attention to the flying-fish, as they bounded and fluttered along the ridge of a swell; and to the man-of-war bird, cruising with motionless outstretched wings, as if floating on the eddies of the breeze.

When Don Beltran and his son appeared, Sluiker gave the helm into the hand of an old gray-headed mulatto, with directions to keep a clean full; and advanced to enquire how they had rested. On learning that the schooner's motion rather disagreed with them, he produced a case bottle, and recommended "a morning dram" both by precept and example. He then desired the black cook, who was busy at the galley fire, to bring the breakfast aft; and a plentiful repast was soon spread before him, consisting of fish and yams, turtle's eggs and plantains. His passengers, it is true, did little honour to the provisions set before them; but the worthy schipper found appetite for all. Not content with this marvellous triumph, he endeavoured, as is usual in such cases, to argue his guests out of their indisposition, and to persuade them that it existed only in their imaginations; assuring them, that if they would but eat heartily, all their ills would vanish, as if by magic. Finding them, however, obstinate and incredulous on this point, as landsmen usually are, he betook himself to his long criollo cigars, which he owned, might almost be rigged as sliding-gunter-poles for his schooner, in case of need. As he leaned against the mainmast, so that the smoke might annoy his last passenger as little as possible, he began a series of what are usually termed tough yarns; interrupting them occasionally, by giving necessary directions to the man at the helm.

As the day advanced, the breeze hauled a few points more round to the southward, so as to blow perfectly fair, and, towards evening, they could see the small groups of Aves islands, right ahead on the horizon. Several vessels had passed in different directions during the day, to the great delight of the novice; and she had been for some time looking over the stern at one that appeared to be bound the same way, as it was coming rapidly up with the drogue, under a press of canvass. It was a long top-sail-schooner, with taunt tapering masts; and its deck-ware plainly seen to be crowded with men. The helmsman, of whom Maria del Rosario asked some trifling question about this vessel, turned a careless eye upon her; but after looking steadfastly at her for a few moments, he called to the schipper, that a suspicious looking stranger was overhauling them, hand over hand.

Lodewyk broke off in the middle of a long story, and snatching the spy-glass out of the binnacle, reconnoitred the vessel astern; but soon threw aside the glass, exclaiming "Stranger? Ik ken 't schip too well. It would swear, by de bruin patch in his voor topsail, dat 't is 't roover of 't Bahamas! Ik heb vallen in mit hant many a time, bevoore to-day, but never so far to windward as dis. Go below and hide thyself in myn berth. Do you, cavalleros, kruipen onder 't zeils in 't holt. Ik heb zien no man on deck, except myself and 't scheep's volk, he will pass 't droguer medoot noticing her: but ik fear he is too wauk-zaam voor dat."

There was no necessity for him to repeat this advice for his terrified passengers retreated instantly on hearing the alarming intelligence. Lodewyk hastily bent a small Dutch ensign to the halyards.

Contrary to his expectation, the schooner clowed up her top-sails, hauled down the jib, and passing the stern of the drogue, rounded to abreast of her without halting. When her way through the water was checked, a boat was lowered from the stern davits, and being manned with half a dozen hands, besides several sitters in the stern sheets, was pulled towards the droguer. When the boat came along-side, several rough looking marauders, of various nations, and hues of complexion, stepped on board, with cutlasses and pistols in their belts. Their leader, who appeared fitted by his muscular frame, and ferocious expression of countenance, to rule such a lawless band, shook Lodewyk heartily by the hand, addressing him familiarly as "old shipmate;" and demanded to know what passengers he had on board, and where he had stowed them. The schipper was hesitating whether he had better own to the fact, when his deliberation was cut short by the pirate, who said he had already seen them.

"Never think of denying them, old Sluiker! I keeps too bright an eye to windward to be deceived; so let the gentry coves tumble up slick to muster directly, or I must send somebody for them. I should have passed your droguer without overhauling her, for old acquaintance sake, if they had kept the deck manfully; but such hasty diving below looks tarnal suspicious."

Lodewyk, who trembled for the safety of his female passenger, made haste to call Don Beltran and his son from their place of concealment. They hesitated so long to obey his summons, that the pirate became impatient, and with a volley of oaths and denunciations of vengeance on their obstinacy, ordered two of his men to "jump down into the hold, and turn to, to start on deck every mother's son they could find." Scarcely had they dropped through the hatchway, when a joyful shout announced their having discovered a prize in the iron chest.

"Pass down a running bowline!" cried one of them; "and stand by to rouse this here yapper on deck. Never mind the passengers this bout! I suppose they are coiled away under some of these sails; but we have made a better land-fall."

All those who had remained in the boat, left her in charge of the bow-man on hearing this welcome news, and crowded round the hatch-way, to assist in hoisting out the chest, the weight of which proclaimed its value to be considerable. When it lay before them in the gang-way, they announced their success, with three hearty cheers, to their shipmates, who had climbed into the schooner's rigging to watch their proceedings. While they were busied lowering it carefully into the boat alongside, their captain called Sluiker aside.

"I guess," said he "old schipper! you can have no interest in that there kist; or perhaps I might endeavour to save you some part of it. I shall always remember that we two have been on the account together formerly; and although you are now in a quieter line of business, still you have it in your power to be useful to us occasionally. Tell me honestly, Lodewyk, have these passengers of yours got any thing else of the right sort? If not, I will boom off with my ship-mates, before they think of overhauling your berth; as you may have some little articles of your own there, which you would not like to lose."

As Lodewyk assured him, with not a few oaths in his peculiar dialect, that there was nothing else of value in the vessel, he again shook hands, and stepping into his boat, ordered her to be shoved off. The pirates pulled merrily for their schooner, singing in chorus the well known West Indian canoe song;—

"The captain's gone ashore;
The mate has got the key;
Hurrah! my jolly boys,—
'Tis grog time o'day."

The boat was cleared and hoisted up, and the schooner filled her sails and stood away for the Westward, before Sluiker recovered from his astonishment at this unwelcome visit. Having made sail on the droguer, and given orders for her to be kept her course, he descended to the cabin, and relieved the novice from the dreadful apprehensions under which she had laboured, while the pirates were on board. He found it a far more difficult task to reconcile Don Beltran to the loss of his treasure; and it was in vain that he reminded him of the providential escape he and his family had, from falling into the hands of a lawless gang. The unfortunate emigrant was at first stunned by the suddenness of the mischance that had befallen him; and could scarcely credit the reality of his loss. He soon recovered, however, from this apparent apathy, and awoke to a painful sense of total destitution; with a family too, entirely dependent on him for subsistence, and whom he himself had compelled to wander from their home and native land. He had been comparatively calm during his arrest, and subsequent imprisonment, at Caracas; and had not in reality felt such terror, in the prospect of approaching death, as now overwhelmed him, when anticipating poverty and wretchedness.

His agonies of mind were truly terrifying to his daughter, who had never before seen him, but as the stern stoical parent, whom she had not indeed been taught to love, but whom she nevertheless instinctively respected. He now appeared to her completely bereft of reason, as he alternately uttered the most violent imprecations on the pirates who had robbed him, and wrung his hands in unavailing regret and despair. She once ventured to approach him, for the purpose of suggesting some thoughts of consolation;—she scarcely knew what;—but he repulsed her with violence, and even fierceness, as if anxious to relieve himself, by a vain attempt to throw the blame of his ruin on any one who came in contact with him. He occasionally appeared to look as if expecting consolation from his son Joaquin, for whose sake chiefly he had laboured to amass his wealth. But although the young man was sensible, to its fullest extent, of the misfortune which had befallen them, his thoughts were thoroughly engrossed by his own share in the calamity; and he sat apart in gloomy silence, without uttering a word betokening sympathy in his parent's distress.

Lodewyk, meanwhile, who had at first offered to return to Los Bagres, and land his passengers, but had met with an abrupt, and, as he conceived, haughty refusal, stood for some time at the helm in silence; conscious, doubtless, that his abilities in consolation were not to be relied on. When he found, however, that the violence of Peñuela's despair had worn itself out, he began, in his own phrase, "to mak 't best of a bad job."

"Come, señor passagier, you must not throw your heart after your doubloons. If't roovers have taken your geld-kist, they have left you your zoon and dochter. Inmiddels, as you must be a king's man, by your running away just now, you may easily get a passage to Cartagena, or La Havana, where you zal be onder your own vlag, and 't Spaansch government will be bound to maintain you. Of spanders, if you prefer coming to anker at Santo Thomas, you zal find plenty of royalist uitgangers, who fled from Caracacas last year, and now contrive to make a tolerable living among the Deensehe, in hopes of soon returning. You moet do as they do. De jonker, here, your zoon, is stout enough to work vor you all dree; and ik dare say your dochter has learned borduurig, at 't konvent, dat zal be useful to her."

Maria del Rosario caught eagerly at this suggestion, and assured her father that her novice had not been passed in idleness; enumerating the different accomplishments she had acquired, such as embroidery, flagree work, &c. which usually form the principal part of a conventual education. Don Beltran rewarded her with a look of affection, the first she could remember his having bestowed on her; and he sighed, as he reflected how little he deserved sympathy of any kind from her, whom he had been on the point of consigning to the solitude of a convent, and who was even now condemned, through his means, to penury and want.

When night approached, Lodewyk cautioned his passengers against the danger of exposing themselves to the cold sea breeze, after the heat of the day; and Joaquin Peñuela retired at once to the hold, where he stretched himself to sleep on the spare sails. Maria del Rosario, whose attachment to her father appeared to have revived, under these circumstances of difficulty and distress, refused to leave him. She drew close to him, as he sat in silent abstraction on the deck of the small schooner, leaning against the weather bulwark; and watched with timid solicitude for an opportunity of whispering comfort to him. He suffered her to take his hand, but averted his face, as if to repel all attempts at conversation; and continued to gaze in silence on the dark extent of the surrounding ocean.

It was a clear starlight night, and not a sound was heard, but the dashing of the waves against the droguer's bows. The novice's thoughts, which had never yet been accustomed to dwell on either the loss or acquisition of wealth, speedily wandered from the subject that engrossed her father's attention, to the peaceful cloisters of the convent in which she had enjoyed uninterrupted tranquillity;—except for one intrusive thought, which she still reproved, yet unconsciously cherished. She thought also of her kind friend Doña Gertrudes; and sighed deeply as she remembered how slender were her hopes of ever again embracing her. If she for a moment recollected her father's recent loss, it was only with exulting anticipation of the services she would now be able to render him, and the additional claims they would give her to that affection she so anxiously coveted.

The droguer glided rapidly by the dark rocks of the Aves islands; passing so close as to distinguish the flocks of sea birds at roost, appearing like regular ridges of white marble. Maria del Rosario gazed on them in her reverie, until they faded by degrees from her sight, and she sank into a profound slumber in her father's arms. Old Sluiker, who had watched her attentively, stepped softly forward, and laid his boat-cloak gently over her. Her father acknowledged his attention by a grateful pressure of the hand; and continued to ruminate, in melancholy silence, on the prospect before him.

He was well aware, that he had no assistance to expect from the Spanish government at Cuba; for he anticipated the observation that would be made, that he ought to have emigrated at the very commencement of the revolution of Venezuela; if he had been a staunch royalist. The secret services he had occasionally rendered to Monteverde had been punctually paid for; consequently he could have no claim on him, as he no longer had it in his power to be useful as a spy. He was also conscious, what slender pretensions a traitor to his country can have to the sympathy even of his employers; and was too well convinced of the profrigacy of a Spanish army, to venture on taking his family with him to Cartagena, as dependants on the bounty of a royalist general. He therefore determined to establish himself at the island of Santo Tomas; and to obtain, if possible, some commercial situation, as a means of support for himself and his daughter.

He had but little hope from the well known indolence and selfishness of his son Joaquin. But he flattered himself that, when the youth should be made fully sensible of the absolute necessity for exertion, the instruction, he had received from the monigte, or at least his bodily labour, would stand him in stead. After several wakeful hours, he at length closed his eyes, and sank into a disturbed slumber, interrupted by dreams, which repeated in vivid colours the misfortune of the preceding day.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE WEST INDIES.—THE NEGRESS'S COTTAGE.

The first rays of morning awoke Maria del Rosario from her light slumbers; and she gazed around her, unable at first to recollect where she actually was, and by what means she had been transported thither. One glance, however, at the white sails above her, and the blue ocean around, sufficed to remind her that she was indeed an exile's daughter. Her father was still in a heavy, but apparently unsound sleep, his countenance was disordered as if in pain, and his forehead and cheeks were flushed and parched, notwithstanding the coolness of the morning breeze. She resigned to him the cloak that Lodewyk had spread over her; and leaning on the bulwark, contemplated the lovely scenery of the islands to windward, abreast of which the schooner was sailing. To the east, and in the full blaze of sunrise, were seen the naked peaks of Montserrat and Redonda; and more to the northward, the blue mountains of Santa Eustacia and La Saba towered above the neighbouring islets.

The old mulatto was at the helm; and, as he spoke her native language, Maria beguiled the time by questioning him concerning the different islands, with all of which he appeared well acquainted. The schipper at last came on deck, smoking his long cigar, as usual. After kindly expressing a hope, that his fair passenger felt no inconvenience from braving the night air, he proceeded to rouse Don Beltran, muttering Creole-Dutch exclamations of surprise at the heaviness of his slumber. On awaking, Peñuela found himself totally unable to rise, in consequence of severe head-ache and giddiness. To his daughter's great alarm, Sluiker pronounced him on examination, to be attacked by that tropical fever so fatal to Europeans; and scarcely less certainly so to all creoles, who venture to change their place of abode incautiously, or who expose themselves to sudden and violent vicissitudes of weather. In answer to the anxious enquiries of the novice, Sluiker declared that nothing could be done for him, while aboard the droguer, except to shelter him from the sun until the evening; when he observed, they would, in all probability, reach the island to which they were bound. He therefore spread an awning for the invalid across the main rigging, beneath which he provided him with as comfortable a couch, as was possible under existing circumstances; recommending that he should be left undisturbed, and strongly warning the novice against exposing herself to the contagion of the dangerous disease. No consideration, however, could prevent her from attending her father with sincere filial affection. She would permit no hand but hers to smooth his rugged pillow, and to offer to his parched lips such beverage as could be prepared for him, in so ill provided a vessel.

As the mid-day heat grew more oppressive, the violence of the fever increased; and the raving of the unfortunate emigrant terrified his daughter. Having never before attended a bed of sickness, except that of some meek, penitent nun, gradually sinking into the grave in the full possession of her senses, and surrounded by all that is consolatory in the aid of religion, and soothing in the sympathy of friends, she had formed no idea of, and was totally unprepared to witness, a death embittered by mental and corporeal agony. She vainly endeavoured to soothe, and meet by argument, what she at first believed to be the suggestions of an over-excited mind, irritated by misfortunes to a partial insanity. Even after she had been undeceived by the more experienced Lodewyk, who was unwearied in his attention and advice, she involuntarily started and shuddered, as she heard her name, and that of her brother, repeatedly called on; one while in the most endearing terms, and the next with the bitterest reproaches and execrations, as he confounded in his frenzy the idea of his children, with the recollection of the recent outrage perpetrated by the pirates. Joaquin, meanwhile, sat on the companion, gloomily looking on; but evidently taking no interest in what was going forward, nor in any way attempting to be of the least service.

Towards the afternoon, they entered the beautiful little archipelago, dedicated by the first discoverers, (in allusion, probably, to the richness of the soil,) to "La Virgen Gorda;" and just before sunset the droguer passed the green island of San Juan, and entered the sheltered harbour of Saint Thomas. The arrival of the small schooner excited no attention whatever among the many cheerful parties, that were walking under the cocoa-nut trees on the beach, or seated on the ramparts of the half dismantled inner fort. Although Mario del Rosario well knew she had not a friend, nor even an acquaintance in the world, except at Caracas, yet she felt almost disappointed, that not one among the numbers she saw, had come forward to welcome her. An overwhelming sense of loneliness oppressed her, as the droguer came to an anchor near the landing place. As she looked at her father's helpless condition, and recollected the necessity of removing him to the shelter of some stranger's roof, she hid her face on his couch, and burst into tears.

The schipper, who had been busied mooring his little vessel, and launching his jolly-boat from the larboard gangway, where it had been stowed during the passage, now accosted the novice in as soft a tone as he could assume. He entreated her not to distress herself, for he would himself go immediately on shore; and endeavour to procure a lodging at some emigrant's house. When it was a little later, and the streets were not so much crowded, he said, he and a couple of his sailors would carry the sick man to his new quarters.

The coolness of the evening brought with it the usual temporary remission in the more violent symptoms of the fever. Don Beltran lay in a state of dozing insensibility, which renewed his daughter's apprehensions. She feared it was the precursor of death; and dreaded every moment to see him expire before her eyes, without any attempt having been yet made to save him. She was also embarrassed by the recollection of her father's poverty, and alarmed at the thought of incurring even the necessary expenses attending his removal, as she was totally ignorant whether or not he possessed the means of defraying them. Her brother was at that moment purchasing some fruit from a canoe alongside; and, when he approached her to offer her some bananas, she took the opportunity of enquiring whether their father had any funds with him, to pay for the lodging, and requisite attendance. Joaquin professed his ignorance on that subject; but said, that he himself had a few dollars left from his last mezda, which would, he supposed, be sufficient for the present emergency. This greatly relieved her mind; and she waited, with comparatively little impatience, for the arrival of the good-natured schipper.

After a long anxious hour of expectation, Lodewyk returned. He declared that he had in vain offered money in advance, at every house in the emigrants' quarter of the town, and even at the regular boarding houses; for he was obliged to mention his passenger's illness, and that was considered by every one an insuperable objection to receiving him as an inmate. As he found it impossible to conquer the scruples of the white inhabitants, he determined to try the well known hospitality of the blacks; and was successful at the cottage of the first blanchisseuse, to whom he mentioned his embarrassment. After promising that the place was small, although otherwise comfortable, and perfectly clean, he offered to conduct his passengers thither. Maria del Rosario eagerly expressed her thanks; and in the first place he carefully removed the invalid; leaving the brother and sister on board, as the boat was too small to contain them all at the same time. In about half an hour he returned, and invited them to accompany him to their lodgings; assuring them that they would find Don Beltran more comfortably situated, than they perhaps anticipated.

They followed him to the suburb behind the fort. There, on the rise of the hill leading to the plantations, a few neat white-washed cottages stood, totally differing in appearance, and style of building, from any that the emigrants had ever before seen. Maria del Rosario would never have suspected them to belong to laundresses, unless perhaps from seeing the bamboo poles, supporting clothes' lines, in the gardens behind. The path by which they ascended, ran along the brink of a deep ravine, which was the channel for a mountain torrent in the rainy season; but now merely contained a small rivulet, struggling down to the sea through large pebbles and fragments of rock. Some black women were seated on these, even at this late hour, singing in shrill chorus, and banging lustily, with small wooden beetles, the linen they were washing, after the West Indian fashion.

The schipper knocked gently at one of the largest cottages, and the door was opened by an elderly but remarkably erect negress, whose good-humoured smile, and laughing black eyes, welcomed her guests before she spoke a word. It was easy to see, that she had mustered all her little finery, to do honour to her future inmates. She had dressed herself in a scrupulously clean white muslin gown, with light blue ribands; and her shoulders were covered with a bright yellow silk shawl. Her shoes were pink satin; and her white cotton stockings would have been faultless, were it not for the open work of their clocks, which betrayed the sable hue of a daughter of Africa. Her ear-rings were broad circles of gold, set with several ill-shaped and rather yellowish pearls; and a long necklace of gold beads, to which several pieces of Spanish coin, were attached, hung down nearly to her waist. Her hair, which was perfectly woolly, had been tortured into various attempts at plaiting, which projected abruptly like short horns; setting at defiance the efforts of some dozen small tortoise-shell combs, which were stuck into different parts of the chevelure.

Lodewyk introduced her as Mama Chepita; and informed Maria del Rosario that her hostess could understand and speak Spanish, as most West Indian negroes can. He then took his leave, promising to return the next day to enquire after the invalid, previous to sailing. The negress kissed her fair guest's hand, and led her through a small porch, into a room floored with bright red tiles. Its neatness astonished the emigrants; for on hearing Sluiker mention a laundress's cottage, they had formed an idea of a miserable ranchito, like those they had been accustomed to see at the outskirts of their native city. The windows were, of course, unglazed, on account of the excessive heat of the climate; but they were covered with muslin curtains, of so thin a texture, as to admit the breeze from the harbour, which the cottage overlooked. The chairs were cane-bottomed, and painted in imitation of bamboo; and the table, which stood in the middle of the room, was of dark Honduras mahogany, brilliantly polished. Opposite the door was a small side-board, covered with glass of every description, cut and plain, ranged ostentatiously in rows, from the smallest sized liqueur-glasses, to rummers and sangria-cups. Behind all, towered those tall candle-shades, which are rather necessities than luxuries in a tropical climate, where moths and other nocturnal insects swarm to such a degree, as instantly to extinguish an unguarded light.

Mama Chepita smiled with gratified vanity, at seeing the notice her young guests took of this piece of negro finery, which is rarely seen on the main, although extremely common on the islands. She invited them to be seated on an old-fashioned sofa, covered with a gaudy chintz, which appeared from its lustre, and the stiffness of its folds, to have been just taken out of the antique cedar chest, where it had been carefully laid by for state occasions. Maria del Rosario expressed an anxious desire to see her father, and the negress led her to a small curtained recess at the upper end of the room, where she showed her a neat couch surrounded by mosquito curtains, under which Don Beltran appeared to enjoy a refreshing sleep. In answer to the novice's enquiries respecting medical assistance, Mama Chepita assured her that, unless some unfavourable alteration in the symptoms should occur, it would be needless to call in a doctor; expressing at the same time great dread of the learned faculty, and hinting that Europeans could possibly know nothing about the proper treatment of West Indian fevers. She also pointed to a large glass full of brevage, compounded of various herbs which she herself had collected. It stood cooling in the window, close to a jar of that never-failing specific, anarsajada; and the negress declared that, with these simples, she would answer for the patient's cure.

Mama Chepita then opened a drawer, in which she had laid Don Beltran's clothes, and gave the novice a purse belonging to her father, containing a few doubloons and dollars; likewise the keys of the trunk, which had been brought from the droguer by two of the crew. She showed Joaquin a small closet next to his father's, which she said was to be his bed-room; and led his sister to a neat apartment under the corridor opening into the garden, shaded by a large tamarind tree. When they returned to the sitting-room, they found the table laid for supper, and attended by a young negress, whom Mama Chepita presented to her guests, as her daughter and their servant. No entreaties could prevail on the hostess to join her guests. She hoped she knew her place better, than to sit in the presence of white people; and pressed them so earnestly to try the fish and tomato, and the ochra, that Maria del Rosario, who at first forced herself to partake of those West Indian dainties from a wish to gratify her kind hostess, was soon induced to follow her brother's example, in supping heartily at them. The repast concluded with coffee, which can nowhere be obtained in greater perfection; after which all retired to rest, except Mama Chepita, who declared her intention of sitting up with the invalid until day-break, when she was to be relieved by her daughter Marta.

CHAPTER XV.

MILITARY PREPARATIONS.—THE MONK'S TRIAL.

As it became generally known that tranquillity had been re-established at Caracas, the peaceable part of the community, which had fled for safety to the neighbouring villages and plantations, returned to the capital, and employed themselves and their slaves in repairing and rebuilding their shattered houses. At the same time, large bodies of peons were sent in from the country, and were employed by government, together with the soldiery, in clearing away the ruins of public buildings, burying the numerous bodies that lay beneath them, and erecting temporary barracks and store-houses.

Afflicting accounts were daily received at headquarters, from different parts of the united provinces of Venezuela, concerning the damage sustained through the earthquake. Although the inhabitants of the other great cities had not imitated the capital, so far as to break out into open revolt, yet the overwhelming calamity had produced considerable disaffection, and had cast a damp on the spirits of the superstitious;—that is to say, the majority of the population. The situation of the country was rendered still more critical, by reports that had found circulation, relative to the Spanish army at Cartagena. It was generally known, that a strong reinforcement had arrived from Cadix; and it was asserted, and universally believed, that Monteverde had received positive instructions to commence a war of extermination on the infant republic.

The province of Coro, which lay between Caracas and the royalist army, still persisted in refusing to listen to any overtures for joining the union. It was consequently to be apprehended, that the Spanish general would send supplies there, and reinforcements, if necessary, in his march against the capital of Venezuela, which was now daily expected to commence. Miranda therefore exerted himself indefatigably to recruit the exhausted armies of the republic; and to put the dismantled fortresses, on the frontiers, in a defensible condition.

Puerto Cavello, one of the strongest of these, which was also a sea-port town of importance, was entrusted to the command of Colonel Simon Bolivar, a young native officer, whose intelligence and activity had obtained for him a considerable share of the confidence of the patriot government. His natural abilities, which were of a superior order, had been cultivated by a liberal education, rarely attainable by his countrymen; and by travel in Spain, France, and some few other European countries. The garrison under his command consisted principally of volunteer corps, from his native valleys of Aragon. The most distinguished among these was a regiment of cazadores, raised and disciplined by himself, on his paternal estate of San Miguel, near the city of Vitoria; and armed, as well as clothed, entirely at his expense. The officers were all young creoles of the patriot families in the country; and the soldiers had formerly been slaves on his plantation. They had been freed, to the number of about twelve hundred, when Bolivar was one of the first to set an example of devotion to the cause of liberty, which was subsequently so well followed. This corps was conspicuous, not only for its high state of discipline, but also for its military equipments. It was one of the few in which regularity, in that respect, was at all attended to. The uniform was dark green, a colour well suited to the complexion of most of those who wore it; and on the front of their schacos was first displayed the device, which was afterwards so generally adopted, of "MUERTE, o LIBERTAD!"—Death, or Liberty.

The patriot army could not boast, at that time, of any native artillery officers; but this deficiency was supplied by a number of foreign volunteers. As most of these were either Frenchmen, or creoles of Martinico and Santa Lucia, the term Franceses was applied indiscriminately to all foreigners, at the commencement of the revolutionary war.

The guerilleros, commanded by the old chief Zaraza, were necessarily objects of suspicion when bivouacked in the neighbourhood of towns and cities; for their habits of foraging, contracted while on a campaign, were rather difficult to shake off, even when among friends and allies. They were therefore detached by Miranda beyond the lagoon of Maracaybo, towards the borders of the province of Coro. By this politic arrangement, the Venezuelan government reaped the united advantages of harassing their unfriendly neighbours, maintaining a corps of observation in front of the declared enemy, and keeping an useful and efficient, though capricious and irregular, body of men in good humour. It afforded the guerilla facilities of enjoying without interruption those little privileges of war, which must otherwise have been exercised at the expense of their fellow citizens, or, if altogether withheld, would inevitably have led to disgust and desertion.

Zedoño and Monagas, both of whom had previously been peaceable mayor-domos on cattle farms, and had acquired in that active capacity, considerable local knowledge of the country now about to be the theatre of war, as well as an intimate acquaintance with the genius and character of the lower orders among their countrymen, came forward from the upper plains of Barcelona, each with a large cavalry force, well mounted, but merely equipped with lances. The negro chief, Piar, (who was afterwards shot by Bolivar's order in the Plaza of Angostura,) announced to Miranda, that he was in Cumana, at the head of a large army of Pardos, both horse and foot; with which he was ready to join the patriot forces, provided the white officers would agree to receive him and his comrades on terms of equality.

Besides these, several small corps were in motion towards head-quarters, under Bermudez, Mariño, and other leaders, whose enthusiasm, and devotion to their country's cause, it was hoped, would atone for their unavoidable deficiencies in military skill and experience. Lastly, gun-boats of different sizes were prepared in the naval arsenals of La Guayra and Puerto Cavallo, for the protection of those harbours; and the Spanish guardacostas, which had fallen into the hands of the patriots, were fitted out, and manned with volunteers of all nations; so as to be in readiness to cope with any royalist expedition, that might attempt to make a descent on the coast of Caracas.

In the midst of these preparations against the foreign enemy, Miranda had not forgotten what was due to the tranquillity of the interior of Venezuela, which had been so treacherously disturbed by the friars, at the time of the late earthquake. He had kept his intentions, on this subject, a profound secret. The Capuchins and Franciscans, therefore, were thrown completely off their guard; and, believing their seditious conduct to have been entirely overlooked, had again begun to appear in public, and to go their usual rounds as mendicants, which were now more than ever necessary, to collect contributions for the repairs of their convents. Their surprise and consternation were great, when, every precaution having been taken to guard against the recurrence of a popular commotion in their favour, the principal friars of both those monasteries were formally cited to appear before a military commission. This council was ordered to assemble in the refectory of the Dominicans, for the purpose of enquiring into the share the mendicant monks had taken, in the recent disorders in the capital.

The noted capuchin, Fray Pablo Oyarzun, although not particularly designated as a ringleader, was too conscious of the active part he had played, not to be seriously apprehensive of the impending consequences. He therefore endeavoured to make it a common cause among all members of the church, as well secular as regular; declaring their religion to be in imminent danger, from the daring and unheard-of innovation attempted to be introduced, in summoning ecclesiastics before a court composed of laymen;—nay, even soldiers. He hurried from church to convent, zealously haranguing, and imploring his brethren to unite in resistance to the illegal and sacrilegious citation. The secular clergy, however, felt rather pleased than aggrieved by an event, which promised to chastise the arrogance and encroaching spirit of the friars; while the Dominicans, a wealthy peaceful order, had been previously withheld from joining the agitators, through fear of the consequences to their large estates. They were now therefore still more averse from any collision, direct or indirect, with the existing government.

The smaller monastic bodies, as well as those members of the convents in question, who were not included in the citation, peremptorily declined interfering. The former dreaded the thoughts of identifying their peaceable and insignificant communities with those of their more important and intriguing neighbours. Many of the latter were deterred from openly espousing the cause of their brethren, by a consciousness, that they themselves were in danger of being recognised as their accomplices; and not a few secretly exulted in the prospect thus opened to them, of succeeding to the situations held by their seniors, whose rank, in their communities, had procured for them the unenvied distinction of being selected for examples.

The spacious refectory of the Dominican monastery was fitted up for the solemn occasion, in a style of ornament, which the friars of that order designed to be magnificent and imposing. The walls were hung with white tapestry, disposed in imitation of a tent, as was customary in the convent hall on solemn festivals, and embroidered in compartments, with representations of the principal miracles performed by their patron saint. At the upper end of the hall was a crucifix, ten feet in height, carved and painted with a minute and appalling fidelity to nature. It was supported by a Señora de Dolores, and a Maria Magdalena, kneeling one at each side; and images, as large as life, of Santo Domingo, San Francisco de Paula, and San Antonio de Padua, frowned portentously from their different stations.

The lower part of the refectory was railed off, for the accommodation of such spectators as chose to be present; and, as soon as the court was opened, became crowded with a motley assemblage of clergy, military, and civilians, in their various and distinct costumes. Their deportment, and probably their thoughts, were as widely different as their dress. The officers, although uncovered, through respect to the court, stood "dangling their bonnets and plumes," and jingling their spurs, with an air of importance; casting, from time to time, looks of contempt and hatred on the accused monks, who sat, with downcast looks, on benches ranged along one side of the hall, from whence the tables had been partially removed, to afford room to the court-martial. The citizens, wrapped in their plain burghers' capotes, looked on with interest and curiosity at the novelty; and expressed in cautious whispers to each other, their doubts of the legality, or apprehensions of the dangerous precedent, of such a proceeding, according as their veneration for the monastic fraternity or jealousy of martial law, predominated. The friars appeared sedulous to avoid making themselves conspicuous. With their hoods drawn close over their pale thoughtful countenances, they kept themselves in the rear of the other spectators, shrinking back, with every demonstration of humility, as often as the glitter of lance or the clanging of a sabre on the marble pavement, announced the approach of an officer.

Silence was proclaimed in the court; and Brigadier Cordovez, (who had been summoned from La Guayra by Government to preside in Miranda's stead) first took the usual oath in the prescribed form, and then administered it to the vocales in turn; each of whom, as he swore to decide impartially, laid his hand on the hilt of his sword, and said aloud, "I swear." The Juez Fiscal first read the commission from the Junta Suprema, by virtue of which the court was assembled. He was proceeding, but was interrupted by Fray Pablo, who rose and exclaimed, "I deny the right of the Junta to give such authority! and I here protest, before heaven and earth, against the competency of any court of laymen, however, and by whomsoever convened, to try ecclesiastics!"

A pause ensued, and the eyes of all present were turned on the daring assertor of the church's privileges. His brethren of the cowl, and fellow prisoners, shrunk from him, as if there were infection in his touch; and ventured not to look up, even to observe what effect his protest had on the court, lest they might be suspected of coinciding with him in the opinion he had so boldly expressed. The vocales stared in each other's faces, as if doubting whether they had heard right. The more intelligent among them turned over the leaves of that useful manual, styled Colon de consejos, but in vain; for this was evidently a case which the learned Spaniard, who is the oracle of courts martial, had not contemplated as likely to occur. The majority, who gave themselves but little trouble concerning the niceties of law, merely twisted their moustachios, and muttered something, scarcely audible, about the usual modest assurance of monks: while one member of the court, less ceremonious than his colleagues, half whistled, half hummed, the well known Carracqueñan song,

"El fraye de la Vitoria es un padre escrupuloso!"

to the undisguised amusement of his junior comrades outside the bar. The little president, Don Ygnacio Cordovez, sidged for a while in a fruitless attempt to be delivered of a suitable reply. At length, having consulted in a whisper the vocales on his right and left, he said, with as much solemnity as his nature permitted him to assume, "This court will not permit the authority of the Junta Suprema to be questioned; seeing it has been recognised by the unanimous voice of the Venezuelan nation. The court pronounces the protest it has just heard frivolous and of no avail, inasmuch as the crime, of which the prisoners stand charged, forfeits, of necessity, their sacerdotal privileges, and renders them amenable to martial law."

On hearing this decision, the members of the court resumed their judicial gravity, and regarded the baffled friar with austere looks. He sat down, and appeared to watch attentively for some flaw in the proceedings of the court, on which he might found his defence. The Fiscal proceeded to read the charges, which were various, but all tending to the same general accusation, of sedition, and rebellion against the republic. Fray Pablo, undismayed by his previous failure, again rose. He demanded to know, with what show of justice he and his brethren could be accused of rebellion, by those who were themselves actually guilty of a revolt against their lawful sovereign.

"Beware, misproud and sacrilegious men!" said he, "how you persist in this mockery of justice. The present state of anarchy, in which Venezuela is plunged, cannot,—be assured! endure much longer. Tremble, therefore, to think what will be your doom, when the towers and lions of Spain shall once more wave over the walls of this city!"

The friar had strangely miscalculated the effect which he had expected to produce by this address. His auditors without the bar, both civilians and military, broke into a confused murmur of disapprobation; and the vocales called on their president to silence the audacious monk. Cordovez, who had acquired confidence from the success of his former harangue, desired him, in an authoritative tone, to abstain from such seditious language: assuring him that the expressions he had permitted himself to use, would have their due weight in the decision of the court. Several soldiers were then called by the Fiscal, and deposited to having heard the inflammatory harangues of the prisoners, whom they identified; describing the effects which their exhortations had produced on the populace. All agreed, in bearing witness to the active part taken by Fray Pablo in the insurrection; and in declaring, that he acted as ringleader of the mob, which the patriot troops found assembled in the Plaza, on the afternoon of the recent attack.

When their examination was concluded, Fray Pablo objected to their testimony being received, on the ground of their being soldiers, and consequently under the direct influence of the court, which he ventured to tax with sinister intentions, in selecting witnesses from among a body of men notoriously at enmity with the friars. He was proceeding to complain, that not a single impartial evidence had been produced, when he was thunder-struck by hearing the name of Fray Nicolas Polillo called, and seeing the portly Confesor del Carcel step forward, and stand before the court.

On being desired by the Fiscal to declare what he knew, concerning the recent insurrection in the capital, as connected with the prisoners whom he saw on their trial, he stated that, on the morning of the late terrible earthquake, he had been sent for to the jail, for the purpose of administering spiritual consolation to a prisoner, whom he understood to be under sentence of death. He had been surprised, while in the condemned cell, by that awful convulsion of nature, by which his life was placed in the most imminent jeopardy; for his penitente made his escape through a fissure in the wall, far too small to admit of his following, and ungratefully left him there to perish, without an attempt at rescuing him.

"In that cell," continued he, "did I pass the remainder of the day, and the entire night, without the least sustenance, (except a few cigars which I had providentially brought with me,) and in momentary dread of perishing by that most horrible of deaths, starvation. However, praised be my patron Santo Domingo, the next morning early, when I was just at the last gasp, between terror and famine, a mob of rotos commenced removing the rubbish, which blocked up the entrance to the dungeons, with the intention of releasing some of their fraternity, who, they little doubted, were to be found therein. I contrived to make myself heard, although my voice was feeble through inanition, (as it well might be, after four and twenty mortal hours fasting,) and they burst the door of my cell. But instead of expressing their thankfulness, at being the humble instruments of my rescue from the jaws of death, as it were, they unfeelingly and irreverently scoffed at my misfortune. Nay, one among them,—Avo Maria!—said, with a profane oath, that he would not have toiled so hard, had he known it were a cogote-raspado; but that he believed it had been his comrade Bilchez, (a noted highway robber, be it remembered,) who was in the dungeon, under sentence!"

Here the Fiscal interposed; and requested the reverend confessor to confine himself to stating what he knew concerning the prisoners.

"Assuredly, learned sir! I am presently coming to that point. At the head of those ruffians, (I sorrow to say it,) was Fray Pablo Oyarzun; who, instead of rebuking them for their rude deportment towards me, or attempting to divert them from their unlawful design of prison breaking, was comforting and encouraging them thereunto. He also sought to win me over to his party; declaring that he had full authority, from Monteverde, for his attempt to bring about a counter-revolution. He made me many tempting offers, in the name of the royalist government, which, he assured me, would shortly resume the command of Venezuela; but truly I am a peaceable man, and content with my lot.

"More I cannot depose touching this matter; for I forthwith retired to this very refectory, which, I may say with truth, has been my abode during these days of disquiet and alarm; excepting only such hours as I passed in my cell, or in the convent chapel."

Fray Nicolas was then permitted to retire; and the prisoners were called on for their defence. They all expressed their contrition, and threw themselves on the mercy of the court, except Fray Pablo, who declared that he gloried in the share he had taken in the late attempt to re-establish the regal authority in Venezuela. He upbraided his brethren with their pusillanimous behaviour; and again menaced the court with the utmost vengeance of the Spanish army, which, he affirmed, would in a few days more be in possession of the capital. The hall was then cleared, and Cordovez called the attention of the vocales to the case before them. He decanted, at some length, on the turbulent disposition constantly manifested by those two mendicant communities; and on the dangers that would result from suffering this last outrage, of which they were the main cause, to pass with impunity.

The deliberation of the court was speedily concluded. It was unanimously agreed, to sentence all the prisoners to banishment from the territory of Venezuela, for various terms, in proportion to their criminality, and rank in their respective convents. A few members at first hinted, that the contumacious ringleader merited a still more severe doom; but they contented themselves with voting, that the court should mark its sense of his outrageous behaviour, by ordering him to be conducted, in irons, beyond the limits of the republic, never to return. The place selected, for their exile, was the province of Coro; and an official letter was addressed to the commander-in-chief, desiring he would appoint a sufficient escort, as soon as convenient, to conduct them to the frontiers.

The prisoners were then called in, and made acquainted with their sentences. It was listened to, by some of them, with the indifference natural to those who have no families to leave; and by others with exultation, for it relieved them from the dreadful apprehensions under which they had laboured during their trial. A military court, indeed, had been associated, and not without reason, in their terrified imaginations, with ideas of scaffolds and executioners; disagreeable objects, which they had often gazed at with indifference, when the fate of others was concerned, but which now haunted them in all their most horrid colours.

Fray Pablo Oyarzun alone appeared unmoved; and was on the point of once more addressing the court, when Cordovez rose and hastily dissolved it. He intimated to the prisoners, at the same time, that they were to consider the refectory as their place of confinement, until the morning, when they were to set out for their destination.

CHAPTER XVI.

BANISHMENT.—THE GUERRILLA.—A SKIRMISH.

A troop of carbiners was in readiness, in the outer court of the convent of Santo Domingo, at day-break, commanded by Don Carlos Sepulveda, who had been selected by Miranda to superintend the removal of the banished friars. Forty mules stood saddled for their conveyance; being the animals usually employed by ecclesiastics on a journey, for their steadiness and easy pace. Among them was a tall powerful macho, destined to carry Fray Pablo; conspicuous for an embroidered woman's sillon, which was provided for his accommodation, as his fetters would not admit of his riding like a horseman.

A crowd of the lower order of Caraqueños had assembled at the gate, from various motives, to witness the friars' departure. The females, who were here and elsewhere their enthusiastic partisans, had each prepared some offering for her confessor, of provisions, or other little articles that might be useful to him on the road. The men, among whom monks were by no means favourites, came to enjoy the discomfiture of those objects of their jealousy and superstitious dread; and the children gathered round from all quarters, to lend their ever ready shout of acclaim to the novel procession. The prisoners at length came forth, and the hum of curiosity subsided, as they began to mount in sullen silence; the clang of Fray Pablo's fetters being distinctly heard, as he shuffled across the paved quadrangle to his mule, on which he was placed by two of his escort.

The sobs of the devotees became more audible, as the preparations for the march proceeded; and, when the banished friars reached the Plazuela, in front of the convent, those who had offerings to make, pressed forward between the files of cavalry, to kiss the hands and sandaled feet of their spiritual guides, whom they looked on almost, if not altogether, in the light of martyrs. Fray Pablo was commencing a farewell harangue to the populace; but Don Carlos, who had received instructions to prevent any exhibition of the sort, gave the word to proceed—and the procession moved forward at a brisk pace; amidst the shrill screams of children, and the irrepressible laughter of the men, at the ludicrous contrast between the dress, demeanour, and style of horsemanship, of the prisoners and their guards.

As government apprehended some danger of popular commotion, should the friars pass through any disaffected town on their way to the frontiers of Venezuela, Sepulveda led the escort by the most unfrequented route, and carefully avoided halting in or near any populous village. On the evening of the fourth day, he arrived at the southern shore of the great Laguna de Maracaybo, just at the entrance of the valley, through which the rapid river Catacumba empties itself into the lake. Leaving to his subaltern officer the management of the party, while crossing the stream in canoes, Don Carlos passed over, attended by his ordenanza; and rode down to the border of the lake, in search of a commodious spot for a bivouac that night. His attention was attracted by a smoke, which curled upward through the dark foliage of a mahogany tree. On examining what neighbours he was likely to have so near his halting place, he found a small Indian camp, consisting of eight or ten Cachiris, with their wives and children.

An old man, whom he recognised as the Cacique Pichiloncoy, advanced to meet him; and cordially invited him to share their meal, being some fine bagre fish from the lagoon, which one of the squaws was stewing in an earthen olla, with wild tomatoes, and bird-pepper from the woods. Sepulveda gladly accepted this offer, which was by no means unwelcome after his long ride. He therefore despatched his ordenanza to the pass of the Catacumba, with directions for his subaltern, as to where he was to halt; and dismounting, he joined the hospitable group. Having answered the Cacique's enquiries concerning their mutual friend Tovar, he in turn questioned his host about Zaraza's flying camp. He learned that the guerilla had skirmished, the very day before, with a column of Spanish cavalry that had appeared on the plains of Harinas. Zaraza had been compelled to fall back on the borders of the lake. There he was encamped, only a few leagues off, in hourly expectation of being attacked by a superior royalist force, which was advancing against him.

On hearing this piece of intelligence, Sepulveda resolved to hasten to the old chief's assistance. Accordingly, when the escort arrived, he left a small detachment with the lieutenant, to take care of the prisoners, who were now within a day's march of their destination; and set off with the main body of the carbiners, in the direction Pichiloncoy had mentioned. After a smart gallop of a couple of hours, he left the woody glades, which skirt that part of the lake, and entered on an extensive plain. At the farther end of this, the sun was just sinking behind the chain of lofty mountains, forming the eastern barrier of the province of Santa Marta.

A flight of vultures, which were wheeling lazily round in airy circles, pointed out the situation of the camp; and the carbiners were soon apprised, that they were in the immediate neighbourhood of the guerilla, by the numerous carcasses of cattle which lay in the long grass, half skinned, and scarcely touched by the wasteful epicures, excepting the ribs and some other choice parts. Few of their horses could be seen, for the greater part lay stretched in the luxuriant herbage of the savanna; and their riders could scarcely have been discovered, had it not been for the rows of long slender lances planted upright in the ground, whose glittering points, and fluttering banners, alone distinguished them from the tall reeds growing on the borders of the adjoining lake. It was not until the sound of the horses' hoofs echoed close to the guerilleros, that they started up, with a confused discordant clamour, from the ponchos on which they had been indolently reclining, and prepared to seize their lances. On seeing the well-known uniform of the carbiners, they again seated themselves, and resumed their games of cards and dice, which had been interrupted.

On enquiring for their general, Sepulveda was directed to the spot where he was seated with several of his subordinate chiefs, smoking his pipe, and watching with apparent interest the chances of a game at brisca, which two of them were playing on a manta spread before them. Zaraza welcomed the young aide-de-camp, and expressed his joy at his opportune arrival, saying that his light cavalry had been rather roughly handled, by some royalist dragoons, in a late skirmish; and that he had sent an express across the lake, to warn Miranda that the Spanish army had opened the campaign.

"I observe all your men carry carbiners," said he, "which will be very useful to us in this savanna. We might as well attempt to charge in a ripe maizefield, through this long grass; and I dare say that was in a great measure the reason why we got something the worst of it yesterday. And yet, for my own part, I could never approve of introducing fire arms among my lads; as I am convinced it would inevitably spoil them for lancers, which is the only true manly mode of warfare. But had you not better dismount your troop? they will find abundance of beef not far off. Or, if they are like my men, and prefer killing every one for himself, yonder is a herd of cows near the lagoon, which we drove with us yesterday from Los Reyes."

Sepulveda accepted his offer of provisions, but declined encamping near the guerilla; because, not to mention the contagious example of such undisciplined troops, he had already seen a sufficient specimen of their carelessness, to be convinced of the necessity of redoubled vigilance on his part; especially as the enemy was said to be advancing. He therefore ordered his men to eat themselves rations from the nearest carcasses, to collect driftwood for fuel, and to fill their calabashes with water at the edge of the lake. Then taking leave of Zaraza for the night, he led his detachment a few hundred yards in advance; and bivouacked with the usual precautions observed by an outline picket.

It was fortunate for Zaraza's guerilla, that this handful of regular troops was in front of his position; for a little after midnight, the "Quien vive?" of a patrol, followed by the report of a carbine, announced the approach of an enemy. Sepulveda's men had scarcely started from the ground on which they lay, and mounted their horses, when they heard the trampling of cavalry, and were almost instantly charged by a squadron of Spanish dragoons, who had mistaken the carbiners for guerilleros. When they were close upon him, Don Carlos gave the word to fire, and a volley was delivered among them, the effect of which could not be distinctly seen; but, from the cries of the wounded, and the number of masterless horses which were seen to gallop off in different directions, it might be presumed to have done considerable execution. The loud voice of their commanding officer was heard, endeavouring to rally his disordered troops; but Sepulveda anticipated his intended movement, by ordering a charge in his turn, which was promptly and effectually executed. The enemy fled in confusion; and Don Carlos, content with having repulsed them, halted his carbiners, and waited until day-light should enable him to discover by what force his late antagonists were supported. He at the same time despatched a non-commissioned officer to Zaraza's bivouac, to acquaint him with the result of the recent attack, and to urge him strongly to move his guerilla forward from the position he had chosen, as he was in evident danger of being out-flanked and surrounded.

Day broke slowly over the broad lake, and the morning breezes rolled from its sullen waters thick masses of fog, which mingled with the night mist hovering over the savanna, and rendered it impossible to distinguish a single object at a few paces distant. Sepulveda strained his eyes in a fruitless attempt to penetrate this screen, which concealed from him the enemy's line; but he was already made aware, that a considerable body was in the field, by the various distances and directions in which he heard the Spanish reveille played, by the martial music of both cavalry and infantry. His own troop was so close to the corps with which it had been engaged, that he could distinctly hear their morning roll-call, and the neighing of their horses. The fog floated past in thinner clouds, and the sun was dimly seen rising on the eastern side of the lagoon; near which the guerilla might now be distinguished, mounted, and lounging in different attitudes, on their rough looking horses. The mist at length rolled upwards in one dense volume; and exposed to view the splendid scene of a battle field in full array.

In front, and within half musket-shot, were the dragons of Numancia, with their brazen helmets and black horse-tails; forming, together with several other corps of heavy and light cavalry, the first line of the Spanish army. At a considerable distance in the rear, were seen the glittering bayonets of the columns of infantry, just appearing above the high grass. From the numerous stands of colour, that waved along the second line, Sepulveda could calculate the royalist force to be far superior to that which Miranda was at present able to bring into the field. He had little time to waste in idle speculation; for he clearly saw, that the cavalry on the right of the enemy's line would have it in their power to cut off his retreat, by occupying the wood through which he had advanced the preceding evening. He therefore rapidly crossed that part of the plain, which lay between him and the defile, without waiting to consult Zaraza; and, having halted in front of the wood, sent to summon his lieutenant's detachment to his assistance, desiring him to abandon the charge of the prisoners.

Zaraza's guerilleros had nearly reached the wood, when the Huzares de la Reyna, who had advanced to intercept their passage, charged and scattered them after a short struggle. They would have been surrounded, and probably cut off to a man, had it not been for the carbiniers, whom Sepulveda led to their assistance; and who skirmished so sharply with the Huzares, separated as they were in pursuit, that they checked their progress, and enabled their friends to gain the shelter of the defile. Nevertheless, the guerilleros were so far from attempting to rally there, that they did not even halt; but crowded in a panic to the pass of the river Catacumba, which they swam, and dispersed themselves through the neighbouring country. Sepulveda regained his position in the wood; but quickly observed, that he was deserted by the troops which he had so successfully supported. He nevertheless maintained his post, until the near approach of the enemy's infantry rendered it no longer tenable.

As he retreated through the wood, skirmishing with the advanced guard of the pursuers, he passed Pichiloncoy's little encampment; where he found the Indian families seated calmly on the ground, with their usual affectation of indifference. It might however be plainly seen, that this apparent apathy was only assumed, by the anxious looks which the females cast after their children, who had crept through the underwood towards the scene of conflict, impelled by the restless curiosity of infancy. The men, on seeing the carbiniers arrive, heated by exertion, and blackened by the smoke of the fray, advanced to meet them with calabashes, full of water, that had been hung up in readiness, among the branches of their leafy camp, as if anticipating the occasion for which such refreshment might be required.

Far different was the greeting met with by the detachment, from the friars whom it had so lately guarded, and who were assembled in a small glade, through which it had to pass. They were emboldened, by the near approach of the royalist army, and exasperated, beyond the bounds of their ordinary caution, by a misfortune which had befallen them, since they had lost the protection of their escort. Some stragglers from the guerilla, it appeared, had fallen in with them; and not contented with plundering their alforjas of the necessities they contained, had stripped the unlucky exiles of their girdles, in which, after the fashion of mendicants, they had concealed their hoards of coin. They therefore took this opportunity of expressing their exultation at the patriots' discomfiture, by chanting in chorus the anthem "Bendito y alabado sea! &c." prescribed to be used in their chapels, on occasions of peculiar rejoicing and jubilee. Fray Pablo Oyarzun, not satisfied with this indirect mode of triumphing over his late escort, took his station on a mossy hillock, which covered the roots of some decayed forest trees; and from thence, as from a pulpit, fulminated his anathema on the retreating soldiers. One or two of them, however, less patient, or more revengeful than their comrades, discharged their carbines in the direction of the orator, when they saw their officer's attention otherwise engaged; and he judged it most prudent to descend hastily from his rostrum, and conceal himself from observation, by mingling with his brethren.

The bugles of the Spanish cazadores now began to ring through the glades of the wood; and Sepulveda was compelled to hasten his retreat to the river Catacumba. Having crossed it, he established his troop in a range of bodegas, built on the summit of a steep bank for the accommodation of travellers, when detained by floods during the rainy season; taking care, previously, to abandon to the current all canoes and piraguas belonging to the ferry, so as to impede as much as possible the passage of the Spanish army.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE ISLAND.—THE NEGRO MARKET.—THE SPANISH PLANTER.

Maria del Rosario rose early, the morning after her arrival at Saint Thomas's; and found her hostess's daughter in close attendance on Don Beltran, in whose health she was rejoiced to learn there was a very perceptible amendment. He was in a sound and, apparently, refreshing slumber; and the young negress said, that he had woken at an earlier hour, and had evinced no symptoms of delirium, having enquired, in a collected rational manner, concerning his children, and his present place of abode. At that moment, Martha's mother entered the room. Having congratulated her young guest, on the improvement in the invalid's health, (which she did not fail to ascribe to the conserves she had given him,) she proposed to show her the town, of which she was about to become an inhabitant.

As they proceeded up the hill overhanging the harbour, by the side of the rivulet, which was now crowded with laundresses, in the full exercise of their gossiping profession, Mama Chepita pointed out, with no small pride, a group of her hired servants, who were working for her advantage. She observed, that she herself had been for some years free; and that, although her daughter Martha was as yet hired by her from her master, a wealthy Spanish settler, she had hopes of being able to pay for her freedom, in a few months.

The path led between small patches of cultivated ground, from which (as it was a holiday among the plantations,) numerous families of negroes were issuing, bearing on their heads baskets of fruit and vegetables, to sell on their own account in the market. Half way up the hill, at a short distance from the road, was a spot of rugged waste land, overgrown with wild limes and tamarinds, and shaded by a few cocoanut trees. Under these were the ruins of an irregular fortification, of rude construction and ancient date, which tradition ascribes to the Buccaneers, who used in former days to make this island, and the rest of the Virgen Gorda group, their places of rendezvous. From this eminence, Mama Chepita pointed out to the novice the enchanting scenery which it commanded, of both town and harbour, far below them.

In the former, the flat roofs of the principal dwelling-houses, covered with white chunam, were contrasted with the picturesque palm and cabbage trees, and the dark coloured evergreens, which filled the surrounding gardens. The calm unruffled bosom of the latter reflected a cloudless sky, and the tapering masts of the merchant vessels of different classes, which floated on it, with well-bleached sails hanging loose to dry, and the many-coloured ensigns of their respective nations, drooping in the still morning air. Innumerable boats, and light canoes, were crossing it in all directions, scarcely dimpling the surface of the dark blue mirror over which they glided; while the wild sound of the conch-shell, blown in the foremost of a line of fishing piraguas, announced their return from a successful night's toil. The sea, outside the bay, was mottled by the fresh trade wind, under the influence of which a tall bark was reeling along in her rapid course, towards the neighbouring island of Puerto Rico, that loomed mistily in the offing.

Mama Chepita pointed to the south, towards which the novice was intently gazing; and said, "Your home lies in that direction, Señorita! I also used once to look that way, for hours together, on holidays such as this; for I was born in La Trinidad, and little thought, when I was of your age, ever to have left it. But my master, Don Anselmo Urrutia, sold his plantation, when the island fell into the hands of the English,—for he could not endure a heretic government,—and bought another estate within a few miles of this spot, on which he still resides. I had been married, not many months before, to a fellow slave on the same plantation; and you may suppose it was hard, even on us negroes, to be torn asunder. But I was an in-door slave, and my husband a field poem, so that there was no help for it. There had not been time for him to save sufficient money to buy my freedom; so I was brought here, and he was sold with the estate. Poor Beño!—he worked hard night and day for some years, as I afterwards heard, to collect the sum my master demanded; and at length sent it to me by a droguer belonging to his new owner, which always used to bring me news of him. But the vessel was lost in a hurricane, within sight of this harbour; and, when he found that his hopes of seeing me, and his infant child, were once more put off, he pined away, and died of a broken heart. Ah, Señorita! you are now happy in your own family: may you never know what it is to be separated from one you love!"

The novice's cheek flushed with the consciousness, that she was at that moment thinking more of those she had left behind, than of father or brother; and she secretly resolved to call to mind her hostess's melancholy story, as a warning against indulging in fruitless regrets and vain expectations. They then descended the hill by a different road, leading to the market-place, where the lively scene soon dispelled all unpleasant recollections from both their minds. Stalls made of bamboo were erected along three sides of the square. On these, yams, plantains, green maize, and every other variety of tropical vegetable, mingled with pine-apples, avocado pears, and cocoanuts, were offered for sale by negroes looking the pictures of good humour and cleanliness, dressed in bright chints gowns, and neat Bandanna head-gear. Little negro children were seated on the grass in the centre, with baskets of chickens and eggs, and plantain leaves full of ochra, bird-pepper, and tomatoes; and the incessant chattering of buyers and sellers, in creole French and Spanish, and in broken English and Danische, emulated the confusion of Babel.

Among the spectators who had been assembled here merely by curiosity, were several elderly negroes, swelling with all the importance of conscious freedom. Their white hats, pink silk umbrellas, and ostentatious display of heavy watch-chains and seals, procured for them the low bows and curtsies of their less fortunate sable brethren; salutes which they scarcely vouchsafed to acknowledge, farther than by a gracious and condescending wave of the hand. A more busy class, were the mates and stewards of European merchant vessels; men whose robust frames, and florid countenances, bore sufficient evidence to their being recently arrived. Followed by their respective cabin boys, with well-filled market baskets, they bustled through the throng, exclaiming, as they passed each other, against the insufferable heat of the climate, and clearing entire vegetable stalls at a purchase, in their eagerness to enjoy a sufficient "fresh mess." Every body made way for these griffins, as they are usually termed; even those important personages, the black cooks of hotels, and domestics catering for private families. These watched the sailors' anxiety to buy, and readiness to pay the most extravagant prices, with a grin of civil contempt for their inexperience; observing, with a shrug, as they turned to make their more economical market,—"Massa Griffin alway gib what him dealer ask!—No wonder neger market sellers so sarcy."

There were also several groups of slipshod creole inhabitants, and foreign settlers, lounging here on their return from their morning bath, in the retired bay behind the fort. Their sallow bilious complexions, and negligent attire, gave sufficient indications of the enervating effect of tropical climates on the constitutions of Europeans, and of their descendants for many generations. These insular fashionables gazed on the novice with a listless stare, that embarrassed her greatly. She was on the point of expressing a wish to return to the cottage, when a tall elderly Spaniard, wrapped in a loose capote, and wearing a broad palm leaf sombrero, beckoned to Mama Chepita, who obeyed the signal with an alacrity that bespoke him to be a person of consequence;—at least in her eyes. After asking a few questions, which Maria del Rosario could not help suspecting to refer to her, as he repeatedly turned his eyes on her while speaking, he passed on; and the negress returning said, that her late master, Don Anselmo, had been enquiring what Caraqueñan young lady she was attending.

"He said he knew you to be from Venezuela by your dress," said Mama Chepita; "and, when I told him you was my lodger, and that your father, who had just arrived from the Main, was lying sick at my house, he said he would call in the course of the day, to enquire whether he could be of any service. It has happened fortunately that we met him; for he is a wealthy planter, and though rather severe among his slaves, very charitable and generous to his equals, especially his countrymen. The poor sick gentleman may be considered the same as one, being a native of the Spanish colonies; so I hope, señorita, things may turn out better than you expect. Lodewyk Sluiker, who brought you over, has told me how your father has been plundered by the pirates."

They then left the market-place; and when they reached the cottage, they found Don Beltran sitting up and conversing with the skipper, who had called, according to promise, for the purpose of wishing them farewell previous to his departure. He saluted Maria del Rosario, with all the frankness and cordiality of an old friend. Having expressed his hope that she was pleased with her hostess, and with the accommodations of the cottage, he offered to convey any letter or message for her to the Main, observing, that he intended to beat out of the harbour that forenoon, with the first of the sea-breeze. The novice looked to her father for permission; but he drily thanked the skipper, and said that he wished for no sort of correspondence with that unhappy country, until it had renounced its rebellion, or should have been reconquered by the armies of its lawful sovereign;—an event which he flattered himself was not far distant. His daughter acquiesced with a sigh; for she had promised Doña Gertrudes to write her a few lines, from wherever her destination might be.

Lodewyk then rose to take leave; and after hemming for a while, as if irresolute, he exclaimed, "Dohder! het zal be zo. Zie you, myn heer! dis has been an unlucky trip voor you; and here you stand, medout a shot in 't locker. Hier is 't gelt you gave me for your vrucht; except one doubloon dat is gone for harbour-dues, and a month's huis-rent to your landlady." So saying, and without waiting for an answer, honest Sluiker threw down the gold on the invalid's bed, and disappeared immediately. This unexpected act of generosity from a man of such unpolished exterior, drew tears of gratitude from Maria del Rosario. The hostess contributed her share of praise; declaring that, although her old friend Lodewyk lay under the imputation of being a smuggler, and there was even a report in circulation that he had formerly belonged to a still more lawless and dangerous fraternity, yet there was not a kinder hearted skipper in the droguer trade. Don Beltran assented, though rather ungraciously; complaining, at the same time, of the disagreeable necessity under which he laboured, of being obliged to a man in Sluiker's station of life.

Joaquin now entered the cottage, and, in answer to his father's enquiries, said that he had been forming some acquaintances among the young royalist emigrants; several of whom were on the point of sailing for Cartagena, to offer their services to Monteverde, in aid of an expedition it was understood he was about to undertake. Mama Chepita, and her daughter Martha, then spread the table with a substantial West Indian breakfast, which might have tempted far more languid appetites than those of her two young guests; and the elder negress assured Don Beltran, that in a few days he would be sufficiently recovered to partake with his son and daughter.

After siesta in the afternoon, Mama Chepita announced a visitor; and Don Anselmo Urrutia entered the room. Whether it was that Maria del Rosario had been prejudiced against him, by her hostess's narrative in the morning, or that his manners and address were in reality repulsive, she thought she had never seen a more disagreeable Gallego. He had exchanged his capote and plain morning clothes, for an antiquated full dress suit of black, in which he bore no small resemblance to Cervantes' "Knight of the Mournful Visage." Addressing the novice with all the formality of a Spanish Hidalgo, softened by such a condescending air of patronage as he conceived suitable to the occasion, he paid her some awkward compliments, at which she found no small difficulty to preserve her gravity, and enquired after the health of her father.

On being introduced to his bedside, he seated himself, and immediately entered on the subject of colonial politics; reprobating the principles and measures of the revolutionists, in a strain of violent ultra loyalty. Don Beltran having given him to understand, that he had been compelled to emigrate on account of his devotion to the cause of the mother country, he expressed his satisfaction at having the good fortune to make his acquaintance; and begged that, as soon as his health would permit, he would honour him by visiting his plantation at Caobas, together with his son and daughter, and making as long a stay there as would suit his convenience. Don Beltran, who had always been blindly prejudiced in favour of all natives of Spain, expressed his acknowledgments in suitable terms; and was readily induced to detail every circumstance connected with his leaving Venezuela, and his passage from Los Bagros; not forgetting his unfortunate meeting with the pirate schooner, and the serious loss he had thereby sustained, which he owned had nearly left him penniless. Don Anselmo made no comment on his recital, but renewed his general offers of assistance; and then took his leave, promising to repeat his visit the following day.

This interview rekindled in Peña's bosom all the ardour for political intrigue, that had been his besetting foible, but had lain dormant since his arrest and imprisonment at Caraccas; and he eagerly desired to be once more in a situation that would afford him opportunities of recruiting his scattered finances. With this view he resolved to pay assiduous court to his new acquaintance; flattering himself that, by a skilful display of royalist principles, and an exaggerated statement of his sufferings, and losses sustained by his adherence to them, he might induce the wealthy Spaniard to interest himself, in his favour, with the colonial government; so as either to obtain for him a pecuniary reimbursement, or an indemnification, by means of some lucrative situation, at Cartagena or the Havana. He, therefore, became doubly anxious for a speedy recovery; and insisted, much to Mama Chepita's mortification, on a medical man being immediately summoned.

Joaquin Peña's volunteered his services to enquire for one among his emigrant acquaintance. He soon returned with a travelling French practitioner, who had lately arrived at Saint Thomas's in the course of a tour through the windward islands; and who, as his advertisement declared, "had been induced to postpone his intended departure for a few days, in compliance with the urgent solicitations of his numerous and respectable patients." Having enquired into the invalid's symptoms, and felt his pulse, protecting himself at the same time from infection, by means of a muslin handkerchief profusely sprinkled with aromatic vinegar, he retired to an open window, from whence he proceeded to deliver his opinion. In the first place, as a matter of course, he disapproved of every thing that had been done, in the way of cooling and refreshing the patient; and directed a totally different system to be adopted, by keeping him warm, and administering tonics and stimulants. He next wrote a series of recipes, which he desired to be instantly taken to his assistant, who would make them up from his own travelling medicine-chest. Having received his fee he walked away, lamenting, (in the usual terms,) that he had not been called in sooner, and hoping it was not yet too late, &c. &c.

Don Beltran now became perfectly convinced, that he was in reality dangerously ill; so great is the power of grave looks and oracular sentences over the human mind. His daughter scarcely knew what to think; but endeavoured to comfort herself by the reflection, that he had, at all events, the best possible advice; while Mama Chepita, shaking her head, prepared to obey the doctor's injunctions, by closing the windows and substituting sangaree for conserves. A basket full of phials soon arrived; and before night the cottage was perfumed with the ill-omened scent of musk.*

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE PLANTATION—THE SLAVES' HUTS—THE DUENA.

The consequences of the French doctor's visit were, as Mama Chepita had anticipated, of a highly unfavourable nature to Don Beltran. The fever, over which the simple remedies of the negress had been nearly victorious, was reinforced, secundum artem, by the inundation of drugs and stimulants, which the travelling practitioner had so unsparingly poured in, and assumed a formidable character. Nature, however, ultimately triumphed over art; and the strength of the patient's constitution, assisted by such nostrums as his experienced nurse persisted in secretly administering, at length completely shook off the deadly infection. Nevertheless, his health had sustained so severe a shock that for several weeks he was unable to leave his couch; but his daughter's attention, through the whole of his tedious illness, was most persevering. Mama Chepita could with difficulty prevail on her to take even her necessary rest; and no representations, nor entreaties, could induce her to leave the cottage for a single moment.

* The scent of this drug is abhorred in the West Indies, as being always perceived in houses where a sick person's life is despaired of; for it is the ultimo recurso of colonial doctors, in cases of yellow fever.

The visits of Don Anselmo, which he punctually repeated every morning and evening, were a source of considerable annoyance to Maria del Rosario. As she judged it expedient to prevent him, under various pretences, from incommoding her father by his interminable political disquisitions, and querulous lamentations over the rebellious colonies, she was compelled to endure his visitations, herself, in the sitting room; where he would smoke his cigarillos for hours together, bestowing all his tediousness on her, in uninteresting discussions, and unintelligible arguments. He construed her silence, which was the natural consequence of vexation and abstraction, into pleased attention; and flattered by so docile an auditor, he continued day after day to harangue in the same monotonous strain, on the duldest theme he could possibly have selected for the entertainment of a young female.

Don Beltran was at length pronounced a convalescent; and the farther attendance of his medical adviser could be dispensed with. Maria del Rosario observed with alarm, that the necessary incidental expenses had fearfully diminished the small stock of money on which she and her family depended for subsistence. It was true that Don Anselmo invariably concluded his tedious visits with offers of assistance; but these were so ambiguously expressed, as to leave it in doubt whether or not they were more words of course. Besides, she involuntarily recoiled from the idea of owing any sort of obligation to so very disagreeable a person. She therefore determined on attempting to avail herself of the skill in embroidery and ornamental work, which she had acquired in her convent, for the purpose of supplying her father's diminished funds. She took the first opportunity, when Mama Chepita had succeeded in enticing her to walk towards the ruined buccaneers' fort, of mentioning her intention in a few words; and requested her hostess to inform her, what articles of needlework would meet with the readiest sale on the island.

The negress listened with surprise to her resolution, scarcely believing it possible, that a white person could speak so composedly of work;—that bug-bear of hot climates. Perceiving, however, that her young mistress was actually in earnest, she replied with some hesitation, that she had indeed heard of emigrant ladies employing themselves in that way, but that she was totally ignorant whether they had been so successful as to make it worth their while to continue it. The inhabitants of all classes, she said, were certainly fond of finery; but she believed that they were nothing but European manufacture, and she hardly thought they would consider any other good enough for them. At the same time, she readily engaged to procure her young mistress, (as she constantly termed her,) patterns of such articles as were most fashionable at the time; and the novice, having purchased the necessary materials, set herself in private to imitate them. This she effected so closely, and with such neatness, as to draw from her hostess exclamations of surprise and admiration. Mama Chepita had never before believed, that any thing of the kind could be made, except in the manufactories of France or England, and, having obtained permission to exhibit for sale the first specimen that was finished, returned exultingly in a short time, having disposed of it at the house of one of the principal inhabitants, where several more pieces of the same work were bespoke. This welcome success relieved Maria del Rosario, in a great measure, from her distressing apprehensions. Nevertheless, the difficult and tedious nature of the work, and the frequent interruptions she met with in prosecuting this undertaking, through her father's exceeding poverty, and impatience of being left alone, permitted her to make but small daily progress.

A vessel was now on the point of sailing with the royalist volunteers to Cartagena. Don Anselmo, who had considerable influence among the emigrants of his own party, as well as interest with the merchants who had fitted out the expedition, obtained a passage for Joaquín Peñuela, and gave him letters of introduction to the Spanish general, and other Europeans, on that part of the Main. His father, on bidding him farewell, divided with him the scanty remainder of his property, and exhorted him to distinguish himself by his zeal in his sovereign's cause; reminding him, that by that means alone he could now hope to obtain preferment, and an honourable independence. His departure relieved Don Beltrán from a load of anxiety that had materially tended to retard his cure. Although he fondly doted on his son, he could not be insensible to the dangers of the society into which he had contrived to introduce himself since his arrival. It consisted chiefly of young emigrants, totally devoid of employment; whose sole resources against crisis appeared to be cards, dice, and the numerous gaming tables which are to be found lurking in every corner of a West Indian sea-port.

Don Beltrán's convalescence now proceeded rapidly; so that he was enabled to accept his new Spanish acquaintance's reiterated invitation to visit his estate at Caobas. On the morning appointed, two mules were in readiness at the door of Mama Chepita's cottage, with several stout negroes, whom Don Anselmo had sent to escort his guests, and carry their baggage. They took leave of their kind hostess;—Maria del Rosario, in particular, embracing her and her daughter Martha affectionately;—and took the road leading to the plantation.

After following the course of the rivulet for a considerable distance beyond the old buccaniers' fort, the travellers, instead of continuing to ascend the mountain, crossed the ravine by a slight bamboo bridge, which vibrated fearfully under their mules' tread. Being totally unprovided with balustrades, it could not be crossed without a sensation of imminent danger. The path then lead along a stony ridge, whose dark-coloured rocks, and arid soil, were such as might be expected in the immediate neighbourhood of some volcano. Yet this apparently barren track was shaded by tamarinds, and wild pomegranate trees; and from the dry clefts sprang various splendid species of the flowering cactus, besides geraniums, and towering aloes. Even the mules were compelled to pick their steps carefully along the beaten track, to avoid coming in contact with the prickly-pear bushes, guarded by the most formidable of all vegetable weapons, and associated, by dear-bought experience, with ideas of rattlesnakes and scorpions.

Having passed rapidly over this disagreeable part of their journey, which the sun's rays had already made oppressively sultry, the path entered a deep and gloomy ravine, shaded completely from the heat by a copse of arching bamboos, over which the majestic forest trees, from which the neighbouring estate derived its name, stretched their gigantic arms. As the path descended, the murmuring of a rivulet was heard from beneath the canes. The underwood began to be thinly scattered with wild plantains, which, as the soil improved, gradually assumed the appearance of cultivation, until they mingled with, and were lost among, the domestic shrubs of the plantation.

The country opened into a small but fertile valley, through which ran a stream sufficiently large to turn a sugar mill, that was in full work close to the principal dwelling-house. The merry song of the field negroes re-echoed in chorus from a neighbouring cane patch, in which they were busily employed cutting; and droves of mules were filing past towards the mill, laden with bundles of sugar cane. In another direction were seen long rows of slaves, only distinguishable, at a distance, from the dark soil they were hoeing, by their short white drawers, employed weeding the tobacco crops; while the occasional clang of a whip was heard from the attendant drovers, in most cases by way of warning to the indolent workmen, but sometimes as a practical reproof to some incorrigible idler.

Lower down the valley, the travellers arrived at the negroes' habitations, thickly scattered along the high bank of the stream, out of reach of the periodical inundation to which it was subject. These huts, although built of clay, and thatched with palm-leaves, had an air of comfort about them, that might in vain be looked for among the cottages of a free-born peasantry. Each of them had a garden attached, small indeed, but amply stocked with vegetables for home consumption and sale; and the poultry of every description, including numerous broods of turkeys and guinea-fowl, that swarmed around them, bore witness to the plenty enjoyed on the estate. Nearly as numerous were the little black urchins of all ages, who, in all the luxury of perfect nudity, were dabbling in the rivulet, or rolling in the dust under the plantain trees. Many of them, scarcely able to crawl, through extreme infancy and plumpness, lay sprawling about the pathway, apparently in imminent danger of being trampled under foot by the mules; but immediately on their near approach, the urchins would scramble, as it were instinctively, under the shelter of some bush; from whence, as they peeped forth, their black eyes glared, like those of some wild animal crouching in his lair.

A short avenue, well swept and watered, led to the dwelling-house, a spacious airy building of only one story above the ground floor; being so constructed, as a necessary precaution against the consequences of earthquakes and hurricanes. These, indeed, especially the former, were far from being frequent on the island; but they were probably dreaded the more, from their making a more lasting impression, than they usually do where they are less uncommon.

Under the shady side of a broad corridor, extending round the whole building, sat Don Anselmo, with two of his friends. One of them might be easily known to be a friar; although the gray robes of the Franciscan order were thrown carelessly round him, rather after the fashion of a dressing gown, than of a monastic habit. The other was an elderly European, of a diminutive figure, but evidently possessing great vivacity and animal spirits. He wore a white jean jacket and trousers; a broad-brimmed straw hat, with green lining; neat yellow leather shoes, and a light blue silk handkerchief, tied loosely round a stiff shirt-collar. He was, in short, a specimen of dandyism, among the generally rough race of planters, such as the Venezuelan strangers were not prepared to expect.

This party, which had assembled in the shade, for the social purpose of enjoying their cigars and conversation together, was seated with their elbow-chairs leaning so far back against the wall, as to serve every purpose of couches. Three little negro pages were protecting them from mosquitos, with Buenos Ayrean ostrich feather flappers; while a fourth handed round a silver tray, stored with capacious goblets of porter-cup and sangaree. The trio arose as Don Beltrán and his daughter reached the corridor; and Don Anselmo, having welcomed his new visitors to Caobas, presented to them, in the first place, his near neighbour and friend Mons. Rodolphe Thermidor, a French settler on the island, who possessed a plantation not many leagues distant.

The little planter had been embrowned and shrivelled by a long exposure to a tropical sky, until his face might have been mistaken for that of a mulatto. He had, nevertheless, preserved unimpaired, through change of climate, and years of exile from all that deserved the name of civilised society, all that courtesy and devotion to the sex which Frenchmen of the old regime were usually supposed to possess exclusively, and by prescription. He advanced, with a self-satisfied air, to pay his respects to the novice; and immediately attached himself to her, apparently secure of entertaining her, and showing his own wit and eloquence, by a series of compliments, uttered with such volubility, as to set all interruption or attempt to answer alike at defiance.

Don Beltrán was next introduced to the friar, by name Padre Bernardo, whose ostensible duty was that of chaplain to the plantation, and confessor to its owner and his household. But, in reality, he filled the situation of humble companion to his patron; whose pride it was his business to soothe, and whose vanity he found it his interest to flatter. While he entered into conversation with Don Beltrán on the inexhaustible subject of the late disturbances in Venezuela, Don Anselmo despatched one of the black pages to summon the dueña de casa, or housekeeper, Señora Jacinta. When she arrived, he recommended Maria del Rosario to her care, with directions to show the young lady the apartments that were prepared for her, and to provide her refreshments better suited to her habits than those of which he and his companions were partaking in the corridor. Mons. Rodolphe politely handed her to the door of the entrance-hall; and expressed his hope, as he relinquished her hand, that the dinner table would be honoured by her company.

The novice felt relieved from the embarrassment natural to her youth and inexperience, by being permitted to retire with a female of the dueña's dignified mien; and examined her looks by stealth, as she walked forward in silence through the spacious rooms, which were rendered gloomy by the window shutters being closed, for the purpose of excluding the noon-day heat. She saw, with regret, that her present attendant appeared to have nothing of the motherly kindness and good humour of Mama Chepita. Her features were expressive of pride of place, and the moroseness of habitual ill-temper; evidently soured and exasperated by the commission she had just received, and which she considered as degrading her to the level of a menial. She was a mulata tercerona; and, from the few words she had uttered in answer to her master's directions, the novice knew her to be a native of the Barlovento provinces, either of Camana or Barcelona. Her dress, which was the dark habit of Nra. Señora de Dolores; her long rosary of black soap-berries; and the formidable scourge which she wore twisted round her waist, proclaimed her to be a devotee of the strictest and most bigoted class.

Having conducted Maria del Rosario to a neat chamber on the first floor, opening into a viranda, which commanded a view of the mill, with the stream that supplied it, and a flower garden at the back of the house, she was about to retire; but she caught sight of the young visitor's trunk, with which a slave had followed them up stairs, and resolved to wait for a while, in hopes of obtaining a peep at its contents. For this purpose she seated herself, unasked, at the open window, complaining of heat and fatigue; and conjecturing, from the novice's youth and apparent simplicity, that there was little occasion for ceremony in addressing her, she began, without farther apology, to question her as to where she was born, and how long she had been on the island. As nothing is more common, in the cloisters of a convent, than a similar spirit of inquisitiveness, Maria del Rosario was by no means surprised or offended at meeting it in a religieuse. She, therefore, readily satisfied her curiosity, by saying that she was a native of Caracas, which city she had left only a few weeks before, for the first time in her remembrance. But when the dueña, encouraged by her affability, proceeded to enquire what had induced her father to leave his native land, and, above all, to bring with him so young and delicate a female, she found it necessary to check her impertinence, by answering, with a look of as much displeasure as she could assume, that she never permitted herself to pry into her father's motives for his actions, and that they could still less concern any one else.

Señora Jacinta found that she calculated too much on the young stranger's placid deportment; and apologised for her curiosity, which she attributed to the interest she could not help feeling for the young lady. She then offered her assistance, in changing her travelling dress for one better suited to company; informing her, that she had not much time to spare, for Don Anselmo always dined at a much earlier hour when at Caobas, than in the port. Maria del Rosario thanked her for her offer; but assured her, that she had always been accustomed to wait on herself. Nevertheless, as she could easily divine the motive that must have induced so important a personage to condescend thus far, and had remarked the eager look of curiosity which she had directed towards the trunk, even during her previous cross-examination, she good-naturedly determined to gratify her, by opening it, and transferring its contents to a chest of drawers, which the dueña had pointed out for her use, on their first entering the room.

Señora Jacinta immediately forgot her pretended fatigue; and starting up, officiously busied herself in assisting to lay by every article; opening and refolding such as particularly struck her fancy, with various comments on the present degenerate taste in dress. She described the fashions of the time when she was last in Caracas, as waiting-maid to her late mistress, at the time of her marriage with Don Anselmo:—modes that belonged to the age of slashed sleeves, and of brocades which required no stiffening save their own embroidery; and that were, according to her eloquent description, rather sublime than beautiful.

While she was thus agreeably engaged, she accidentally took up a small paper parcel, in which Maria del Rosario had carefully wrapped the professed novice's dress, that she wore in the chapel of Santa Clara, on the morning of the earthquake, and in which she had been snatched from imminent peril by Carlos Sepulveda. She had thrown it off at the suggestion of Doña Gertrudes, on her father's declaring his intention of making her the companion of his flight; and had preserved it as a relic of the convent, and perhaps as a memorial, both of the danger from which she had been rescued, and of her preserver. The duña unpinned the parcel, under pretence of shaking out any insects it might contain; and started with an exclamation of surprise and horror, on seeing the white serge mortaja and sandals, with the leather belt and scapulary of a nun.

"Holy Virgin!" she again ejaculated; "has my master admitted into his house an apostate nun!—a perjured monja! I would not for worlds sleep under the same roof with so sacrilegious a wretch. Nothing could avert an earthquake, or some similar heavenly chastisement. But we shall hear what the worthy chaplain, Padre Bernardo, says to this discovery."

Maria del Rosario could not avoid smiling at the wild look of horror with which the sanctimonious devotee regarded her; and half resolved to leave her in ignorance of the real state of the case. But she recollected, that the talkative duña was very capable of spreading reports on the island, which might be greatly to her disadvantage. She therefore undeceived her, by relating the accident which had unexpectedly prevented her from taking the veil; appealing to her flowing hair as a conclusive proof that she had not in reality become a member of any religious sisterhood. Señora Jacinta shook her head incredulously; owning that, when she was on the Main, all nuns were closely shorn. But she declared it impossible to say what new rules might have been introduced, in that respect, into the convents, since the country had fallen into the hands of rebels, who contemned alike king and faith. She added, that if all indeed were true that she had just heard, she could not so much blame the novice. But she expressed her sincere hope that she would take the earliest opportunity, (as was incumbent on her,) of offering up those vows, which, she insisted, had been already mentally taken, and were therefore as conscientiously binding, as if they had been actually pronounced before the altar.

Although the novice thought very differently from her on this head, and was internally rejoiced at her escape from the cloister, she perceived it would be fruitless to argue the point with so bigoted an opponent. She therefore merely hinted, that the same awful visitation, which had interrupted the solemnization of the ceremony, had materially altered her views in life. In saying this, she referred to her father's escape from prison; but the superstitious duña imagined, that she had alluded to the earthquake as an evil omen. As this suggestion was exactly adapted to her comprehension, it made a suitable impression on her mind. She agreed that much might be said in favour of that supposition; and it evidently tended more to reconcile her to the idea of the novice's delaying to take the veil, than the most rational arguments that could have been used. A present that Maria del Rosario made her, consisting of a shawl of vicuña's wool, from the Cordillera, and a scapulary, embroidered and consecrated by the abbess of Santa Clara, effectually removed the prejudices she had begun to entertain against her fair countrywoman; and she curtsied out of the room, promising to send a negro girl to wait on her with refreshments.

The smoking party in the corridor, which had been interrupted by the arrival of the emigrants, had meanwhile resumed their cigars and conversation, which continued, with little intermission, until the first dinner bell summoned them to their respective chambers. When they at length assembled in the saloon, Don Anselmo insisted on seating Maria del Rosario at the head of the table, to her great confusion, for she had never been called on to preside in her father's house, since leaving the convent; and, while a recluse in the cloister, she had, of course, seen little or nothing of society. Nevertheless, she surmounted the difficulty she so much dreaded, with comparative ease; being assisted by the lively little Frenchman, who seated himself at her right hand, and paid her undivided attention until she retired.

CHAPTER XIX.

INVASION—BATTLE—VICTORY.

The consequences of Monteverde's advance towards Caracas were far more serious than Miranda at first anticipated. Scarcely had the express arrived at head quarters, which Zaraza had despatched, with the first intelligence of the royalists' having opened the campaign, when scattered parties of guerrilleros made their appearance, in full retreat to their respective homes. They spread the report, as they passed, of their defeat on the borders of the Laguna de Maracaybo; and of their having lost their general, either killed or taken prisoner. It was impossible to stop them; for they considered their military engagements void, from the moment of losing the chief to whom they owed temporary allegiance.

As their services were never to be confidently depended on, so their defection was of trifling consequence in itself, compared to the discouragement the dangerous example seemed likely to spread through the army. The discontented among the troops,—and they were numerous,—seized this opportunity to raise a clamour, for the payment of all arrears due to the army; and endeavoured, under this pretence, to excite their comrades to mutiny. The prompt and vigilant line of conduct adopted by Miranda, for the purpose of quelling the slightest appearance of insubordination, was barely sufficient to maintain a salutary dread of his authority; and it became evident to him, that the soldiers' spirits were depressed, and little to be relied on, if he persisted in his original design of remaining on the defensive. He had also received private intelligence of deputations having been sent from the nearest frontier towns to the enemy, offering to treat with Monteverde on separate terms; and he plainly saw, that vigorous measures alone could save the republic from falling asunder, and from consequent ruin. He therefore took leave of the Junta, who previous to his departure created him dictator, with the most ample authority belonging to that important situation; and placing himself at the head of the army, advanced to meet Monteverde, and, if possible, to check his farther progress.

By the intelligence he continued to receive from his aide-de-camp, Carlos Sepulveda, who had received instructions to watch the advance of the invading army, he was led to conclude, that the Spanish general designed to force his way over the small branch of the Cordillera, which forms the western boundary of Venezuela. Under this impression, he pushed his army rapidly through the valleys of Vitoria and Maracay, and established himself at the formidable pass of the Tambo del Condor. From hence, the patriots had an uninterrupted view of the great lake, and of the open country on its eastern banks; along which were scattered the white tents of the royalists, in a chain of encampments, extending far to the right and left of Miranda's position. At a small hamlet, half way down the mountain, was Sepulveda's picket of carbiniers. Their tricoloured standard, waved aloft in sign of welcome, could plainly be distinguished; for it was burnished by the last rays of the declining sun, while the Spanish camp, still lower down, was already wrapped in gloom.

Miranda, attended by his staff, rode down to visit the advanced picket; and was informed by Sepulveda, that the royalists had as yet made no demonstration of their intentions, as to the point by which they designed to pass this mountain barrier. He had however been informed by an Indian, on whose fidelity he could rely, that numerous convoys of baggage and ammunition had passed, by night, towards the left of the Spanish line. This gave grounds for suspicion, that Monteverde's secret determination was to advance by the sea coast, for the purpose of attacking Puerto Cavallo. Nevertheless, the circuitous nature of this route, and the well-known difficulties attending any deviation from the ordinary track,—impediments which the timid and jealous policy of the Spaniards had forbidden to be removed,—appeared to Miranda conclusive arguments against the probability of this suggestion. He was still farther confirmed in his previous belief, by the unanimous declaration of the guides belonging to the army; who united in asserting, that the Tambo del Condor was the only practicable pass for troops.

The next morning, however, a messenger arrived at the patriot bivouac before daybreak, to apprise Miranda, that Sepulveda's patrols had discovered the enemy to have decamped silently during the night. The mountain mists as yet prevented the commander-in-chief from reconnoitring, or detaching any portion of the army in pursuit; neither was it yet by any means certain what direction the royalists had taken. But, when the fog had risen from the valley, it was ascertained, by the stragglers seen at a distance following the line of march, and by the united testimony of the peasants, who had assembled through curiosity on the site of the abandoned camp, that Monteverde had marched rapidly to the northward.

While Miranda was deliberating, in a council of war, whether it were most expedient to follow the route of the royalists, or to fall back on the valleys that had been left defenceless, Lorenzo Tovar presented himself at the general's tent with intelligence. He stated that the Cazique Pichiloncoy, who had brought him a present of fish from the lake, had declared to him, that he well knew the mountain road, by which Monteverde would probably enter the valleys of the Caracas.

The Indian was immediately sent for, and repeated his assertion before the council; stating that he had long been acquainted with the Quebrada del Culegui, and that it was also well known to the Guagiví tribe, as a short but rugged pass leading into the low country of Venezuela. He said that the above tribe, with which his people were at war, had certainly betrayed this road to the Spaniards; for he had seen one of their number, in company with Monteverde and his staff, ride by a bush in which he lay concealed, the day after the enemy crossed the river Catacumba; and had watched them until they took the direction leading to the pass. He also said that, considering the early hour of the night, at which the enemy had decamped, they must certainly have reached the quebrada by day-light, and probably their main body had already crossed the mountains. This intelligence decided the question at issue in the council; and Miranda gave orders for a rapid retreat towards the valley of Maracay.

Monteverde, meanwhile, who had purposely continued encamped near the lagoon, until he had drawn the attention of his less experienced adversary from his real plans of attack, reaped the fruit of his stratagem, in an unimpeded entrance into the low country. Here his army was reinforced by numerous partisans, whom discontent or superstition induced to rally round the Spanish standard; and his cause was daily strengthened, by the declamations of the friars in the neighbouring towns, who exhorted the people every where to flock to the cause of their lawful sovereign Fernando. The most conspicuous and enthusiastic among them, was the Capuchin Fray Pablo, who had been appointed one of the chaplains to the army, in consideration of his services and sufferings, and who affected the tone of a martyr to his principles. This turbulent monk eagerly seized every opportunity that offered, of invoking vengeance on the sacrilegious traitors, who had rebelled against their king, and had insulted the Catholic faith in the person of its minister. After a succession of forced marches, the patriots found themselves, at an early hour of the morning, in the presence of their opponents; who were marching in a parallel direction, and had entered the same valley by a different road. The generals on both sides issued orders for the immediate formation of the line of battle; being well aware, that it was impossible, from the relative positions in which they had been so suddenly placed, to avoid coming to a decisive action, even if they had been desirous of postponing it. Little previous exhortation was necessary to animate the troops. The royalists were inspired with the confidence natural to an advancing army, augmented by a sense of superiority in numbers and discipline over their opponents, whom they despised and hated; while enthusiasm, and confidence in their leader,—sentiments which gained additional strength from the excitement of the impending fight,—amply atoned for the deficiencies in numerical force, and inexperience in war, of which the patriots could not but be conscious.

A short time was spent in arranging the opposite armies, on each side of a small brook that wound through the centre of the valley, and in manœuvring for the possession of certain important positions:—operations which could not have failed to interest a mere spectator, by the beautiful display of military skill and precision, in the various complicated movements, executed chiefly to the sound of the bugle. The action was commenced by a brigade of field pieces, on a small eminence behind the left of the Spanish line. Very few shots took effect, by reason of the usual mistake made by the Spanish artillery, of opening their fire when at too great a distance. Nevertheless, it mainly contributed to render the raw patriot recruits unsteady; and compel Miranda to advance to the attack that part of his line which was cannonaded. Before it had reached the rivulet, the French volunteer artillery-men, who had been detained in the rear by the bad roads, came up. Having calculated their distance more scientifically, they returned the fire, with interest and with a far superior aim, on the Spanish line.

Monteverde, who had designed to act on the defensive as long as possible, was highly pleased to find that his opponents had left their position, for the purpose of commencing the engagement. He permitted the centre regiments, which Miranda had ordered to the front, to descend into the bed of the rivulet without opposition. But then, while their columns were unavoidably broken by the winding banks, which prevented them from readily forming, or acting in unison, he charged them with the reinforcement that had lately arrived from Cadiz.

These mustachioed veterans advanced, with their usual war-cry of "Santiago por España!" and drove those patriots who had gained the land, back again into the stream, which was nearly breast high in that part. Flushed with their advantage, they plunged in after the fugitives, and pursued them to the opposite side, encouraged by the Spanish officers, for they, unacquainted with the habits of the creoles, erroneously supposed, that troops which were so easily broken could not be rallied with equal facility.

They soon discovered the fatal error, into which their overweening confidence had led them. The Venezuelians, who fought barefoot, or at most with light sandals, and unincumbered by knapsacks, waded the rivulet with ease, and ran back to the position they had left, where they were rallied without the least difficulty. The Spaniards, on the contrary, heavily armed, and accoutred with all the paraphernalia of regular troops, were considerably impeded in their passage; and, when they had ascended the bank, could advance but slowly to the attack, with shoes and gaiters soaked with water. The patriots were encouraged, by their evident embarrassment, to charge them in turn. They could make but little impression on veterans, long accustomed, during the Peninsular war, to conflicts on a more extensive scale; but they succeeded in checking their progress, and in convincing them that victory was not so easily gained, as they had anticipated, over troops however inexperienced, who fought for liberty and their native land.

Meanwhile, the Cazadores de Aragoa and the Grenadiers del Barlovento, who were stationed on the right of the patriot line, had crossed the stream lower down, under cover of the French volunteers' fire, and had carried the height which had been crowned by the Spanish field-pieces, three of which fell into their hands. Miranda immediately ordered the carbiniers to cross the rivulet, and support the infantry; sending with them a body of Frenchmen, to work the guns which had been captured. The left flank of the royalists having been thus turned, Monteverde found it necessary to recall the Spaniards who had crossed the brook, and to make a final desperate effort to dislodge the patriots from the position they had just gained. But the veteran Europeans had scarcely approached within range of the artillery, when a galling fire was opened on them, which was perceived, as often as the smoke rolled away, to make considerable gaps in their columns. They advanced, nevertheless, with the coolest intrepidity, their track being marked distinctly by the killed and wounded left behind them; until they reached a level maize field, just beneath the mountain on which the guns stood.

Here they halted, and were in the act of deploying, preparatory to ascending the heights, when the patriot regiment of carbiniers, that had been just joined by a corps of lancers, galloped round from behind the hillocks by which they had been concealed, and charged the Spaniards before they had time to form square. The consequences were most disastrous, as will readily be conceived. A few royalists succeeded in gaining the bed of the rivulet, and the broken ground that they had incautiously left; but far the greater part fell victims to the fatal "war to the death," which their own countrymen had in an evil hour introduced, and which was long carried on with unrelenting fury by both parties. In vain did they form small platoons; and, setting back to back, fight manfully for their lives. Lance thrust and sabre cut were showered on them unsparingly, and without intermission, by the overwhelming force of the patriot cavalry; and, in a few minutes, the mournful cry of "Quarter, in the name of God," which had been raised in the agony of despair, by a few panic-struck individuals, who found themselves the last survivors of their band, was silenced for ever.

Monteverde was in most instances notoriously prodigal of human life, which he was ever ready to sacrifice, where there was the most remote chance of success; but here he saw clearly, that it would be useless to protract the struggle. He therefore rapidly retired to the heights overlooking the valley; not however before a considerable number of his men had been surrounded, and taken prisoners by the cavalry, who had for once been satiated with slaughter, and were prevailed on by Miranda to give quarter. The patriot general then reconnoitred the fresh position occupied by the royalists, and saw sufficient cause to apprehend, that any attempt to dislodge them, must inevitably cost him a number of his best troops, disproportionate to any advantage he could possibly reap by success. He therefore considered it expedient to bivouac on the field, without harassing his troops by any farther exertion; fatigued as they were by marching and fighting, with scarcely any rest or refreshment for several days. As it was still early, he sent off the prisoners, guarded by the carbiniers, who were the most trustworthy corps in the army, to Puerto Cavallo; with particular instructions to the governor, Simon Bolivar, to be vigilant in his precautions against surprise by sea and land.

CHAPTER XX.

THE CASTLE.—DESERTERS.—THE CHINGANERA.—THE CHICHERIA.

Sepulveda was once more detached from his duty as aide-de-camp, to command the escort appointed to conduct the prisoners. During the early days of the revolution, treachery and breach of faith were notoriously of such frequent occurrence among men of all ranks, that it was considered a measure of common precaution, by no means unusual or invidious, to supersede any officer in an important command, by another whose patriotism was more thoroughly approved; and to reinstate the former, without any explanation being required or offered. A verbal order was sometimes sufficient for this transfer; but it was more usually notified in general orders, that "Don Fulano de Tal, Edecan, &c., would take temporary command of such a corps during the performance of some specified duty; in place of Don Perenzejo de Tal, who would join the staff in the interim."

As Sepulveda was well aware of the unsettled state of the province, consequent on the incursion of the royalists, and the inflammatory harangues of the friars, he took especial care to march his escort with every precaution usually observed in passing through an enemy's country. About half a league to the southward of Puerto Cavallo, he was met by a patrol from the castle at the port, and warned that it would be dangerous for him to attempt entering the city. He learned, that the inhabitants had risen, the preceding day, against the troops composing the garrison, whom they had compelled to retire into the forts at the harbour; and that the Spanish flag had been hoisted in the city and suburbs. The subaltern, in command of the patrol, furnished Sepulveda with one of his men, to conduct him by a circuitous route to the port; and, as the escort proceeded, Don Carlos questioned the guide concerning the cause of the insurrection.

He was informed that, immediately on the arrival of the news of Monteverde's having succeeded in crossing the mountains, his partisans, who were numerous in the city, had openly declared themselves in his favour. This had rendered it necessary for Don Simon Bolivar, the governor, to make some serious examples of the most audacious among them; but his decisive measures had drawn on him the indignation of the friars, who had not scrupled to recommend in their sermons to the people, that the "impertinent stripling" should be cut off from among them. Bolivar had consequently been warned, by many of the most distinguished inhabitants, against risking himself in the streets without a guard; but to no effect. The day before Sepulveda's arrival, as Bolivar was passing through the Plaza, in company with his fort-adjutant, Rivas, he was publicly pointed out as an arch-rebel, and malignant heretic, by a friar who was haranguing the populace.

Irritated at this affront, Bolivar rode up to the insolent monk, and struck him several blows over the shoulders, with the flat of his sabre; ordering him at the same time, at his peril, to retire to his convent. The mob instantly took fire at the outcries of the fanatic, who pretended to be severely wounded. They assaulted the governor and his companion so vigorously, with stones and knives, that they killed the adjutant on the spot, and compelled Bolivar to consult his safety by flight. The populace, emboldened by their success, and probably apprehending chastisement from the garrison in the forts, armed and organised themselves, and sent a deputation to Monteverde, inviting him to occupy the city with the troops. They had as yet showed no signs of an intention to attack the castle; nor had they attempted to impede its intercourse with the surrounding country. But they had shut the city gates, and posted regular pickets at all the outlets of the suburbs; with the avowed intention of holding Puerto Cavallo for Monteverde, until he should send them succours.

As Sepulveda approached the port with his escort, he found every part of the fortifications in a state of preparation for defence; as if hourly expecting an attack. The drawbridges were up; a lighted match smoked by the side of every gun; and the bayonets of sentries glittered from every part of the ramparts, where the bandera tricolor waved defiance to the neighbouring city. When he reached the castle ditch, he rode forward in advance of his party along the causeway, which projected into a narrow inlet of the sea, flowing round that part of the forts, and waved the standard of the carbiniers. He was answered from the wall, above the sally-port; and in a few minutes the drawbridge was lowered, the heavy iron-studded gates were thrown open, and a strong guard of infantry marched out, and formed on the glacis. Sepulveda then beckoned to his lieutenant to advance; and the prisoners filed forward towards the castle, followed by the cavalry escort. The garrison guard brought up the rear; the drawbridge was again drawn up; and the gates closed with the usual ceremony.

An adjutant appeared to receive Sepulveda, and signified to him the governor's orders, that the prisoners should form on the parade for his inspection. The carbiniers having dismounted, as their attendance was no longer necessary, Don Carlos ranged the Spanish captives in double file along two sides of the square. There they stood, with down-east looks, travel-stained, and some among them slightly wounded, exposed to the curious gaze, and whispered remarks, of all the idlers belonging to the garrison. The officers, in particular, crowded round Sepulveda, to enquire the news; and he was proceeding to satisfy their curiosity, when the appearance of Bolivar silenced all conversation for the present.

He advanced with hurried steps into the centre of the parade; and enquired for the officer commanding the escort which had just arrived. Sepulveda presented himself with the usual salute, which was slightly answered; and Bolivar proceeded to ask him several questions, in rapid succession, relative to the late action; repeatedly interrupting his details, by exclamations of impatience at not having been present. He then turned to the prisoners, and walked slowly along their ranks, regarding each individual with a scrutinising glance; under which few, even of the sullen hard-featured Gallegos, could avoid quailing. He paused before a creole, who stood among them in the uniform of a Spanish grenadier; and having examined him attentively, said, "Well, comrade! have you forgotten me?"

The soldier whom he addressed, faltered an attempt to reply, and remained silent.

"Your memory appears to have failed you, amigo!" continued Bolivar: "let me remind you, that you served in my regiment on the last expedition to Coro, where we lost you; and you have never been able, it seems, to find your way back to your colours. Stand out from the ranks!"

He recognised, in like manner, eight or ten more deserters; and separated them from their companions, whom he ordered to be confined in the casas-matas. He then directed the adjutant to take a few files of men from the Guardia de Prevencion, and to shoot the deserters instantly on the north bastion. The unfortunate men, on hearing this sudden sentence, turned pale; but made no sort of attempt to obtain pardon. The adjutant lingered, as if unwilling to execute the order he had received; and ventured to enquire, whether a confessor should be summoned.

"Quatro balas a cada uno!" vociferated Bolivar with the terrific frown, peculiar to him; "Cuerpo de Dios! I will have no monks introduced into these castles. They have already done more mischief, both at Caraccas and Puerto Cavallo, than the shaven crowns of their whole meddling fraternity are worth. If the deserters have a fancy for confession, let it be to each other, on their way to the bastion; but at your peril be it, Señor Ayudante Corbalan, if I do not hear the musketry at work within ten minutes. Attention!"

As Corbalan retired with the deserters to the Guardia de Prevencion, on the opposite side of the parade, Bolivar followed him with a keen searching glance, and said in a low voice, scarcely audible even by those nearest him,—"Twice already has he presumed to interfere with his advice, since I have made him fort-adjutant. To plead for Godos and deserters! Let him look to his own head. Poor Rivas!—I should have given him this commission to execute, had it not been for that mutinous canaille in the city yesterday.—I had confidence in Rivas. No trouble about friars and confession with him; but I hardly know what to think of this Corbalan. Let him look to himself!"

He then turned to Sepulveda, and directed him to quarter his carbiniers in the cavalry barracks, at the port,

* Bolivar's frown, when he was agitated by one of those bursts of passion to which he was subject, used to wrinkle his high forehead into furrows, of that peculiar horse-shoe form, described as the brand of the Redgauntlet family.

"And where his frown of hatred darkly fell, Hope withering fled—and mercy sigh'd farewell!"

for the night; as there was no forage in the castle for the horses, and little water to spare, there being but one tank for the supply of the garrison. He at the same time expressed a wish to see him at supper in the fort, when he had seen his men comfortably established; that he might enquire, more at his leisure, into the circumstances of the late victory. Don Carlos expressed his thanks, and ordering his carbiners to mount, left the castle with them, by a different gate from that by which he had entered; and descended by a steep narrow path immediately into the port. The streets through which he passed were silent and deserted; and, as the sound of the horses' hoofs was heard clattering along the paved streets, the doors and windows of the principal houses were hastily closed. As the uniform and standard of the carbiners were recognised, groups of females, still trembling with apprehension, crowded round the soldiers, to enquire the fate of their friends, and to learn when the enemy might be expected.

Having marched his men into the barrack, and given his lieutenant the necessary instructions, Sepulveda strolled out to the harbour, which he found nearly empty, although usually much frequented by merchant vessels of all sizes. The few which still remained were lying with sails bent, evidently in readiness to go to sea on the first alarm; and several small droguers and lighters were lying close to the quay, hastily embarking merchandise of various descriptions, with which it was piled. Merchants and their clerks were hurrying from their respective store-houses, followed by strings of peons, bending under the weight of bales and cases, which they were hastening to ship. A Venezuelan man-of-war schooner was lying at some distance, with her fore-top-sail loose, and her signal for sailing flying at the main; and several gun-boats were mooring in a line in front of the mole, so as to command the mouth of the harbour.

Sepulveda walked slowly along the sands, yet moist with the ebbing tide, until he reached the rocky promontory on which the castle stands. Here he seated himself to rest after his fatiguing march, enjoying the cool evening breeze, and the novel sight of the dark blue ocean outside the harbour. His thoughts insensibly turned to the theme on which they were wont to dwell, during the few short intervals of tranquillity he was fated to enjoy. He was wearying his mind in fruitless conjectures, whither Don Beltran and his daughter had wandered; when he heard a light step by his side, turned, and saw the Chinganera, muffled in her dark woollen manta.

"Well met, Carlos Sepulveda!" exclaimed she, before he could address her; "I come to fulfill the promise I made when we last parted; and where could I find a fitter place than this? That small black schooner, close under the guns of the castle, is the very one that conveyed Maria del Rosario Peñuela from her native land."

"Then you have learned whither she is gone?" cried Don Carlos, with joyful surprise; "tell me instantly the place."

"I know it not, hermano! but you shall soon know; that is if you can prevail on the Dutchman who commands the vessel to tell you. His mildest replies to me, when I asked him the question, were 'bruja,' and 'perra montonera.' But follow me, and I will show you the bodegon he frequents."

She led the way, followed by Sepulveda, along the beach, until they reached the quay. She there turned up a narrow lane, lined by watermen's and peons' cottages, before whose doors their wives were busied cooking fish for their evening repast. At the upper end of this lane, where it was crossed by an alley leading to the main street, she pointed out a corner house, which was denoted to be a chicheria, by the usual legend, in large ill-formed letters over the door, of and by a grotesque sign, painted in ochre and indigo on the white-washed wall, said to represent a bull-fight. On a long bench outside the door, formed by a broken canoe with its bottom upwards, sat several sailors and peons, smoking, and drinking wine and chicha out of red lacquered calabashes; while the large room within resounded to the strains of a harp, accompanied by two or three vihuelas and Indian rattles, and by the shrill recitative of the hired singers.

The Chinganera having directed Sepulveda to enquire for Lodewyk Sluiker, he made his way, with difficulty, through the press, to the Señora of the inn, a comely zambita, whose massive gold ear-rings, and rosary with padres and credos of the same precious metal, showed her profession to be tolerably lucrative. She was so earnestly engaged in dispensing chicha de piña* and aguardiente, and in performing her duty as taster to each of her numerous guests, that she scarcely gave herself the trouble to attend to the question that was asked her. On seeing indistinctly Sepulveda's mustachios and capote, through the dense medium formed by the smoke of at least a hundred cigars and churumbelas, she exclaimed in a flippant tone, "there are none of your soldiers here, Señor Militar! you may believe me," adding in an under voice, meant only for those nearest her, "Poor fellows! their pay-day comes too seldom for them to see the inside of a chicheria often."

The revellers, standing round the musicians, turned to offer to the stranger, to whom the hostess had drawn their attention, a share of their several potations; but all made way for him in respectful silence, on seeing beneath his military cloak the light blue sash of an aide-de-camp to the commander-in-chief. A whisper soon spread through the crowded room, of "Edecan del Gefe Supremo!" and reached the alarmed landlady's ears. She hastened to apologise for having mistaken "Os Merced" (him) for a soldier; declaring that she had supposed him to be a serjeant from the castle, in search of men belonging to the garrison.

"But Os Merced has undoubtedly called to taste my chicha de piña, which, without boasting, is allowed to be the best in the port; and well it may—made of the finest red pine-apple from Aragoas. If Os Merced will please to walk into the aposento, he will find Alférez Chispán, Cadete Naypes, and Abanderado Tragón, with several other señores militares, who honour my chicheria with a visit every evening after siesta."

Sepulveda begged permission to defer, until another opportunity, his introduction to the worthies who were employing their leisure hours so agreeably; and enquired for the master of the Curazao droguer.

"Malhaya la suerte!" a messenger from the castle has just fetched him away to the governor, to receive his despatches for La Guayra. He will sail to-morrow with the forenoon tide and sea breeze; but if Os Merced will wait a while,—"

"It is of little consequence, patroncita! I shall probably meet him at the castle; if not, I will call in the morning."

He left the chicheria, cheered as he went by the revellers, with shouts of "Viva Miranda!" and communicated to the Chinganera the result of his enquiry. He then stated the necessity there was for his immediately waiting on Bolívar; and expressed a wish to meet her the following morning in the same place.

"One thing more," she replied, "I have to say, before we part, perhaps for ever. I warned you on the Alameda of Caraccas, that, when we next met, you would be in danger of shortly becoming a wanderer from Coquibacoa. Beware of sleeping in yonder castle. When did a fort long wear the same flag that a neighbouring city had torn down? It will be known, before long, that there are foes within, as well as without the ramparts. I counted the royalist prisoners who arrived this day; and they are more in number than the soldiers of the garrison. Beware, lest they win their way out of the casas-matas with silver keys!"

She turned, and hastened down the lane with her usual celerity; leaving Sepulveda in doubt, whether to pity what he believed to be the ravings of a disordered imagination, or to laugh at the oracular tone affected by all of her tribe, when they wish to excite interest and attention in their hearers.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE ADJUTANT.—BOLIVAR.—TREACHERY.—ESCAPE.

The evening gun was already fired, and answered by musquetry from the schooner in the harbour, as Sepulveda reached the castle. Nevertheless, the land-port gate was fortunately still open; and, as Don Carlos passed under the arched gateway leading under the ramparts, he enquired of the officer on guard, whether a foreign sailor had entered.

"He has been with Bolívar this last half hour," was the answer; "and the fort-adjutant has just brought an order to keep the bridge down until his return. It has happened luckily for you, camarada! for otherwise you would have found the gates closed for the night, and must have sought lodgings in the port;—not to mention the serious loss of a good supper at the governor's table."

As Don Carlos passed through the narrow covered-

* Chicha de pina, cider made of pine-apples, a common beverage in many parts of South America.

way, into which the casas-matas open, he met the adjutant, followed by several men whom, notwithstanding the gloom of the vaulted passage, he recognised as the deserters, whom Bolívar had detected among the prisoners, and had ordered for instant execution. Corbalán started back on seeing him; but immediately recovering himself, ushered the men into one of the cells, which he opened with a master-key. Having locked them in, he turned to Sepulveda with a forced smile, saying, "I am rejoiced to see that you are at last arrived, Señor Edecan. I feared you would have delayed so long at the port, that we should have been deprived of the pleasure of your company at Don Simon's."

Sepulveda made a suitable reply; and turned the conversation on the deserters whom he had just seen. He expressed his surprise at Bolívar's having consented to pardon them, contrary to his repeated declaration; and complimented the adjutant on his extraordinary success, in persuading a chief so remarkable for pertinacity in all his resolves. Corbalán appeared more and more embarrassed; and at length confessed, that he had spared the men's lives without the governor's knowledge.

"To own the truth," said he, "I contrived it with the assistance of the erjeant commanding the shooting party; whom I bribed to load his men's muskets with blank cartridges. I gave the prisoners a hint to fall flat, as if killed, on hearing the volley; and the picket was marched off without suspecting any thing extraordinary. But let me entreat you will say nothing whatever of my stratagem in the garrison; for, if it should come to Bolívar's knowledge, I might chance to suffer severely for my humanity."

Sepulveda promised to keep the secret, as he was requested; although he could not but entertain a very different opinion of an officer, in so confidential a situation as that of an adjutant, who could degrade himself so far, as to tamper with his subalterns in the discharge of his and their duty. He made no remark, however, but enquired how Corbalán proposed to conceal this neglect of the governor's sentence; observing that, in all probability, suspicion would be excited by the night patroles not finding the bodies, on going their usual rounds along the ramparts.

"Never fear!" rejoined the adjutant; "the north bastion is built on the rock overhanging the harbour; and I intend to say, (should any enquiry be made,) that I ordered the bodies to be thrown into the sea at high water; as used to be the custom formerly, when the Spaniards were in possession of the castle."

They reached the governor's house, just as Lodewyk Sluiker was leaving it. Sepulveda endeavoured to question him, but the schipper would not hear a word; claiming, as he broke away,—"Come to myn wyn-huis to-morgen, and we zal talk so long as you zal choose."

The adjutant left Sepulveda in the entrance hall, while he carried in the evening reports to the governor; and immediately returning, ushered Don Carlos in, whispering a repetition of his earnest request, that he would be careful not to allude to the deserters. He found Bolívar pacing up and down a drawing-room, commanding a view of the harbour, in animated conversation with several officers of the garrison; and occasionally referring to a map of Venezuela, drawn by himself from his own surveys, which was spread on a side table. On seeing Sepulveda, he welcomed him cordially, and taking his arm, continued his usual rapid walk; listening with interested attention to the details of the recent opening of the campaign.

On hearing him mention the Quebrada del Colequi, as the pass by which Monteverde entered the low country, and which Don Carlos assured him that the guides had declared not to exist, Bolívar turned to his map, and exultingly pointed to the spot; saying, between jest and earnest, "At some future period, when I succeed to the office of commander-in-chief, I will show the Godon, that there is not an inch of my native land, with which I am not as well acquainted, as with my own plantation of San Miguel. Little did the Captain-General of Caraccas think, when he employed me as engineer to survey the country, that even then, mere youth as I was, I dreamed of nothing but the independence of Venezuela. Hoping that a correct map might be one day useful, in the event of a struggle for our rights and liberty, (which was then indeed a most visionary expectation,) I took this copy, by stealth, and in spite of every precaution and sanguinary threat of the jealous despot who commanded us."

He folded it up, and deposited it carefully in the breast of his uniform; laughing as he continued: "It has ever since been my bosom friend; and was, in one instance, the means of saving me from a severe and probably dangerous wound. During a smart skirmish, one day, in the province of Coro, its thick folds ward off a musket ball, which would otherwise have penetrated pretty deep, and in an awkward direction."

Supper was announced by a gray-headed soldier, who acted as butler to the governor, and was well known throughout the patriot army, for the unwearied fidelity with which he attended him, although of a very advanced age, through those arduous campaigns, which proved too severe for many a more youthful follower. He had been a confidential servant in the family of Bolivar's father, on whose death he had attached himself to Don Simon; and was clad, at his own request, in uniform, which, as he conceived, gave him a right to fight in the patriot ranks, near his old master's son. He was, at the same time, rather pertinacious in offering his opinion on politics; and, although he firmly believed his young colonel to be the best and bravest man in Venezuela, and respected him accordingly, his affection too frequently led him to indulge in greater familiarity, than Bolivar would have endured from any other human being.

When Bolivar had taken his seat at the table, surrounded by the staff of the garrison, and other brother officers, his guests, few could have recognised, in the affable and highly polished host, the stern unbending disciplinarian of the field and parade. There he affected a roughness totally foreign to his domestic habits, and enforced peremptory obedience by a torrent of coarse expletives, adapted to the comprehension of the rude undisciplined insurgents, whom he most frequently had to deal with. In his own house, or elsewhere at times when duty did not interfere, his conversation was highly pleasing and instructive; and no one could be better acquainted with the art of making his guests pleased, at one and the same time, with themselves and him.

After supper, he encouraged a brisk circulation of the bottle; for although Bolivar was in general remarkably abstemious, he was far from being rigid in enforcing temperance at his own table. From thence cigars alone were banished, as (strange to say of a creole and a soldier) he had an unconquerable dislike to the smell of tobacco. The guests, with the exception of Corbalan, who sat silent, and evidently in deep meditation, soon caught the lively tone of hilarity which animated their host; and the sound of the retréta, commencing under the governor's balcony, and slowly going its usual rounds through the castle, reminded them for the first time that it was getting late. The fort-adjutant immediately started up, and retired to collect the reports of guard and roll-call; taking with him the heavy bunch of keys, with which it was his duty to inspect the different posterns and case-mates. The other officers were preparing to follow his example; but were detained by Bolivar, who insisted on their sitting still until the return of Corbalan.

"When Rivas had charge of the keys," said he, "I used to trust entirely to him, and retire to rest, as usual, with the retréta; but I must see more of this new adjutant, before I can repose so much confidence in him. Besides, we are not every day so fortunate as to receive an aide-de-camp from head-quarters, bringing good news, and some hundred prisoners. We must send back Don Carlos to-morrow, with a favourable report of the hospitality of our little garrison, to our friends in the army."

Thus encouraged, the company resumed their gaiety. Time was again passing unheeded in social merriment, when the old butler slowly opened the door; and having paused a moment, as if to ascertain who were present, advanced to the back of the governor's chair, where he stood until his master was at leisure to attend to him.

"Well, Tahita Felipe!" said Bolivar at length; "have my unusually late hours scandalised you? Or are you come to tell me, that I must have no more wine, as you took the liberty of assuring me not very long since?"

"No, hijo Simon!" said the old man; "but do you recollect how long the adjutant has been absent? And do you remember that he has the keys with him?"

"Very true, Tahita! he has certainly been rather dilatory; but he is now in office, and consequently awkward at first."

"Take care that he is not too clever for you, hijo!" said Felipe; and added in a significant under tone, "He is a Porteneco of Cartagena."

"And what though he be, are you so thorough-bred a mountaineer as to distrust all Portenecos, on the authority of the silly old song? I thought there had been more sense and less prejudice under those gray locks, amigo Felipe! But tell me, once for all, what is it you suspect?"

"It is my belief, hijo Simon,—as well as that of others in the garrison, who are afraid to speak out,—that 'ñor Corbalan is little better than a Godo in disguise, and by no means to be depended on in a castle so near the enemy as this is. Recollect how he interested himself to-day for the deserters;—as I heard more than one remark;—and for no other reason whatever, than because they were taken in arms for the king."

"You are so much accustomed to the manners of your late favourite, poor Rivas, (who I must own was far more likely to mistake in shooting too many than too few Godos,) that you fancy every one to be of their party, who is inclined to spare them. You forget that I myself used at one time to intercede with General del Toro for them; although few families in Venezuela have more ample cause to execrate them than mine. Go down stairs, and tell my ordenanza to search for the adjutant; and to desire him to make haste with the reports."

When Felipe retired, Bolivar remained thoughtful for a short time; as if his old servant's observations had made some impression on his mind. Sepulveda recollected the circumstance of the deserters, whom Corbalan had rescued in so clandestine a manner, from the fate they had merited. He was debating within himself, whether he ought to consider himself bound by a promise of secrecy so imprudently given, when a shot was heard in the corner of the parade, followed by a volley of musketry, and the well-known ominous shouts of "Long live the King!—Death to the insurgents!"

"A thousand devils!" exclaimed Bolivar, as he started to his feet, and buckled on his sabre; "Felipe was right, after all; and I am a confiding idiot!"

All rushed into the adjoining room; from whence they could see the parade beneath, crowded with troops in the Spanish uniform, mingled with a disorderly mob of rotozos bearing clubs, long knives, and torches, who were rushing towards the Government-house. The sergeant's guard, which was stationed at the door, fired among them as they advanced, and instantly retreated into the porch, shutting the gate after them. But a tumultuous attack was made on it with stones and bludgeons; the mob outside being only hindered from forcing their passage, by the impediments their own eagerness and numbers threw in their way. Bolivar comprehended at the first glance the state of the case.

"That traitor Corbalan," said he, "has released the Spanish prisoners, surprised the main-guard, and thrown open the gates to the rotozos from the city. Follow me close, camaradas!"

So saying, he hurried back into the supper-room; and threw open the folding doors leading to the viranda which overlooked the harbour. He then unbuckled his sash, and having fastened it to the railing of the balcony, set the example of descending, which was speedily followed by his guests and domestics, among whom was old Felipe. Bolivar led the way to the north bastion, which he and his party reached unobserved. Pausing there, he prepared for taking to the water, by unbuckling his sabre, and fastening it to his back.

"All will be well, comrades!" said he, "let all those who can swim follow me to that little schooner you can just discern, about a pistol-shot off. Luckily for us, it is high tide; and there will be depth enough of water, close under the rocks, for us to drop into without danger."

All the officers, and most of the soldiers, who heard him, prepared to take his advice: but old Felipe shook his head, and said, "I was born in the Cerrania, and never could swim, even when a boy; so that I should run but a poor chance, were I to trust myself out of my depth at my age. Shift for yourself, hijo Simon, and never heed me. The Godos will hardly ill-treat so old a man as I am; and if they should, I shall have lived too long if I must see the Spanish flag flying in the place of the tricolor!"

As he advanced to embrace his master, Bolivar suddenly seized the old man in his arms, and plunged him into the water from the rock on which he was standing. Then dashing in after him, he caught him before he could sink, and supported him with one arm, swimming actively with the other towards Lodewyk Sluiker's schooner. Lights now began to appear on board several vessels, which had been alarmed by the firing and clamour in the castle. The honest Curazao-man, who was getting up his keedge in order to haul out of range of the guns, no sooner heard the repeated plunges into the water, and could distinguish swimmers approaching his vessel, than he began to shout, "Boom af! whoever you call be."

Bolivar, who was by this time assisted by Sepulveda in supporting his old servant, found leisure to answer, "we are friends!"

"Vrienden zey je? Slapperloot! call you it vriendelyk to plunge blindlings off 't rocks, like so many zee-honds; and to bring fright over an honest schipper and his maats?"

Then snatching a lantern from one of his men, he held it over the gunnel, and seeing Bolivar, exclaimed,—"Duizend duizelen! he is 't kleintje kolonel—so will ik live!—and myn old vriend't bottelier; whom they zal drown among them, if he have not good luck."

As the droguer's boat lay alongside, and her waist bulwarks were unshipped, the whole party found little difficulty in climbing on board; where they stood dripping with wet, and staring on each other, as uncertain what to do next. Bolivar immediately took his resolution, on seeing torches appear on the bastion they had just left. He ordered the schipper to cut his cable instantly, and to haul alongside of the man-of-war, before they were perceived by the enemy on the ramparts; assuring him that his droguer would otherwise be sunk by the guns of the fort. But Lodewyk, whom it was not so easy to put out of his way, had a very strong objection both to cutting and slipping; and observed, that it would be a difficult matter to get another kellie, now that no hopes remained of being able to land at the port.

Unluckily for Sluiker, the royalist party, which had obtained possession of the castle, was so keen in their search after Bolivar, and his officers, whom they designed to have massacred, that they found the few soldiers who had been left behind on the north bastion. These they compelled, under the most dreadful denunciations of torture, to declare which way the governor had escaped. They consequently kept a sharp look out, from different parts of the ramparts; and no sooner had the schipper raised his usual cry of "heave, met a will, ahoy!" than a shot came from one of the long piedreras on the bastion, which struck the droguer's larboard bow, and travelled right through, passing out below her water-line on the other side.

Bolivar instantly drew his sabre, and cut the hawser without any more delay. A few more shots followed the first; but merely cut away some of the standing rigging. The sailors, reinforced by the landmen, who compensated in strength for their deficiencies in nautical skill, made such strenuous exertions, that they reached the man-of-war schooner, and scrambled aboard, just as the little droguer began to settle in the water and go down. The sentry on board the Tiburon hailed, as soon as he heard the droguer's sweeps; and was answered by Bolivar with the night parole, which he had always been careful to communicate to the men-of-war lying in the harbour, in anticipation of some such emergency as the present. He was therefore immediately recognised; and preparations were made to receive him. The captain, a creole of Barcelona, who had been promoted from a small coasting vessel to his present command, got under weigh by the governor's directions. Having swept out of the harbour, he hoisted, until day-light should enable him to reconnoitre the port and castle.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE SCHOONER.—REVOLUTION.—SURRENDER.

As soon as the morning breeze blew fresh enough to ensure a vessel against missing stays, the Tiburon schooner stood in to the harbour's mouth, under Venezuelan colours. The moment she was seen from the castle to be rounding the point, the Spanish flag was hoisted on the north bastion, and the royalist war-cry was distinctly heard from the throng that lined the ramparts. The gun-boats had evidently been surprised the preceding night, and had changed masters, for the red and yellow colours of Spain were flying at the mastsheads.

Bolivar saw enough to convince him of the impossibility of attempting any thing for the relief of the castle; he therefore gave the captain of the schooner directions to wear and stand out to sea again. While he was executing this manœuvre, and just as the Tiburon turned her stern towards the inner harbour, a flash was seen to issue from the nearest gun-boat, followed by a dense volume of white smoke, which rolled forward over the surface of the water, like mist before the breeze. Before the report of the heavy gun was heard, a shot spun past the schooner, bounding along the waves, so close as to throw the spray on her deck.

"By 't jumping Jonas! dat was wel gemeend!" exclaimed Sluiker, forgetting his personal danger in the excitement of the moment; "Kyk out, kinders! you zal zie another closer aboard us directly."

The words had scarcely been uttered, when the other gun-boats followed the example of their commodore, and with far more fatal aim. Of the five shots, two went through the sails and rigging; and the third carried away the jaws of the main gaff, which immediately swung loose by the halyards, disabling the mainsail for the time. The last struck the unfortunate creole captain, who was at that moment hanging over the lee quarter, overhauling the boom sheet, and dashed him overboard. He clung for a moment, with a convulsive grasp, to the rope he was holding; and then, his gripe at once relaxing, he fell into the water, and was seen no more.

The Tiburon made such rapid way through the water, that although it was not long before the gun-boats repeated their fire, all their shots dropped in her wake, without touching her. When she was once more outside the harbour, the ex-governor enquired of the seamen, who was the officer next in command to their late captain. He was informed, that the lieutenant and contramaestre, who were the only subalterns belonging to her, had received permission to go ashore the preceding evening, and had not returned on board previous to the surprise of the castle and the port. Bolivar therefore took upon himself the responsibility of appointing Lodewyk Sluiker as comandante interino, until the pleasure of the Junta Suprema should be ascertained on the subject. Lodewyk received his appointment, with many thanks for the honour done him; observing, at the same time, that "it was an ill wind that blew no man good: one shot had sunk his droguer, and another had made way for his promotion."

Like most seamen, Sluiker was a tolerably good carpenter. He therefore set himself to work with some tools, which he found on board the schooner, as soon as she was hove to; and in a few hours had the gaff mended, and ready for hoisting once more. Bolivar then directed him to take the schooner to La Guayra, as speedily as possible; expressing a hope that he might be able to arrive at Caraccas, before the news of the insurrection at Puerto Cavallo should have animated to revolt the fickle populace of the capital. He was assured, however, by the new captain of the Tiburon, that no vessel, however well she might sail, could possibly beat up to that port, against both trade-wind and current, in less than a week.

Monteverde, meanwhile, had received intelligence from the traitorous adjutant Corbalan, that the castle of Puerto Cavallo was once more under the Spanish flag. He immediately marched his army thither by a circuitous route, by which he completely eluded the vigilance of the patriot general. The acquisition of this sea-port was of the greatest importance to the royalist army; for reinforcements, military stores, and provisions, were now received direct from Cartagena by water, instead of being delayed for many weeks on a tedious and hazardous mountain road, through a tract of country in which they were always in danger of being waylaid and intercepted. The Spanish head quarters, being thus established in the centre of Venezuela, overawed the timid inhabitants, who had been for centuries accustomed to look up to their European rulers with the deepest submission and dread, and to reverence them as the legitimate representatives of regal authority. Monteverde's emissaries busied themselves in distributing proclamations, in which he called on the creoles to return to their allegiance. He promised a general amnesty to all those who should give in their adherence, before the entrance of the royalist troops into the capital; and denounced the extremes of military chastisement to all such as should dare to temporise, by delaying their submission until circumstances should have rendered the event of the struggle no longer doubtful. To this appalling threat was added the powerful influence of the friars, who openly denounced and excommunicated the patriots, as rebels, and as renegades from their holy faith; refusing confession and absolution to all such as would not renounce their heretical and damnable principles.

The populace of Caraccas now rose en masse, and terrified the Junta Suprema, which was left but weakly guarded on the march of the army, into sending a deputation to Monteverde, to sue for pardon, and to place the republic at his disposal. Miranda received the news of this fatal measure, while he was falling back for the protection of the capital, which now renounced him, and refused to receive him within its walls. He soon perceived, from the effect which it produced on the army, that the cause of freedom was, (for the present at least,) lost to Venezuela. The greater part of his soldiers mutined, and deserted to the royalists by entire battalions; and many of his officers, on whom he had been in the habit of reposing the most unlimited confidence, fled to their estates, where they hoped, by submission and temporary retirement, to escape the impending storm. Many of Miranda's friends earnestly pressed him to follow their example; but he persisted in standing, to the very last, the hazard of the die his own hand had thrown. As a stranger by birth to Venezuela, he was unwilling to burthen any native of that country with the dangerous responsibility of concealing him; and he imprudently resolved to confide in the honour of the conqueror, by whom he confidently expected to be liberated on his parole.

He at length determined, for the sake of the faithful few who still continued to share his shattered fortunes, to propose a capitulation, while it was yet in his power, and, if possible, before his adversary should become acquainted with the strait to which he was reduced. Monteverde received the officer, who was sent to treat with him, in the most courteous manner. He lamented the unhappy differences in opinion, which had so long separated the inhabitants of Venezuela from their countrymen in Coro and Cartagena; and expressed his sincere hope, that a new and better organised government would speedily be established in the colonies. At the same time, he studiously avoided all discussion of the terms he designed to grant; giving evasive replies when pressed on that head. He finally postponed his answer, until he should have entered Caraccas, whither he proceeded immediately at the head of his army, leaving a strong garrison for the security of Puerto Cavallo.

The greatest anxiety prevailed, meanwhile, on the part of the patriot army encamped near the village of Cucuiza, respecting the intentions of the Spanish general. Desertion continued to thin the troops; and still no definitive reply was received from Monteverde. Miranda found his army reduced to the mere skeleton of that with which he had opened the campaign. He therefore came to the resolution of disbanding it, and surrendering himself to the royalist commander-in-chief; in hopes of thereby averting from Venezuela, at whatever price, the horrors of a hopeless and protracted struggle.

He ordered the small remnant of his army to be formed, for the last time, in a hollow square; and addressed his troops in a short farewell harangue, in which he highly extolled their unshaken devotion to the cause of their country. He thanked them, in plain but feeling terms, for the fidelity and personal affection which they had evinced for him to the last; deeply regretting that any further efforts on their parts would now be unavailing. He desired them, as the last mark of their obedience which would probably be exacted by him as their general, to pile arms, and disperse peaceably to their homes; advising them to take the earliest opportunity of exchanging the proscribed uniform they then wore, for the less ostentatious dress of private citizens.

The soldiers were deeply affected at parting with their respected chief, and those officers, whom a common cause, and a participation of hardships and dangers, had endeared to them. Some complied with Miranda's order, and sullenly laid down their muskets. But the greater part, who felt the fondness of soldiers for the warlike weapons which they had borne through many a weary march and hard fought field, indignantly broke the stocks against the trees of the wood adjoining their bivouac; declaring that no God should have it to say, that they had surrendered their arms. Officers and men united in insisting, that the national colours, at least, should not be given up. As Miranda appeared at a loss how to dispose of them, the troops soon decided the question, by tearing them into shreds, which they distributed among themselves as relics; vowing to wear them concealed next to their rosaries, until they might display them, at some future day of meeting, under more favourable circumstances.

All the officers signified their desire of accompanying Miranda to Caraccas; but he requested them, as well for his own sake as for theirs, not to insist on showing him this hazardous mark of respect. He assured them, that it could only tend to exasperate the royalists, and would, in all probability, awaken Monteverde's jealousy; thereby disposing him to impose still harder terms than might otherwise perhaps be obtained. They reluctantly acquiesced in the prudence of his resolution; and, having selected a few of his oldest staff-officers to attend him, he bade the rest affectionately farewell, and took the road to Caraccas.

As he reached the summit of the hill, which overlooked the valley of Cucuiza, he looked back on the spot where the rude huts of his late encampment stood; and a tear of bitter mortification stole down his cheek, on seeing the small parties of his faithful warriors, which were separating in different directions towards their native villages. He sighed deeply to think how those veterans, who had acquired in the camp the habit of depending entirely on their officers for their daily rations, and were totally unaccustomed to provide for themselves, would be compelled to trust to the casual hospitality of the peasantry, who were by no means well inclined towards them, for their subsistence on the road.

A few leagues from Cucuiza, he met with a Spanish picket of cavalry, which had been stationed there, rather for the purpose of watching the movements of the patriots, than from any apprehension of danger to be dreaded from their diminished force. The commanding officer, who had lately arrived from Spain with the last reinforcements, turned out his guard as soon as he heard the name of Miranda; and received him with the military honours due to his rank. In answer to the patriot general's enquiry, whether he could be permitted to proceed to Caraccas, for the purpose of soliciting an interview with Monteverde, the Spaniard replied, that he had received no instructions on that head. He said, however, that he would immediately dispatch a dragoon to head-quarters, with intelligence of his approach, and that meanwhile the general was perfectly at liberty to continue his journey.

He experienced a far different reception, from his own countrymen, on reaching the capital. The officer on guard at the gate, a creole who had deserted from the patriot army, affected to consider Miranda as his prisoner, and ordered him into a close and crowded guard-room, where he and his staff remained exposed to the gaze of the soldiers, until the return of a messenger sent to enquire how he was to be treated. One of the Monteverde's aides-de-camp arrived soon after, with an invitation for him and his officers to visit the Spanish commander in chief at the palace, which had been so far repaired, since the earthquake, as to be rendered habitable. He also apologised slightly for Miranda's detention, saying that his general had been so much occupied by important arrangements, since his arrival at the capital, that he had not found leisure to give the necessary orders for his reception.

On entering the Plaza, Miranda found a crowd assembled to witness an execution that had just taken place; and saw the bodies of five unfortunate victims to the disturbed state of the country, hanging on a gallows which was erected opposite to the windows of the palace. He could distinctly see, that they wore the green uniform of patriot officers; and the aide-de-camp observed, pointing to them, "Insurgents, who have been detected endeavouring to conceal themselves."

The attention of the populace was drawn to the palace gate, by the trumpet of the guard which saluted Miranda; for he still wore the insignia of his rank. The mob immediately recognised their old general; but "no one bid God bless him." On the contrary, the fickle Caracuenos, who had not long since greeted him, on that very spot, with enthusiastic acclaim, now pursued him with hooting and execration; shouting loudly, that they might be heard within the palace, "To the gallows with the rebel!"

When Monteverde was apprised that his once formidable opponent had arrived, and requested an interview, he at once refused to see him, until he should have taken the opinion of his council as to his reception. At the same time, he directed apartments to be provided for him in the palace; but ordered the officers, who had accompanied him, to be conducted under close arrest to the Guardia de Prevencion. On the following day, Miranda was called before the council of war, and required to answer, why he should not be tried as a rebel to his sovereign: Without attempting to argue the question of treason, which he readily perceived would be fruitless before his present judges, he pleaded the proclamation promulgated by Monteverde when at Puerto Cavallo; as the faith of which, he declared, he had now come forward to avail himself of the amnesty promised therein. The council, however, decided that, by his tardiness in deferring his submission until the Spanish army had entered Caraccas, he had forfeited all claim to the king's indulgence.

He then appealed to Monteverde himself, as a witness that he had sent a deputy to treat for terms of surrender, a considerable time previous to his obtaining possession of the capital. Against this it was urged, as an excuse for violating the faith which his judges had never designed to hold sacred, that by having disbanded his army, instead of keeping it together for the purpose of surrendering it, he had infringed the treaty into which he had entered; and that, by a fresh overt act of rebellion, persisting to exercise authority, as if in lawful command of an armed force, he had again rendered himself amenable to martial law.

Monteverde, however, either felt compunction for the harshness with which his counsellors appeared disposed to treat a fallen enemy, or, as is not improbable, was unwilling to subject themselves to the odium he would doubtless incur, by exercising unnecessary severity towards a man so much beloved by the respectable part of the community. He took a middle course, by refusing to sanction his trial before a military court in the colonies; urging the difficulty that would inevitably be found, in obtaining a cool and impartial decision, while men's minds were still under the influence of the violent spirit of party, which had so recently distracted the land. But he intimated his intention of sending him to Spain, together with some of the principal actors in the late scenes of the revolution, to be placed at his Catholic majesty's disposal. He concluded, by ordering him to be confined in a separate cell of the casas-matas at La Guayra, until an opportunity should offer of a vessel bound to Europe. This was expected speedily to be the case; as important despatches, relative to the fortunate conclusion of the war, were in readiness to be sent to Cadix.

Miranda bowed to the decision of the Spanish general, although he was well aware that death, or perpetual imprisonment, would be his fate in Spain; and solicited permission for his staff to occupy the same cell as himself. The request was peremptorily refused; and it was even hinted, that those officers would probably be tried at Caracas, as the result of a court martial on them would be of comparatively trifling importance.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE PATRIOT MAN-OF-WAR—BOLIVAR DISGUISED—CARACAS.

The Tiburón, meanwhile, beat up along the coast, towards the seaport nearest to the capital; but, although Sluiker carried all the canvass he could crowd on her, it was evident that her progress by the land was very tedious. Nothing could equal Bolivar's impatience, when, as the vessel stood in towards the shore, early in the morning succeeding each calm night, he could recognise the very points of land which he had left on the preceding evening. He paced the deck almost uninterceptedly, alternately looking out through the spy-glass for the high blue land about Caracas, and angrily remarking to Lodewyk, that the schooner formerly bore the reputation of being a good sailer, but that, since she had been under his charge, she scarcely appeared to make any way through the water.

The skipper usually sat smoking his cigar on the taffrail, with imperturbable gravity; and seldom thought it necessary to make any reply to these ebullitions of impatience.

At length, on the eighth morning after leaving Puerto Cavallo, they made the harbour of La Guayra; and to their great mortification, (although they were in some degree prepared to expect it,) they saw the Spanish colours flying on the castles. As it was, of course, impossible to have any communication with the shore, Bolivar enquired of the captain if he was acquainted with any obscure port in the neighbourhood, into which they might run unobserved, and endeavour to obtain intelligence of the fate of the army, and the situation of affairs in the interior. Lodewyk mentioned Los Bagres, as a creek with which he was best acquainted, in which a vessel was little liable to attract the attention of the inhabitants; for they were in habits of frequent intercourse with free traders of all nations. He accordingly received directions to proceed thither immediately.

During the passage, Bolivar disclosed to Don Carlos his intention of penetrating into the interior of Venezuela in disguise, that he might thereby be enabled to form a more correct opinion of the actual state of the country, for the purpose of deciding what was most expedient to be done, than if he trusted to intelligence obtained by any other means. At Sepulveda's earnest request, he was permitted to accompany Bolivar, who also gave Sluiker directions to stand out to sea, after obtaining water and provisions, and to cruise in the offing for twenty-four hours, at the expiration of which time he was to return and send a boat for them. But, if they did not appear by the second morning, he was to conclude they were taken by the enemy, and was to bear up for the island of Margarita. The old servant Felipe was directed to deliver over to the patriot governor, at Pampatar, a case containing money and important papers belonging to the state; which Bolivar had caused to be embarked on board the schooner, the day previous to the loss of the castle at Puerto Cavallo, with the intention of sending it for safety to Caracas.

The Tiburón having anchored in the creek of Los Bagres late in the evening, Bolivar and his young companion proceeded to disguise themselves as muleteers, by exchanging different articles of clothing with the seamen. When it was quite dark, Lodewyk set them ashore at a short distance above the village, and they succeeded in gaining the open country unobserved. There was little danger of detection when once they were landed; so completely was their appearance altered, by the coarse dark ruanas which they wore, over blue woollen drawers of the mountaineer cut. As for their complexion, a soldier's face rarely stands in need of any artificial stain to embrown it; and, although they could not boast of the long platted locks of hair, which form the muleteers' chief pride, their broad palm-leaf sombreros were slouched over their foreheads, so as to conceal the deficiency.

They had taken the precaution to furnish themselves with halters, before leaving the schooner; and soon caught themselves horses, which they mounted without saddles. They then galloped rapidly across the savanna of Cafaveral, and reached the ravine of the Tucqueri just before day break. Having concealed the horses among the culegui canes, which afforded both shelter and pasture, they walked into Caracas early in the morning; but, judging it prudent to wait until the streets began to fill, lest suspicion might be excited by their being seen wandering about at that hour, they entered a posada in the outskirts of the city. Here they mingled in a crowd of muleteers and peons, who were seated on the sheepskins that had served them for beds, under the corridor of the house; smoking their churumbelas, and watching with evident satisfaction the progress made by their beasts, in eating the maize and chopped straw, which was spread before them on undressed cow-hides.

Bolivar demanded breakfast for himself and his companion; and was ushered by the landlord of the posada into a large room full of arrieros, who were seated on benches round a long table, discussing huge slices of boiled tajazo with plantains, which they occasionally washed down with copious draughts of chica. A black female cook, rather scantily dressed, set before the travellers their allowance of the substantial fare, which appeared to be so much in request; presenting the pieces of dried beef, smoking from the embers on which they had been broiled, on a large wooden spit, which she stuck in the earthen floor behind them; and rolling from her apron on the table about a dozen large plantains, roasted and slightly bruised. Their host, who ruled without a rival in the department of the cellarage, placed a large calabash of fermented cane juice on the ground behind them, and filled two capacious horns, first drinking to the health of his guests. He then seated himself near them, and proceeded to question them, (by virtue of his undisputed privilege as landlord,) as to whence they came, and whether they were bound. As had been previously concerted between them, Bolivar said, that they had just come up from the plantation of San Miguel, near Vitoria, with a drove of mules laden with cacao; and that they purposed returning the next day.

"I know that plantation well," said the landlord; "It used to belong to the Bolivars of Aragoa, but I suppose it has fallen into the hands of government; if it be true, as report says, that Colonel Simon was killed at Puerto Cavallo, when his rascally troops rose and delivered up the castle."

"True, or false," said an old arriero, who sat opposite, "the estate will go to Monteverde; never fear! More is the pity, I say, to hear every day of the oldest families in Venezuela dying off, and making room for a swarm of hungry strangers, who come over from Spain boobies, and return petit-maitres."

"Softly, tahita Capacho!" said the landlord; "speak reverently of the powers that be. I will have no politics talked in my posada. Were the alcade to hear of it, he would soon send me an order to shut up the house."

"Why we are all arrieros here, are we not?" asked Capacho, who had been partaking rather too freely of the potent chicha de caña: "Besides, there is no treason in saying that I like my own countrymen better than foreigners. But as you say, there is little use in speaking one's mind in these times, and perhaps too much danger. As I passed through the Plaza, late last night, I saw peons at work erecting the cadahazo, just in the place where it used to stand; and, by all accounts, this Monteverde is the very man to find the verdugo employment."

Bolivar took advantage of the old man's talkative humour, to enquire what news was stirring in the capital.

"Bad enough, compañero! Besides those cortapesueños who used to be here in garrison, and would neither let man nor woman walk the streets in peace, there has arrived a fresh importation of Spanish jail-birds, who swagger about the city as if the land were their own, and every one they meet their born slave. They have begun plundering the paysanos from the country, too, already; but they had better take care, or many of them will soon be taught the length of the Ceranos' knives. No longer ago than last night, as I was coming home from the cancha de bolas, one of the new-comers, with a sabre dangling from him as long as my bride-reins, was looking about for mischief. Seeing my compadre Goyo riding beside me, with a bota of aguardiente hanging at his saddle, he took it from him, threatening to cut him down if he said a word. Goyo looked about, and saw that there was not a Christian in the street, beside ourselves and the Spaniard. He quietly unbuckled his off-stirrup, which was a true Cerano's, of heavy brass, and swinging it like a lazo over his head, struck the Gdo, who was too busy drinking to mind what he was about, one blow on the head, and no more. He went down like a bullock: Goyo picked up his bota; and we rode off, without waiting to see whether he recovered or not."

"But Miranda and his army,"—said Bolivar; "where are they now?"

"Hua! the army has melted away like the snows on the Cordillera in summer; and no one knows where Miranda is. Some say he intends to surrender: but if he does, he will surely either be shot, or sent over to Spain. But here I sit talking while I ought to be looking to my mules. Casero! let us have the stirrup cup; I am for the valleys this morning."

The arrieros now began to load their mules, and to separate in different directions. Bolivar and Sepulveda, having satisfied their host, walked out towards the Plaza; where they saw, by the guard which surrounded a newly erected scaffold, that an execution was about to take place. They endeavoured to retire, but were ordered back by a cordon of Spanish sentries, stationed across the corners of the square, whose orders were to keep all those who were already in the Plaza from leaving it. This they effected by freely applying the butts of their muskets, and the points of their bayonets, to all such as had the misfortune to be driven too close to them by the throng.

The hum of the multitude was suddenly hushed, by the shrill notes of a warning trumpet, blown at the gates of the Guardia de Provencion; and a solitary muffled drum was heard beating the dead march, as the procession slowly approached. The crowd made way before the escort, which advanced in close column with fixed bayonets; and Bolivar saw five of his former companions in arms, between the ranks, heavily ironed and attended by friars, moving with pallid cheeks, but firm footsteps, towards an ignominious death;—if that which the guiltless and brave die can ever be so termed.

When they had ascended the scaffold, and before they were delivered over to the executioner, silence was proclaimed. The Juez Fiscal read with a loud voice the sentence of the court-martial, and a proclamation issued by Monteverde, offering a reward for the heads of several chiefs in the late insurgent army, who were therein specified. Bolivar's blood boiled within him, on hearing his own name, among many others of the best and bravest in the land, denounced as that of a traitor and outlaw. He was more than once on the point of answering with his scornful defiance; but reflection convinced him, that by doing so he would only give one triumph more to his enemies.

* This anecdote is related, word for word, as it was communicated to the author by an old Hunzo of Chile, who exulted in having himself performed the feat.

Secretly resolving to exact ample and severe atonement for the insult, on some future opportunity, he smothered his resentment, and awaited in silence the completion of the barbarous sentence. When the executioner advanced to perform his task, Bolivar involuntarily turned away his eyes; and, in a few moments, a suppressed murmur, which ran through the populace, announced that all was over. The escort retired, and the sentries were withdrawn, leaving the passage once more free. The two seeming arrieros were hurrying from the scene of death, so different from that in which a soldier ought to meet his fate, when they unexpectedly met Miranda and his companions, entering the Plaza with one of Monteverde's aides-de-camp.

Bolivar watched anxiously for one glance of recognition, as his general passed; but he appeared too deeply absorbed in the contemplation of his country's blighted hopes, to observe those around him. When he disappeared under the arched gateway of the palace, Bolivar said in a low voice to Sepulveda, "Then all is lost indeed! and we may now retire from this land of tyrants and slaves, until some favourable opportunity shall enable us once more to raise our battle cry, of Liberty or death! For my own part, I leave neither relation nor friend behind to lament my absence; but you have a mother, camarada! Let us endeavour to take her with us to Margarita."

They found that the small house behind the Alameda, which Doña Gertrudes occupied, had risen afresh from its ruins; few days sufficing, under the cloudless skies and scorching sun of a tropical climate, to convert the rubbish of fallen walls into sun-baked bricks. The son's eyes soon caught sight of his mother, seated under the shade of a tamarind tree, and fortunately unaccompanied, except by a faithful old black slave, who sat at her feet, spinning with the old-fashioned huso de hilar. Don Carlos requested his companion to wait for him a few moments at the gate; and entering the garden, beckoned to old Mama Panchita, who had been the nurse of his infancy. She rose and came towards him, at first slowly as if in doubt; but when she clearly distinguished his features, she quickened her pace and caught him in her aged arms. Doña Gertrudes saw the action, and knew there was but one human being, who could have so transported her old servant beyond the bounds of her decorous demeanour. "My son!" she cried: and Carlos, springing forward, folded his mother in his embrace.

For a while, the hearts of both were too full for conversation; at length Doña Gertrudes exclaimed, "What could tempt you to venture here, my dearest Carlos? Fervently as I have prayed to behold you once more, heaven knows I would not have wished to buy even that blessing at so great an hazard to yourself. Surely you cannot mean to remain at Caracacas in that disguise?"

"No longer, my dear mother, than until this evening," answered Sepulveda; "when you must accompany me to the coast. But here comes one, who has a much better head to contrive the means of our escape, than I can boast of."

Bolivar, who was tired of waiting, and guessed that the recognition must have been already effected, now came forward.

"Friend Charles," said he, "I shall never choose you for a masquerading companion at Carnestolendas, if you desert your friends after this fashion. Excuse me, Doña Gertrudes, but your son totally forgot that he had left me standing at your garden gate. If I had remained there until he recollected me, some officious neighbours might have taken me before the alcade, on suspicion of a design on your fruit trees. But come we must retire to our posada, and prepare for our departure. It would inevitably create suspicion, were two arrieros to be seen visiting at ladies' houses; and I know the vigilance of the Spanish police too well to wish for any farther acquaintance with it. Your mother goes with us this evening of course?"

"Pardon me, Don Simon! I fear I am too old for such a journey. I should only embarrass you both, and very possibly endanger your detection. Besides, how can I leave my brother Gabriano? He has been proscribed by Monteverde, in consequence of having been appointed chaplain to the Junta; and is concealed in the hut of one of his friend Miranda's slaves, near the Quinta of Girasol. Mama Panchita carries him provisions every night; and should we desert him?"

"My dear Doña Gertrudes!" interrupted Bolivar, "I am too staunch a patriot to leave the widow of a worthy friend whom my father esteemed, and the mother of a comrade, in the power of the Godos. As for Don Gabriano, it shall be our business to find him out, and persuade him to accompany us. Who knows how soon I may require his services as an army chaplain? for I assuredly mean to return before long, and to expel these invaders from Venezuela. Sepulveda and I can easily procure mules for the whole party, and attend you on the road with less danger of suspicion, under our assumed character. So keep up your spirits until the evening, and be not surprised, should you see three arrieros at your garden gate instead of two."

Carlos once more embraced his mother; and having receiving from her the necessary direction for finding his uncle, he and his companion took the road to Girasol. They found, with some difficulty, the hut that was the object of their search, half way up the ravine that overlooked the Quinta. It was so completely concealed from view, by the spreading leaves of the plantains under which it was built, that its gray thatched roof alone was visible, and might have easily been mistaken, at a short distance, for one of the mis-shapen granite rocks that lined the edges of the mountain stream. The mistress of the hut, a middle aged zamba, was making casaca cakes before the door, surrounded by children of all ages. She glanced a jealous eye at the two strangers; and, on their enquiring for the Señor Capellan Gabriano, doggedly denied all knowledge of such a person; assuming, at the same time, that stolid expression of countenance, so peculiar to her countrywomen, when they either cannot or do not choose to answer a question.

No sooner, however, had they made themselves known, than her features brightened, and she expressed the greatest satisfaction at seeing any friends of the "pobre Señor Clerico," who, she feared, must be tired to death of his solitary way of life. One of her little daughters, by her orders, immediately led the way up the ravine, to show them his place of concealment. The child bounded lightly from rock to rock, before the two young men, who could hardly keep pace with her; and pointing to a spreading caoba, whose branches reached the ground on every side, exclaimed, "Allí está mi amo Don Gabriano!"

The chaplain was seated on a moss-grown stone, in the shade, puffing his cigarillo, and whiling away the time with the perusal of Ercilla's Araucana. His friends could hardly have recognised him through his disguise, which was similar to that worn by both of them, had it not been for his clerical tonsure, and venerable white locks; his sombrero being thrown aside on account of the heat. He started up, on seeing two strangers, but was reassured by hearing his nephew's voice; and shook hands with them both, laughing heartily at their uncouth appearance, and evidently unconscious at the moment that he himself looked even more grotesque. Bolivar lost no time in communicating his plan for their escape to Margarita; and mentioned having seen Miranda already in the power of his enemies, as an additional motive for counselling a temporary retirement from Venezuela. Don Gabriano thoroughly approved of his proposal, and informed them that he had three mules, one of them a baggage macho, tied up in the bush, not far from the cottage; so that his sister and himself were provided for.

"But her faithful old negress must not be left behind," said he; "and she will hardly be able to walk so far. How shall we contrive to convey her?"

Sepulveda immediately expressed his readiness to carry Mama Panchita behind him; and they parted, having agreed to rendezvous in the Alameda at night-fall. When Bolivar and his companion reached their posada, the landlord received them with energetic encomiums on a famous olla podrida, which had been prepared since morning for his guests' dinner. The sable Hebe of the inn placed before them a smoking mess of that savoury compound; and the young men, whose appetites were sharpened by their long walk, played their parts so like genuine muleteers, that all suspicions of their real quality, had any such arisen, would doubtless have been dispelled. After dinner, Bolivar purchased from the host two Carrano saddles, and a sillon, under pretence of executing a commission for his friends in the country; and placing them on their heads, muleteer fashion, the two friends returned to the Quebrada del Tucueri.

By the time they had saddled their horses, which had apparently fed undisturbed since morning, it was full time to repair to the appointed place of meeting. Bolivar held the horses, under the poplar trees at the lower end of the Alameda, which was as yet but little frequented as a promenade, since the return of the Spaniards to Caracacas. Sepulveda walked to his mother's garden, where he found his uncle Gabriano, and the negro who owned the cottage at Girasol, busied loading the baggage mule, with Doña Gertrudes' trunks and almofras. The whole party mounted in silence; Mama Panchita finding some comfort, amidst her terrors of emigration, in the unlocked for honour of riding behind her young master. Being joined by Bolivar, who undertook to lead the march, they reached the open country without the slightest interruption.

By riding fast during the whole night, without resting or deviating from the road, they reached the wood, bordering the creek of Los Bagres, just before sunrise. Lodewyk Sluiker, who was seated in his boat waiting for them, had already given up all expectation of seeing them that morning; and was preparing to return on board. Shrugging up his shoulders, and looking peculiarly arch and cunning, he bustled about to get his passengers and their luggage into the boat; familiarly calling on Don Gabriano to lend him a hand, as he perceived him to be any other than a Carrano peon. The chaplain's sombrero having accidentally fallen off, as he stepped into the boat, his tressure caught the skipper's eye; and drew from him the muttered exclamation, "Slapperloot! here is een priester in 't momment!"

Sluiker was now completely mystified. He uttered not another syllable, but steered the boat in silence, stopping alternately at Mama Panchita and the chaplain, until they reached the Tiburon. When they had sufficiently expressed his perplexity, Sepulveda took him aside, and explained to him who the new passengers were, whose appearance had so much puzzled him. Bolivar then directed him to make sail; and in a few minutes the schooner was on her way for Pampatar in the island of Margarita.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE CRUISE.—THE CHASE.—THE CAPTIVE.

On anchoring in the rocky harbour of Pampatar, the Tiburon was surrounded by innumerable canoes and piraguas, bringing off patriots, who were eager to enquire the news she was supposed to have brought from the Main. They had as yet only heard an imperfect report of the royalists having entered Caracacas, by a small vessel which had left La Guayra on the Spaniards taking possession of it, and had touched at Margarita, for provisions on her way to Trinidad. The governor of the island, Don Jose Arizmendi, on hearing that Colonel Bolivar had arrived, sent his barge to invite him and his party to the Government-house, where they were hospitably received; and Doña Gertrudes was put in possession of a suite of apartments, commanding a view of the Boca del Surpunta and the opposite coast of Cumana.

Shortly after their arrival, it was determined, in a consultation held by the two chiefs, that the Tiburon should be immediately fitted out, for the purpose of cruising against the Spanish flag among the West Indian islands; and that Bolivar, with a sufficient sum of money from the government chest, should be landed at Santo Domingo, to purchase arms and accoutrements, and, if possible, enlist volunteers, by means of whom a fresh army might be formed to renew the struggle for independence. To give some semblance of authority to their proceedings, Arizmendi and Bolivar formed themselves into a Junta Provisional, into which they admitted Colonel Santiago Marino; and a seal was engraved, in close imitation of that employed by the late Venezuelan Government. Troops were raised, with the greatest facility, for the defence of the island, among the hardy inhabitants, but smugglers, half fishermen, who, to a reckless daring love of adventure, added a thorough hatred and contempt for the Spanish government, by which their contraband trade had been often severely noticed. The dismantled fortifications were also repaired and manned, in confidence hopes that the patriot troops, which were now scattered over the face of Venezuela, would speedily rally round the "tri-coloured flag," as soon as they should learn that it was again displayed.

Powder and shot were embarked for the Tiburon's guns; and a sufficient number of seamen were soon shipped, not only for her complement, but also to man the prizes she was expected to make. A party of newly raised troops having been sent on board as marines, Sepulveda requested and obtained command of them. Don Gabriano, too, resolved to accompany the expedition as chaplain; for he already began to foresee, from the experience of a few days' residence at the Government-house, that any longer stay on the island, with no other society than that of a few illiterate officers, would not fail to be very irksome. A cabin was accordingly fitted up, with every attention to his comfort, next to that of his nephew; and, having taken an affectionate leave of his sister, whom he recommended to the care of the governor's lady, he embarked, to the great delight of the Margaritaños on board. Lodewyk Sluiker, who had obtained a regular commission, as captain, from the Junta Provisional, and had received on board several officers to act under his orders, speedily recovered his usual good humour, which had been rather ruffled by the unlucky shot that sunk his droguer. He looked forward, with the greatest glee, to the prospect of a cruise; boasting of his accurate knowledge of every creek and corner among the islands; and confidently predicting success, from the novel circumstance of having a "kapellán" on board.

Every thing being ready for sea, and the last raft of casks received from the watering place, the anchor was soon run up to the bows; and the Tiburón stood out of the harbour, firing and receiving a farewell salute.

The trade-wind being completely in their favour, they made Santo Domingo in three days from their moorings at Pampatar, and landed Bolívar near San Luis. Sluiker's experience, as pilot, now proved of essential service. He carried the schooner in safety through the intricate channel to the northward of Cuba; and having passed the Anquilla shoal, commenced cruising off the point of Matanzas, in hopes of intercepting some homeward-bound Spanish merchant-man from the Havana.

It will readily be believed, that Sepulveda had not been so long on terms of daily intercourse with his skipper, without finding an opportunity to make enquiries respecting his former passengers in the droguer. Lodewyk began to entertain great kindness for his young marine officer, whose assistance he found exceedingly useful in drilling his sailors in general to the management of the guns, and the boards, in particular, to the use of the cutlass and pistol. He was therefore highly pleased to find that Sepulveda was acquainted with Maria del Rosario; and, as Don Carlos could not dissemble the deep interest he felt for her welfare, Sluiker, who did not want for penetration, and whose rugged exterior concealed a kind heart, soon comprehended how the case stood. Sepulveda now left the cabin regularly every evening, much to the surprise and chagrin of his uncle, for the purpose of accompanying the skipper during the first watch. While Don Gabriano was wondering at his bad taste in selecting such a companion, his nephew was listening with interested attention to the skipper's repeated details of the droguer's trip to Saint Thomas's, and of her being intercepted and plundered by pirates.

After a fortnight's cruise, during which the recruits became tolerably expert at the guns and small arms, the Tiburón was running along the land, one evening, between Las Matanzas and the Havana, when the gabiero, on the look out at the mast head, proclaimed the welcome intelligence of a sail in sight, standing out of the harbour. The eyes of all on board were eagerly turned in the direction pointed out by the man aloft; and Sluiker, seizing a spy-glass, ran nimbly up the fore-rigging to obtain a better view of the stranger. The sun was just sinking abreast of the Moro rock, and some few of the sailors, whose eyes were strong, could just catch an indistinct glimpse of a vessel, directly in the broad glare of sunset. When the dazzling orb had disappeared below the horizon, a three-masted vessel was plainly made out, crossing the Tiburón's course, and standing to the northward for the Bahama passage.

"Hoo-see!" exclaimed Lodewyk in an ecstasy; "she carries sky-sails over royals; and is certainly een groot koopvaard bound to Cadiz." He then came down on deck, and bestirred himself with unusual alacrity, to get the square fore-sail set. This increased the schooner's walk so much, that when he had seen the ropes coiled down, and every man at his station, Lodewyk beckoned Sepulveda, and pointing to the foam, as it danced rapidly past over the deep blue waves, remarked that the schooner was doing her duty, and that he should shortly call on the marines to do theirs. The guns had already been loaded, and the gunner's crew was busy taking out the tompions and priming; while, under Sepulveda's directions, the small-arm men were mustered on the quarter-deck to prepare their muskets. When every thing was in readiness, the word was passed fore and aft, for all hands to lie down at their quarters; and a dead silence prevailed, interrupted occasionally by Sluiker's hoarse voice, as he issued brief directions to the helmsmen.

Don Gabriano, meanwhile, who was totally unused to scenes which appeared to threaten so much personal danger as the present, sat on the companion; casting wistful looks from time to time at Lodewyk and Sepulveda, as they paced silently up and down the weather side of the deck. At length, overcome by his apprehensions, which became every moment more importunate, he called, his nephew, and asked him in a scarcely audible whisper, where the chaplain was usually stationed during an engagement:—"Because," said he, "if my presence is not particularly required on deck, I believe I shall be most useful in the cabin, where I can be in readiness to confess undisturbed the unfortunate men, who will doubtless be mortally wounded in the approaching conflict."

Sepulveda tranquillised him by the assurance that, far from being wanted on deck, he would only be in the sailors' way; and requested him to retire below as soon as he thought proper. There was no necessity for repeating this welcome intimation. Immediately on receiving it, the worthy chaplain embraced his nephew affectionately, entreating him to take care of himself, and to run no needless risks; and then disappeared down the companion ladder, with a celerity that bore witness to the reality of his alarm.

The brief twilight of the tropics had long since faded away; but the moon shone with such brilliancy of splendour, that the white sails of the chase were distinctly visible, broad on the bow. Sluiker anxiously reconnoitred her, from time to time, through a night-glass; and as often expressed to Sepulveda his apprehension, that she would reach the Gulf-stream, while the Tiburón was still in the counter current of the shoals. At last, however, he announced that she had taken in her flying-kites, and stripped to her top-gallant sails; as the cautious Spaniards generally do soon after dark. The schooner then rapidly gained on her, and her painted ports could occasionally be seen, as she rose on a swell, and exposed her glistening broadside to the rays of the moon. A few minutes more, and the Tiburón was within a cable's length of her quarter: so still, meanwhile, was every thing around, that the dash of the waves against her broad bows was distinctly heard.

Sluiker now ordered the square-sail to be taken in; the fore and main-sails to be brailed up; and the gunner's crew to cast loose and point the long gun, which was mounted on a circle a-midships. Although the sailors executed these manœuvres with all possible stillness, and even held their breath in the intense earnestness of expectation, some slight noise was unavoidably made, which caught the attention of the watch on board the Spanish vessel. A voice immediately hailed through a speaking trumpet,—"Ho! la go-le-ta!—Que bu-que?"

Sluiker returned no answer, but looked along the gun, and blew the match which he had taken in hand. There was evidently some bustle and confusion on board the strange ship. Several voices spoke at once, as if giving orders; and Lodewyk heard cartridges called for in Spanish.

"Keep her away, een half point!" said he to the helmsman; "Ik zal cut her tiller-ropes daadelyk."

The captain of the merchant-man hailed once more, and threatened to fire into the schooner, if she did not immediately answer. "Viva Venezuela!" exclaimed Sepulveda; and "Viva la Patria!" shouted his men; springing up simultaneously, and standing to their guns. Sluiker at the same moment applied his match to the touch-hole of the long gun, just as it pointed towards the ship's rudder; and, while the report still thundered along the wide waters, the chase was seen to shoot up into the wind. Chance had so far favoured the skipper, that he actually cut away her wheel-ropes, as he had previously threatened between jest and earnest.

"Hurrah!" cried Sluiker; "give her 't weather-guns, kinders, so soon as you zal zie her stern turned towards you. Luff, maat! and follow her; or we zal get on her beam directly."

The six carronades, composing the Tiburón's broad-side, were fired just as the ship's sails began to shiver in the wind. The guns were pointed too high to hull her, but some of her running gear was evidently cut; for Lodewyk, who watched her manœuvres with a practised seaman's eye, saw that her crew were attempting to box her off, but that they could not succeed in bracing the yards round. She then began to gather stern-way. Sluiker was prepared for it, and handled the schooner so cleverly, that the ship made a stern-board to leeward of her; receiving on her way, a charge of round and grape from the long gun, and the whole of the larboard broad-side.

Not a shot was fired all this time from the Spanish ship; and it was evident, from the confusion that prevailed on board her, that she was not prepared for fighting, and had not calculated on the probability of meeting an enemy in this part of the West Indies. After some hesitation and clamour, and just as Lodewyk was again training his long gun on her, lanterns were shown in her gang-way; and the Spanish captain hailed to say he had surrendered.

Sluiker now laid the schooner close abreast of her; and hailed her in an authoritative manner, desiring a boat to be sent him forthwith. This order being promptly complied with, he detained the men who came in the boat; and sent Sepulveda in her, with a party of marines, to take possession of the prize. He also ordered a prize-master on board, with a picked crew; and gave him directions to shorten sail to the ship's topsails, reef fresh tiller ropes, and heave to for the remainder of the night. His own boat was then hoisted out, and he went on board the stranger, accompanied by the chaplain; for, as soon as Don Gabriano was certified that there was no farther danger, he volunteered to confess such of the enemy as might stand in need of his good offices, as none of his own flock were so circumstanced as to require them.

The prize proved to be the Avistruz, bound to Cadiz, with tobacco and other produce of the Havana. She had also on board what was far more german to the matter, in the eyes of her captors;—a very considerable sum in dollars and bullion, consigned to different Spanish merchants. The importance of the capture astonished Sluiker, and converted his usual thoughtless gaiety into a serious steadiness of demeanour. As soon as he had secured the ship's papers, and ascertained beyond doubt that she was a lawful prize, he confined half the prisoners under hatches; and employed the remainder, together with his own men, to get the ship's pinnace off the booms, and launch her over the side. He then commenced loading the boats with cases of treasure, and transferring it to the schooner, accompanying every trip in person; so that, before morning, nothing but bales of merchandise and provisions remained on board the Avistruz.

It was fortunate for the captors, that he made such expedition. As soon as day broke, and the sea-fog dispersed sufficiently for surrounding objects to be distinguished, Lodewyk found, to his great consternation, that the Gulf-stream had set both vessels so far to the northward, that the Bahama bank was in sight under their lee, and a low uninhabited island, covered with mangroves, was within a cable's length of the prize. Every possible exertion was made to save the ship, by making sail and towing; but all was in vain, for the morning breeze was so light, that she took the ground and bilged, shortly after the danger was discovered. The Tiburón, drawing less water by half, had not drifted so far with the current; and, as she could make use of the awnings, with which she was provided, in case of necessity, she ran no risk whatever. She was therefore enabled to stay by the wreck; and to save as much valuable merchandise as she could stow.

Lodewyk then sent back the Spanish prisoners, whom he had taken out of the prize; and advised the captain at parting to send his boat for assistance to the island of Bahama, which was within sight, assuring him that he would be in perfect safety, if he chose to remain by the ship, until pilot-boats came out, and assisted to save the remainder of the cargo. Having seen the crew of the Avistruz safely landed on the islet,—which, like the rest of that group, abounded with turtle,—and having supplied him with fuel, fresh water, and provisions, the Tiburón made sail for Saint Thomas's, for the purpose of selling the prize goods she had on board; Sluiker deigning to proceed from thence to the island of Margarita, after watering, and refreshing the ship's company.

CHAPTER XXV.

AN AGED SUITOR—EXPLANATION—RESOLUTION.

Maria del Rosario, meanwhile, was far from being agreeably circumstanced on the plantation at Caobas. She enjoyed no society whatever of her own sex, with the exception of Señora Jacinta; and the dueña, who had for many years governed with unrivalled despotism in her department as housekeeper, and was exceedingly jealous of her authority, could not from the first moment, without considerable uneasiness, see a young and interesting female daily seated at the head of her master's table.

Her forebodings were speedily verified; for the influence of proximity gradually became victorious over even Don Anselmo's insensibility. Instead of confining himself to the stately politeness with which he used at first to address his young guest, and hand her to and from her seat at table, he began to pay her closer attentions, such as could not be, and were not mistaken by any one, except herself, their unconscious object. The consequence was, that Señora Jacinta's malevolence daily increased. Although she dared not openly resent the injury which she believed herself about to sustain, in being subjected to the caprices of a young mistress, she contrived fully to indemnify herself for this compulsory forbearance, by sullen looks, and indistinct ejaculations, in which she made it her prayer (rather needlessly perhaps) to be delivered from forwardness and coquetry. After a few attempts to appease her, although perfectly ignorant of the cause of her ill-temper, Maria del Rosario gave up the task in despair, and applied herself more closely than ever to her needle-work. This innocent employment, unluckily for her, confirmed all the doubts and suspicions. As her imagination was perpetually occupied with the idea of the approaching nuptials, which she considered certain, she firmly persuaded herself, that the novice was embroidering her wedding dress; and resolved never to forgive that which she could not but consider as a manifest triumph over her.

Mama Chepita's visits, which were regularly paid every Sunday and holiday, formed Maria del Rosario's chief amusement. Attended by the kind hearted negroes, she used then to stroll about the woods which surrounded the plantation; or at times, seated under a spreading cocoa tree near the rivulet, she would hearken with delight to the banjes and violas on the lawn in front of the huts, where the slaves were enjoying their evening dance. The little Frenchman too, Mons. Rodolphe, was always at her service for a walk, when on a visit at the house. He was no less delighted with the novice's naiveté, and eagerness for information, than she was instructed and amused by his lively conversation, and entertaining descriptions of France in general, and Paris in particular, as he remembered it in the happy times previous to the revolution.

She all at once became sensible of a change in his behaviour towards her, that surprised and afflicted her, as she concluded that she must have inadvertently given him some cause for displeasure. She observed, that he now no longer offered himself to attend her, with all the prompt gallantry of la vieille cour; nor exerted himself, as usual, to entertain her during their promenades. On the contrary, he now left it to her to propose an excursion, and sometimes framed an excuse for declining it; or, when unavoidable, accepted it with evident hesitation and embarrassment. While walking out with her, he was unusually silent, and constrained in his manner; and when they were joined by Don Anselmo, which frequently happened of late, Mons. Rodolphe anxiously took the first opportunity of resigning her hand, and pleaded some engagement, or business, as an apology for retiring. On those occasions, when she was left alone with Don Anselmo, the high-flown compliments with which he used to address her, were a great source of amusement to the unsuspicious novice. She had not the most distant conception that a man of his advanced age could entertain a serious idea of captivating her affections; and firmly believed that the flattering language, which proceeded so awkwardly from him, were merely designed in imitation of Mons. Rodolphe's former method of entertaining her.

After tasking her memory in a fruitless attempt to recollect any thing she had either said or done, that might have given rise to her French cortejo's present coolness towards her, she determined to enquire of himself, at the first opportunity. She put her resolution in practice that same evening. Having proposed a walk in the garden, to which he agreed after some hesitation, she mentioned, without further preface, the pleasure she had always taken in his conversation, and her fears that she had by some means unintentionally offended him.

Mons. Rodolphe had never felt more embarrassed, than by the novice's simplicity of manner, in thus seeking an explanation. He stammered some incoherent and disqualifying sentences, about the unmerited honour conferred on him, and the utter impossibility of his being in any way offended; and concluded by hinting, as delicately as he could, something about Spanish jealousy. She had, even now, no idea that he alluded to Don Anselmo; but supposing him to mean, that her father might be displeased at the frequency of their walks, she merely replied, that there was not the least cause for his apprehension.

On meeting her father soon after, she related the Frenchman's scruples, as an amusing instance of punctilio, in a man who had been always on terms of familiarity with them, since they first met at Las Caobas. She was thunderstruck at hearing him answer, that Mons. Rodolphe acted with becoming prudence and circumspection towards the intended bride of his friend. Don Beltran also advised her to be more reserved in future; as any indiscretion on her part might displease Don Anselmo, who had all the sensitiveness of a Castilian Hidalgo. The truth suddenly flashed on her mind; and she stood, as if doubtful whether her ears had deceived her, gazing on her father with a look of such speechless agony, that he condescended to explain to her, that Don Anselmo had some time since offered himself as a suitor, and been accepted by him in her name. He accounted for not having previously apprised her of this joyful event, (as he considered it,) by saying that, as his mind had been made up on the subject from the beginning, he thought it superfluous to mention it, and was willing to give Don Anselmo all the advantage he might be expected to reap, from being the first to communicate so pleasing a proposal.

When Maria del Rosario recovered herself sufficiently to articulate, she threw herself into her father's arms, and implored him, by her mother's memory, not to sacrifice her to a man so utterly unsuited to her in age and manners. She assured him of her willingness to devote herself to his service; and entreated, if she had become a burthen to him, and he was determined to get rid of her, that he would at least permit her to retire to a convent, in the seclusion of which she would never cease to pray for his happiness, and that of her brother. Don Beltran interrupted her, by enquiring whether she had forgot that she no longer possessed the dowry necessary for a nun. He assured her, that she was but too happy, as a portionless girl, to have met with so advantageous an offer; and commanded her, on pain of his heavy displeasure, to receive Don Anselmo as an accepted suitor.

It was in vain that she reiterated her entreaties, and declared that their host was not only indifferent, but absolutely odious to her. Her father laughed at her remonstrances, as mere childish whims; and asked, with some scorn, what notions of preference the novice of a convent could possibly have, that should prevent her from accepting the hand of any suitor, not actually deformed, whom a parent thought proper to select as her husband. Then suddenly recollecting the offer Don Carlos Sepulveda had formerly made, and forgetful that his daughter had not been made acquainted with the circumstance, he upbraided her with cherishing an affection for a lover whom he had rejected; reading her, at the same time, a severe lecture on the guilt of disobedience, and the folly of love matches. In this, however, he unadvisedly touched on a dangerous theme, and one of all others the most calculated to disconcert his plans for the projected alliance.

Maria del Rosario had long felt esteem and admiration for the son of her oldest and dearest friend, Doña Gertrudes, even while she believed him to regard her with perfect indifference. But now that her father had disclosed the secret of Sepulveda's attachment, her eyes were open to a thousand instances, in which he had all but betrayed his love; and she learned how to account for his apparent coldness, which previously appeared to her as unkindness. So delightful was the discovery, that she almost pardoned, for its sake, the hateful discussion from which it had arisen. She no longer conceived herself called on, by maiden pride, to banish every thought connected with Carlos and her native land. She had heard that she was beloved, and by him, whom, could she have chosen, she would have selected from the whole world.

This would have been sufficient, of itself, to insure her rejection of all other offers, however splendid, and all other suitors, however fascinating. But, if she previously looked on Don Anselmo with dislike, she now regarded him with abhorrence; and internally resolved that nothing, short of actual force, should compel her to receive him for a husband. As surprise and agitation prevented her from answering her father, he interpreted her silence into submission to his will. He therefore took leave of her, repeating his injunctions that she should treat her wealthy suitor with affability and gratitude.

No sooner had he left her, than she retired to the solitude of her own chamber; and abandoned herself to melancholy reflections on the distance that separated her from Doña Gertrudes, the friend of her youth, to whom alone she felt that she could now look for advice and consolation. While she pondered on the world of waters that lay between her and her native land, a thought suddenly struck her, that if Lodewyk Sluiker were again to visit the island, he might be prevailed on to assist her to escape over to the Main. She felt convinced that she might safely confide in him; and condemned as trifling, with true youthful ardour, all obstacles which would have appeared to her insuperable but one short hour before. She was, in truth, completely changed from the timid inexperienced novice, to the no less gentle, but determined, Venezuelan maiden, who first felt

"How all the other passions fleet to air,
As doubtful thoughts, and rash-embraced despair,
And shuddering fear, and green-eyed jealousy," when once the heart thrills with the consciousness of mutual love.

Her resolution thus taken, she retired to rest, in pleasing anticipation of Mama Chepita's weekly visit, which she expected to receive the following day. Never had time appeared to her to move so slowly, as during the hours intervening before her hostess's usual time of arrival. But, previous to the wished-for meeting, a mortification awaited her, which had probably been accelerated by some explanation between her father and Don Anselmo. Her ancient suitor, having requested and obtained an interview, proceeded to declare his passion in a studied speech, to which she listened with distracted attention. Nevertheless, as he prided himself on his eloquence, so he entertained not the slightest doubt of his success; and attributing to bashfulness and joyful surprise, the silence caused by contempt, and by comparisons which were any thing but advantageous to him, he kissed her hand, as customary in similar cases, and strutted away on exceeding good terms with himself.

In the afternoon, Mama Chepita appeared with her customary offering of a bouquet of flowers, from the negroes' market in the port; and Maria del Rosario, intimating that she had much to say to her in private, immediately proposed a walk, and led the way to their usual cool retreat beneath the great Cocoa tree; where Don Anselmo's gallantry had lately prompted him to order a rustic seat to be constructed.

After a long silence, during which the novice polled to pieces the flowers she had just received, she briefly explained the unpleasant situation, in which she stood; taking care, at the same time that she declared her unconquerable dislike to Don Anselmo, not even to hint at any preference she felt for another. She merely said, that as she had reason to apprehend violent measures on the part of her father, she had resolved to spare him and herself the pain of inflicting and submitting to restraint, by withdrawing herself privately from the island. She concluded, by entreating her old hostess to further her design of reaching Venezuela, where she said she had friends, who, she doubted not, would gladly receive and protect her.

Her determined tone astonished the negress, who had been accustomed to see her all timidity and submission to her father's will. She answered, with some hesitation, that her dear young lady was certainly the best judge of her own happiness; and that she was at all events rejoiced to hear her resolution against accepting Don Anselmo, whose former wife had died, to the best of her belief, of a broken heart. But, while she declared her readiness to assist her in any possible manner, she begged leave to enquire how she proposed to cross the sea to the coast of Caraccas.

The novice satisfied her on that head, and Mama Chepita agreed that Lodewyk, who was an old married man, with a family in Curacao, was trust-worthy. There was also little doubt, judging from his good nature and disinterestedness, that he would readily give her a passage. She promised to make every enquiry, without loss of time, among the droguer masters in the port, where he was to be found; and to send her daughter Martha, the next evening, to acquaint her with the result. Maria del Rosario was now more at leisure, her mind being comparatively at ease, to listen to her hostess's domestic news and plans. She learned, with pleasure, that Mama Chepita had made up, within a few dollars, the sum Don Anselmo demanded for her daughter; and she listened with interest to her resolution of leaving Santo Tomas, as soon as she had accomplished that dearest wish of her heart, and settling at Trinidad, "where she might be near poor Beños' grave."

The sound of the banjes was now heard on the slave lawn; and Mama Chepita proposed to her young mistress to walk down, and look on for a while at the dance, for the purpose of diverting her mind from melancholy thoughts. When they reached a small guava coppe, which skirted the lawn, they found that some extraordinary festivity was going on among the slaves. They had raised a sort of triumphal arch of bamboos, covered with flowers of the scarlet fuchsia, geranium, and orange trees, under which was placed a table, spread with refreshments little inferior to those usually prepared for a dignity ball.* The negroes, in clean check shirts, and

* A ball given by the free people of colour is called in the West Indies, par excellence, a dignity ball. The nob white cotton trowsers; and the negresses in chintz gowns, and Bandanna head-dresses; were dancing with wild glee, which burst from them in spontaneous peals of laughter, as each couple reached the bottom of the set.

Mama Chepita called one of her acquaintance, who was passing near the spot where they stood concealed by the bushes, and enquired the meaning of this grand display.

"Kih! body!"—exclaimed the laughing negress, displaying a set of ivory teeth; "Massa Anselmo gib us feast to-night. Old man he gone crazy, ever since young Missy promise to be him second wife."

Maria del Rosario would hear no more. She turned, and hurried away from the scene of gaiety, which was now fully accounted for, shedding bitter tears of mortification; and took an abrupt leave of Mama Chepita, who in vain attempted to console her; entreating, once more, that she would lose no time in enquiring for Lodewyk Sluiker.

CHAPTER XXVL

THE ARRIVAL.—THE INTERVIEW.—THE PLOT.

Mama Chepita was seated, after her return to her cottage, at the frugal supper her daughter Martha had provided for her; indulging in many sage inuendoes and reflections, without however mentioning names, on the the happiness of their humble state, as contrasted with the misfortunes to which their superiors were exposed; when a well known voice was heard at the door, crying, "Holla! Mama Chepita! haus dooy!"

Martha having opened the door, Lodewyk Sluiker entered, accompanied by a young officer, whom he introduced as Don Carlos Sepulveda; and seating himself, with as little ceremony as if he had left the cottage but that morning, enquired how his passengers were.

"Both well, Señor Ludovic!" answered the negress; "But,—ave Maria purissima! what change is this? Where is the droguer? And why are you masquerading thus in an officer's capote?"

"Masquerade, mother? slapperloot! this is my every-day suit now. Ik verloor myn droguer, and found a vechting schooner in her stead. My name zal be no more plain Lodewyk, but Captain Don Ludovic, donder!"

Then, lighting a long cigar, he proceeded to question Mama Chepita more closely respecting his former lady passenger; and Sepulveda had the inexpressible satisfaction of hearing her relate the whole conversation she had held that very evening with Maria del Rosario. The negress would have faithfully concealed her young mistress's secret from any one else; but Sluiker was the very person in whom the novice herself had resolved to place confidence. Therefore, in her surprise and joy, at seeing him thus unexpectedly, she not only mentioned Maria de Rosario's intention of flying to the Main, but, also the pressing necessity that urged her to that determination. Sepulveda could not avoid drawing a flattering conclusion in his own favour, from the novice's having resolved to seek the protection of her friends in Venezuela; as he well knew she could only mean his mother.

His enquiries, respecting the plantation at which she was residing, were so minute, and his eagerness to visit it so evident, that Mama Chepita must have been less sharp-sighted than she really was, if she had not some shrewd suspicion of the truth. In this she was confirmed by Sluiker's repeated exclamations, at any interesting passage in her narrative, of "Heard you that, myn vriend? We are just op 't time come. Ik altyd zaid that a kapellaan on board was lucky; and now, zie you! we may want him 't morgan."

The schipper then placed on the table a case-bottle of rum, which he had brought ashore under his boat-cloak; and desired the negress to procure materials for mixing a bowl of punch; declaring his intention of making himself comfortable for that night at least. While Martha was absent on that errand, Sepulveda, who had already made considerable progress in Mama Chepita's good graces, easily obtained her consent to show him the road to Caobas early in the morning; and to procure him when there an interview with Maria del Rosario. As Lodewyk persisted in his resolution of sitting up, and seeing his bottle out, Don Carlos wrapped himself in his capote, and lay down on the sofa, having first persuaded Mama Chepita and her daughter to retire to rest.

At the first cock-crow, Sluiker, who had been zealously expensive refreshments are provided on the occasion; and more ceremony is usually observed among the sable revellers, than is to be seen in an entertainment at the Government-house.

engaged all night in a fruitless attempt to quench his thirst, and on whom the copious libations had taken no more effect, than on the capacious bowl in which they had been compounded, awoke Sepulveda according to promise; and throwing himself on the couch, soon gave audible proofs of being in a sound sleep. Mama Chepita then appeared, in readiness for a walk; and having previously presented to her guest the indispensable West Indian luxury of coffee, they set out together for the plantation.

When they reached the valley, it was broad day-light; and the slaves were swarming forth to their daily labour. To avoid their observation, Mama Chepita hurried Sepulveda off the path towards the Caoba tree, where she left him seated, while she went to apprise Doña Maria of his arrival. The novice, who had just risen, saw her from the viranda, in which she stood enjoying the morning breeze; and immediately descended to the garden in expectation of hearing some intelligence about Sluiker's droguer. Words cannot express the unfeigned astonishment with which she listened to Mama Chepita's communication. She had, at first, some scruples as to the propriety of meeting Don Carlos clandestinely; but the negress speedily removed them, by reminding her that she would be present, and assuring her that the young officer had brought her news of his mother, who, he said, was an old friend of hers. This last argument was unanswerable; and she accompanied Mama Chepita to the Caoba tree.

The interview of lovers, although they are said to be highly interesting to the parties immediately concerned, are unfortunately the dullest of all possible subjects, when reduced to the matter-of-fact details of,—"said he," and, "she replied," &c. It may therefore be sufficient to state, for the information of the reader, and the better understanding of the remaining pages, that the name of Doña Gertrudes proved of the most essential service to her son, in furthering his suit. As Maria del Rosario had declared her resolution, previous to his arrival, of seeking that lady even as far as the Main, and of trusting herself in a small droguer, to the protection of one who was nearly a stranger to her, she could frame no excuse for retracting, now that the distance was comparatively trifling, the mode of conveyance commodious, and the escort, to say the least of it, more eligible. It is true, that Sepulveda did not assail her, in direct terms, with the startling word marriage; but it is no less true, that he more than once reminded her,—it might be unnecessarily,—that his uncle was chaplain of the schooner, and would receive her as a daughter, at Mama Chepita's cottage.

She finally consented, or rather ceased to object, to take a passage on board the Tiburon to the island of Margarita; with this proviso, that she was that day to make one more attempt to mollify her father. Lest, however, she should find him deaf to her entreaties, and absolutely bent on sacrificing her to Don Anselmo, Sepulveda obtained her permission to return, that night, for her final answer. Mama Chepita was once more to be his guide, and to conduct him to the garden, from whence there was a winding stair-case, leading to the viranda. The negress then considered it necessary to warn them of the danger of discovery, if they prolonged their interview until the family in the house should be stirring; and they reluctantly parted, with mutual promises of punctuality to the appointed hour.

When Sepulveda returned to the port, he found Lodewyk busily employed landing merchandise from the schooner; having already found a ready sale for the greater part of the prize goods. He scarcely found leisure to speak to Don Carlos; except to whisper his hopes that he had settled every thing to his satisfaction. The Danish governor, he said, had politely expressed a wish that the Tiburon might sail that very night; as he was apprehensive of being embroiled with the Spanish authorities on the neighbouring island of Puerto Rico, on which Santo Tomas was often obliged to depend for provisions, during times of scarcity.

Sepulveda then went on board, and found Don Gabrileo pacing the deck, in considerable alarm at his long absence. His nephew had acquainted him, the preceding evening, before he went on shore, that Don Beltran and his daughter were on the island; and had hinted his intention of persuading her, if possible, to elope with him to Margarita. Sluiker too, on embarking in the morning, had informed him somewhat mischievously, that Don Carlos was gone a little distance into the country, to the plantation of a Godo, his rival; and the worthy chaplain's imagination had been haunted ever since, by fears of hearing that his nephew had fallen by the cuchillo of the jealous Spaniard. It was with heartfelt joy, therefore, that he embraced him, as he stepped on the gang-way. On being informed of the particulars of his project, he readily consented to unite him to the novice, that very night; protesting at the same time, that he had in general a very strong objection to clandestine marriages, and to any thing savouring of disobedience in children. But in this case, he observed, where the parent was a declared traitor to his country, and the suitor, whom he wished to force on his daughter's acceptance, was a God, he certainly was of opinion, that she might conscientiously be assisted to escape from such tyranny.

His nephew then proposed to him to go ashore until the evening; for the ship was a scene of noise and confusion, with hoisting casks and bales out of the hold, and striking them into the lighters alongside. They therefore adjourned to Mama Chepita's cottage, where Sluiker promised to join them, as soon as the business with which he was engaged should be concluded. The day passed tediously with Sepulveda; but evening at length arrived, and with it came Lodewyk, full of the good news he had to communicate concerning the handsome shares of prize money that would be paid them on the capstan-head, the day of their arrival at Margarita.

Don Carlos then taking him aside, enquired whether he could advance him a sufficient sum from his share, to enable him to assist their worthy hostess in buying her daughter's freedom. Lodewyk immediately assented, and producing a large canvass bag from the breast pocket of his jacket, counted out doubloons to the required amount: taking a receipt for the satisfaction of the Junta at Margarita, to whom he was responsible.

Mama Chepita was called in, and presented by Sepulveda with the money, in Doña Maria's name. The good negress was affected even to tears by this kindness, and struggled to kiss his hand; declaring that, notwithstanding her daughter's being free from Don Anselmo, she should still consider her the slave of Don Carlos and Doña Maria, and would accompany Martha and them wherever they might go. Sepulveda then urged her to set out immediately, and pay the money to Don Anselmo, as soon as possible, that there might be no unnecessary delay; for he advised her, knowing her design of removing to Trinidad, to take her passage in the schooner to Pampatar, from whence she might at any time reach the former island.

When she was gone to Caobas, Lodewyk acquainted Sepulveda with the precautions he had taken, to ensure the success of his enterprise. He had already hauled the Tiburon out to the mouth of the harbour, where she was lying at single anchor; and had given directions to his lieutenant to get under weigh at dusk. When clear of the rocks, he was to heave to, and send a boat ashore with a steady coxswain, to the small bathing place at the back of the fort. From thence, two picked men of the boat's crew were to come to Mama Chepita's cottage, which he had already pointed out to them.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE ELOPEMENT.—THE MARRIAGE.

The sailors, two stout Margaritanes, were punctual to their appointed time; and came armed, by Sluiker's order, with such garrotes as their countrymen use, in climbing their native mountains. Lodewyk gave each of them a dram out of his flask, by way of encouragement; and having lighted his cigar, ordered them to follow him and Don Carlos in silence. Then, shaking hands with the chaplain, he desired him to "stand by met 't mass-buck, for he should find it useful bevoer gun-fire in 't morgen."

The moon was of no small advantage to them, while traversing the hilly part of the road; as it enabled them to avoid the prickly-pear bushes, which would otherwise have rendered the track impassable. But when they approached the plantation, the danger of discovery was so much augmented that Sepulveda led Lodewyk and his sailors off the direct path, and proposed to conceal them at the Caoba tree, while he himself went to the garden. He was, however, unexpectedly met by Mama Chepita, who informed him that she had paid the price demanded for her daughter, and that Doña Maria had desired her to thank him, in her name, for his kind attention.

Her young mistress, she said, was exceedingly unhappy, in consequence of an interview she had that day with her father. He had treated her with unusual harshness, and had commanded her to prepare to marry Don Anselmo the following day; assuring her that the chaplain of the estate, Fray Bernardo, had agreed to celebrate the ceremony, if she proved refractory, without her consent; on his representation, that his only wish was to promote the happiness of his disobedient and self-willed daughter.

Mama Chopita had already brought to the place of rendezvous such articles of dress and ornaments as Doña Maria wished to take with her; and she desired Don Carlos and his friends to remain at the tree, while she went alone to conduct her young mistress to him. After a short delay, she returned hastily with Doña Maria, who threw herself, almost fainting, into Sepulveda's arms for protection; exclaiming that they were pursued by some person, who had watched them as they left the garden. Don Carlos spread his capote about her, and entreated her to take courage, for no one should harm her, nor tear her from him; and Lodewyk, looking out among the trees, cried,—"Duizend duizelen!"—here is my hearer! planter himself!"

Don Anselmo, advanced, exclaiming in a voice almost inarticulate with rage,—"Fine doings, Señorita de Peña-ela! Your father shall be informed of these moonlight excursions. Where have you hid yourself? and where is that vile negra terçeira, who has dared to encourage you in such unseemly conduct?"

Just as he said these last words, he issued from the guava copse, and unexpectedly found himself confronted, face to face, by Lodewyk Sluiker, whose weather-beaten features, half concealed by bushy black whiskers, had a formidable appearance at any time; but seen thus by moonlight, and in so solitary a place, were capable of terrifying a stouter heart than that of the old planter. Don Anselmo's knees knocked against each other, and he was on the point of falling to the ground in his extreme trepidation; when Lodewyk, apprehensive that he would call for assistance from the negroes' huts, as soon as he should recover his presence of mind, suddenly threw his coat over his head, lifted him on his shoulders, as if he had been an infant, and set off with him through the wood at a rapid rate.

Sepulveda, seeing that Maria del Rosario was rendered almost incapable of walking, through terror and agitation, followed Sluiker's example, by raising his lovely prize in his arms; and was guided by the sound of the skipper's footsteps, until he overtook him at the ascent of the ravine. Here Lodewyk set his terrified captive down; and threatening to kidnap him altogether, and sell him to the patriots in Margarita, if he uttered a syllable, proceeded to tie him hand and foot, with pieces of rope, which the sailors had brought in expectation of having trunks to carry to the boat. He then gagged him, and laid him down close to the path, under the bamboos; assuring Don Carlos, in answer to his remonstrances against rough usage, that it was absolutely necessary, to prevent him from alarming the whole coast. He consoled the unlucky planter, on taking leave of him, by observing, that a night's rest in the fresh air would be of service; as a specific, to cool his blood; and that his slaves were sure to find him, when they passed that way to their work next morning.

Maria del Rosario had by this time recovered herself sufficiently to walk unassisted; and the whole party proceeded, as rapidly as the nature of the path would permit, until they reached Mama Chopita's cottage. Martha was seated outside, in the moonlight; and immediately on seeing them descending the hill by the side of the rivulet, she sprang forward to embrace her young mistress, and to thank her for her freedom.

While Mama Chopita was busied, with the assistance of the sailors, in packing up and carrying to the boat some few articles, which she considered of too much value to be left behind, Sepulveda led Maria del Rosario to his uncle, and entreated him to unite them without further delay. The novice would fain have remonstrated against this haste; and proposed to defer the ceremony until their arrival in Margarita; but honest Lodewyk urged the danger of pursuit from the harbour, if the schooner should unluckily be becalmed in the offing. In that case, he said, he could not answer it to the Danish governor, if a fugitive daughter was to be found on board; although it would be a totally different case, were it an obedient wife, whose duty it would then be to follow her husband.

As Don Gabriello expressed himself of the same opinion, she consented to give Sepulveda a right to protect her; and Lodewyk, after giving her away, exclaimed,—"Always tak' de zey, dat 'savage' is 't retad, dat goed to niemans' brenge!" It would be een droguer-schipper this day, but vor 't loss of Puerto Cavallo; and you, myn hartje! een Non, but vor 't Earthquake of Carracas."

THE END.

THE HISTORY

OF THE

Rise and Fall of Masaniello.

AT NAPLES, A. D. 1647.

Translated from the Italian of Alessandro Giraffi, by James Howell, and reprinted from the edition of 1664.

INTRODUCTORY NOTICE.

James Howell, one of the most learned men and copious writers of the seventeenth century, translated the following history from an Italian work, "Le Revolutioni de Napoli," written by Alexander Giraffi, an Italian nobleman, published at Venice in 1647, the very year of Masaniello's extraordinary career.

Several editions of Howell's translation appeared during his life, and another history of this conspiracy was published in London in 1729, by Francis Midon, Jr., which purports to be collected from authentic memoirs and manuscripts; but it is also a translation from Giraffi, and the writer has made frequent use of Howell's edition. In the present publication, some facts omitted by Howell have been incorporated, taken from Midon's work.

The style of Howell is peculiar to himself, quaint, and sometimes pedantic, and abounding in beautiful allusions. It has been altered and abridged in the following extraordinary narrative, in order to make it more intelligible to the readers of the present day; but the spirit of the whole has been carefully preserved. The title given by Howell to his translation, will best explain its contents. He terms it, "An Exact History of the late Revolutions in Naples, and of their Monstrous Successes, not to be paralleled by any ancient or modern History."

The circumstance of a favourite opera bearing the title of "Masaniello," has made the name familiar to most ears, but few probably are acquainted with the facts of his life—to such the annexed narrative cannot fail to prove surprising and instructive. We know of no fragment of history of more absorbing interest.

"Truth never looked so like a lie,
As in this modern Historia."

THE PROEM.

Naples, for the space of two hundred years, served the House of Austria with gratitude and fidelity. She succoured Alphonso I. with a voluntary imposition of ten carlines* upon every fire throughout the whole kingdom for ever. She added five carlines more to Ferdinand; and so by degrees it amounted to sixty-six carlines, which she pays to this day, [1647], being three millions of gold yearly.

Afterwards, even with more readiness, she supplied Charles V. in ten donatives with five millions; Philip II. with thirty, in three-and-thirty donatives; and Philip III. and IV. from the year 1628 to this day, with one hundred millions and more. Yet in order to raise those large subsidies, it was found necessary to impose many taxes and gabels upon all necessary commodities.

Pursuing the same affection towards her king, and being desirous to present him with a new donative, without regard to her own strength, in 1646, a new design was formed to put a fresh gabel upon fruits, which comprehended all sorts, as well dry as green, such as mulberries, grapes, figs, apples, pears, &c., depriving her of her ordinary nutriment. By making her thus live seven months continually, she fell down at last flat upon the ground by mere weakness; and then feeling her deplorable state, and that of the whole kingdom, she took a new resolution to disburden herself not only of this, but of all other insupportable exactions, formerly imposed; and this she did not without well-grounded reasons. For it is clear that there is engraven in the breasts of all men by nature a detestation of slavery, and unwillingly therefore do they put their necks into the yoke of another, especially when exorbitant exactions are imposed whereby they are reduced to extreme fits of desperation. Ad extremum rerum populi exitium, cum extrema onera eis imponuntur: People run to extreme ruin, when extreme burdens are laid upon them,—as Tacitus truly taught.

Hence it came to pass, in the royal city of Naples, that a multitude of the common people, with their families, being, among other gabels, much aggrieved by that upon fruits, and not being able to endure it, made it often known to the most excellent lord, the Duke of Arcoa, viceroy of that kingdom, by the public cries and lamentations of women and children: and the men of Lavinaro, and other populous quarters, as he passed through the market-place to the devotion of the most holy mother of Carmine, in the church of the Carmelites, situated along the said market, petitioned him by the means of the most eminent Cardinal Filomarino, the archbishop, and others, to take off the said gabel. At last upon a Sunday, as his excellency went to the said church, he heard a great noise among the people, and little less than threatenings, presages of the following commotions; and promising to take off the said gabel, he returned with such apprehensions of fear to the palace, that he not only went no more to the Carmine, but would not suffer the solemn feast of St. John Baptist to be celebrated, which was done yearly in Naples, in order to prevent such a multitude of people to assemble in one place.

In the interim, the people, much grumbling and murmuring that the promised grace was delayed, set fire one night to a baracca of powder in the market-place, which burned down the toll-house where the said gabel was exacted; and from day to day most pungent and bitter invectives, full of popular grievances and of fiery protests against the public officers, were fixed up in the most public places of the city. This boldness increased afterwards; and with this boldness came the report of complete success in the revolutions of Palermo, and a great part of Sicily, Messina excepted, the viceroy of which kingdom, the most excellent lord the Marquis of Velez, had taken off or moderated many gabels, and afterwards had given a general pardon for all excesses.

The people of Naples, being allured and encouraged by this example of a neighbouring kingdom, grew very envious to attain the same freedom, saying, "What! Are we less than Palermo? Are not our people, if they unite, more formidable and warlike? Have not we more reason, being more burdened and oppressed? On, on to arms! Time is precious; it is not good to delay the enterprise." These, and like complaints, becoming more public, the viceroy, in high wisdom, being desirous to prevent mischief, caused the six quarters or precincts of the city to assemble, viz. the fifth part of the gentry, and the sixth of the people, that some means might be devised to take off the tax upon fruits. But this design, though it was pleasing to all for the satisfaction of the people, because it was prejudicial to some of the farmers, there were secret ways found out to hinder its happy effects. The viceroy, therefore, was induced to repair the toll-house; which he did, however, with a view to the ultimate adoption of some temperate way which would satisfy the discontented people on the one side, and the Neapolitan nobles, gentry, and merchants on the other; the latter having advanced upon the said gabel above six hundred thousand crowns upon the account of the capital million, and eighty-five thousand crowns of annual rent.

It was now rumoured abroad that some new tax was to be put upon corn and wine; on which account the enraged people protested that they would never give way thereunto; but reiterated their demands to take the gabel upon fruit quite taken off, and so other parties in compensation of it. As matters were in this state, behold an occasion did suddenly present itself which made way for the total exaction of the desired purpose, as it shall be clearly declared from day to day, and that with as much fidelity and truth as any pen can possibly promise upon this subject.

THE FIRST DAY.

SUNDAY, 7TH JULY, 1647.

A young man about twenty-four years of age, chanced to be in a corner of the great market place at Naples, in appearance active and pleasant, of the middle stature, black eyed, rather lean than fat, having a small tuft of hair on his chin. He wore linen slops or trowsers, a blue wajacoat, and a sailor's cap; his legs bare below the knees, and without shoes. Yet, he had a good countenance, and was sufficiently bold and enterprising, as the result will prove. His profession was to angle fish with a rod, hook, and line, as also to buy fish, and to carry and retail them to those that dwelt in his quarter. Such men are called in Naples Pescivendoli. His name was Tomaso Aniello* of Amalfi, but he was commonly called, by contraction, Masaniello. This man dwelt in the market-place; and under the window of his house, towards the left of a neighbouring well or fountain, were the arms and name of Charles V., being very ancient, which might be ascribed to a mysterious presage that he should regain and restore, as he himself would often very pleasantly observe, the privileges which that unconquered monarch granted to the city and people of Naples. It is a remarkable circumstance, that about a hundred years before, in the month of May 1547, as John Antonio relates in his History of Naples, when there was a commotion in the government of Don Pero de Toledo, on account of the tribunal of the Holy Inquisition which Philip II. would have introduced, another Masaniello, a Sorrentine, and captain of some banditti, was the leader of that tumult. But because the nobility were then joined with the people, that insurrection was not very hurtful, nor lasted long. And if such an union had now been, so much ruin had not befallen both king and people; for what greater contagion can there be in a city, than disunion between its inhabitants?

This Masaniello, from a kind of natural penetration, having observed the murmurings up and down the city, laid hold of the following occasion:—One day (which was four days before the holy festival of Corpus Domini) he went very angry towards his house, and passing a church where a famous bandit captain, named Perone, had fled for refuge, with one of his companions, he was asked by them what was the matter? He answered in great wrath, "I will be hanged if I do not attempt to set this city right." They laughed at his words, saying, "A proper person you are to right the city of Naples!" Masaniello replied, "Do not laugh; I swear by God, if I had two or three of my humour, you should see what I could do." "What would you do?" asked they. He answered, "Will you join me?" "Why not?" said they. "Pledge me, then, your faith," replied Masaniello, "and you shall see what we have to do." They instantly pledged their faith to him, and he departed.

But he had not been long at home before he met with fresh provocation; for some of the officers of the customs having accidentally met his wife in the street, as she was carrying a small quantity of contraband flour in her apron, they laid hold on her, and hauled her to prison; and, without having the least regard to the tears and entreaties of her husband, would not let her go, till he had sold all his goods, to pay a fine of an hundred ducats, which was the price they had set on her liberty. This barbarous extortion struck so deep into the heart of the young man, who was naturally choleric, that he immediately meditated upon the means of being revenged; and considering how the people were enraged by the gabel upon fruit, he made use of that pretence, and running up and down among the fruit-shops that were in that quarter, complained loudly of the cruelty of the tax, and engaged them to come in a body to the market-place, and there declare publicly to the country fruiterers, that it was in vain for them to bring their fruit to market, for they would not buy one basket till the gabel was taken off.

In the meantime, while this dissatisfaction spread throughout the shops, the elect, or chief magistrate, Andrea Anacletio, having been chosen that very day, betook himself to the market-place, where the various fruits were distributed to the shop-keepers. They all cried out to him that they would buy no more gabelled fruit; but Anacletio persuaded them at that time to pay the tax, with the assurance that it would be speedily taken off. This promise caused the tumult to cease at that time, and Masaniello, seeing that nothing farther was done, went up and down exclaiming, Avant Gabel! Avant Gabel! for which some laughed at him, but others considered well his words.

About this time a great number of boys had gathered together in the market-place, and Masaniello approaching them said, "Say as I do; two torrone, that is, a bajocco, for a measure of oil, six and thirty ounces the loaf of bread, twenty-two the pound of cheese, six granas for beef, six granas for pulse, nine granas for veal, two granas the pint of wine."† These words he made them repeat various times; and being thus taught, and bearing them in memory, they cried them up and down all the city, and even in the face of the viceroys. He gave them, however, another lesson, which was, "Let God live! let the Lady of Carmine live! let the Holy Father live! let the King of Spain live! let there be plenty! may the ill government die! may the accursed government die!" These and similar phrases being taught by Masaniello to the boys they cried them up and down, which caused much laughter and jeering at their master. But he told them, "You laugh at me now: you shall soon see what Masaniello can do: let me alone, and if I do not free you from slavery, let me be held infamous for ever." This increased their laughter; but regardless of it, he began to enlist such a number of boys, betwixt the ages of sixteen and seventeen, that they came to be above 500, and at last 2000, inasmuch that he could not only muster a company, but even a whole regiment. He then prepared himself for the approaching festival of our Lady of Carmine, making himself commander of his troops, and giving to every boy a little cane.

Among other things during this festival, it was a custom to observe a certain ceremony, which was, that a sort of castle or tower of wood was erected in the midst of the great market-place, and a company of boys, who represented the Turks, used to defend it, whilst another set of lads pelted and battered it with sticks and fruit; and this drew together a great concourse of people; but it seldom ended without quarrelling and bloodshed.

On this occasion, there were assembled a vast multitude of people of the meaner sort; and although the hour was come when fruits were generally brought to the market to be taxed, and the boys were all met for the purpose of picking up such as fell upon the streets, it chanced that no fruit appeared at all; for the shop-keepers had resisted the payment of the gabel, telling the fruit-merchants that they might pay it themselves if they pleased, but as for them, they would pay none. This caused an altercation, which proceeded from words to blows, and which being told to Zuffa Grassiero, governor of the city, he ordered Andrea Anacletio to quell the commotion. This Anacletio in vain attempted to do, for both the fruiterers and the retail sellers were firm and obstinate in their quarrel; and not to displease the latter, he decided against the fruiterers (most of whom were from the city of Puzzuolo,) reviling them with words, threatening to bastinado them, and to condemn them to the galleys.

Among those of Puzzuolo, there happened to be a cousin of Masaniello, who, according to the instructions given him, began more than any to excite the people. Seeing that he could sell his fruit only at a low price, and, after paying the gabel, have hardly any thing left, he flew into a rage, and, throwing two large baskets full of fruit upon the ground, he exclaimed, "God gives plenty, and the ill government a famine! I care not one straw for this fruit: let every one take it." Upon which the boys eagerly ran to gather and eat the fruit. As all this fell out according to Masaniello's expectation, he rushed in among them, crying out, Avant Gabel! Avant Gabel! but Anacletio instantly threatened him with the bastinado and the galleys, which so exasperated the people, that they threw figs, apples, and other fruits, with great fury into his face. But this attack seemed too little to Masaniello, who hit the magistrate on the breast with a stone, and encouraged his army of boys to follow his example, which they did. Anacletio was accordingly forced to break through the crowd as fast as possible in a coach; and reaching the church of the Lady of Carmine, he embarked there in a felucca, and thus reached the palace in safety, otherwise he would have been torn to pieces, or stoned to death by the boys.

Upon this success the people flocked in greater numbers, as well to the said market-place as elsewhere, and began to exclaim loudly against those intolerable grievances under which they groaned, and crying out, "Let the king of Spain live, but let the accursed government die." The tumult still increasing, Masaniello being followed by a multitude of boys and all sorts of loose people, some with sticks, others with pikes and partisans taken from the tower of the Carmine, he leaped upon the highest table which was among the fruiterers, and with a loud voice cried, "Rejoice, dear companions and brothers; give God thanks, and the glorious Virgin of Carmine, that the hour of our redemption draws near; a poor bare-footed fellow, like another Moses, who freed the Israelites from Pharaoh's rod, shall in like manner free you from all gabels that were ever imposed. A fisherman, I mean

St. Peter, reduced with his voice from Satan's slavery to the liberty of Christ, Rome herself, and with Rome, a world. Now another fisherman, who is Masaniello, shall release Naples, and with Naples a whole kingdom, from the tyranny of gabels. Henceforth you shall shake from off your necks the intolerable yoke of so many grievances, which have hitherto depressed you. Nor to effect this do I care a rush to be torn in pieces, and to be dragged up and down the kennels and gutters of Naples. Let all the blood in my body be drawn out of these veins; let this head dance from my shoulders by the fatal steel; and be perched up in this market-place upon a pole, I shall die contented and glorious; it will be triumph and honour to me to think that my blood and life were sacrificed in so glorious a conquest, and that I became the saviour of my country."

Masaniello, by often repeating this and similar harangues, marvellously inflamed the minds of the people, who were disposed in their hearts to cooperate with him to this effect; and as a proof of their zeal, they set fire to the house next the toll-house for fruit, both of which were burnt to the very ground, with all the books and accounts, and many of the goods belonging to the farmers of the customs, which were therein.

This being done, the common people increased in such numbers in every street, that the citizens shut up their shops, every one being astonished at the sudden tumult; and many thousands of the people uniting themselves, went to other quarters of the city, where were other gabel-houses, for fruit, corn, flesh, fish, salt, wine, oil, cheese, silk, and all other eatable or wearable commodities, and spared not one of them. All the writings and books of entrance or issues appertaining to the said gabel, as also all the furniture, as well of the farmers as others, and all things that were there in pledge, or otherwise, such as hangings, chairs, arms, great quantities of money; with other rich moveables, were hurried into a great fire of straw, and burnt to ashes upon the streets. There was one thing remarkable during this plundering and confusion, not one durst meddle with the least piece of any thing, but all was dedicated to the fire; it being the quintessence, as it was said, of their blood, they would not have a jot of any thing preserved from the fury of the flame. The mob becoming still more bold and courageous, because they found no resistance or obstacle, and the number having increased to about 10,000, they made towards the palace of the viceroy, many of them holding loaves of bread upon the tops of staves and pikes, and crying more loud than ever, "Let the king of Spain live and let the accursed government perish!"

The first army of Masaniello, also, consisting of 2000 boys, every one lifting up his cane with a piece of black cloth tied on the top, went along the streets and cried out with dolorous and loud voices, which moved many to tenderness and tears, "Have compassion upon these poor souls in Purgatory, who, not being able to endure the burden of so many grievances, seek how they may escape: O dear brothers! join with us; O sisters! help us just, so necessary an enterprise, and so profitable for the public good." These doleful tones they whined from one street to another, till they came at last to St. James' prison, which they violently broke open, and, freeing all the prisoners, they admitted them to their society.

Being now come before the palace, and under the window of the viceroy, they began to cry out again, that they would not be freed of the fruit-gabel only, but of all others, especially that laid upon corn. The viceroy came out to the balcony, and told them that the said gabel should be abolished, and part of the corn gabel also; but the mob howled still that they would not be relieved in part, they would have the whole taken off, and they still cried out, "May the king of Spain live! and the accursed government die!" A number of them wishing to enter the palace to notify unto the viceroy the rest of their grievances, his excellency commanded the German and Spanish guards to suffer them to pass and repass freely; but not being heard by them, some resistance was made by the soldiers, when the mob, with canes and clubs only, (a thing incredible to believe,) and with loud cries, effected their entrance, demanding audience of the viceroy. But he had made his escape; and the Dutch and Spanish guards at the gate abandoned their posts, and made off to their quarters. The mob then entered the palace, and bursting open the hall-door, entered without any difficulty, until they came to the chamber where the viceroy was hid in a closet, and, though they found the door doubly bolted, yet by force of halberds and other instruments, they broke it open. The viceroy would have been torn to pieces had not the Duke di Castel di Sangro and Don Ferrant Carraciolo previously conveyed him away, and so saved him from that mortal blow

* The word literally signifies a ring.

† These were silver or copper coins current in Naples at the time. A bajocco, or bajocca, was a copper coin, ten of which made a julio, and one hundred a Roman crown.

which was intended. With a few gentlemen that were about him, the viceroy now resolved to retire into the castle, where the duchess of Arcos had withdrawn herself with her ladies, children, and relations; but, understanding that the ladies had taken up the draw-bridge, he took a resolution to fly into the neighbouring church, dedicated to St. Louis, where there was a friary of Saint Francis of Paola. In order, however, to let the mob know that he was willing to enter into their demands, from a window he threw small schedules up and down signed by himself, and sealed with the king's seal, wherein he absolutely took off the gabel upon fruit, and part of that upon corn. But the mob were far from being satisfied; they made signs with their hands, and cried aloud that he must come down and speak with them face to face, upon which the viceroy went down to avoid exasperating them by any appearance of distrust.

In the mean time, that part of the mob who remained in the palace ran up and down with great fury, gutting the rooms every where, setting fire to sedans, tables, windows, screens, and other moveables of value; yet they would not meddle (a thing to be wondered at in the middle of such a tumult) with the apartments of the most eminent Cardinal Trivulzio, who dwelt in the same palace.

The viceroy, having come down to the rabble, threw himself into a coach with two horses, which was provided at a proper place to carry him to the church of St. Louis; but no sooner was he perceived by the mob, than they stopped the coach, and, opening the door, presented two naked swords at his breast, and threatened that unless he would take off the gabels, he would be put to instant death. He accordingly promised he would do so if they were quiet; but this would not serve them unless he came out of the coach, and showed himself to the people. This also he did, and then some respect was shown him; some kissed his hands, and fell upon their knees, crying out, "Most excellent sir, for the love of God, disburden us once of these gabels—let us have no more slavery—let us live." His excellency then confirmed unto them their request, but meanwhile was devising how to escape out of their hands; for although he was honoured by many, yet he held himself not safe in such a confused multitude. In order to divert the mob, he threw among them some hundred zecchins of gold, which he carried about with him for that purpose, which had good effect, though many cried out aloud, "We have no need to be relieved with a little money, but to be freed from the gabel." But while most of them were greedy to take up the gold, his excellency got safe and sound into the church, where he caused all the doors to be shut, and those of the monastery also.

The rabble perceiving this, and being greatly enraged that the viceroy had escaped out of their hands, went straightway to the monastery, and, battering down the first gate, they thought to do so with the rest, crying out still to be released from the gabels, and insisting that his excellency would consign them a paper in writing under his hand and seal, in which he should promise to do so. Fearing that the mob would do further violence to the monastery, as their numbers still increased, he opened a window, and desired them to be quiet, for he was disposed and ready to satisfy them. The incredulous multitude, however, believing still that they would be deluded, proceeded to batter down the other gate; which being done, they immediately entered the monastery. While this violence was going on, Filomarino, Archbishop of Naples, being zealous in his pastoral charge for the service of God and his church, endeavoured to appease the people, in order to avoid those irrecoverable losses which he saw threatening the city, made a sign to them with his hand, that they should be peaceable; but they replying, that they would have the writ for release of the gabels from the viceroy, especially those upon corn and fruits, his eminence answered them, that he would make it his business to obtain it, and so going out of his coach, he went in person to the second gate of the monastery, to hinder the pulling of it down by the furious rabble. He effected his purpose, for, out of the great reverence they bore to their archbishop, the fury ceased; but still they prayed that the gabels might be abolished. The bishop promised to bring them the instrument signed and sealed; but lest the fury should recommence during his absence, he sent a messenger to the viceroy, desiring him to send the said instrument. This the viceroy did, desiring him to deliver it with his own hands to the people. The bishop having received the said written instrument, entered his coach, and showed the charter to all the mob, which he drew after him along Toledo street, every one being anxious to know what it contained. But what? The charter was no sooner read with a loud voice by the bishop, but the mob cried out again that they were cheated, for that instrument contained only the taking off the fruit-gabel, and seven carlines upon wheat; but they would have divers other gabels abolished. The bishop, perceiving that nothing could be done with the rabble while in that state of ferment, and having delivered the charter to the chief of the people, retired peaceably to his palace.

The mob now ran to the great market-place, to give notice of the said charter to the rest, who were assembled there in still greater numbers; but finding that this was but satisfaction in part, it was deemed necessary, for the common defence of the faithful people of Naples, to enroll some armed men, to procure a total discharge of gabels. Returning to the palace, thousands of men and boys would again have attempted an entrance into the church and monastery of St. Louis; being resolved to burst open the doors of that part, where divers lords and ladies were, but the Spanish soldiers opposed them; and, in particular, a brave captain kept off the rabble with his sword, and the soldiers with their muskets, and divers of them were killed. In the meanwhile, the ladies had time to retire into the friars' cells, and the viceroy, by the help of the abbot of the convent, scaled the walls, and got into the monastery of the Jesuits, whence, putting himself in an old sedan carried by Spaniards, he was conveyed to the castle of St. Elmo.

As soon as it was known for certain that the viceroy had escaped from the monastery, the rabble returned to the palace, resolving to disarm all the Spaniards who were on guard. But they compounded, by delivering to them drums and half pikes, and all other instruments, their swords and muskets excepted. They then went to all the other courts, and guards dispersed up and down the city, whom they immediately attacked and disarmed. They next proceeded to the suburbs of Chiagia, to the palace of Don Tiberio de Garaffa, Prince of Bisignano, who was field-master, and colonel-general of the battalion of Naples, defying that great cavalier, who, by his natural affability, had made himself beloved by all Naples. They desired that he would be pleased to be their defender and intercessor betwixt them and the viceroy for the total abolition of the gabels, according to the favourable privileges granted them especially by Charles V. But before they got the Prince of Bisignano's answer, some of them ran furiously to the place where they exacted the gabel of fruit at Chiagia, set fire to the house, and burnt every thing that was in it, as they had done in other places. The rabble still augmenting in that populous suburb, they divided themselves into two squadrons, or rather armies. By this time, the Prince of Bisignano came out on horseback. The lesser sort of boys put him in the middle, and he desired them to be orderly; but they called out, "Let us go to take off the gabels." He was conducted by the palace, and so along to the castle, and thence through all the public places, till he came to the great market. The prince, seeing the mob wonderfully increased to above fifty thousand persons, endeavoured to appease them; and to do this the more conveniently, he went to the church of the Lady of Carmine; and being got up in a high place, with a crucifix in his hands, he prayed, exhorted, and conjured them for the love of God, and of the most blessed Virgin his patroness, to be quiet a little, promising them by oath to obtain from the viceroy what they desired. But finding that all this did no good, he waited some time in the market, to have an opportunity of negotiating with the ringleaders of the riot, in order to assure them that he would make it his own task to procure them complete satisfaction. In the mean time, other new accessions of people coming from other parts of the city, they proceeded to break open the prisons of Santa Maria d' Agnone, St. Archangelo and others; the guards of which not being able to resist, were obliged to yield and fly. The gates being thrown open, they made all the prisoners depart, burning and consuming to ashes such books and processes against them as were found there; though some of the mob were averse to this violence, because those prisons had been in former times royal palaces. At last they were dissuaded from it by the Prince of Bisignano, who stated that by setting at liberty foreigners, murderers, and thieves, they would draw upon themselves great inconveniences.

They next directed their course toward the dogana or tollhouse for corn, with faggots on their backs, and fire and pitch in their hands; and the gates being wrenched from their hinges, the prince not being able to persuade them, though he laboured earnestly, they entered there with such fury, that they spread fire on all sides. Nor were they satisfied till they saw all not only burnt, but reduced to ashes: corn, with a great store of household stuff, and a great quantity of money, which the ministers of the dogana had in bank, being either their own, or in deposito, or pawned, were consumed in the flames.

After this exploit, they went to the piazza of St. Lawrence, the prince still remaining with them from a desire to pacify them. Having arrived there, and entered through the church into the cloisters to go up to the steeple-tower to sound the great bell, that all men should put themselves in arms, an entrance was at first denied them by some who had fled thither for sanctuary; but two of whom were presently killed. Now, some of the people began to apprehend divers fears; but a Sicilian, who appeared to be rather a devil in human shape, and one of the greatest furies that bell could hold, animated them all to battle. He reproached them with their fears; he jeered their cowardice; but the justice of heaven found him out; for he was killed from the said tower by a musket-bullet.

The Prince Bisignano, finding himself exhausted after so many hours' fatigue, and after so much mischief done to the city, and being weak and faint by reason of the heat of the season, and his own delicate constitution, now sought to disengage himself from this labyrinth of popular tumult. By a wise stratagem, he distributed the people into various quarters of the city, with strict prohibition that they should not sack or assault any one's house; which plot took; for being thus divided, he retired unperceived to a kinsman's house hard by, where, having refreshed his spirits for a while, he betook himself about the evening in a close sedan chair into Castel Nuovo.

The report being dispersed abroad of the retirement of the Prince Bisignano, and the people, finding themselves without a head, cried out for their leader and conductor, Masaniello, who, accepting of that charge, began more than ever by sound of drum to influence the people throughout all the city and suburbs. It was now thought fitting that some religious men should go in procession through the city, not only to appease the unruly people, but to implore divine help; which being done, those officers of the holy church were much acknowledged by the viceroy, who sent effectual relation thereof to the Conte d'Ognate, then Catholic ambassador to the court of Rome. In the mean time, the viceroy and the nobility, dreading that the rabble would go to St. Lawrence church, and seize upon divers things which belonged to the city, and sound the great bell to arms which hangs in the steeple of that church, sent thither some companies of Spaniards well armed, as also others, for the guard of the said church and cloister of St. Lawrence.

At two o'clock after midnight, the viceroy removed from St. Elmo to Castel Nuovo, which adjoins the royal palace, there being only a bridge between them. There went also thither Cardinal Trivulzio, with many officers and cavaliers; and although it seemed high time for them to think of chastising the rebels, yet the viceroy, like a wise prince, restrained his indignation, and published, that by next Monday the loaf of bread should weigh thirty-three ounces four grains, whereas before it was scarcely twenty-four ounces; and that the gabel of fruit should be absolutely taken off. For greater safety, however, he ordered that additional guards should surround the castle. Meanwhile, the people did not flag a whit in their former fury, but caused the bell of our Lady of Carmine to ring out thrice for arming, and consequently great companies flocked together, and divided themselves into divers quarters. Some proceeded to set fire to all the out-houses of Naples, where gabels were exacted, with drums beating before them; others remaining behind, to prepare arms for the following day, plundered the shops for swords and muskets, for bullet, fire and match. Others went among the merchants, who, without any resistance, furnished them with all sorts of arms; and because one master of a shop would foolishly have made opposition by threats, and, which was worse, by discharging a mortar-piece out of a window, which killed one of them, they were so exasperated, that putting fire to his house, wherein were divers barrels of powder, eighty-seven persons were blown up and perished, and forty-four were hurt. To prevent such a disaster in future, his excellency commanded, that all the powder in other places throughout the city should be wetted: But the unruly mob, passing with such an imperious authority through the streets, began to put an army in order, and provide all things necessary for the business of the following day.

THE SECOND DAY.

MONDAY, JULY 8TH, 1647.

The active and formidable preparations made by the rabble the night before had this effect, that although the day had not yet grown clear, and the glorious sun was not come out of the womb of the vermillion morn, yet up and down the city nothing was heard but drums and trumpets, and clashing of arms; nothing seen but colours displayed, choice soldiers, burlished swords, cocked muskets, archibuzes, lances, targets: and what was even more alarming, besides the citizens themselves, the country swains appeared from the neighbouring villages, armed with ploughshares, pitchforks and shovels, and ranging themselves in a military way for common defence to plough glebes of flesh, and water them with blood; in fine, the women were seen in great numbers armed with fire-shovels, and iron tongs, with spits and brooches, and their children with little staves and canes, encouraging the young men to battle. Now, let it be considered what such a multitude all armed could do, who being invipered as it were with blood in their eyes, cried out, "Let the king live! let the king our lord live! let the ill government die! No gabels, no gabels! Let the dogs die, who, being transformed to wolves, have devoured the flesh of innocent lambs! Let these wasps fly away, which have hitherto sucked the sweet honey of the bees!"

With such like cries proceeding from the bottom of their throats they rent the very air, and were enough to soften the hardest marble, draw tears from the stones, and sighs from ice; they animated one another, they crowded the streets, guarded the passages, and prepared themselves to provide furniture for the war. Horror, blood and amazement, reigned in every corner. The keys were consigned from Minerva to Mars. Books were neglected, studies were abandoned, the bar was solitary, the chairs were silent, the ecclesiastics sung Luzchryms, the law ceased, patronages were despised, advocates were dumb, the judges were idle, tribunals were shut. The arsenals only were open; the pikes had got the better of the pen, force of wit, boldness of wisdom; the whole city was inflamed with martial fury. The places adjoining the great market, especially Lavinaro, Porta Nolana, Covaria, Sellaris, the Piaz of the Elm, were in the utmost commotion, from the dense multitude who resorted thither. Orders were given to the inhabitants of the other precincts of Naples, which are thirty-six in number, to arm in like manner, under pain of an irremissible burning down of their houses, which was punctually performed. There being want of powder, they went to a house where it was sold, to buy some; but the sellers refusing without orders from the viceroy, they raged with such a fury, that, throwing fired matches into that house, they blew up the powder into the air, and with it above sixty persons, as afterwards appeared from the number of bodies which lay many days unburied. This happened at Porta della Calce; and it caused a shock like an earthquake through all the city; but they were not a whit disheartened at the disaster. Going in greater numbers than before, to the king's powder-house out of the city, towards Cap de Chino, they would have seized that magazine of powder, had they not been prevented by the labourers, who had put the said powder in water to prevent a similar disaster.

While the rabble made all these preparations, the viceroy did not relax his wanted prudence to acquit himself of his duty, although he had retired into Castel Nuovo. He dispersed guards all along the castle, and in St. Francisco Xaverio's street, to the number of four hundred. He shut up in the royal palace for his own guard 1000 Germans, and planted at the gates 800 Spaniards, with 1000 Italians. He secured Pizzafalcone, which lies above the palace, as also the neighbouring streets, with good fortifications, making ramparts of faggots, and raising other trenches of earth about the gates of the old and new palace, and at the end of the street looking towards the said palaces. He likewise commanded a large piece of ordnance to be put at the end of every street towards the Santo Spirito, the monastery of the Dominicans, and of the Minims; another against the cross of the palace; another upon the ascent of Santa Lucia; and two before the great gate towards the middle of the new palace. In the meantime the people hearing that another regiment of Germans had arrived from Puzolo by order of the viceroy, they went to meet them, killed part who made resistance, and the rest, who willingly surrendered themselves, were made prisoners, and led into the city. The same was done to two companies of Italians; but by order of Masaniello the latter were released, and armed for the defence of the city. The Germans he sent in derision into the castle, laden with all kinds of provisions.

It happened upon Monday morning, that the Spanish guard, for some insults they had received, imprisoned two mean fellows; and the people, fearing they would be executed, rose up and threatened, with howlings and unusual cries, to tear in pieces all the Spaniards who were in Naples, if those prisoners were not delivered them; wherefore, to avoid such a fate, which would certainly have happened, they were yielded up safe and sound.

That morning, bread of very excellent quality and unusual weight was sold, inasmuch, that a loaf of bread, which was but little more than twenty-two ounces, was now thirty-three, and the joy of the people may be easily conjectured. Both men, women and children, citizens and strangers, went crying up and down the streets, "Let the king of Spain live! let the most faithful people of Naples live! and let the ill government die!"

It now seemed expedient for the viceroy to despatch by some lords of the collateral council, and of the council of state, a note unto Masaniello, as head of the mob, wherein he granted as much as was demanded the day before, which was the taking away of all kinds of gabels. But the people would not be satisfied with this, but sent notice, that they would have further contentment, viz. a restitution of the privileges granted them by Kings Ferdinand, and Frederic, and by the Emperor Charles V., all of which, by public act, the viceroy, the collateral, and council of state, with all the nobility, should oblige themselves to observe. They insisted farther, that the people should nominate the chief clerk of the market of the city; that it should pass for a law, that no new gabels in future should be imposed, without the consent of the Capo Popolo, who should be a lord by title, as it was anciently, when the Prince of Salerno enjoyed that office; that he also should be named by the people, without any dependency, or having any recourse to the viceroys for the future. They scrupled not to demand, in addition, that the castle of St. Elmo should be put into their hands, though they proceeded not very far in that proposition.

His excellency, perceiving that the mob would lend no ear to any reasonable offers of peace, judged it expedient to restore to favour the Duke of Mataloni, and Don Joseph Caraffa his brother, and to solicit their joining with other lords and knights, they being favourites of the people, and to go up and down the city with a view to restore order and quietness. This, accordingly, was done; for many lords did ride up and down the streets in divers quarters, in particular the Prince of Bisignano, Caraffa di Bel Nuovo, Il Principe di Monte Sarchio of the house of Avalos, the Prince di Satriano Ravaschiere, the Duke di Castel di Sangro, Don Ferrante Carraciolo, the Prince della Rocella, the Lord Don Diomedo Caraffa, the Lord of Conversano, with other lords, dwelling in the piazza of the great market, in which there was a great multitude assembled. These lords signified unto the mob, that his excellency the viceroy was very ready to give them all satisfaction; but it was answered, that they desired no more, than that the privileges of King Ferdinand should be granted to the city, which were confirmed by Charles V., who, by oath, promised to impose no new taxes upon city or kingdom, either he or his successors, without the consent of the pope; and even being so imposed, they should be well regulated, otherwise the city might rise up with sword in hand, without any mark of rebellion, or irreverence to the prince, for the maintenance of her liberties. Now, since most of the gabels ever since, some few of small consequence excepted, have been imposed without the consent of his holiness, it was just that they should be all taken off, and that the people should have delivered up to them the original of the said privilege, which was among the archives of the city in the church of St. Lawrence. Those lords and gentlemen understanding this, went back to Castel Nuovo to impart all this to the viceroy, who presently convoked the collateral council, with that of the state, as also the sacred council of Santa Chiara, to consult what answer should be returned unto the people.

In the mean time, the archbishop ordained that the holy sacrament should be openly exposed in many churches, and that all persons should be invited to implore divine assistance at such an emergency. The miraculous blood, and the holy head of St. Gennaro, the glorious protector of Naples, which lie in the dome of the chapel of Tesoro, were likewise exposed, and the clergy went in solemn procession up and down the city, viz. the Dominicans, Franciscans, those of Del Carmine, the Augustins, the Jesuits, Capuchins, Teatins, and others.

That day it was debated by the people who should be their chief, that by his authority they might prepare their address to the viceroy, and obtain what they desired; and as, among those who rode up and down the city, the Lords della Rocella were the most eminent, and had their palaces in the great market, they made overtures to the said lords, that they would please to employ themselves in behalf of the people, in order to obtain the restitution of their charter to which they consented. For the performance thereof, these lords went to Castel Nuovo, accompanied by many people, where his excellency commanded them to be admitted, the concourse of people remaining without all the while, expecting, not without much anxiety, an answer from the viceroy.

At the same time, and for the same purpose, the Lord Prior was sent for from St. Lawrence; and in the belief that the charter would now be found, the multitude which accompanied him was so great, it appeared as if both he and his horse were carried on their shoulders. But the Lord Prior, knowing that it would be difficult to find it, and feigning to withdraw himself upon some business, he made off with incredible speed, and concealed himself in the church of the holy apostles. This occasioned extraordinary murmuring and discontent among the people, who thought themselves baffled and deluded by one who they expected would have been their defender and advocate. Nevertheless, some affirm that the Lord Prior, with a view to quiet them, did bring them a skin of parchment, pretending that it was the original charter of Charles V.; which being shown to the satrapans and council, and found to be a counterfeit, they were so enraged, that had he not fled, they would have put him to death.

The Duke de Rocella, in the mean while, returned from the castle to the great market-place, attended by the gross of the multitude, and carrying with him a copy of the charter desired by the people; but having heard of the dangerous success of the Lord Prior, he dared not say it was the original, but told them it was a true and real copy, as the original could not be found. Hereupon it was received at the beginning with some applause; but being read and found imperfect, it raised a mighty discontent in the hearts of the people, who cried out that they were mocked, cozened, and betrayed by the said duke, as they had already been by the prior; and falling into a mortal hatred of all the nobility, they raged against them, threatening them with ruin and revenge. Having the said Duke della Rocella in their hands, they clapt him in prison in the monastery del Carmine, and appointed the bandito Perrone to be his keeper, who himself had formerly been chained in the same church, but was set at liberty by the people. This man, however, being an ancient friend and confidant of the duke, did manage the business so effectually with the people, that he obtained the duke's freedom, obliging himself to restore him into their hands when demanded; so the duke having remained a day or two in his palace, retired afterwards to his country house.

There was appointed to be about the person of Masaniello, as one of the principal heads of the people, a priest named Julio Genovino, who had been their elect during the government of the Duke of Ossuna, and was well practised in the affairs of the court, and who had always endeavoured to advance the good of the people; and to him they added for a companion the aforesaid famous bandito Perrone. These two being joined with Masaniello, drew out a list of sixty houses of ministers and others, who had been connected with the farming of the gabels, and who, having enriched themselves, as was given out, with the blood of the people, deserved to be made examples to future ages, by having their houses and goods burnt to the ground; which was done accordingly.

But let us proceed more orderly in the relation of these ruined palaces. The first was that of Gieronimo Feticia, one of the farmers of the corn gabel, situated in the quarter of Porta Nuovo, near the houses of the Lord Mermilli. There the people having flocked with faggots and pitch, and getting into the house, they threw out of the window all kind of household stuff, and all sorts of utensils, with great store of money, chains and bracelets, breaking the windows wider for that purpose; all of which were brought to the market-place and hurled into a great fire, where they were burned to cinders, amid huge outcries of the people.

This first act of the fiery tragedy being ended, they went next to the house of Felice Basile, who at first had been a poor baker, and carried bread up and down the streets of Naples; but having friends at court, by tampering with the gabels, in a short time he became very rich. He dwelt near the Spirito Santo, where the people having met, and plundered his palace from top to bottom, they hurled out at the windows and balconies all the household stuff, writings and books, with other rich curiosities. There were twenty-three great trunks thrown out into the streets, some of which being broken open, contained wondrous rich things, such as cloth of gold and tissues, with costly embroideries, that dazzled the eyes of the beholders; all of which, with a cabinet full of pearls and other precious stones, were hurled into the devouring element, without saving so much as a rag; nor durst any one take up the value of a pin, unless it were to help the throwing of it into the fire.

These two burnings lasted five hours; after which they passed to the palace of Antonio de Angelis, a counsellor, who had been elect of the people in the time of Monterey, and who concurred with that viceroy in imposing many new gabels. This man, being admonished by many of his friends to secure his goods and his palace from destruction, neglected their advice, because the day before they had taken down his gate only, and he imagined that there their fury had terminated. But he reckoned without his host: his unfortunate destiny blinded him so, and so stopped his ears, that he would not listen to wholesome caution. Whereupon the rabble, being come before his house, they furiously entered, and finding it full of all kinds of costly furniture, even to admiration, they presently destined every thing to the fire, leaving not a jot unburnt. That which was most to be pitied was, that the pleas, writings, charters, patents, and processes of divers poor and rich men, were all consumed. There was also a library of curious books, two coaches, four beautiful horses, and two mules, all burnt; and they threw bottles of oil into the fire, to make it burn with more violence. In his pantry, larder-house, and kitchen, there were delicate provisions, and divers chests of sweetmeats; and a boy having taken up a small piece of bacon which fell by chance, he was nearly torn in pieces by the multitude. There were 10,000 crowns in good silver burnt, besides vessels of plate double gilt. The fire of this house was so great, that although it was in the night-time, every corner of the street was as clear as if it had been noon-day.

Thence they ran to the house of Antonio Mirabella, another counsellor, and a Neapolitan cavalier, who narrowly escaped with his life, but of whose house they left not one stone upon another, but consecrated all to the voracious flame, which lasted above three hours.

At six o'clock they passed to the palace of Andrea Anselmi, elect of the people; but he had wisely removed his goods the Sunday before, prefiging some violence. In furious disdain, they applied fire to the four corners of the house, which made a horrible flame, to the terror of the beholders, which lasted till the sun returned to enlighten the following morn.

But while the people consumed with fire the houses, goods and wealth, of those public thieves, as they termed them, there burnt in the breast of the viceroy an ardent desire to put a period to such fearful combustions. In order to hasten an accommodation, the collateral council and councils of state and war, were assembled; and it was resolved, that his excellency should command four companies of foot to reinforce the squadron which was already in the castle, while a legal instrument was ordered to be printed, wherein an abolition of those gabels, and a general pardon, were granted. This instrument was accordingly printed and sent into the great market, that all people beholding it might return to their homes; but it took no effect, because the pardon was considered imperfect, not specifying so much as the people would have, and containing divers matters subject to litigation. The viceroy, perceiving that the nobility were hateful to the people, and therefore unfit to quench the fire, but rather to increase it, now purposed to make use of two of their own prime advocates, who were also much esteemed by him. These were Andrea Martellone, and Onosico Palma, whom the viceroy having commanded to come unto him, he committed unto their care and prudence, and that with a great deal of earnestness, the appeasing of the people, with large promises of remuneration. These men executed what was imposed upon them with much alacrity; but it produced no fruit, and having returned to the viceroy, they said it was impossible to assuage the fury of the people, unless he delivered unto them the original of the charter granted by Charles V. Upon this being fully understood by the viceroy, who, from the beginning, had an ardent desire to content the people, especially in this point, he caused all diligence to be used, that the said charter should be found out. In order to effect this, he despatched to the church of San Lorenzo some of the nobles, elect of the city, together with Don Joseph Maria Caraciolo, a person of great valour and learning, who, besides his high birth, was a most earnest pacificator at all times, especially at the present conjuncture, being warmly devoted to the service of his king and country. In the mean time, Masaniello made it known to all the merchants in the name of the people, and corporations of the city, that they should instantly arm themselves for the service of the people; and in order to enforce his proclamations, a great part of his train, partly on horseback and partly on foot, proceeded to the various houses demanding arms, which were delivered up to them, both by noblemen and officers. They thus obtained possession of many thousands of archbuzes, carbines, muskets, pistols, and such like arms; as also nine pieces of artillery, which one merchant had in his house, and which were given him in pawn from the court for some thousands of ducats. They took also seven cannons out of a ship, which they assaulted in a new galley, all of which they placed at the mouths of the principal streets of the city; and having understood that Mazola, a Genoa merchant, had a good store of arms, they entered his house, where they found 4000 muskets, which were distributed up and down to the populace dwelling in the quarters of Santa Maria il Pareale, then clapped torches to his house, and consumed it to the foundation.

The archbishop seeing that, notwithstanding all profers of accommodation, the disturbances increased every hour with more fury, resolved to go abroad in procession; but doubting that it would not be agreeable to the people, before he put his designs in execution, he requested the Impositors of St. Paul and of the Apostles to discover how they stood affected. These, together with Don Carlo de Bologna, and Don Diego de Mendoza, being the most eminent of the secular priests, both on account of their birth and exemplary lives, put themselves into their coaches, and went to the piazza of the great market, to observe the humour of the people, the bishop having no other aim herein, than the service and satisfaction of the city; yet he wanted to know their inward inclinations. The said fathers and lords having put in strict execution what they had in charge from the archbishop, found true what his eminence had formerly doubted; as it was told them by the chiefs of the people, who yet thanked the archbishop for his pious zeal, that, touching such a solemn and extraordinary procession, they humbly advised his eminence not to do it, because the priests and religious men in those broken times might haply receive some injury, which would prejudice the reputation of the church. They prayed his eminence, however, that he would expose in the church the holy host, and order public orisons for forty hours.

The fathers and gentlemen having returned to the Cardinal Archbishop, related unto him what they had proposed, and the answers that were made; whereupon his eminence, not thinking it expedient to put his former thoughts in execution against the will of a tumultuary people, directed the said impositors, and all heads and rectors of churches, as well secular as regular, that the blessed sacrament should be exposed, and public and private prayers made, to recommend unto the divine majesty the woful condition of city and kingdom; which was punctually performed every day until the death of Masaniello.

When the archbishop had despatched those seasonable orders, it being now night, his eminence repaired to Castel Nuovo, to consult with the viceroy, whether any terms of accommodation could be proposed, that might avert the calamities that hung over the city, and give some satisfaction to the enraged multitude; who had been so used to fire and cruelty, that they seemed to delight in such sights and executions. For the better effecting of which, this worthy patriot associated with him the most illustrious the Lord Altieri, Apostolical Nuncio, at that time residing in the kingdom. In the evening, divers other lords and cavaliers retired also to Castel Nuovo; as well for the safety of their persons, as to consult with the viceroy, what was most proper to be done in the present extremity.

THE THIRD DAY.

TUESDAY, JULY 9TH, 1647.

The minds of the Neapolitan people being now inflamed with rage, and with a determination to destroy the houses of all public ministers, partisans of the royal court, lawyers, and farmers of the gabels; there were no bounds sufficient to stop their insolence and fury.

Hence the glorious man had scarcely appeared in the orient to illuminate the city, before the furious people ran to the palace of one Valenzano, formerly a very poor plebeian, and who afterwards, from a petty clerk in the Dogana, had become a farmer of the gabel, and enriched himself extremely. It is incredible what a world of precious goods, both for quantity and quality, were found in his house, which were all reduced to ashes, except two boxes full of gold, found in the cupboard of a window, which were taken and deposited in the king's bank.

Hence they passed to the palace of the Duke of Ceirano, towards the little gate of Santa Chiara, where all his writings and public books,—he being secretary of the state,—and an infinite store of rich moveables and utensils were found, all which were burnt in two great fires, and the palace levelled with the ground. What rich coaches, sedans and couches, with rare vessels of argenteo, and jewels of all kinds, were consumed in this place! There were also a great number of curious pictures found here. The profane were burnt, but some holy pieces were sent to divers churches, reserving for the fire the frames of them, although they were very gallant and rich, which course they observed in all other places. The heat of this fire was so great, that it reached to a monastery of nuns, of the order of St. Francisco, hard by, who cried out that they were all destroyed. It also included a library of books, the leaves whereof flew up aloft, and the words were legible in the air, one of which leaves happened to fall upon the ground, which treated of the nobility of the ancient Dukes of Milan.

It would be tedious to describe the desolation and ruin caused by those conflagrations, with the quantity, and quality of the goods destroyed. It may be merely observed, that all these cruelties (termed by the people just revenges) were exercised upon all those who were put down in Masaniello's list, as devoted to destruction. Among these were the palaces of many of the nobles. The owners of many of these mansions, wishing to save their property, endeavoured to elude the vigilance of the rioters, by privately conveying them to various monasteries and convents; but Masaniello having notice of this, caused the inmates of these religious houses to deliver them up, under the pain of a similar visitation; and, not venturing to refuse, they were consigned to the rabble, who immediately threw them into the flames. So violent were they on their work of destruction, that some splendid coaches, which were discovered concealed with their horses alive, were also thrown into the flames, and consumed to ashes.

The most diligent search, in the meanwhile, was made for the original charter of Charles V. in the Convent of St. Lawrence, where the archives of the city were kept; and not finding it there, the people grew more tumultuous than before, ordering every thing they found to be burnt, among which was the picture of the Spanish king, which they had formerly carried about with them, exposed under a rich canopy, and exclaiming, "Let the king live! Let the accursed government die!" Among the bands which went abroad that day, were many women with arquebuses on their shoulders, like so many amazons. One of these, well dressed and handsome, having the royal arms upon her head, encircled by a writing in large letters, "Long live the king, and the most faithful people of Naples!" and having a naked sword in her right hand and a poniard in her left. They now declared that they would be masters of the Convent and Tower of St. Lawrence. This they demanded, because they feared its situation; inasmuch as their head-quarters in the market-place were exposed to its cannon; and as it was the arsenal of the city, by obtaining possession of it, they could provide themselves with arms and ammunition. They had, indeed, made an attempt upon it on Sunday, the first day of the insurrection, but being then few in number, they met with a vigorous repulse from some banditti who were in the belfry. The case, however, was now altered; 10,000 of them surrounded the place, ranged themselves in order of the battle, and prepared for an assault, by placing two large pieces of cannon before the tower, with the intention of battering it down. But the friars soon abandoned the monastery, leaving behind them only a few novices, some noblemen, and about sixty Spaniards, sent on the previous evening to guard the tower, and who soon surrendered, on the conditions that their lives should be spared and their clothing preserved. Overjoyed at their success, the rioters rushed into the convent, seized all the arms, and eighteen pieces of cannon, placed there for the service of the city. The former were distributed among the people, and the latter ordered to be planted at certain streets, with a sufficient guard. Masaniello then commanded the great bell to sound to arms; declaring, at the same time, that it was not for rebellion, but only that the people should be ready to defend their rights and liberties; and to make his intentions the more plausible, he caused the standard of Spain, and the ensigns of the city, to be displayed from the top of the steeples. About this time, having notice by his scouts that some Spaniards, quartered in the neighbouring villages, were marching towards Naples, Masaniello despatched a party to meet them, who, after disarming them, sent them back to their former stations, while he proceeded himself, at the head of a considerable body, to stop the progress of 500 Germans, sent from Capua by the governor of that city to aid the viceroy. As soon as Masaniello approached, they laid down their arms, and were led to Naples, where they were so well treated by the fisherman, that they went up and down the streets exclaiming, "Long live the most faithful people of Naples!"

While the people were thus revenging themselves on their pretended adversaries, the two original charters of Ferdinand and Charles V., which they so earnestly desired to possess, were discovered, and brought to the viceroy by the chief elect of the nobility, and Don Joseph Caracciolo, who had been indefatigable in their search after them. The viceroy, on this discovery, sent for the archbishop, and, delivering them into his hands, with a ratification of the privileges therein contained, desired him to go to the market-place, and show them to the people; at which the archbishop rejoiced greatly, not doubting that he would be able to allay the commotions.

The archbishop was received in the market-place with the greatest reverence and honour, and proceeded to the church of the Lady of Carmine, amid the applauses of the people. As soon as he entered the church, he exhibited the original charters, which he read with a loud voice, and which seemed to be received by all as if with a jubilee of contentment. Yet, some rebellious spirits who were among them, as if by the secret excitement of the devil, pretending to suspect the archbishop's sincerity, began to cry out, "Will your eminence also deceive us?" which produced such a movement, as made the archbishop apprehensive of his safety. He asked Masaniello, who stood near him, what was the matter. "Most eminent sir," replied Masaniello, "the people still suspect that this charter is not the true one, and that your eminence goes about to baffie us; but I do not believe it; and I will turn against them in your defence, or kill myself, knowing well how punctually honourable your eminence is." The bishop answered, "My dear son, these privileges and charters are the very same which Charles V. subscribed, and which the people desire; but in order that you may be convinced, find me an intelligent man and I will deliver it to him, leaving it in his hands; and for a sign of the truth, I will not stir hence till you are satisfied. You ate my sons as much as the nobles; and as your pastor and father, I would spill my blood most willingly for my people, as also for the peace and quietness of my dear country." At these words Masaniello grew very quiet, and with him the tumultuous people. So they sent for Doctor Julio Genovino, a most sagacious man, who knew thoroughly the affairs of the city and kingdom by his long experience, being eighty years old, and having been nineteen years a prisoner, during the time of another revolution which happened in the government of Osuna. The archbishop, therefore, delivered the charter to this man, that he might study and review it, which he did all the night following with most exact diligence, during the whole of which time the bishop remained in the church of Carmine. And it was by the disposition of God Almighty, and the most blessed Virgin, that this happened; for that very night thirty-six houses of cavaliers were to be burnt.

It happened, however, that while the charter was in the hands of Genovino, a whisper ran throughout the multitude, distrusting the intentions of the viceroy. Fearing that, if they dispersed, they would still feel the governor's vengeance, and as they conceived that he had by no means given them a sufficient security in pledge for the entire removal of the gabels, they simultaneously exclaimed, that the original charter was of little value, as long as the viceroy's ratification was lame and imperfect, and that, therefore, articles of capitulation must be drawn up by some of their party, and signed by the viceroy, and the several councils and tribunals of the kingdom. The archbishop, astonished at this new demand, could only say, that he would send to the viceroy, and ascertain his pleasure therein. Accordingly, the prelate sent some of his attendants to the viceroy, informing him of the new demand; who, prudently concluding that it was of no use to employ force, sent a letter in reply to the archbishop, desiring him to let "the most faithful people know, that whatever articles they should draw up, would not only be signed, as they desired, but that he would get them ratified as soon as possible by the king of Spain."

When this was announced to the people, it was some time before they could agree among themselves about the person to draw up the said articles; but at length they selected Genovino, and commanded that they should be read publicly in the market-place on the following morning, before they were presented to the viceroy. It is said, that one of the articles proposed was, that the castle of St. Elmo should be delivered up to the people; and that Masaniello seemed to approve of it, when Genovino stood up, and said, "that although the people might legally take up arms to maintain and defend their rights and privileges, pursuant to the decision of Pisanello, and several other most learned lawyers in 1547, yet they could not insist upon the surrender of the castle of St. Elmo, without incurring the imputation of rebellion." At the word rebellion, Masaniello, who had always protested that his sole design was to shake off the oppression of the gabels, and not his allegiance to the king of Spain, desired that no more might be said about it, for he would rather die than give his consent to a demand that would make him pass for a rebel. This was no small proof of Genovino's influence with the people, which he farther showed, by causing one of his friends, named Ciccio Arpaia, who had been formerly condemned to the galleys for being concerned in the conspiracy against the nobility under the Duke of Osuna, to be declared elect of the people, which procured even the consent of Masaniello.

THE FOURTH DAY.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10TH, 1647.

The Neapolitan people, not satisfied with publishing unto the world, by outward firing and combustions, the extreme disdain they had taken against the chief authors of the gabels, still ruminated in the night what further revenges were to be taken in the day.

Hence it came to pass, that early upon Wednesday morning, when Aurora had hardly ushered in the sun, Masaniello ordered, that upon pain of death the brigade of his life-guard, in number about 8000 persons, should repair to the palace of the Duke of Caivana, to plunder again the said duke, notice having been received that goods of far greater value were not yet discovered. Thereupon, the soldiers, as swift as lightning, went, in obedience to Masaniello's command, and re-entered the house, where, battering down a door, they found two chambers full of the richest tapestry, with other costly moveables; then, descending into the gardens, they defaced divers marble statues and fountains, grubbed up the flowers and trees, broke down the balconies, and set fire to every thing both in house and garden.

Other acts of outrage were committed; women and boys brought straw and all sorts of combustibles to help the flames, crying, "Though there is little straw left in the houses, it will help to burn the kennels of those dogs who have imposed on us the accursed gabels." Many women brought their infants in their arms, and, putting lighted torches in their hands, would make them throw these into the fire, exclaiming, amid curses, ejaculations, and prayers, "These poor infants shall also take vengeance of the thieves for the bread they have taken out of their mouths. May the king live! May the dogs die the death!"

While the people thus evaporated their high discontents against the enemies of the public good, the lord bishop continued to negotiate with the viceroy, and in addition to the ancient charters of King Ferdinand and Charles V., confirmed by the royal collateral council and council of state, holden expressly for that purpose, he also received a general pardon or indulgence for the people of Naples, the tenor whereof was as follows:

"Philip by the Grace of God, King, &c.

"Don Roderico P. de Leon, Duke of Arcoa.

"We, by an everlasting privilege, do grant to the most faithful people of this most faithful city of Naples, that all gabels and impositions be extinct and abolished which were laid upon the city of Naples, and the kingdom, from the time of the Emperor Charles V. of happy memory, until this hour. Moreover, we grant a general pardon for any offence whatsoever committed, since the beginning of this present revolution to this point of time; as also, for every offence and inquisition passed that related to the said revolution.

"Given in Castle Nuovo, 10th of July, 1647.

"EL DUQUE DE ARCOA.

"DOMATA COPPOLA,
Secretary of the Kingdom."

These charters and privileges having been delivered to Don Julio Genovino on the part of the people, and the former pronounced by him to be genuine, the business seemed now brought to so hopeful a pass, that a motion was made by the viceroy for a solemn cavalcade to the church del Carmine, where all the nobility should attend him, that the capitulations of peace might be publicly read, and Te Deum sung, to give God thanks for all his goodness. This being intimated to Masaniello, he consented thereunto, yet commanded the people to continue vigilant, and ordered every enrolled soldier to have his arms ready, and not to stir from his post upon pain of death.

There was now great hope of seeing the distractions at an end. The rabble, satisfied with the vengeance they had taken, and dazzled by the prospects of so many immunities and privileges they were on the point of enjoying, abated of their former fury, and even sighed after peace. But a fatal and unexpected accident entirely ruined these good dispositions, and blew up the flames of discord to a greater height than ever.

At the very time when the market place, as well as the church and convent of Carmine, were crowded with an infinite multitude of people, who all waited with impatience, to learn the success of the negotiation, about 500 banditti, well armed and mounted, came into the market place, where they were received with demonstrations of joy, upon their giving out that they had been sent for by Dominico Perrone, and were come for the service of the most faithful people.

As soon as Masaniello saw them, he thanked them for their good will; and, telling them to alight, appointed them different quarters of the city, where they should expect his further orders afoot; upon which, Perrone told him, he judged it much more proper to assign them a separate standing to themselves, and by no means to dismount them; because, being on horseback, they would be much readier to assist him in case of necessity. To this, Masaniello replied, that it was altogether unnecessary, and that they would be as serviceable to him on foot as on horseback. But, Perrone warmly insisting upon their going mounted, and in a body, without being able to give any good reason for it, Masaniello began to suspect that some dark business was going forward; and, therefore, peremptorily commanded the banditti to go afoot to the quarters he assigned them, and not to stir an inch without his order. He had no sooner spoken, than a musket was fired off; which, Masaniello looking upon as the signal of some mischief, cried out, "Treason, treason! there is a plot on foot!" when five muskets were immediately fired upon him by some of the banditti, who had slid themselves among the crowd that surrounded him; and though a bullet or two came so near to him, as to singe his shirt, yet he received not the least hurt. The people, seeing their general alive and without harm, cried out one and all, that God, and the Lady of Carmine, whose medal hung upon his breast, had protected Masaniello; then fell without mercy upon the banditti, and having killed thirty of them upon the spot, they pursued the rest into the church and convent of Carmine, whither they had taken shelter. Nor could the holiness of the place secure them from the people's rage; who, in an instant, turned it into a scene of blood and cruelty. Nothing was to be heard on all sides, but the piercing cries of the wounded, who, whilst calling for confessors, met with the stroke of death. Two of them were slain at the foot of the great altar; and another under the very seat where the archbishop sat, whither he had fled for safety. In short, the whole pavement was covered with slaughtered bodies; among whom were Dominico Perrone and Gregorio Perrone, the former having lost his life for being an accomplice in the conspiracy, and the latter for being brother to the former. Captain Antimo Grasso lost his life also; having first declared, that the banditti had been sent by the Duke of Mataloni, and Don Pepe Caraffa, his brother, to revenge, by the death of Masaniello, the insults he had received from the rabble; that Dominico Perrone was privy to the plot; and that several troops more of banditti were to come into the city at the close of day, who, favoured by the night, and the confusion which the death of Masaniello must necessarily create, were to fall unawares upon the people, and cut them into pieces.

One of the banditti taken alive desired his life of Masaniello, and he would discover unto him more than Grasso had confessed, which being promised him, provided his discoveries proved true, he revealed, that the night following, supposing the foresaid five hundred banditti were successful, several other troops of horse were to second them, and set fire to certain mines under the great market-place, when it was fullest of people. These mines, he said, contained fifty cantaras of powder, amounting to fifteen thousand pounds, which, being spread up and down through the bowels of the said market-place, would have blown into the air all the people then present, with the monastery and church del Carmine, insomuch, that there would have perished, besides the destruction of the buildings, holy and profane, about one hundred and fifty thousand souls. When the mines had taken effect, the banditti were to disperse up and down, joining with some of the gentry whom they had brought over to them, and falling upon the rest of the common people, put all to the sword. Upon this being understood by Masaniello, he ordered that, with all possible diligence, those subterranean places should be searched, and upon his declaration being found true and real, he gave the prisoner his life, but with perpetual banishment from the city and kingdom. The said powder being taken up from all those places under ground, did serve the people for many days, for they had great scarcity thereof.

The rabble had now put to death one hundred and fifty banditti; and having dragged their carcasses through all the streets and kennels of the city, they brought their heads to Masaniello, who commanded them, together with those of Perrone and his brother, to be fixed upon poles in the middle of the great market-place; which order was executed accordingly. One would think the spilling of so much blood would atone for the greatest inhumanity, and that the people, after having sacrificed so many lives to their just resentments, would have stopped here and gone no further. But Masaniello, considering his work but half completed, so long as the Duke of Mataloni and Don Pepe Caraffa were not in his power, used his utmost endeavours to find out the place that contained them; when word was brought him, that the latter was in the church of Santa Maria de la Nova, and that the former was at St. Efram, a church belonging to the Capuchin friars. A squadron of armed men were immediately despatched to St. Efram, with orders to bring the duke alive or dead; but having got timely advice by a spy, he put on the disguise of a Capuchin friar, and, upon a swift courser, rode off towards Benevento. The rage of the people was now bent against D. Giuseppe Caraffa; and four thousand persons, all armed, were sent to the foresaid monastery of Santa Maria della Nuova, where he had secured himself, as also his brother, Father Gregorio Caraffa, Prior of la Rocella, who, assisted by God for his innocence, foretold the approaching danger which menaced their destruction. The prior exhorted and conjured his brother that they should betake themselves to a place of greater security; but Don Giuseppe, not giving ear to the exhortation of the prior, yielded to his hard destiny and remained alone in the monastery. The prior having taken leave of him with tears in his eyes, was scarce gone, when the foresaid rabble surprised the place, and rushed in with extreme rage, though for a great while they could not find him, he being hid in the secretest place of the monastery, whence he tried to give notice to the viceroy of his desperate condition. Having written a note for this purpose, it was sewed betwixt the sole and the shoe of a poor friar, to whom he gave a good reward to go with it to the castle. But the bearer had scarcely set out before he was stopped, and searched from head to foot; and the said note being found, they fell upon him most furiously, and chopped off his head.

Caraffa hereupon lost all hopes of preserving himself, if he remained in the monastery, and therefore resolved to attempt an escape; but in order to do this with less danger, he put off his friar's weeds, and apparelled himself in a secular habit. He now leaped out of a window of the monastery over against the shop of a silk weaver, and going into the next house, where a mean woman dwelt, he hid himself under a bed, praying her (with a large promise of reward) to conceal him; but the ill-natured and base woman, promising herself a greater reward from the promiscuous crew, delivered him into their hands. Having seized upon him, they dragged him along the little piazza of Ceriglio; and, notwithstanding that he promised twelve thousand crowns in good gold if they would suffer him to escape, and although some began to hearken to such a proffer, the greater number barbarously cried out, "Kill him, kill the traitor!" at which words, among others who slashed him with daggers and stilettos, Michael de Sanctis, a young fellow, son to a butcher hard by, with a great knife cut off his head. The joy of the rabble upon this occasion was as great as if they had taken off the head of the grand Turk, and cut to pieces the whole Ottoman empire. They fixed the head of Caraffa upon a pike, and bore it in triumph to the market-place, crying as they went along, "Thus may all those perish, who are traitors to the most faithful people!" The head was now presented to Masaniello, who, taking it into one hand, and striking it several times with a cane which he held in the other, made a speech to it, wherein he upbraided Caraffa with the pride and cruelty which he had shown upon several occasions, as if he had been still living; then commanded it to be put in an iron grate, and nailed to a post erected for that purpose, without the gate of St. Gennaro, facing the Duke of Mataloni's palace, with this inscription underneath—"Don Pepe Caraffa, Rebel to his Country, and Traitor to the Most Faithful People."

This tragical adventure made different impressions upon the minds of those who were witnesses of it. The people beheld it with unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction; but the nobles were struck with fear and horror. They knew not what to think, or what to expect, after such a terrible example made of one of their order, who at other times used to make the whole city, nay the very kingdom, tremble at his name. And what increased their apprehensions still the more, was, that since the discovery of the banditti's plot, the better sort of citizens, who as yet had had no hand in the tumult, now rose in arms, and joined themselves to the rabble.

In the mean time, Masaniello, from a tribunal in the market-place, environed with heads and bloody carcasses, was thundering against the nobility; and not satisfied with the death of Caraffa, he issued out a proclamation, whereby he declared the Duke of Mataloni an enemy to the most faithful people, and promised a reward of 30,000 crowns, with the ransom of 150 outlaws, for his apprehension. Having also grown suspicious since the discovery of the conspiracy against his person, Masaniello made no scruple to believe, that it had been contrived by, or at least carried on with consent and approbation of, the viceroy; and therefore, with a view to reduce him to such straits as should at once revenge him, and force the viceroy to accept of whatever conditions he thought fit to impose upon him, he commanded that no refreshments or provisions should pass into the castle, where he and his duchess, with the counsels, king's ministers, and officers of state, resided.

He commanded also, because he intended to choke them with thirst, as well as to furnish them with hunger, that all the aqueducts should be cut off; and the viceroy, seeing himself in so scurvy a condition, despatched a letter to the archbishop, requesting that he would make known to the people his sincere intentions towards them, and that he was a mere stranger to the practices of the banditti, and their abominable conspiracies; for proof whereof, he assured them that he had used all human industry to apprehend those banditti, and deliver them to the hands of the people, to do with them what they pleased.

THE FIFTH DAY.

THURSDAY, JULY 11TH, 1647.

It is well known, from what Pliny and others affirm, that in the Olympic games, it often happened that the judges gave the prize in doubtful combats, not so much according to the valour of the combatants, as in compliance with the wishes of the people; and one may very naturally think, Masaniello being young and of very low birth, that he obtained the truncheon of general command, not so much in reward of his own merits, as that the empty breath of popular applause was now blowing strongly in his favour. It appears, however, that Masaniello, although a mere fisherman, or rather a fisherman's boy, had sagacity enough to uphold the high command which he had assumed. Throughout the whole of the important events of the last few days, in which he had been so conspicuously engaged, he had conducted himself with so much wisdom and discretion, and with such rigorous justice, as to have raised a kind of admiration in the minds of all men; and particularly in that of the archbishop, who, more than any other, had occasion to try his capacity, from the first day of his reign until the end of his usurped dominion. He had unspeakable boldness, which seemed wonderful to those present, and will seem incredible to the absent: not the forwardness of a plebeian, or of some abject fellow, but that of some great martial commander; and therefore, with threats in his looks, terror in his gestures, and revenge in his countenance, he subjugated Naples—Naples, the head of such a kingdom, the metropolis of so many provinces, the queen of so many cities, the mother of princes, the birth-place of glorious heroes. By the impenetrable judgment of Heaven, this Naples, with a population of six hundred thousand souls, saw herself commanded by a poor fisherman, who, within a few hours, raised an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, dug trenches, appointed sentinels, placed spies, reviewed squadrons, condemned the guilty, comforted the fearful, encouraged the bold, threatened the suspected, reproached the coward, applauded the valiant, promised rewards, and marvellously incited those, who were by many degrees his superiors, to battle, to burnings, to plunder, and to death. The whole city, yea the very Spaniards, stood astonished, that in so great, and so confused a multitude of armed men, he could proceed so regularly in his orders, and that these orders were so punctually observed,—that he should be so ob-servant to ladies, so respectful to holy church and her officers, suffering no outrage to be offered to them, save only in Santa Maria della Nuova while in quest of Caraffa; and that, amid such a world of wealth, which was burned up and down, not the value of a pin should be converted to private use.

Many papers having been circulated the preceding evening, wherein inkings were given of some notable design against the people, the first order published by Masaniello, early upon Thursday morning, was, that all men should go without cloaks, gowns, wide cassocks, or such like, which was generally obeyed, not only by the common sort, but by all the nobility, churchmen, and religious orders; yea even by the canons and dignitaries of the cathedral churches, the chaplains of the Archbishop Filomarino, Cardinal Trivulzio, the viceroy, the apostolical nuncio, and of all the bishops residing then in Naples: And if we give credit to the relation of many, their eminences themselves went without upper garments all the while that Masaniello reigned, every one submitting to him.

He commanded also that all women, of what degree or quality soever they were, should go without farthingales, which was also obeyed; and that, when they went abroad, they should tuck up their petticoats somewhat high, that it might be discerned whether they carried any arms underneath; it having been discovered, that under such long robes sundry sorts of arms were brought to the banditti, and other enemies of the people. That morning, also, all the streets were intrenched, and the cannons from the magazine of San Lorenzo were brought down, set upon carriages, and placed in divers parts of the city; and companies, both of foot and horse, were dispersed up and down, well armed, to be able to withstand any force.

Masaniello also commanded, that all cavaliers and noble personages, under pain of death, should deliver their arms into the hands of such officers as he should commission; and that all their servants should also give up their weapons for the service of the people. This was accordingly done, although with a very bad grace; for they plainly perceived the design of this disarming, which was not only to render them unable to make any opposition, but to expose them to the mercy of the furious people their enemies.

That day there was also an excise put upon all eatable commodities, regulating at what price they should be sold; and in sundry places of the city, divers pictures were set up of Charles the emperor, and of his catholic majesty Philip IV., now regnant, with the arms of the city of Naples drawn underneath; which, when the soldiers passed, they were directed to cry out, "Let the king of Spain live, and let the ill government die!"

While the commands of Masaniello were thus published and executed every where throughout the city, the archbishop, who from Tuesday morning had kept himself within the monastery of Carmine, to be able to negotiate with Masaniello, and the other heads of the people, did not neglect to publish a true account of his own and the viceroy's intentions, in the fervent hope that he would be able to appease this high popular fury, which every day, every hour, yea, every moment, increased with still greater fury. He next went into the castle the capuchin Filomarino, his brother, in order to induce the viceroy to give his assent to what was demanded, assuring him that the people were inclined towards peace, and that, therefore, it now all depended with his excellency; and that, if said assent was longer delayed, he could not but prognosticate a total and irreparable ruin to both city and kingdom. The viceroy received this message with great satisfaction; and, to show his readiness to comply with the wishes of the archbishop, he wrote him a very affectionate letter, wherein, after demonstrating the ardent disposition which he had for the public tranquillity, and which, indeed, the late interruption alone had prevented being felt, he declared himself willing to be guided solely by his eminence; and in proof of it that he would ratify whatsoever his eminence promised to the people, that no longer delay might take place in carrying and returning propositions and answers from one side to the other.

The archbishop, having received from the viceroy this ample commission, held a conference with Masaniello and his counsellors, Genovio and Arpaia, in the church of Carmine; and, reading unto them the viceroy's letter, with much dexterity and eagerness he reall of which being brought before Masaniello, he commanded that all his moveables and goods should be put in a magazine near the great market-place, and that none should touch the least thing, but that the moneys should be employed to pay the soldiers.

Masaniello also commanded a body of armed men to go into the country, and demolish the house of the Duke of Calviuso, and burn all the furniture and goods that were there deposited; which was done. The palace of Mataloni, which was in Chiaia, was also pitifully set on fire; nay, the rabble took the portraits of his ancestors, and consigned them to the flames; first mangling them most horribly, thrusting them through with their swords, plucking out their eyes, and cutting off their noses and heads; and having returned to the great market-place, they hung another picture of the Duke of Mataloni under the body of Don Poppo Caraffa, with this motto underneath, "The Duke of Mataloni, rebel to his majesty, and traitor to the most faithful people." After this, further commands were given by Masaniello to burn the goods of other officers, and particularly of the king's visitor; yet this command was revoked by the effectual intercession of the Archbishop Filomarino. It was also ordered that the Regent Zuffias should run the same fortune; but the execution was suspended, and no man knew why, unless it was because certain troops of horse were quartered at his house, which was intrenched round about.

There arrived in the port at that time thirteen galleys of the squadron of Naples; and the General Gianettino Doris having sent notice thereof to the viceroy, with desire to land some men for provisions, the viceroy ordered that he should make his address to Masaniello; which being done, he immediately commanded fresh victuals, with a supply of money, to be sent to the general; but with this proviso, that the galleys should go farther off the port, and that none should set foot ashore, either soldier or passenger, not even the general himself.

In the mean time all people went up and down the streets with as much security, and all kinds of shops were opened with as much freedom, and as little fear, both by night and day, as if there had been no soldiery at all in the town, or occasion of outrage, so great were the apprehensions of fear and terror, which were implanted in every one's heart, of the rigorous and inflexible justice exercised by Masaniello.

The viceroy, all this while, seeing himself as it were besieged in the castle, deprived of provision, and all sorts of victuals and refreshments, sent to Masaniello that he might be furnished accordingly. Thereupon fifty porters were sent unto him, laden with bread, wine, fruit, flesh, poultry, sweetmeats, and all other things that were eatable.

As Masaniello had, the night before, sent to the viceroy, that he much wondered he had not seen Cardinal Trivulzio, the said cardinal was advised by the archbishop to give him a visit; for Masaniello was come now to that height, that he expected observance from every one, even from the princes of the church. Therefore, to prevent some rude affronts and outrages, which vulgar minds are subject to offer, the cardinal went from the castle to the great market-place to visit Masaniello, which he did, by giving him the title of illustrissimo. But the first words which Masaniello addressed to him were laughed at, which were, "The visit which your eminence gives me, though it be late, yet it is dear unto me." His eminence having paid his respects to his most illustrious lordship, when he departed, Masaniello commanded two files of musketeers to guard and conduct him to the castle. The Cardinal Trivulzio was scarce gone, when some gentlemen came from the castle with presents to Masaniello from the viceroy, thanking him for the refreshments which he had sent into the castle; and also bringing some compliments from the duchess, who desired to know how he did, and begged that, for her sake, he would make use of what were sent. Among other things, there was a rich suit of apparel sent him; a strange metamorphosis of fortune, and so capricious and rare, that these things will seem incredible, and mere romances to future ages, though all be a true and real story.

THE SEVENTH DAY.

SATURDAY, THE 13th OF JULY, 1647.

Masaniello, already pronounced captain-general of the Neapolitan people, was advised that there was no other means more effectual and sure to overcome and triumph over any projects against his person or the people, than punctual submission, and which he so exacted, that the least act of disobedience was punished with death, as being held a capital crime. Hence, having heard, that upon Friday night some went up and down the streets to sound the shopkeepers, endeavouring to make them see their slavery, the first thing he did at break of day, was to publish, by sound of drum and trumpet, that, upon pain of death, those seducers should be revealed; some of whom being found out and appeached, they were hanged before those shops where they committed the offence. There were gibbets set up in other places of the city, whereon divers were executed that day; among others, two vassals of the Duke of Mataloni, who were discovered to have brought some letters in their shoes, which, because they were written in ciphers, were adjudged to contain matter of rebellion, or some sinister counsels and incitements to sedition.

It was told him this day, that there was a great burglary and theft committed in the palace of the Prince del Colle Cavaliero; and at first it was thought to be by some of his squadron; but after a diligent examination, it was found to be by some of the banditti, who had taken sanctuary in a little church. They were accordingly dragged out, and executed in the public market-place.

The same morning, there came before him seeking justice a poor girl whose father had been killed; and the brother of him that had killed him being there present, he cried out, that if the fact were pardoned, he would take her for his wife without any dowry; but that kind of marriage did not please Masaniello, because the young maid abhorred it, in regard of the blood of her father; therefore he obliged the brother of the murderer to find out two hundred crows within four and twenty hours for the young maid's dowry, and so the offence should be remitted. A little after this, a murderer was brought before him, who had been a friend to Peverone, and giving him time and confession, he sentenced him to death, and ordered that his head and his feet should be chopped off, and his body dragged up and down the streets. Another bandit was used in the same manner.

It was intimated the same Saturday morning, that two squadrons, with seven hundred Spaniards, should immediately go abroad to find out the banditti, who, according to report, were in bands together, in divers places, ready to invade the city. He also caused a proclamation of grace to be published, that what banditti soever should discover any such plot, should be absolutely pardoned, provided he was not depending upon the Duke of Mataloni. He farther commanded, that all artisans should work openly in their shops, and not within their houses; as also, that all merchants should follow their business, but be ready within half an hour's call to take arms. A message was also brought him from a cavalier, upon some business of consequence; but he answered, "I have nothing to do with cavaliers, for God hath put me here for the people;" and, turning himself to the people, he said, "My people, pray for me, and preserve me well; if ye lose me, we be unto you!"

The same morning there came from the country about Naples innumerable people, and, among them, many women with staves upon their shoulders, and naked swords in their hands, bringing with them their children armed also with something or other, proportionable to their years. They came all to the great market-place to do homage to Masaniello, and to be redressed by him for divers grievances. But while Masaniello was busied in such exercises, Genovino and Arpeja, accompanied by the brother of Masaniello, went to the castle to put the viceroy in mind of his former engagement and promise made upon Thursday night, that he would come upon the Saturday following to the archiepiscopal church, with all the tribunals of the chancery, the council of state and war, with the royal chamber of Santa Chiara, accompanied with all the civil and criminal judges of the great court of the vicaria; in presence of whom, and of the whole people, an oath should be taken, to observe with all punctuality the capitulations, which oath was to be taken by the viceroy and all the tribunals.

In the mean time, the viceroy sent two of his best horses with rich furniture, and led by two of his servants, to be at the service of Masaniello and his brother, who, being mounted upon them, apparelled both in cloth and silver, Masaniello carried in one hand a naked sword, in the other the charter of Charles the emperor; and his brother carried the capitulations made with the viceroy, to be read publicly, and to be sworn to in the archbishop's palace. There rode in their company the elects of the people, Francesco Arpeja and Julio Genovino, besides others of the civil sort among the people. And because the multitude increased through all the streets, and encompassed them on all sides, so that they could neither pass forward nor backward, Masaniello, with a loud voice, commanded "That none should stir a step further;" which was accordingly obeyed. They now rode to the palace of the viceroy, with a trumpet sounding before them, where, after being shortly entertained by him, his excellency, and the counsellors and prime officers, accompanied them towards the archbishop's palace. First, there were many trumpeters on horseback, then a choice troop of one hundred horse, then Masaniello and his brother, after them the elect of the people, and old Genovino, who, by reason of his great age, was carried in a sedan. After these came the captain of guard to the viceroy, and immediately after the viceroy himself, with his pages, lacqueys, and horses, and his grand of Germane, with a great number of gentlemen and cavaliers, domestic and foreign, and surrounded with a crowd of people, who, together with the viceroy cried out with loud acclamations, "Viva il Re di Spagna!" The bells rang in every church as they passed, which filled the hearts of all with joy and pleasure. Small and great, women and children, cried out, "Viva il Re!" but many cried out, "Let the king live, but without gabel!" and some Spaniards were overheard to cry, "Let the king live, for now he may say he is king!" In passing through the Piazza of St. Lorenzo, Masaniello stopped there awhile, and with him the whole cavalcade. Turning himself to the people, he cried out with a very loud voice, "May God live! may the king of Spain live! may the Cardinal Filomarino live! may the Duke de Arces live! may the fidelissimo popolo di Napoli live!" and all the people took the word, and, with strong echoes, cried out, "Viva! Viva!" doubling and redoubling the sound with incredible exclamations.

Having arrived at the archbishop's palace, and dismounted, they entered the church, being met by the archbishop, all his canons, chaplains, and officers. They then advanced to the great altar, where the archbishop being set on a throne, as also the viceroy, and all the tribunals who were there attending, Cavalier Donato Coppola, secretary to the kingdom, read, with an audible voice, the capitulations desired by the people, Masaniello standing all the while on foot upon the steps of the archbishop's throne, and, to the astonishment of all, adding, taking away, correcting and interpreting all things as he pleased, no man interrupting or replying unto him. After the articles were read, a solemn oath was taken by the viceroy, and all the ministers and officers of state, to observe the said capitulations; promising also, and swearing to procure their ratification by his catholic majesty. When this was done, two choirs sang Te Deum laudamus; during which Masaniello was observed to swell with a kind of glory, at having attained his ends with so much felicity and applause. Nevertheless, he carried still in his hand a naked sword, and sent many arrogant and ridiculous messages to the viceroy. The first was, that thenceforward he should continue to be captain-general of the city. The second was, that by virtue thereof, he intended to go with a guard, and to give patents to all officers of war and arms. The third, that he would dismiss from the castle all cavaliers. These and such like messages he sent to the viceroy separately, and there were affirmative answers brought back to each, not to disturb the ceremony with negatives; but the gentleman that delivered these messages made an apology for himself privately in the ear of the viceroy, for indeed most people there did blush, or laugh, or jeer, at the sudden impertinence of Masaniello.

While these messages were sent, Te Deum was ended; then Masaniello began to reason, sometimes to good purpose, sometimes senselessly. He said, that the most faithful people of Naples were naturally spirited and vivacious, and were so esteemed by all nations; but that they had almost quite lost their wonted magnanimity and courage, by the heavy weight of so many exactions and gabels which were imposed upon them from time to time, not by their catholic majesties, but by evil ministers, and their own associates. During this discourse he so heated himself, and protested with such a fury and excess of zeal, and the words proceeded from him so incoherently, as to make all the people amazed and surprised with a kind of dumb astonishment. Having finished his discourse, he began to tear in pieces the rich dress he had on, and desired the archbishop and the viceroy to help him off with it, saying, that as he had only put it on for the honour of the ceremony, it was now become useless since that was ended; that for his part, he had done all he had to do, and would now return to his hook and line. This proceeding seems to have been a prelude to the madness which not long after possessed him. However, being made to understand that it would be very indecent to strip in the church, and in the sight of so many persons, he went out with the viceroy, who, with all the mobility and gentry that attended him, made a procession through the most public streets of the city, and then returned to the castle, where he was saluted with several peals of ordnance. Masaniello, having taken his leave of the viceroy, went back to his house in the market-place, through all the acclamations and blessings that were due from the people to the great saviour of their privileges.

THE EIGHTH DAY.

SUNDAY, JULY 14TH, 1647.

It is impossible to express the rejoicings of the people of Naples for the capitulations of peace which were signed and sworn the day before, which rejoicings ended not that day, but continued upon Sunday. The articles were printed, and fixed through all places of the city, that all things might be manifested to the world, and every one contended who should express greater happiness. Such a general jubilee indeed was among them, that it drew tears from many, which, falling upon the ground, made flowers of joy to spring up, which the heaviness of former times had caused to fade.

And because the beginning of this reformation, and consequently of this joy, preceded from Masaniello, and from his stout undertakings, he was extolled with the highest praises by every one, and cried up to be Liberator Patrie, to be the saviour of his country, and the saviour of public liberty, from the tyranny and gripes of so many ravenous wolves, both in city, court, and kingdom; who, glutting themselves with the common blood of the people, increased their wealth by the poverty of others. And yet all this was effected, not by the hand of some invincible emperor, of some warlike prince, but by a poor young fellow, a barefooted fisherman. This made it far more admirable; and they attributed it the more to God, who chooseth the weak things of the world to confound the strong.

After the publication of the capitulations and general agreement, the city of Naples seemed to wear a new face, for there was no more fear of any war, or of further combustions, and consequently no need of any armed bands, or caution for the maintenance and defence of the people from the insults of enemies. Nevertheless, it seemed expedient to Masaniello still to continue a military force on foot; and he commanded that every one should stand firm to his post: Nor was it unnecessary or superfluous policy; because the city, after so general a convulsion, could not presently recover her former health; nor, after so many conflagrations, could she be secure till the fire had been quite extinguished.

Hence it came to pass, that the soldiers still remaining up and down the city, Masaniello began to command more like an absolute master or tyrant than a captain-general. It being known on Sunday morning that four banditti had fled for sanctuary to the church of Carmine among the Jesuits, he sent a considerable band of armed men to encompass both cloister and church, whose gates being shut, the assaulters made their entrance by pick-axes, so that a great hole being made in the wall, they rushed in and took one of them, chopping off his head presently, as they did afterwards to the three others. And because one of those fathers, being zealous for the church immunities, had made some resistance for the preservation of those miserable men, he was so mortally wounded that he died a few days after.

Notice being also given, that within the monastery of nuns called Della Croce di Lucca, many of the goods of Caesar Luprano were deposited, he having two daughters who were nuns there, Masaniello commanded some captains to proceed thither, and to bring into the market-place the said goods, with orders, that if the nuns made any resistance, to threaten them with the firing of the monastery. This was put in speedy execution; and the soldiers repairing thither unhinged the gates of the religious house, which struck such a terror into them that one of them was like to have breathed her last; which, being related by a flying messenger unto the archbishop, his eminence was moved, and therefore sent to Masaniello, who, to excuse himself, answered, "He knew nothing of it, but that it was done without his order, and he would therefore punish those captains." This he did; for, ordering them before him, they were examined, and so executed. But still he was resolved to have those goods, which were accordingly delivered to him by those nuns.

Masaniello having given strict command that none should dare to go out of the city without his express licence; and Caffarelli, archbishop of Santa Severina, having occasion to remove himself from Naples, where he then resided, to Calabria, to visit his own church, he went in a short habit, and without a cloak (such an order being still in force) to the house of Masaniello, to obtain leave of him. When Masaniello beheld him, he said, "What wilt thou have, my good lord?" He answered, "That I may safely pass to my church of Santa Severina in Calabria, with your good leave." "My lord," answered Masaniello, crying at the same time, "Who waits there? Let four hundred of my men go and accompany my lord as far as his archbishopric." The archbishop thanked him, saying, that he went by sea. "By sea?" said he, "then let forty feluccas be provided to attend my lord archbishop." He answered there was no need, because he had already taken four for the transport of himself and his family, which were sufficient, and to have more would be an encumbrance unto him, and troublesome. "Well, well; your lordship may do what you please," replied Masaniello; "but at least you shall not refuse to accept of this small bag of double pistoles," which he presented unto him, saying, "Take this, to defray the charge of your voyage." The prelate thereupon smiled, and, giving him many thanks, he refused them a good while, saying, he wanted them not; but he was constrained to receive 500, which he did for fear of hazarding his head, by denying such a capricious and frantic man; then, giving him a license in writing, he embraced him, and said, "My lord, go in safety." A little after, a gentleman of Auvers, of the family of Tufo, came to speak with him upon business of his own; and having despatched him, he gave him a kick behind, saying, "Begone, I make thee Prince of Auvers."

That morning he commanded the house of a widow baker to be burnt, because she had made light bread. He caused also an abbot to be beheaded, called Nicholas Auetrano, and three others, being dependents of Mataloni. He issued an order, that it was his pleasure the jesuits, the certosini, the benedictines, and the friars of Mount Olivet, should pay a great sum of money for the service of the people. He commanded also to bring before him sundry rich men; and, asking them first if they were loyal to their king, upon their answering that they were, he made them subscribe to a writing, wherein every one bound himself to pay him so much money, telling them that he did so to observe the word given the day before to his excellency, to make a donative of five millions of gold to his majesty; towards whom, being desirous to show himself more devoted and faithful, he issued a proclamation, that none should go for the future dressed according to the mode of France; and repeated his former orders, that every one should have the king's arms and that of the people on his door, and that every one should tend his shop, with arms ready upon all occasions.

The same morning, Pizzicarolo, a cousin of Masaniello, went to the palace, and said openly, that he began to grow mad, and that, if he did not give over his firings and burnings, his throat would be cut by his own friends. This Pizzicarolo had more power over him than any other, for he took no meat from any hand but from his. But Masaniello had grown odiously proud; he would order and contradict a thing at the same instant; his head had begun to turn, being mounted so high, and from a simple fisherman having become a kind of monarch. All people obeyed him—viceroy, bishops, and all—who humoured him all the while, not doubting but he would at last break his own neck. Hence it came to pass, that from an humble and zealous spirit, he became a fool and a tyrant, issuing such rigorous proclamations, commanding so many heads to be chopped off, so many palaces to be burnt, merely to please his own caprice, and to make himself formidable. He would ride on horseback alone, and make the round of the city, imprisoning and torturing whom he pleased, shutting up shops, preaching and railing against the nobility and gentry, not sparing the viceroy himself, but threatening to take off his head. Yet when he spoke of the king, he named him with a great deal of reverence, taking off his hat, and bowing his body; but it appeared very ridiculous, that he made boys and mean fellows captains, camp-masters, and officers of war.

In the afternoon, divers of the people, and some commanders made by Masaniello himself, sent to the archbishop to complain that they were clapt in prison for small matters, and some were condemned to have their heads severed from their bodies. Upon which the archbishop spoke to him by way of advice; but when he saw him obstinate, he desired him at least to defer the execution of those men till the day following, it not being fitting to shed human blood upon a Sunday, and stain the holy Sabbath with such sacrifices of cruelty. The archbishop spoke to him with candour and winning affability, and, turning his discourse to other factious stories, he obtained of him a delay of the execution; and to recreate his tired spirits, he wished him to go to take the refreshments and pleasures of Posilipo for awhile.

The same day towards the evening, Father Rossi, a theologian of the archbishop, went with a message to Masaniello, desiring that the people might lay down their arms, for he was secure enough now without soldiers, and again recommending that his excellency should retire for awhile to Posilipo to refresh himself. This message pleased him well; and all things necessary being provided, many soldiers were disbanded, which was done without any grumbling or questioning.

A little after, Masaniello went from the market, accompanied by a great mob, to the castle, all the way afoot in a loose habit, having one of his legs bare, and without band, hat, or sword, but running like a madman. He made a sign to the serjeant-major of the Spanish guard, that they should make no noise; so he entered, and said to the viceroy that he wished to eat, for he was ready to perish of hunger. The viceroy, looking to his servants, said, "Bring something to eat for the Lord Masaniello." "No, sir," he replied, "let us go take fresh air at Posilipo, and let us eat together there, for I have provision already." And saying this, he caused some mariners to enter with baskets of fruit. The viceroy excused himself as well as he could, because he was troubled with a great pain in the head, but said he would be very glad of his company at any other time. So he gave orders, that his own gondola should be made ready to wait upon Senior Masaniello, who embarked himself, with divers mariners, attended at least by forty feluccas full of musicians, and other sorts of men fit to give him amusement. Many thousands of people ran to the mole of Chiara to see the spectacle; and in his way, he gave orders that some should go to the oaroom regular of St. Lateran, to draw thence such goods as he had understood were conveyed and deposited there; which was done, and taken to the market-place. As he went along, he threw pieces of gold into the sea, which the mariners swam after, and ducked to take up, in order to show him pleasure and pastime. Then he fell to eating, rather to feasting, for he had very choice provision in the gondola; and they said, that, before he came back, he had drunk twelve bottles of wine called Lacryme Christi. The operation of that wine will be seen in the next day's work, which was Monday. When he returned to Naples in the evening, he gave those of the gondola and feluccas which attended him, ten measures of wheat every one.

The comedy of this day had not been complete, if the wife of Masaniello had not acted her part. About the evening she went to the castle, clad in cloth of silver, with a chain of gold, and other jewels and gallantries; a very stately coach of the Duke of Mataloni, which was made for the day of his marriage, and was valued at least at 8000 crowns. She was accompanied by gentlemen of quality, who complied with the times, and went also richly adorned; but these were no other than Masaniello's mother, two sisters, and kinswomen of his, all fishermen's daughters! A little boy, his sister's son, bore arms upon his sleeve, which showed that his uncle was captain-general of the city of Naples. When she came to the viceroy's palace, there were sedans sent for her and her company, with a guard of halberdiers, pages and lacquies to attend them: and being brought in to the duchess, they were welcomed with dainties. The duchess presented her with a rich diamond; and the visitor-general took the young boy often in his arms, and kissed him. Masaniello's meeting upon the stairs with Cavalier Fonseca, the grand engineer, who used to make captivities, she told him that he should tell the viceroy, that as her son feared nobody but God and his excellency, he ought to desire him to refrain from so much fire and blood.

Masaniello, being returned from his recreation at Posilipo, was so heated with the wine that he had drunk, and with the heat of the sun, that he fell into kind of rage and foolishness. He sent presently to speak with the said Fonseca, and ordered him to make divers inscriptions engraven on marble, to this effect, "Tommaso Aniello of Malphi, Prefect and Captain-General of the most faithful people of Naples." He also gave orders that his commands should be no longer obeyed, but only those of the Duke of Arcoa.

THE NINTH DAY.

MONDAY, 15TH OF JULY, 1647.

If Masaniello, on Saturday when Te Deum was sung in the cathedral church, had renounced all his authority and power into the hands of the viceroy, he returned, as he said and swore he would, to his former vocation of selling fish, he had deserved a statue of

from the people of Naples, to the eternal memory of his magnanimous undertaking, brought to such a successful issue; but boundless ambition cast such a mist before his eyes, that, breaking the reigns of reason, his brain began to turn, and he committed many acts of foolishness and cruelty.

Yet many reasons are urged for the continuance of his command. Some say that he was willing to resign it, but that, by the instigation of his wife, and others of his kindred, he took a resolution to keep it still. Others say, as having heard so from himself, that he still continued his power, because if he left it, he could expect nothing but death, being so generally hated by the nobles and gentry for having burnt and destroyed so many palaces, and put to death so many of their number. Others say, that he still continued his authority, because sense opposed reason, being allured with the sweetness of rule and power.

Yet, if his said usurped dominion had been attended with that humility, discretion and judgment, with which he began his reign, he might, peradventure, have continued longer from that precipice whereinto he tumbled in so short a time. His ruin befel him, because he had broken out into a thousand follies, which were the causes of his tyrannical deportment, and consequently of the universal hatred of the people, who for many days had depended upon him, as upon an oracle, and obeyed him as a sworn and natural king.

But if one be curious to know the reason why he fell into that state, I might tell him, that it was reported a fatal drink had been given him by the viceroy, which was calculated to work upon his brain, making him odious and ridiculous to the people. This, at least, is the opinion of many. It may well be said, also, that the sottishness and foolery which befel him, proceeded from excess of vigilance, care, watchings, and not eating; for he seldom slept, and he ate much more seldom, his head being so full of thoughts, and new affairs pressing upon him continually, whereof his narrow understanding was not capable. The extreme joy likewise at becoming, from a poor fisherman, monarch of such a city as Naples, might have distempred a greater mind than his. Hence it came to pass, that, throwing himself upon his bed, he hardly could close his eyes; but he would suddenly rise up again, telling his wife, "Let us be lords of Naples, and then let us sleep: Up, up, let us put our authority in practice." Then, going to the window, he would face the guard, and call upon them, employing them always upon some design or other, that his usurped dominion should not be idle. What marvel is it, then, all these things being well considered, that he should fall into such foolish extravagances?

On Monday morning Masaniello appeared in the market-place on horseback, with a naked sword in his hand, striking many men, and driving them before him, without provocation. While thus domineering, an old and experienced captain, called Cesar Spano, begged that the command of Tuttevilla's regiment might be consigned unto him, as they were Germans and Walloons, which was done accordingly; but he struck and wounded the old captain, saying, "Be gone when I bid you." Turning his horse's head, he went towards Toledo-street, where, meeting with one who was said to be a spy, he suddenly, without any trial, caused him to be beheaded.

Afterwards he met the prince of Cellamare near the church of St. Joseph. That nobleman was chief post-master of the kingdom, a discreet and well-tempered prince; and to him Masaniello addressed himself, saying, "If he knew any one, though he were the greatest potentate in the world, who favoured Mataloni, he would chop off his head." A little after, there passed by the Duke de Castel di Sangro, Don Ferrante Caracciolo, a cavalier of high esteem in Naples, who, not using any compliment towards Masaniello, he ran a great hazard of his life; for he made him come suddenly out of the coach, telling him that a new elect was to be made over the five piazzas of the nobles: and he would publish an order, that they who deserved that degree should go decently dressed, and that the cavaliers who were sellers of votes should retire to their dwellings barefooted; and so he dismissed him. This being done, he went to the king's stables, and there being many horses there, he said, "These are particular men's horses;" but the grooms told him, they belonged to the king, and that the Lord Carlo Caracciolo, the chief master of the horse in the kingdom, had the charge of them. He asked, "What Carlo? What master of the horse? Am not I every thing? Not acknowledging any one." And saying this, he took for himself and his friends six of the best horses; but, before he had brought them half way to the market-place, recollecting himself, he sent them back to the stables. At the same time he despatched a band of armed men to the hospital, and to the church of Zoccolanti, commanding that the goods of the visitor-general of the kingdom, Don John Ponze de Leon, should be carried to the market-place; but he returned them again, when he was told of the kisses he had given his nephew in the castle the day before; yet he told him there would now be no necessity for a visitor-general, because he himself would look well enough to the abuses of things, and to the public thieves of king and country.

After dinner he sent a peremptory order to Don Ferrante Caracciolo, that, under pain of death, and the burning of his palace, as he had not in the morning come out of his coach to do him reverence, that he should meet him in the market-place. He sent also another message to Don Carlo Caracciolo, master of the king's horse, to do the like. They answered prudently, that they would do what he desired; but holding it derogatory to their honour, instead of going to the market-place, they went to the castle to complain to the viceroy, and deplore the abject and sad condition into which they were plunged, with all the rest of the Neapolitan nobility and gentry. Having related unto him the arrogant message sent them by Masaniello, they said they had resolved to die sooner than to live in such baseness and servitude; for it was a great stain to their reputation to suffer him to rule so long.

The viceroy was extremely vexed to hear of such grievances; but he durst not apprehend Masaniello, as he was well supported by the infatuated people all in arms. While they were discoursing on the means how things might be remedied, Genovino and Arpaia came into the castle, and bitterly complained also against Masaniello. The first spoke very despitely of him, saying that he found himself every moment in no small danger of his life, even more so than he was in the time of the Duke of Ossuna. Arpaia also had his mortifications; he publicly received a box from Masaniello. All people were terrified at him, and affronted; yet they knew not how to remedy themselves, having at his devotion 150,000 men well armed, although the greater part, and the most civil, hated him, especially since the Sunday evening, on account of his inhuman cruelties. It was therefore determined, by the advice of Genovino and Arpaia, that all the people should make their addresses to the viceroy, and assure him, that they not only disliked, but hated the tyranny of Masaniello, and would not obey him any longer; provided they were assured of the observance of their privileges already granted. To this the viceroy readily consented, and promised the confirmation of them by public ban at the Piazza of St. Augustin. But a great number fearing the frowns of Masaniello, came not thither. Two resolved to chain him, and keep him in safe custody all the residue of his life in some castle, for they were not inclined to put him to death for the things he had done for the public good; but he was gone on another excursion to Posilipo.

When Masaniello had returned from Posilipo, he went to the office of the galleys, and provided captains and other commanders for them, though they were far from the port; and thence proceeding to his house in the market-place, he threatened divers captains to take off their heads, as also Genovino and Arpaia, because they had not attended him that day. Nay, he threatened fire to the whole city, because he perceived they had lost the former respect and obedience which they were wont to show him.

Being extremely hot, he threw himself into the sea-water in all his clothes; and having come out again, he began to shake his sword up and down, and do diverse mad pranks; nor could any, not even the archbishop himself, bridle him, or keep him within any bounds. The captains of the people were now constrained to apprehend him, and place him in confinement, with a band of soldiers for his guard, in his own house.

THE TENTH DAY.

TUESDAY, JULY 16th, 1647.

Next day, being the feast of the virgin of Carmine, a day of very great devotion among the Neapolitans, especially the common people, Masaniello, having escaped from his keepers, entered the church, which stood near the great market-place. The archbishop had scarcely entered, when Masaniello, meeting him in the face, said, "Most eminent lord, I perceive now that the people will abandon me, and go about to deprive me of my life. I desire that for my consolation, and of all this people, a solemn cavalcade may be made, together with the viceroy, and all the tribunals of the city, to this most holy lady; for being to die, I shall then die contented; therefore, I beseech your eminence to send this letter to the viceroy." The archbishop embraced him, and, much commending his devotion, instantly sent a gentleman to the palace with the letter to the viceroy; and going afterwards to the great altar of the lady of Carmine, he leaned there, intending to chant mass, the church being crowded with people. Masaniello, going up the steps of the altar, took a crucifix in his hands, and recommended himself with much tenderness to the people, that they should not forsake him after what he had done for them; narrating the difficulty of the design, the danger he had encountered, the hatred of so many thousands by reason of his fiery punishments, and the conclusion at last of the whole business in that very church. A little while after, he fell into a raving fit; accusing himself of the badness of his past life, and exhorting every one to make the like confession before the feet of his ghostly father, that God's anger might be appeased. But as he uttered many ridiculous expressions, some savouring of heresy, his guard forsook him; and the archbishop not enduring to hear him, being in the very act of celebrating the mass, he persuaded him to go down. Mass being done, he prostrated himself at the archbishop's feet, praying that he would please to send his chaplain to the castle, to advertise the viceroy that he was willing to renounce his command. This the archbishop promised to do, and caused him to be conducted to a dormitory to repose a while, thinking him worthy of compassion: so the bishop returned to his palace.

In the meantime, Masaniello being refreshed, had gone out into a great hall, and as he was leaning over a balcony to take the fresh air, some hardy persons rushed in, accompanied by a great multitude, who, having first entered the church of Carmine, cried aloud, "Let the king of Spain live, and let none hereafter, under pain of life, obey the commands of Masaniello!" Going thence to the cloister, under pretext to speak with Masaniello, and negotiate with him, they found him almost all alone. He hearing some one crying Masaniello, the unfortunate wretch advanced to those who were conspired to despatch him, "Ye go perhaps in search of me; behold, I am here, my people." Presently, Salvador and Carlo Cataneo, two brothers, Angelo Ardizzone, and Andrea Rama, discharged their musket-shots at him; and he fell upon the earth, crying, after the first shot, "ah! ungrateful traitors!" A butcher then came in and cut off his head, which, being put upon a lance, they went into the church of Carmine, where were 10,000 people, and thence to the market-place, crying out, "Let the King of Spain live, and, under pain of death, let none henceforth name Masaniello! Masaniello is dead! Masaniello is dead!" and discharging many archbuzes, the common people were so affrighted that they lost their courage. The assassins now went securely up and down, with his head upon a pole, and the boys dragging his body along the public streets, where money was thrown to them that drew him by many of the gentry, who all this while durst scarce look out of their houses, or appear abroad publicly, but who now got on horseback, and went to the castle to attend the viceroy, and offer their congratulations. The archbishop, after he had left the Carmine, had scarce reached his own palace, when the tidings of Masaniello's death were brought him, which made him also go directly to the castle, to acquit himself of those duties of congratulation which were due to the viceroy. Strict orders were instantly sent abroad, that the street captains should be in complete readiness, at the command of the viceroy, and that they should not obey any one else whatsoever. The viceroy also commanded to apprehend the accom-

of Masaniello, his wife, his sisters, his kindred; being all made prisoners, were brought up to the castle. And because his brother Matteo was gone to Benevento with more company, to take, as it was given out, the Duke of Mataloni, there were armed bands despatched thither to apprehend him, and conduct him to Naples; which was done, and he was committed to the castle; though afterwards, to please the people, he and others were set at liberty. There were armed bands sent also to the market-place, to restrain the people, and guard the goods that were there deposited.

These good orders being given, the viceroy was exhorted by the archbishop, and by all the nobility and ministers, to show himself publicly up and down the streets; whereupon he, mounted on horseback, accompanied by his eminence, and attended by all the counsellors, ministers, officers, nobility and gentry, with all the tribunals, and being well guarded with horse and infantry, they went to the chief church, to give God thanks, and the most glorious protector of Naples, St. Gennaro, whose holy head and blood were taken out and placed upon the high altar, where extraordinary thanks were given for the tranquillity which was re-obtained by the death of so base a fellow, who, by the secret judgments of God, had made himself so formidable that he terrified the whole city.

From the church the cavalcade proceeded to the market-place, where the viceroy did again, by sound of trumpet, confirm the privileges granted by Charles V., together with the capitulations. He was received with extreme demonstrations of joy by all the people, who loudly cried out, "Let the king live! live the Duke of Arcos!" and others added, "Let Filomarino live, the restorer of his country's peace!" They also gave thanks to the Lady of Carmine; then returned to the castle very joyful, and afterwards every one went to his own home.

The shops were now suddenly opened, the Spanish soldiers stood their arms again, the guards dispersed up and down returned to their former posts, and that in the castle was redoubled with Walloons. Every one with reverence submitted to the viceroy, to whose prudence, patience, and dexterity, joined with the vigilance and indefatigable assistance of the archbishop, the preservation of that city may be attributed. Indeed, if that prelate had not strongly and industriously interposed in the business, the whole city would have been destroyed with fire and sword. This appears from a letter written by a Neapolitan cavalier, one of the greatest patriots of the city, to one of his friends resident at Rome, wherein also there is a relation made, how St. Gennaro, the protector and patron of Naples, appeared, which prognosticated peace, tranquillity and happiness, to the Neapolitan people.

On account of the treaty, many nobles and cavaliers were seen passing every day along the streets to the castle in their coaches, showing themselves to the people, from whose sight they had carefully kept themselves before. The ladies also appeared in their former dresses, which formerly they durst not do, by reason of Masaniello's order to the contrary; yet they moderated their expenses and train, especially those who were used to gain by the gabels.

The head and foot of Don Peppo Caraffa remaining still exposed to public view in an iron grate, upon the gate of St. Gennaro, with an inscription, "This is the head of Don Peppo Caraffa di Mataloni, traitor to his country, and of the most faithful people of Naples." Scarcely had the rumour gone abroad of the death of Masaniello, when four gentlemen allied to the family of the Mataloni, ventured to go boldly to the said gate, and in a commanding way, though there were 1000 soldiers present, they got a ladder, and climbing up, broke the iron grate with the inscription, and took out the head, which they carried in a silver basin, covered with a silk towel, and brought it to the church of St. John de Porta, delivering it to the curate of that church, John Baptista Julina. Afterwards they caused it to be put in a leaden box, and an authentic instrument made ad futuram rememoriam, by a public apostolical notary authorised by the court of Rome, called Don Maria de Julis.

It will be recollected that Masaniello, a little before his death, began to feel the pulses of the richest men up and down the city, demanding of them many thousands of crowns, because he purposed, as he gave out, to present five millions of gold to the king, which he had already promised to his excellency by way of donative. That sum was to be raised out of the money found in the burnt houses, and contribution of the chief merchants and citizens of Naples, which he would have effected within a few days, had he not died; therefore, it was questioned whether his death tended more to the service or disservice of Spain.

Amongst other wealthy merchants he had sent to one Gasper Roomer, a rich Fleming, who, to prevent the firing of his house, sent 12,000 crowns to Masaniello, and then retired to a house four miles out of the city, at a place called La Barra, carrying with him all his best moveables and goods he had in Naples. To this merchant he again sent Savino Converso, of the Carmine, a great confidant of his, the same Tuesday, the day that he was slain, with an order in writing, at sight whereof he was to consign unto him 5000 zechins for the service of his catholic majesty, since he had grown so rich out of good bargains he had from the viceroys from time to time. Roomer could not tell how to avoid the complying with his desire, and obey them; so he delivered so much gold in ready money to the messenger, who, leaving a receipt behind him, and returning to Naples, understood, as he passed a little church near the Carmine, what had happened to Masaniello. He then embarked himself in a felucca, and went away with the money to Rome; but the merchant sent spies up and down to find him out; and at last, by the help of those of his order, for he was a friar, he got notice where he was, and recovered much of his money.

That Tuesday, in the evening, as already mentioned, was brought to Naples the brother of the said Masaniello, and committed prisoner to the castle, together with his mother. As they passed, all cried out, "Room, room for the Lady Duchess of Sarda!" With the brother of Masaniello were brought four heads of his companions, who would not yield themselves, but make resistance with musket-shot, and nine were taken alive; the rest were mortally wounded, or put to flight.

Thus rose and fell Masaniello of Amalphi, and in the manner which he himself seemed to have anticipated, and to which he alluded at the commencement of the revolution, when going up the market-place; namely, that what he did was for the public benefit of the city, and that, when he had finished the work, he might be slain and dragged up and down the streets of Naples. And so it happened right; for having confirmed the interests of the city upon Saturday, and caused their privileges and the confirmation of them to be subscribed and sworn to by the viceroy and all the councils, he was the third day after assassinated, and dragged up and down the streets; his head thrown into a ditch called the corn-ditch, and his body cast into another, between the gates of Nolana and Capuana.

All antiquity cannot furnish us with such another example as his; and after-ages will hardly believe what height of power this ridiculous sovereign arrived to, who, trampling barefoot on a throne, and wearing a mariner's cap instead of a diadem, in the space of a few days raised an army of above 150,000 men, and made himself master of one of the most populous cities in the world. And, as if fortune, that capricious jilt, had taken delight in raising a fisherman above the greatest monarch, she not only submitted to his empire that innumerable rabble that always followed him, but even that ancient and generous Neapolitan nobility itself, whose immortal exploits have filled the whole universe with their fame. In short, it may be averred without contradiction, that, neither the most formidable tyrants, nor the princes the most beloved, were ever so much dreaded, or so soon obeyed, as Masaniello was, during his short but stupendous reign. His orders were without reply; his decrees without appeal; and the destiny of all Naples might be said to have depended upon a single motion of his hand.

Those who have most curiously inquired into this great and sudden revolution, of which he was the author, have for the most part looked upon it as a pure and immediate effect of God's judgments, who, to chastise the avarice, the pride, and the barbarity of the Spanish ministers, which were then at their highest pitch, singled out the arm of this poor fisherman to execute his anger. Nor is this opinion without foundation: for, if we examine the actions and accidents of Masaniello's life, we shall find them too extraordinary and too wonderful, not to have been in a peculiar manner directed by the hand of Providence. It is reported, that whilst he was yet in the cradle, two Capuchins accidentally calling in at his mother's house, one of them took him into his arms, and having looked very stedfastly upon him for some time, he told her, that that child should one day come to be the master of Naples, but that his government would have but a very short duration. We have already taken notice of his own allusions, relating to his death, together with the cause, time, and manner of it. But, what will raise our admiration most of all is, that he, who had never had any education, and who had always passed among those of his acquaintance for a mere fool, was all on a sudden seen to act and to speak as if he had been conversant in politics, and the management of public affairs. And indeed, with how much wisdom did he not make and maintain, in the very heat of the commotions, the most useful orders and regulations that the wisest legislators and the most experienced generals could ever be capable of? With what art and address did he not insinuate himself into the hearts of so many thousands of men, by far his superiors, encouraging the fearful, extolling the bold, reproaching the coward, and most pathetically describing to all the miserable state of their country, groaning under the heavy exactions of proud and avaricious ministers, and animating them to revenge and redress themselves! Cardinal Filomarino, archbishop of Naples, acknowledged, that in the several conferences he had with him relative to the treaty of accommodation, he had often been amazed at the solidity of his judgment, and the subtilty of his contrivances. In short, let us but reflect upon the greatness of that enterprise which he projected, and executed for the good of his country: that indefatigable assiduity with which he applied himself to it, which robbed him of the hours of nourishment and repose, and made him dictate to seven secretaries all at one time: that just severity, which obliging him to put so many persons to death, never extorted itself on any whose crimes had not deserved it: but, above all, that noble and generous disinterestedness, which kept him poor in the midst of such vast heaps of wealth; and we shall be apt to conclude with a certain Neapolitan gentleman, "that Masaniello seems to have been endowed with no other qualifications, but such as were necessary for the execution of the divine vengeance."

But it is not just, that these reflections should make us leave the head and the body of Masaniello unburied and asunder; and, after having exposed the ingratitude of the people, in forsaking their great deliverer, it is but reasonable, that we should also take notice of the sorrow and repentance which they expressed for it, by the pompous obsequies with which they honoured his remains. The day immediately following that of his death, several children, at the persuasion of some persons who told them "it was a shame that the corpse of him who had done so much for the good of his country, should be thus exposed to the dogs," went and fetched his body, and after they had washed and cleaned it well, carried it on a bier to the cathedral church of Carmine. At the same time, a young man, living in the market-place, called Jeronimo Donneruma, went with a company of men, all armed, to look for his head in the corn-ditch; and having found it, he brought it along with him to the same place where the body was, in order to have them joined together. This being done, it was resolved, in a general assembly of the people, who were gathered together on purpose, "that Masaniello deserved to receive the greatest honours, as head and captain-general of Naples;" and, accordingly, his corpse, preceded by five hundred priests and religious, and followed by 40,000 armed men, and almost as many women with beads in their hands, was carried through several of the most public streets of the city, with all the solemnities that are commonly used at the funeral of a martial commander. As they passed by the palace of the viceroy, his excellency, to conform to the times, sent eight of his pages, with torches in their hands, to accompany the corpse, and at the same time ordered the Spaniards, who were then upon guard, to lower their ensigns, and salute him as he went by. He was at last brought back again to the cathedral church, and there buried; whilst all the bells in Naples rung a mournful peal, and amidst the tears and lamentations of an infinite multitude of women, who showed so much respect and veneration to his dust, that one may say, that, by the effect of a popular inconstancy, which is not to be equalled, Masaniello, in less than three days, was obeyed like a monarch, murdered like a villain, and revered like a saint.

Such, then, is the history of the Neapolitan, from the first origin of their civil misfortunes and sufferings, under an overbearing ministry, to the first period of tyranny and oppression among them; that is, to their being restored to the full possession of their rights and privileges by the fisherman-hero. Happy for them had they never been molested in the enjoyment of them, and that the public faith had remained inviolate! But, alas! They were soon made sensible, by a fatal experience, that the most sacred, and most religious oaths and covenants, are not strong enough to bind princes or their ministers from acting contrary to their views of interest and ambition.

Not many days after Masaniello's death, the viceroy made Julio Gonovino president of one of the courts of justice, and gave him, besides, several other public marks of his favour and esteem. The people were surprised at it; and they could not conceive what it was that should induce the viceroy to give such extraordinary demonstrations of favour to a man who had, with the greatest warmth, so lately espoused the interest of the Neapolitans, and upon all occasions had, in a particular manner, manifested his enmity to the Spaniards. This was a mystery to them, and they were at a loss to unriddle it. But it was not long before their eyes were opened, by the publication of the printed treaty. They observed, that the fourteenth article in it contained a salvo, which had not been read to them in the cathedral church, and which, indeed, made the treaty void and of no effect. The purport of it is as follows: "That all taxes and gabels until then imposed and exacted, should be abrogated and annulled forever; such of them only excepted, as were alienated to private or particular persons, which should always subsist, any thing in this treaty mentioned to the contrary notwithstanding." Now, there being no tax in the kingdom but what was alienated, all the gabels and taxes consequently remained still in force; and this treaty, that was concluded with so much solemnity, and afterwards confirmed by so many oaths, was only a political trick to lull the people asleep till the ministry should find a fit opportunity of replunging them into a state of slavery and subjection.

But all crimes are not alike successful; and heaven would not suffer so heinous a violation of the public faith, sworn and pledged upon the altars, to go unpunished. Those who had first discovered the fraud, immediately communicated it to their neighbours; these again divulged it to the people. In an instant, the whole city was alarmed. Multitudes of people flocked together in haste to the market-place, as is usual in cases of public danger. They plainly perceived the reason of Genovino's new preferment, and they concluded, that he had sold them to the ministry. On a sudden, they gave a loose to their rage and indignation. They flew to arms; and, in the first heat of their furious resentment, they uttered a thousand direful imprecations against the government, in whom they could no longer confide. This was the beginning of a civil war, which, in the end, proved fatal to the Spaniards. The authors of it, unimproved by so recent an example of what an injured and exasperated people can do in their own defence, and the defence of their liberty, soon saw themselves and their country involved in all the calamities and horrors that attend intestine feuds and dissensions. And some of them, by meeting with a more hasty and exemplary punishment, have left behind them an everlasting monument of the wrath of heaven against perjured and avaricious ministers.

THE END.

THE PRIEST AND THE MULBERRY TREE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF HEADLONG HALL.

Did you hear of the curate who mounted his mare,
And merrily trotted along to the fair?
Of creature more tractable none ever heard;
In the height of her speed she would stop at a word,
And again with a word, when the curate said "Hey,"
She put forth her mettle, and galloped away.

As near to the gates of the city he rode,
While the sun of September all brilliantly glowed,
The good priest discovered, with eyes of desire,
A mulberry tree in a hedge of wild briar,
On boughs long and lofty, in many a green shoot,
Hung large, black, and glossy, the beautiful fruit.

The curate was hungry, and thirsty to boot;
He shrunk from the thorns, though he longed for the fruit;
With a word he arrested his courser's keen speed,
And he stood up erect on the back of his steed;
On the saddle he stood, while the creature stood still,
And he gathered the fruit, till he took his good fill.

"Sure never," he thought, "was a creature so rare,
So docile, so true, as my excellent mare.
So, here, now I stand!" and he gazed all around,
"As safe and as steady as if on the ground,
Yet how had it been, if some traveller this way,
Had, dreaming no mischief, but chanc'd to say Hey?"

He stood with his head in the mulberry tree,
And he spoke out aloud in his fond reverie:
At the sound of the word, the good mare made a push,
And down went the priest in the wild-briar bush:
He remembered too late, on his thorny green bed,
Much that well may be thought, cannot wisely be said.

Memoirs of Casanova.

BY HIMSELF.

We find the following curious particulars translated from the German language, in a former number of the London Magazine, a work now united to the New Monthly. It is the only portion of Casanova's Memoirs we have ever seen in English.

Casanova de Seingalt was a Venetian, descended from an ancient but decayed family of Spanish origin; he spent a life of vicissitude and adventures, in which he passed through every gradation of poverty and wealth. In the latter part of his life he retired to Dux, in Bohemia, where he left his Memoirs in manuscript, from which have been published several volumes of "Extracts," translated into German and edited by Schutz. A gamester and a libertine, born and residing for a considerable period of his life in a country celebrated for the profligacy of its morals, he has produced a work, which, judging from those parts it has been thought prudent to publish, is for the revolting nature of many of its anecdotes, probably unparalleled in modern literature, and happily, it is not much known in America; but one copy has ever come to our notice, and the only extract of the same length in the work which we could have ventured (says the translator with truth) to present to the public, is the following history of his escape from the prisons of Venice, which is of more than usual interest, bearing in some of its relations a similarity to the Memoirs of Silvio Pellico recently published.

It is no more than justice to mention, that though Casanova was a man of the most unbounded passions, and of exceedingly loose morals, his vices were those of his country and times, rather than the result of any baseness peculiar to himself. He was certainly a man of considerable talent, even fully allowing for the colouring which vanity must always lend to the writings of autobiographers.

It was on the morning of the 25th of July 1755, just at break of day, when Messer Grande, the title of the chief executive officer of the Venetian police, entered my chamber. To awake, to see him, and to hear the question, "Whether I were Jacob Casanova," was but the work of an instant. I had hardly answered in the affirmative, when he demanded all my papers and letters, and desired me to rise and follow him. I asked by what authority he acted; he replied by that of the tribunal of the state Inquisition.

The word tribunal overpowered me; all my customary resolution yielded to the most implicit obedience; my writing-desk stood open; my writings lay on the table; I told the officer "he might take them." A bag that was carried by one of his assistants was immediately filled with them: I was then required to produce the bound manuscripts which were suspected to be in my possession; I surrendered them, and was at no loss to guess at my infamous accuser. These writings of magical and cabalistical contents, were the "Clavicula Salomonis," the "Zecor-ben," "Picatrix," essays on the planetary periods in which magical incantations were to be performed, and other works of a similarly learned nature; whoever knew me to be in the possession of these, would consider me as a magician, and that I did not by any means regret.

The books also on my table, Horace, Ariosto, Petrarch, a manuscript, and the works of Aretin, were not overlooked.

While the chief of the police was searching for my papers, I dressed myself mechanically; caused myself to be shaved and my hair to be dressed; and put on a silken suit; and Messer Grande, whose eyes were never turned from me, seemed to feel no surprise at my dressing with so much care.

On my leaving the chamber, I was not a little startled by seeing from thirty to forty officers of police; they had done me the honour to consider me worthy of their attendance, though according to the proverb, "No Hercules quidem contra duos," two would have been quite sufficient. Is it not extraordinary that in England, where courage is innate, one man is considered sufficient to arrest another, while in my country, where cowardice has set up her home, thirty are required for the purpose? Probably a coward is still more one when he attacks, than when he is attacked, and that makes the person assaulted bolder; the truth is, in Venice one man is often seen opposing twenty shirri, he gives them a good beating, and escapes.

Messer Grande desired me to enter a gondola, and seated himself by my side; four men remained with him, the rest were dismissed; we proceeded to his dwelling, where, after offering me coffee, which I refused, he locked me in a room; I remained there four hours; when the clock struck three* the head of the shirri entered, and told me he had orders to take me to the "Camerotti."† I followed him, and after passing in a gondola through many by canals, we entered the "canal grande," and stopped at the quay of the prisons: a flight of steps led us over a high, enclosed bridge, which connects the prisons with the ducal palace, and is thrown over the canal, called "Via di Palazzo;" from thence a gallery, leading through a chamber, brought us to another, in which I was presented to a man in the dress of a patrician; he cast a glance on me and said, "It is he, secure him well;" this was the secretary to the state inquisitors, Domenico Cavalli.

I was delivered over to the superintendent of the Camerotti, who, accompanied by two of his men, led me up stairs through three long chambers, two of which were locked, into a dirty garret. It was about six yards long and two broad, and received light through a hole in the roof. I concluded that this was to be my prison, but I was mistaken; my jailer seized a large key, and opened a strong iron-bound door, about three feet and a half high, and which had a hole in the middle, eight inches square; on being desired to enter, I observed with curiosity a machine of iron, fastened to the wall; my attendant on noticing my surprise, said, laughing, "The signor is puzzled to guess the use of this machine; I can help him; when the illustrious inquisitors command a prisoner to be strangled, he is obliged to sit on a stool with his back against this iron, which incloses half of his neck; the other half is surrounded by a silken cord, which is passed through these two holes in the wall, and is fastened to a windlass, which is turned till the culprit has given his soul back to God; but the confessor does not leave him till life is fled."

"Ingenuously contrived! and probably you have the honour of turning the windlass," I replied; but my worthy companion was silent.

As I was five feet nine inches high, I was compelled to stoop double to enter the door, which was immediately closed on me. The jailer asked me, through the grating, what I would have to eat; I answered, I had not yet thought about it; he left the place, and I heard him lock door after door as he went.

Sullen and overwhelmed, I leaned on my elbows against the grating of the window, reflecting on my fate; six iron bars, each one inch thick, crossing each other, formed sixteen small holes five inches square, in an opening of two feet square; my dungeon would have received light enough through these, if it had not been for a beam eighteen inches thick, which crossed before the opening in the roof. I discovered on groping about, and stooping my head, so low was the place, only three sides of the room; the fourth seemed to form an alcove, in which a bed could be placed; but neither couch, table, nor chair were to be found—I made use of a shelf, about a foot broad, which was fastened to the wall, and there laid my fine silken mantle, my gala dress, assumed in an unlucky hour, with my hat and plume. The heat was intolerable, and drove me to the grating, where at least I could rest, leaning on my elbows; the window itself I could not see; but by the light from it, I saw rats as large as rabbits running about the garret; these disgusting creatures, at the sight of which I shuddered, were bold enough even to come close to the grating; I immediately shut the opening in the door, for my blood ran cold at the idea of their approaching me. I sank into a deep reverie, and leaning with folded arms against the grating, stood silent and motionless.

The clock striking twenty-one, raised anxiety in my

* The time throughout the narrative is reckoned after the Italian method.

† This is the name these celebrated prisons are known by in Venice; in the German the original word signifies "lead-chambers," from a cause noticed in the narrative.

mind at the non-appearance of any human being; I was left without food, without a bed, or a chair; I had not even bread and water: I was not in truth hungry, but none could know that, nor seemed to care whether I were or not. I felt, though, a bitterness in my mouth I never experienced before; I still hoped that some one would appear before the end of the day; but when it struck four-and-twenty, and none came, my rage broke loose; I howled, stamped, cursed, and screamed as loud as I could, and made as much noise as was possible; I passed an hour in this occupation, but neither did any one show himself, nor had I any reason to hope that I was even heard; involved in darkness, I shut the grating to keep out the rats, and binding a handkerchief round my head, laid myself at full length on the floor.

So complete a neglect of me, even if my death were resolved on, seemed impossible. I thought a moment to try to remember the crime that had drawn down this punishment, but I could recollect no great fault I had been guilty of; that I was licentious, and spoke whatever came into my mind, and that I sought every enjoyment of life, did not render me guilty; nevertheless, I was treated as a criminal of the worst description. The reader may conceive what hatred and desperation rage inspired me with, against a despotism that could be familiar with such oppression: nevertheless, neither the violence of my anger, nor the depth of my grief, nor the hardness of the floor, hindered me from falling asleep; my body required rest; and when a man is young, he often obtains as much as he requires when he least would expect it.

The midnight bell aroused me; dreadful is the waking that awakes us to lament the unreality of the deceptions of slumber. I could hardly imagine that I had spent three hours free from the feeling of any misery. Without rising, while lying on my left side, I reached my right arm out to get my handkerchief, which I remembered confusedly to have put near me; but oh, heavens! what did my hand encounter—another, cold and stiff as ice. Fear penetrated me from head to foot, and my hair stood on end; never had I felt before such a trembling; I lay for five minutes motionless; at last recollecting myself a little, it occurred to me that it might be imagination only, which had deceived me; in this persuasion I reached forth my arm again, and again encountered the same hand, which, with a cry of horror, I dropped from my grasp; I trembled still; but on reflection, I concluded that a corpse had been laid by my side while I was sleeping, for I was certain when I first laid down there was nothing on the floor. I stretched my hand out a third time to be convinced, by feeling of the truth of this supposition; but when I leaned on my elbow to effect this, I found, on touching the cold hand, that it began to move; I was now convinced, that what my right hand grasped, was only my left one, which, by my lying on it for so long a time, had lost all feeling and warmth.

This discovery was in itself laughable enough, but, instead of enlivening me, it rather suggested the gloomiest reflections. I saw myself in a place where, if what was false seemed true, truth itself became a dream; where reason lost half her powers, and where the fancy fell a prey to delusive hopes or fearful despondencies. I began to be distrustful of the reality of every thing which presents itself to our senses, or our mind. Approaching my thirtieth year, I summoned philosophy for the first time to my aid. All the elements lay in my soul, but no occasion had ever called them forth into action, and I believe the majority die without ever attaining a correct judgment.

I lay till eight o'clock: the dawn of day began to appear at a quarter after nine: the sun must rise: I impatiently anticipated the approach of morning. I had a feeling, which seemed like conviction, that I should be dismissed to my home; and I could not suppress the longing for revenge that glowed in my bosom. The time appeared to be come when I was to place myself at the head of the people, and annihilate the aristocracy; it seemed to me as if the order for the destruction of my persecutors would not content me; I must myself aid in butchering them. Such is man! And he doubts not the least that it is reason that speaks in him; but it is his worst enemy, anger, who thus imitates the voice of reason.

The less I expected from the moment I hoped for, so much the more did my rage subside. The drawing of bolts in the passages which led to my prison broke, towards half-past eight, the deep stillness of this hell, invented by man for his fellow men; I saw the jailer appear before my grating; he asked me whether I had had time enough for consideration of what I would have to eat: one is fortunate when the insolence of inferiors takes the disguise of a jest. I demanded rice, soup, boiled meats, bread, water, and wine. It surprised the fellow to hear me ask none of the questions he expected from me; he went, and returned in a quarter of an hour, to express his wonder that I had not asked for a bed, or any other furniture, "for I deceived myself if I supposed I should only remain here for one night."

"Bring me, then," I replied, "all that in your opinion I shall want."

"Where am I to get them from? here is pencil and paper, write down the address where I am to apply." I described the place where bed, linen, night-dress, slippers, night-caps, arm-chair, table, glass, razors, pocket-handkerchiefs, and the books which messier grande had taken from me, together with other papers, were to be found. I read this inventory to him, for the fellow could not read himself, and he told me I must omit books, ink, papers, looking-glasses, and razors, for they were forbidden to the prisoners. He then demanded money to procure my food: I gave him one of the three zechini which constituted all my wealth; he quitted me, and in half an hour I heard him leave the prison. I afterwards learned, that in that time seven other prisoners had been secured, to each of whom, as to me, a separate cell was allotted, to hinder any communication between us.

About noon the keeper came, accompanied by five assistants appointed for the service of the state prisoners, as we were called; he opened the door to bring in my furniture and food; the bed was placed in the alcove, the dinner on a small table; I had only an ivory spoon, bought with my own money, to eat with; for knife and fork, as well as all other articles of metal, were proscribed.

"Tell me what you will have for to-morrow's food, for I can only visit you once a day, that is at sun-rise; and his excellency the secretary bids me inform you, you shall have other books more fitting for your state, for those you wrote down are forbidden."

"Present my thanks to him for the favour of having given me a room to myself."

"I will do so if you desire me; but you ought not to jest with him."

"I do not jest; it must be a favour to be left alone, and not to be put into the company of rascals, such as I suppose to be in these dungeons."

"How! signor! rascals! I am astonished; here are none but people of condition, and reasons known only to the illustrious inquisitors, compel him to place them apart from one another; with you this has been done as a severer punishment, and am I to return your thanks for that?"

"I did not know this."

The fellow was right, as I learned some days afterwards but too well. I then found, that a man who is alone in his confinement, without the power of employing himself, in a cell nearly dark, and where he only sees the person who brings him food, once in a day, and in which he cannot even walk about upright, becomes the most miserable of living creatures; he may at last even long for the company of a murderer, a madman, or even a bear. Solitude in these prisons brings despair; but none know that who have not had the experience. If the prisoner, however, happen to possess some knowledge; and is allowed pen and paper, his misery is diminished a tenth.

When the jailer was gone, I approached my table to the grating, for the sake of the scanty light which penetrated the aperture, but I could not swallow more than a spoonful of soup; after fasting five-and-twenty hours, my sickness was not surprising. I passed the day tolerably quietly in my arm-chair, and waited till morning, expecting the promised books. I was kept awake all night by the noise of the accursed rats in the adjoining garret, and by the striking of the clock in the tower of St. Mark, which was as audible as if it had been in my room; added to which, that a host of fleas attacked my flesh and blood, with an energy without parallel, that nearly produced convulsions.

At day break, Lorenzo, my jailer, appeared: he ordered my bed to be made, and my room to be swept out and put in order, while one of his people brought me water to wash. I wished to go into the garret, but he told me that it could not be allowed. He gave me two large books, which, intentionally, I would not open before him; probably he would have informed the spy if I had manifested any dislike to them. After he had arranged my meal, and cut two lemons, he left me.

I ate the soup directly, that it might not grow cold. I held one of the books up to the light of the grating, and found it was just possible to read in this manner: the title of the work was, "The mystic town of the sister Maria of Jesus, called Agrada." I could not conceive what could be the contents of the work. The second book was the work of a Jesuit; I have forgotten his name. His object in it was to found a new and more particular veneration for the heart of our Saviour. According to him, this, before all other parts of the body of the Redeemer, should be held sacred: the first page revolted me; the heart seemed to me to be no more worthy of especial veneration than any other of the entrails. The first work somewhat attracted my attention; it contained the ravings of the overstrained fancy of a very pious, but very melancholy nun, of Spanish origin, whose ignorant superiors had flattered her delusions. All her chimerical and extraordinary visions were delivered as revelations, inflamed with love for the holy virgin, and, as her confidential friend, she had received from God himself the direct command to write the life of his holy mother; the Holy Ghost had afforded her the useful instructions for this purpose, which no mortal could have obtained by other means. The writings contained no intentional fictions, for invention could not go so far; all was written in perfect belief, as is usually the case in the visions of an exalted and overstrained imagination, which, far removed from pride, is perfectly convinced of the truth of the communications, which it believes the sacred spirit to have instilled into it. The work excited in me neither a greater thirst for nor devotion to religion, but rather induced me to regard every doctrine as erroneous that contains any thing either dogmatical or mystical.

Nevertheless, I soon felt the effect this reading had on my spirits. A mind more susceptible than mine, and more inclined to the wonderful, would have become as visionary as that of the nun itself. I devoted a whole week to the work, till I could read no farther; on going to sleep, I felt the influence of the disorder which the nun of Agrada had ingrafted on a mind depressed by melancholy and bad food. I smile now when I recall my fantastic dreams. If I had possessed pen and paper, a work might have been produced in the prisons of the Camerotti, more extraordinary than that Signor Carli had sent me.

I have ever since been persuaded of the error of those who boast of the strength of the human intellect. If mankind were to observe narrowly, it would discover more of weakness than of strength in the mind. Notwithstanding mental derangement is a rare occurrence, I am convinced how easily the mind may be overthrown: our reason is like gunpowder, easily inflamed, and but requiring a spark for its explosion. Such a work as that of which I have been speaking, can overturn a man's reason, if, like me, he were a prisoner in the Camerotti, and deprived of every employment, and every other mental occupation.

At the end of nine days, I was destitute of money. Lorenzo asked to whom he should apply for some; I answered to no one. My silence and reserve were in the highest degree repugnant to this gossiping and envious man. On the following morning he announced to me, "that fifty sous per diem were allotted me by the tribunal; as receiver of this sum, he would keep a reckoning of my expenditure, and account with me at the month's end, and I might dispose of the overplus." I requested to see the newspapers twice a week, but I was informed that that was forbidden. Seventy-five livres monthly were far more than I could spend, for I hardly ate any thing: the overpowering heat of my room, and the want of proper food, had exhausted me; the destructive time of the dog days now began, and the sun's rays acting on the leaden roof of my prison, converted the atmosphere of my cell to that of a sweating-stove; I remained entirely unclothed, and the perspiration streamed down on both sides of me on my arm chair as I sat in it; violent accessions of shivering announced the approach of fever: I remained in bed and was silent. On the third day after the first attack, when Lorenzo found all my food untouched, he asked me how I found myself. "Well," I replied. "That is impossible, for you eat nothing; you are ill, and you will be astonished to hear of the bounty of the tribunal, for you shall have a doctor, surgeon, and medicines, without its costing you any thing." In three hours he reappeared, carrying a lighted taper before a man, whose appearance proclaimed him a physician. For three days I had been in a burning fever; he wished to interrogate me, but I declared, that to my confessor and physician I could only speak without witnesses. He ordered Lorenzo to withdraw, and on his refusing, he quitted me, declaring me in danger of my life. This was what I wished; it was a reflection to me to show my inflexible tyrants the consequences of their persecution.

In four hours the physician returned alone with the light, Lorenzo remaining without. I was so exhausted that I felt really at ease. When we were seriously ill we no longer experience ennui; I was even vexed my tormenting spirit remained without, for since he had explained to me the use of the strangling machine, I had conceived a horror of him.

I shortly explained my situation, and what I needed. "You must banish your melancholy, if you would get well," said he. "Write a receipt for that purpose, and bear it to the only apothecary who can prepare a dose of it for me," I replied; "Signor Cavalli has been the fatal physician who prescribed for me the 'Heart of Jesus,' and the 'Mystic Town'; those works have reduced me to this." He prepared for me himself a lemonade, of which he advised me to drink copiously, and then left me. I passed the night more easily, though with troublesome dreams.

On the following morning my medical attendant returned, accompanied by a surgeon, who bled me; he gave me some medicine, which I was to take at evening, and a draught; he had also obtained permission for me to sleep in the garret, where the heat was not quite so overpowering; but this I declined on account of the rats, which I feared might come into my bed. He compassionated my condition, and told me that he had represented to Cavalli the consequences of my reading the books he had sent me, and that Cavalli had promised to send me others; in the mean time he had brought me Boethius. I thanked him for his kindness, and he went, after leaving me elder and barley water to drink.

After four visits of this man I became convalescent, and I regained my appetite. At the beginning of September I was tolerably restored; nothing tormented me but heat, vermin, and ennui, for I could not read Boethius eternally. Lorenzo told me I might, while my bed was being made and my room swept out, in order to destroy the fleas who consumed me, wash my face and hands out of the cell: this was a favour, and I employed the eight or ten minutes that was allowed me in walking violently up and down the garret; the rats, frightened at this, were not visible. On the same day Lorenzo granted me this indulgence, he settled his accounts with me; there remained about thirty livres coming to me, but I gave it to him, telling him he might have masses said for it; he thanked me as if he had been the priest who had to say them. At the end of each month I repeated this gift, but I never saw any receipt from a priest; without doubt, it was among Lorenzo's least crimes that he appropriated this money to his own use.

I remained in this condition, ever nourishing the hope of speedily returning to my liberty; scarcely an evening passed without my retiring to rest with a conviction that on the morrow my freedom would be announced to me; but as I saw my hopes constantly disappointed, it occurred to me that probably a stated term was fixed for my imprisonment, and I conjectured the first of October to be that term, because on that day the inquisitors were changed. My confinement would last till then, I further concluded, from my not seeing the secretary, who, I had supposed, would have come to announce to me the crime of which I was accused, and the extent of my punishment. This seemed but natural and probable; but I deceived myself; for in the Camerotti nothing ever passes that is either natural or probable. I imagined that, aware now of my innocence, they were ashamed of their persecution, but that they still detained me in order to save their own reputations; and that they would free me at the termination of their reign, that their successors might not discover the injustice they had been guilty of towards me.

But all this and other reasoning was totally fallacious, as applied to the inquisition. Every citizen becomes guilty as soon as he is treated by this court as such. What use then to examine him? Why give him the unpleasant information of his conviction and condemnation? His confession is not needed; they therefore leave him hope; the tribunal judges and condemns; the culprit is but a machine, a nail, to drive which through a plank only requires a hammer.

On the night of the thirtieth of September I could not sleep: I longed for the approach of day, for I was convinced it would bring me freedom; but morning broke, and Lorenzo brought me my food without a word. Five or six days I passed in rage and despair; I began to think that, from causes totally inexplicable to me, I was to be confined for life. This fearful thought excited a laugh, but nothing more: I resolved to free myself or perish in the attempt. "Deliberata morte ferocior," I determined, at the beginning of November, to leave a place by stratagem where I was unjustly detained by force. This became my only thought. I resolved in my mind the means of accomplishing, what doubtless many had attempted, but none had ever succeeded in. A curious circumstance disclosed to me the effect confinement had had on my mind. I stood in my cell, with my eyes turned up towards the hole in the roof, and contemplated the large beam; Lorenzo had just left the cell with two assistants, when I saw the huge timber not only shake, but bend to the right and then resume its place; at the same moment I lost my equilibrium: I knew it must proceed from an earthquake, and the alarmed jailers concluded the same thing. Joyful at this discovery, I remained silent; in five minutes the shock was renewed, and I exclaimed, "Another, another, great God! but stronger." The attendants were astonished, for they supposed me deranged, and fled. On reflection, I was aware that it had occurred to me, that in the destruction of the ducal palace, I might effect my escape: I did not seem to doubt the possibility, that the falling building would leave me unhurt and free on the pavement of St. Mark's place! The same earthquake it was that, on the same day, laid Lisbon in ruins.

To render intelligible my plans for escape, a description of the "locale" is necessary.

The cells for the state prisoners are on the highest floor, in the roof of the ducal palace; which roof is neither covered with slates nor tiles, but with plates of lead three feet square and about a line in thickness; hence the name Blickammern. The only access to them is through the gate of the palace, and through those galleries along which I had been brought, and in the way up to them the council hall of the state inquisitors is passed. The secretary alone keeps the key, and the jailer returns it to him every morning after he has performed his service for the prisoners. This arrangement was made, because at a later hour of the day the council of ten assembled in an adjoining chamber called La Bussola, and the jailers would have had to pass through an ante-room, where people in attendance on that council were in waiting.

These prisons occupy the two opposite sides of the building; three, among which was mine, towards the west, and four towards the east. The gutter on our side ran along the inner court; on the other it overhung the canal "Rio di palazzo." The cells on that side are very light, and a man can stand upright in them; but it was not so with the others, which were called "trave," from the beams which crossed the windows in the roof. The floor of my cell was the ceiling of the hall of the inquisitors, who, according to rule, assembled only at night after the meeting of the ten, of which they were all of them members.

I was aware of all this, and my knowledge of the locality afforded me the only hope of escape. It would be necessary to dig through the floor of my cell, but to effect this tools were required, which I had no means of obtaining, deprived as I was of all means of communication with others; all visits and writing materials were absolutely forbidden; gold to bribe the jailers I had none; and if they would have had the complaisance to let me murder them, I had no weapon; besides, one of them stood sentinel at the closed passage, and before even a comrade could be let out he must give the pass word. Flight remained the object of my constant thought; and since I could derive no assistance on the subject from Boethius, I ceased to peruse his writings; but I had ever been convinced that there is no object a man may not attain by constantly devoting his thoughts to it.

In the middle of November I was informed, that, a new state prisoner having been taken, and being condemned to the worst cell, I was to have him for a companion. The information was of course agreeable to me. Accordingly, after the third hour, I heard the drawing of bolts, and Lorenzo accompanied by his two assistants, appeared, conducting a young man, who was dissolved in tears: they shut him in with me, and left us. I lay on my bed in the alcove, so that the stranger could not see me. I was diverted at his surprise; he was fortunate enough to be only five feet high, so he could stand upright: he looked on my arm-chair, which he concluded was intended for him, with attention; and seeing my Boethius lying on the shelf over the grating, he dried his eyes and opened the book, but pushed it away discontentedly on finding it a Latin work. He was still more surprised at observing clothes, and on approaching the alcove he stretched forth his hand and touched me, instantly apologising. I bade him to sit down, and in this manner our acquaintance commenced. He told me he was the son of a coachman, had been valet to a count, and had fallen in love with his master's daughter; that when the father found that she returned his attachment, and that they meditated a secret marriage, the count had exerted his influence, and got him sent here.

He was an agreeable, honest young man, but in love to desperation, and all his tears and sighs seemed vented more on account of his mistresses than of his own situation. I pitied his simplicity, and shared my provisions with him, but he ate nothing; and at night I lent him my mattress to sleep on, as he could get nothing for himself till morning. On the morrow Lorenzo brought him a mattress, and informed him that the tribunal allotted him fifteen sous daily for his provisions. I told the jailer he would always eat with me, and that he might keep the money to have three masses weekly said for his soul. Lorenzo congratulated my companion on my kindness, and gave us permission to walk every day half an hour up and down in the gallery: this was not only of great use to my health, but enabled me to further my plans for escape, which, nevertheless, did not ripen till eleven weeks afterwards.

At the further end of this magazine for rats, I found a quantity of old lumber, on each side of two old chests, laying tumbled together on the ground; a heap of papers and writings lay before them. Among the rubbish was a warming-pan, a brazier, a fire-shovel and tongs, an old candlestick and a tin watering-pot; probably some illustrious predecessor of mine had obtained permission to have these for his convenience; I also observed an iron bolt, about the thickness of my thumb, and eighteen inches long; but I touched nothing: the time had not yet arrived for fixing my attention on any thing.

One morning, at the end of the month, my companion was removed from me; Lorenzo said he had been ordered to the prisons called La Guattri: they are in the interior of the building, and belong likewise to the inquisitors. Those imprisoned in them enjoy the privilege of calling their jailers at any time, if they want any thing. It is true, that there is no day-light, but an oil-lamp supplies the place. I afterwards heard that poor Maggiorino passed five years in them, and was then banished for ten more to Lerigo. The loss of his society affected me exceedingly. Left again to myself, I again fell into dejection, but I still was allowed the privilege of walking in the gallery for a short time, and I found means to examine every thing that was there; more particularly in one of the chests I found some blank paper, paste, undressed goose feathers, and twine; the other was locked. A piece of black smooth marble, about one foot thick, six long, and three wide, I managed to secret and convey into my cell, where I hid it under my shirt.

Eight days after Maggiorino's departure, Lorenzo told me I might expect another companion. This jailer, who was an inveterate gossip, was impatient at my reserve; and as I never gave him an opportunity of showing his discretion, he concluded that I asked him no questions, in the belief he had nothing to tell me worth knowing. This hurt his vanity; and to prove that I was mistaken, he fell full hints of many things, of which I had asked no information, respecting the prisoners and the rules of the place; he also boasted his own virtues, but they were for the most part negative.

This was the first conversation he had honoured me with; it diverted me, and his information was afterwards of use to me; I also gathered from it that his folly prevented him from being baser than he otherwise might have been. I was fully aware that I might profit by this folly.

The following morning my new companion arrived, and the same scene as with Maggiorino was repeated. I now found that I should want two ivory spoons, for the first day I always had to treat the strangers.

I saluted the present one immediately; and my beard, already four inches long, imposed more on him than my stature; for though I was allowed scissors occasionally to cut my nails, I was not permitted to cut my beard; but use is every thing, and I became used to this.

The stranger was a man of about fifty, thin, and stooped much; he was shabbily dressed, and had a sinister expression of countenance; he was reserved towards me the first day, though he ate my victuals, but on the morrow he changed his system. A good bed and linen belonging to him was brought him. The jailer asked about his food, and demanded money for it.

"I have not even a sou."

"Good," replied Lorenzo; "then you shall have a pound and a half of ship's biscuit, and excellent water." He fetched both directly, and then left me alone with the spectre. He sighed, and that awakened my compassion. "Be not dejected," said I to him, "you shall eat with me; but you have been imprudent to come here absolutely without money." "I have money," he replied, "but one must not let these harpies know it."

I learnt from him that he was an usurer, who had been sent here most justly for an infamous piece of robbery he had practised towards a Count Scrimon, to whom he had refused restitution of some money he had been entrusted with by him. After being condemned in a process with costs, he was committed here till he should pay. On the fourth day, at about four, Lorenzo summoned him to the presence of the secretary. He dressed immediately, and put on my shoes without my being aware of it; he came back in half an hour in great grief and agitation, and took out of his shoes two purses with three hundred and fifty zechini in them, with which he returned to the secretary. Lorenzo told me he had been liberated on paying this sum, and his things were sent for on the following day. I concluded that the threats of torture had brought him to confession, so there may be some more even in this tyranny.

On the 1st of January, 1756, I received a new year's gift. Lorenzo brought me a beautiful dressing-gown, lined with fox fur, a silken coverlid quilted with wool, and a case of bear skin to put my feet in; for in proportion as it was hot in summer was my prison cold in winter. At the same time he informed me, that six zechini monthly were placed at my disposal, and that I might buy what books or newspapers I pleased. He added that this present came from my friend and patron, the Patrician Bragadino: I begged of him some paper and a pencil, and wrote on it, "My thanks for the clemency of the tribunal and the generosity of Signor Bragadino."

A person must have been in my situation to be able to be able to appreciate the effect this had on me: in the fulness of my heart I pardoned my oppressors; indeed I was nearly induced to give up all thoughts of escaping; so pliant is man, after misery has bowed him down and degenerated him.

One morning, as I was walking up and down the garret, my eyes rested on the bolt, which still lay on the ground. I saw that it could be made to supply me with an offensive and defensive weapon. I picked it up, hid it under my clothes, and brought it into my cell, at the same time taking in my hand the piece of marble I before-mentioned to have secured: I recognised it now for a whetstone, and trying the bolt on it, I resolved to make a weapon of the latter, though every convenience for so doing was wanting. The difficulties I had to overcome were but an incentive to my perseverance: I was obliged to perform my work in nearly perfect darkness, and to hold the stone in my hand, for want of something to lean it against; and instead of oil, I was compelled to use my own spittle. I worked fourteen days to convert the bolt into an octagonal stiletto, and a sword-maker could not have done it better; but it is impossible to form an idea of the fatigue and patience it cost me: it was a work, "quem Siculi non invenerit tyranni." I could hardly move my right arm, and my left hand was become one blister; but I would not give up my work. At length it was finished. Proud of my labour, and yet uncertain of what use it would be to me, I was puzzled in what manner to conceal it, so as to escape discovery. I hid it in the straw of my arm-chair; no one could find it there unless he knew of its situation. In this manner I was provided with one step towards an escape, which, if not wonderful, was at least remarkable.

After four days of reflection, I concluded that the only thing that remained for me to do, would be to dig a hole through the floor of the cell. I knew that under it must be the chamber in which I had seen Cavalli; I knew that this chamber was every morning open, and that if I could effect the opening, I could let myself down by means of my bed-clothes, then conceal myself under the table of the tribunal, and escape the following morning when the door was opened. I hoped to be able to reach a place of safety before I was pursued: if I found a sentinel, placed by Lorenzo, in that chamber, I would with my weapon kill him; but if it should turn out that the floor of the cell was doubly, and perhaps trebly boarded, the work might occupy me many months, and how should I be able to hinder the sweeping of my room so long? To forbid it would excite suspicion, for I had at first most strenuously insisted on it, for the sake of exterminating the vermin.

Nevertheless, I did forbid it; and after some days, Lorenzo was curious to know the reason; I replied, that it raised a dust that was prejudicial to my lungs: he proposed first sprinkling it, but that I reprobated still more, because dampness caused spitting of blood. At the end of a week he commanded it to be swept, had the bed taken out of the cell, and brought in a light, under the pretence of seeing it well swept; I saw that he harboured some suspicion, but I remained quite indifferent in appearance, and took my resolution accordingly.

I stained my handkerchief with blood, which I obtained by cutting my thumb, and waited in bed his coming. "I have coughed so violently," I said, "that I have burst a blood-vessel: see how I have bled; pray send for a physician." One soon arrived, bled me, and gave me a receipt. I declared to him that Lorenzo was alone to blame, because he would persevere in having the place swept. He was desired to desist, which he agreed to; and it became a rule among the under jail-keepers, only to sweep the rooms of those they meant to ill-treat!

I had gained much, but the time was not yet come for beginning my work; it was so cold that I could not hold the iron without my hands being frozen. My undertaking required great circumspection: the long winter nights made me insupportable; I had to pass nineteen hours in darkness, for on the foggy days, which are common in Venice, the light that was able to penetrate to me was not sufficient to enable me to read. I again sunk into despondency; a lamp would have made me happy. I thought, and thought, how I could supply the place of one: I required a lamp, wick, oil, flint, and steel, and tinder, and I had not one of them all; the lamp, however I supplied by means of an earthen pipkin, in which butter and eggs were prepared, and which I managed to conceal: I saved the oil for my salad, and wicks I made out of cotton from my bed; I then pretended to have a violent tooth-ache, and persuaded Lorenzo to give me a flint to steep in vinegar, to apply to the tooth, and he was present when I laid three flints in vinegar for that purpose. A buckle in my girdle served for a steel, but I had neither matches nor tinder; these, at length, I managed to obtain, through contrivance and fortunate circumstances. An inflammation caused me an intolerable itching; I requested Lorenzo to procure from the physician a receipt to cure it: he proscribed "diet for a day and three ounces of oil of sweet almonds, to cure the eruption; or rub the part with flour of brimstone; but the last to be used with caution." I laughed at the danger, and desired Lorenzo to buy me the salve, or rather to buy the sulphur, and I would make the salve myself with butter; this he did; but now for the tinder; to contrive a substitute for that was the work of three days. It at last occurred to me that I had ordered my tailor to stuff my silken vest, under the arms, with sponge to prevent the appearance of the stain; the clothes, quite new, lay before me; my heart beat,—the tailor might not have fulfilled my orders; I hesitated between fear and hope. It only required two steps and I was out of suspense; but I could not resolve on those two steps; at last I advanced to the place where the clothes lay, and feeling unworthy of such a favour, if I should find the sponge there, I fell on my knees, and prayed fervently. Comforted by this, I took down the dress—and found the sponge.

I was no sooner in possession of it, than I poured the oil into the pipkin, and put the wick in, and the lamp was ready. It was no little addition to the pleasure this luxury afforded me, that I owed it entirely to my own ingenuity, and that I had violated one of the strictest laws of the prison. I dreaded the approach of night no longer; but I was obliged to renounce salad, my favourite dish. I determined to begin my operations on the first Monday of Lent, for during the extravagance of the carnival, I was daily liable to have companions sent me. On Ash Wednesday Lorenzo announced to me, that I was to expect the annual visit of the secretary, which was made for the sake of receiving any complaints of the prisoners, and to enable them to confess, and receive the sacrament; he desired me, therefore, to dress and receive him. When he came, I begged to have a confessor sent to me on the morrow, but I made no other request, and preferred no complaint. I regretted that I could not forbear shivering from cold, as the secretary might take it for a sign of guilt; when he found I had nothing to say to him, he made a slight salutation, and left me, and I returned to my bed again to get warm.

I now began to cut through the deal boards of my floor with my stiletto; at first the chips were not bigger than a grain of corn, but by and by they increased to respectable splinters; the deals were about sixteen inches broad. I dug my hole where two of them joined, and was obliged to be expeditious,—for what was I to do if another prisoner had come, who would have insisted on having the cell swept out? I had moved my bed on one side, lighted my lamp, and lay on the ground, my stiletto in one hand, and a napkin to collect the chips in the other; fortunately I met with no nail nor cramp to impede my progress. After six hours' work I tied the napkin together, intending to empty the chips behind the lumber in the ante-room, and I put the bed back again in its place. On continuing my work on the following day, I discovered a second deal under the first, and of the same thickness; I had no interruption, but was in continued dread of it. In this way I laboured daily for three weeks: three planks were now cut through, and under them I found a pavement of small pieces of marble, called "terrazzo marmorin;" against this my weapon was ineffectual. I recollected Hannibal's contrivance for passing the Alps, and resolved to try it on this occasion. I found that the vinegar, aided by my perseverance, enabled me, if not to dig through the marble, at least to cut out the mortar that cemented the pieces together, and in four days I accomplished my purpose, and had not broken my stiletto. I now found, as I expected, another plank, probably the last, but with which I had greater difficulties, for the hole was already ten inches deep.

It was on the twenty-fifth of June, as in the afternoon, after working three hours, laying on my stomach on the ground, and quite naked, dropping with sweat, and my lamp standing lighted in the hole, when I heard the rattling of the bolts in the ante-rooms. What a moment! I blew out the lamp, left the stiletto and napkin in the opening, pushed the bedstead into the alcove, threw mattress and bedding upon it, and sunk on the floor, nearly dead, just as Lorenzo entered; he would have trod on me if I had not cried out. "Ah, my God!" exclaimed he, "how I pity you, signor; this place is like an oven. Get up, and thank heaven for having sent you such a companion. Your excellency may now come in." He said this to the unfortunate man who followed him, without thinking of my nakedness; the stranger, however, perceived it, and turned away, while I searched in vain for a shirt. The new comer must have thought himself in hell, and he exclaimed, "Where am I? and where am I to be confined? What a heat and what a smell! With whom am I imprisoned?" Lorenzo called him out of the cell, begged me to put on a shirt, and to go out into the garret. He told the stranger he had orders to get him a bed, and whatever he might want, directly; in the mean time he might walk up and down in the room, and the smell in the cell would go off: the smell in fact came from the lamp, which I had blown out. Lorenzo made me no reproaches on the subject, though I was certain he suspected the truth, and I began to respect him a little for this forbearance.

At length I went out into the room with my shirt and dressing gown on: the new prisoner wrote with a pencil what he wanted; but as soon as he saw me, he exclaimed, "You here, Casanova!" I recognised him immediately for the Count Abbé Fanarola, from Brescia: he was an agreeable, much-esteemed man, fifty years of age, and rich. I embraced him with tears, and said he was the last man I expected to see there. I told him, when we were left alone, that I would, when his bed came, offer him the alcove, but begged him to refuse it, and to forbid the sweeping out of the room. I would tell him afterwards my reasons. I mentioned the blowing out of the lamp: he promised secrecy, and rejoiced that he was confined with me. I learnt from him that no one knew the crime of which I was accused; and that, therefore, there were all sorts of reports and conjectures afloat about it. Towards the evening his bed, chair, linen, perfume, an excellent dinner, and good wine, were brought him. He could eat nothing, but I was far from following his example. His bed was placed without moving mine, and we were shut in together.

I now brought my lamp out of the hole, and laughed at finding my napkin soaked in oil; when an adventure that might have had tragical consequences ended with a trifling one, we have a right to laugh: the abbé joined me in my mirth when he heard the story, as I set it to rights again, and lighted it. We never slept the whole night, less on account of the vermin, as that we had numerous questions to ask of one another. From him I learnt that the cause of his arrest was an insignificant but indiscreet observation of his, made at a public place. I told him he might expect to remain here a week, and that then he would be banished to Brescia for a few months, but he would not believe he would be kept here even a week; he afterwards, however, found my prophecy correct. I did my best to console him for the mortification of his confinement.

In the morning early, Lorenzo brought us coffee, and the count's dinner in a basket; the latter could not understand why he must eat at this hour. We were allowed to walk in the gallery for an hour, and were then shut in. The fleas which tormented us, induced the abbé to ask me why I would not have the place swept? I told him, and showed him every thing. He was astonished, and mortified that he had compelled me to the disclosure. He, however, encouraged me to persevere.

The eight days quickly passed; but how unwilling I was to lose my companion may be conceived. It was superfluous to enjoin him to secrecy at his departure; I should have offended him by the mention of it. With much toil I completed my work by the twenty-third of August; an unfortunate discovery had retarded me till then. When I had made a small hole in the last plank, I found I was right in my supposition, that it was the chamber of the inquisitors that was beneath; but I perceived that I had made the aperture just above a large cross-beam, a circumstance that I had all along feared. I was, consequently, obliged to widen the hole on the other side, to escape this. I stopped the small hole in the plank with bread, that the light of my lamp might not be perceived, for I resolved to postpone my flight till the night before St. Austin's day, for then I knew that the great council assembled, and that therefore the Basola would be empty, which adjoined the chamber I must escape through.

But on the twenty-fifth of August an event happened that even now makes me shudder at the recollection of it. I heard the bolts drawn, and a death-like fear seized me; the beating of my heart shook my body, and I threw myself almost fainting in my arm-chair. Lorenzo, still in the garret, said to me through the grating, in a tone of pleasure, "I wish you joy of the news I bring." I imagined he had brought me my freedom, and I saw myself lost; the discovery of the hole I had made would effectually debar me from liberty. Lorenzo entered, and desired me to follow him; I offered to dress myself, but he said it was unnecessary, as he was only going to remove me from this detestable cell, to another quite new, and well lighted, with two windows, from which I could overlook half Venice, and could stand upright in; I was nearly beside myself. I asked for some vinegar; begged him to thank the secretary, but to intreat him to leave me where I was. Lorenzo asked me if I were mad, to refuse to exchange a hell for a paradise; and offering me his arm to aid me, desired my bed, books, &c. to be brought after. Seeing it was in vain to oppose any longer, I rose, and left my cage, and heard him, with some small satisfaction, order my chair to be brought with me, for in the straw of that was my spoutoon hid. Would it had been possible for my toilsome work in the floor to have accompanied me also!

Leaning on the shoulder of Lorenzo, who tried by laughing to enliven me, I passed through two long galleries, then over three steps into a large light hall, and passed through a door at the left end of it, into a corridor, twelve feet long and two broad; the two grated windows in it presented to the eye a wide extensive view over a great part of the town, but I was not in a situation to be rejoiced at the prospect. The door of my destined prison was in the corner of this corridor, and the grating of it was opposite to one of the windows that lighted the passage, so that the prisoner could not only enjoy a great part of the prospect, but also feel the refreshment which the cool air of the open window afforded him; a balsam for any creature in confinement at that season of the year; but I could not think of all this at that moment, as the reader might easily conceive. Lorenzo left me and my chair, into which I threw myself, telling me he would go for my bed.

I sat like a statue; I saw all my labour lost; I could yet hardly lament it: not to think of the future was all the alleviation I could find for my misery. I acknowledged my situation as a punishment for having delayed my escape for three days; but did I deserve to be so severely punished, for listening to the most prudential dictates of reason, instead of following the suggestions of my habitual impatience?

In a few minutes, two under jailers brought me my bed and returned to fetch my other things; but two hours elapsed without my hearing any thing further, though the door stood wide open; this delay excited many reflections, but I could come to no resolution; as I had every thing to fear, I endeavoured to bring my mind to that state of composure that might arm me against whatever might happen.

Besides the "Camerotti," and the prisons in the inner court, there are also nineteen other frightful subterraneous dungeons in the ducal palace, destined for prisoners condemned to death. All judges and rulers on earth have esteemed it a mercy if they left the wretch his life, however painful that life might be for him. It can only be a mercy when the prisoner considers it himself as such; and he ought to be consulted on the subject, or else the intended mercy becomes injustice.

These nineteen subterraneous dungeons are really graves; but they are called "wells," because they are always two feet deep in water, the sea penetrating through the gratings that supply the wretched light that is allowed to them. The prisoner, who will not stand all day long in salt water, must sit on a trundle, that serves him at night for a bedstead; on that is placed his mattress, and each morning his bread, water, and soup, which he must swallow immediately, if he do not wish to contend for it with large sea-rats, that infest these wretched abodes. In these fearful dungeons, where the prisoner remains for life, some have, notwithstanding the misery of their situation and meagreness of their food, attained a considerable age. I knew of a man of the name of Beguelin, a Frenchman, who having served as a spy for the republic in a war with the Turks, had sold himself as an agent also to them: he was condemned to death, but his sentence was changed to perpetual imprisonment in the "wells;" he was four and forty years of age when he was first immured, yet he lived seven and thirty years in them; he could only have known hunger and misery, yet thought "dum vita superest, bene est," and to this misery did I now expect to be condemned.

At last I heard the footsteps of one approaching in a towering passion; it was Lorenzo, absolutely mad with rage; foaming with passion, and cursing God and all the saints, he demanded of me the axe with which I had made the hole, and insisted on knowing the sbirri who had furnished me with it; and he ordered me to be searched. I stood up, threatened, stripped myself, and told him to search as he pleased. He ordered my bed, my mattress, every thing to be examined, and when he found nothing—"So," said he, "you won't tell me where the tools are you used to cut through the floor; I'll see if you'll confess to others." "If it be truth I have cut through the floor, I shall say that I had the tools of yourself, and that I have given them back again to you." At these words, which obviously were concurred in by his followers, he began literally to howl; he ran his head against the wall, stamped and danced about like a madman; he then left me; and after his people had brought me my books, clothes, bottles, and in short every thing, even to the pieces of marble and the lamp, he shut the windows of the corridor, so that I was deprived of the fresh air; yet I had reason to rejoice in having escaped so cheaply; experienced as he was at his trade, he had neglected searching the under side of my arm-chair; I still possessed my stiletto, on which I might rely for achieving my escape.

The heat and change of situation prevented my sleeping: early in the morning, sour wine, stinking water, stale salad, tainted meat, and hard bread, were brought me; my room was not swept out; and when I begged for the window to be opened, I got no answer: a jailer examined the walls and the floor, especially under my bed, with an iron bar; fortunately he forgot the ceiling, for I resolved to effect my escape through the roof; but to effect this I should require co-operation, which I could not yet hope to obtain; every thing which I did would be obvious to the eye, as the room was quite new.

I passed a dreadful day; towards noon the heat increased so much, that I felt as if I should be suffocated; I could neither eat nor drink, for all that was brought me was spoilt; perspiration, that literally dropt from me, hindered me from reading or stirring, but no change was made; the meat and the water that were brought me on the following day, were equally repulsive; I asked whether it were commanded that I should be killed through heat and noisome smells, but Lorenzo would give me no answer; I dipped some bread into some cypress wine, to support me, and to enable me to stab my tormenter when he appeared next day; however, I contented myself with saying, that as soon as I regained my liberty, I would certainly throttle him; he laughed, and left me without a word; I concluded that I was treated thus by command of the secretary, whom he had told of my attempt at escape; I was nearly overcome by the agitation of my mind and the exhaustion of my body.

On the eighth day, I demanded in a rage my monthly reckoning before the under-jailers, and called Lorenzo a cheat; he promised to bring it next morning; the window, which he opened for a moment through necessity, he shut again, and laughed at my cries; but I determined to persevere in using a violent behaviour, as I had gained a little by it; but on the morrow my rage subsided, for before Lorenzo gave me the reckoning, he handed me a basket of lemons, which Bragadino had sent me, with a bottle of good water, and a chicken; an attendant opened the window. I looked only at the balance of my account, and except one zechin, which was to be divided among his men, I desired the rest to be given to Lorenzo's wife: when we were alone he said to me calmly, "You have told me that you were indebted to me for the work-tools you made the great opening in the floor of your cell with; I am not therefore curious to know any thing more of that; but who gave you the lamp?"

"You yourself—you gave me oil, fiat, and sulphur; the rest I had already."

"That is true; can you as easily prove I helped you to the tools to break through the floor?"

"Just as easily, I got every thing from you."

"Grant me patience! what do I hear? did I give you an axe?"

"I will confess all, but the secretary must be present."

"I will ask no further, but believe you; be silent, and remember I am a poor man, and have a family." He left me, holding his hands to his face. I rejoiced to have discovered something by which I could keep in awe a man to whom I was apparently indebted for my life; I knew that his own interest would keep him silent about what I had done. Shortly after, I commissioned him to buy for me the works of Maffei; he was vexed at the laying out of so much money, but he did not venture to own it, but asked what use I could make of more books, since I already had so many. "I had read them all," I replied; he then promised to borrow others of another prisoner, to whom I could lend mine in return, as he assured me they should not be romances, but learned works, since there were many people of education in the prison; I agreed to his offer, and gave the Chronology of Petard to get another book in exchange for it.

In four minutes he returned with the first part of Wolff's writings; this suited me; I recalled the commission for Maffei's works, and he left me, exulting in the advice he had given me. I was not less pleased at the circumstance than he, not so much on account of the books, as because it opened a channel for communication by writing, with some prisoner, who might aid me in my plans for escape. On opening the book I found a sheet of paper with six good verses, a paraphrase on Seneca's words, "calamitosus est, animus futuri anxius." I made the nail of my little finger of my right hand, which I had kept long, into a sort of pen, and wrote, with mulberry-juice, some verses on the same paper; I wrote a list of my other books on the last leaf of the volume; and on the reverse, under the title of the book, I wrote "latet." Anxious for an answer, I told Lorenzo, on the following morning, that I had read the work, and would be glad if the prisoner could lend me another; he returned immediately with the second part; a loose leaf, which lay in it, contained the following, written in Latin.

"We, both confined as we are in one place, must rejoice at the folly and avarice which give us an unexpected advantage. My name is Marino Balbi; I am a Venetian nobleman, and belong to the brotherhood of Somascus; my fellow prisoner is Count Andreas Asquina, from Undine, in Frioul; he desires me to say that you may dispose of his books also, a list of which is subjoined on the other side: we must be cautious to conceal from Lorenzo our little correspondence."

I laughed at the recommendation of caution, because the loose leaf with the list of books was no proof of it on his part; Lorenzo might have found the paper, and needed only to get it translated for him to detect us. I gathered from this circumstance that Balbi was not very discreet. After I had read the catalogue, I wrote on the blank half of the page who I was, and all I knew of the origin of my detention, and that I hoped soon to be freed: in the next book I found a letter of sixteen pages, containing the whole history of the cause of his imprisonment. I concluded from this, that he was an affected, whimsical, false reasoner, wicked, stupid, thoughtless, and ungrateful; for example, he mentioned how unhappy he should be, without money and books, if without the company of the old count, and then filled two pages with jests and ridicules of him. I would never have corresponded with a man of this character, had not necessity compelled me to avail myself of his aid. At the back of the volume I found paper, pen, and pencil; I now had the means of writing conveniently. Balbi had mentioned, among other things, that Nicola was the jailer who attended him, and who told him of all that passed in the prison; that he had informed him of what I had done to the floor of my cell, and that Lorenzo had been employed two hours in getting the hole I had made repaired, enjoining the strictest secrecy to the carpenter and smith whom he had employed to do it. Balbi requested my full confidence as to the plan I meant to adopt, to effect my escape. I had less doubts of his curiosity than of his prudence, for his request was suspicious.

but I was under the necessity of managing this man; at least, I supposed him able to execute the part in our escape I should entrust him with. I employed the whole day in writing an answer; but suspicion induced me to delay sending it directly: it was possible that Lorenzo might have favoured our correspondence, only to ascertain what instruments I had need to attempt my escape, and where they were to be found: I therefore said that I had used a knife, which still lay in the window of the garret before my cell: Lorenzo had not looked there, but he would do so if he examined our letters.

Balbi wanted to know whether I had not always had the knife with me. As he understood I had not been searched, Lorenzo would have justified his innocence of having been at all negligent, by alleging that he naturally supposed every prisoner sent him by messer grande, to have been previously searched; but in truth the latter had no pretence for searching me, as he saw me rise from my bed. Balbi begged me to send the knife to him by Nicola, as this man was to be trusted.

The incaution of this monk astonished me; as soon as I was convinced that our letters were not intercepted, I wrote to him to say, I would trust my secret neither to Nicola, nor even to paper; this suspicion however gradually left me, and I reflected that my stiletto was an excellent means of effecting my escape; but as I could not use the weapon myself, since, excepting the ceiling, all the rest of my cell was daily searched by an attendant with an iron bar, I could only escape by somebody's breaking through this ceiling from without, who could rescue himself as well as me, through a hole we might make, in the same night, in the roof of the ducal palace: but I must have a companion to help me to attain the roof, where we could consult what was to be done further; consequently, though I could find no one more able to execute my directions than this monk, who was only twenty years of age, and of weak intellect, he must know every thing, and even be put in possession of my iron bolt; I therefore asked Balbi in a letter, whether he were really anxious for freedom, and whether he would be ready to do all that I desired him to do, in order to rescue himself and me. He answered me, that he and his companion were ready to attempt every thing that was practicable, but described to me in four pages the impediments and difficulties we should have to encounter. I answered, that common considerations I cared not for; my plan was arranged, and that he should partake of my freedom on promising on his honour to obey me in every thing; he did so promise. I now wrote to him about my iron stiletto, which I would contrive to send him, that he might dig through the floor, break open the wall, and draw me up to him through the opening; that then I would achieve all the rest, and free him as well as the count.

He answered me, that when he had drawn me up to him, I should still be a prisoner, only in another cell. I answered, I knew that well, and had no intention of escaping through any door; my plan was made, and would succeed; I only expected from him punctuality in fulfilling my directions: at the same time I bid him obtain from the keeper fifty prints of sacred subjects, and stick them up against the walls of the cell; these would not excite Lorenzo's suspicion, and we could conceal by means of them the hole through which we should escape, as it would only require a few days to accomplish, and Lorenzo would not be aware of it: I could not do this for myself, for I should be suspected, and no one would believe that I got the prints for the sake of devotion.

Having already planned how to convey to Balbi my iron bolt, I ordered Lorenzo to procure for me a folio edition of a work I specified: the size of this book induced me to hope, that I could conceal the stiletto between the binding and the back, but it was unfortunately two inches longer than the book. Balbi wrote soon to tell me he had hung up the prints. I was determined to send him the stiletto in the book, but with some contrivance to conceal that part that would project.

I told Lorenzo I was desirous of celebrating Michaelmas-day, with two great plates of macaroni, dressed with butter and Parmesan cheese, and that I wished to give one to the prisoner who had lent me his books. He answered, that the same prisoner had expressed a wish to borrow my great book; I told him I would send it with the macaroni, and ordered him to procure me the largest dish he could; I would myself fill it. While Lorenzo went for the dish, I wrapped up the bolt in paper, and stuck it behind the binding; I was convinced, that if I put a large dish of macaroni on the top of the book, Lorenzo's attention would be so occupied in carrying that safely, that he never would perceive the end of the iron projecting; I informed Balbi of all this, and charged him to be particularly cautious to take the dish and book together.

On Michaelmas day, Lorenzo came with a great pan, in which the macaroni was stewed; I immediately added the butter, and poured it into both dishes, filling them up with grated parmesan cheese; the dish for the monk I filled to the brim, and the macaroni swam in butter. I put the dish upon the volume, which was half as broad in diameter as the book was long, and gave them to Lorenzo, with the back of the book turned towards him, telling him to stretch out his arms, and to go slowly, that the butter might not run over on the book. I observed him steadily; he could not turn his eyes away from the butter, which he feared to spill; he proposed to take the dish first, and then to return for the book, but I told him by so doing my present would lose half its value; he consented to take both at last, observing that it would not be his fault if the butter ran over; I followed him with my eyes as far as I could, and soon heard Balbi cough three times, the concerted signal of the success of my stratagem. Father Balbi employed eight days to make the opening, which he daily covered over with a print; he wrote constantly to me, complaining of the slow progress he made, though he worked all night long, and that he thought we should only render our condition worse, as he feared we should have no success; my answer to him was, that I was persuaded of the contrary, though I was by no means so in reality; but I well knew we must either persevere, as we had begun, or give up every thing.

On the 16th of October, at eight o'clock, as I was translating an ode of Horace, I heard a noise over head, and then three taps; I answered with as many: this signal had been agreed on between us, if we had not deceived ourselves as to our relative position. Balbi wrote next day to tell me he should soon finish, if my ceiling did not consist of more than two planks, at the same time reassuring me he would not cut quite through the last, as I had particularly dwelt on the necessity of my ceiling presenting no trace of our labours. I had already resolved to quit my prison on the night of the next day but one; now I had an assistant, I was confident of being able to effect an opening through the great roof of the ducal palace, in four hours; and when we had climbed out on that, to choose the best means that might present themselves of descending.

But on the same day, it was a Monday, two hours after our eating-time, while Balbi was working, I heard the door of the hall which adjoined my prison open; my blood ran cold, but I did not lose my presence of mind; I gave two taps, the signal to Balbi that he must cover the hole up. In a minute Lorenzo appeared, and begged my pardon, but he was obliged to bring me a scoundrel for a companion; at the same time I saw a man about thirty to forty, small, thin, and very plain, with a wretched dress and a round black wig, appear, led by two jailers; I observed, that the tribunal had the power of commanding there; Lorenzo desired a mattress to be brought for him, and left us, after he had told the new comer that ten sous daily were allotted for his provision.

This man, whose countenance and manners by no means belied the character Lorenzo had given of him, had been a common informer and spy of the basest kind; but having deceived the council in a treacherous piece of information, in which he had betrayed his own cousin, he had been sent here for his pains. His ignorance, superstition, and gluttony, were on a par with his rascality, and I was alternately tormented with his absurd and revolting devotions, his nonsense and his voracity; for having at first, out of compassion, let him dine with me, he spent none of his ten sous, but entirely lived on my provisions: his name was Sorodaci. I had written to tell Balbi, that for the present we must give up our efforts at escape; I kept my new companion in good humour, by condoling with him on his imprisonment, and flattering him with hopes of a speedy release; while I procured, through Lorenzo, crucifixes and images to feed his superstition, and plenty of garlic and strong wine to feed his appetite.

One night I wrote to Balbi to inform him, that when the clock struck eighteen he should begin to proceed with his work, and cease as the clock struck three-and-twenty; he had nothing to fear, and the hopes of our escape depended on his punctuality. It was now the twenty-fifth of October, and the day was approaching when the attempt must be made or given up altogether. The inquisitors and the secretary visited, on the first of November, some villages on the main land; Lorenzo was accustomed to get gay on that evening, and did not rise till late the next day to visit his prisoners: that night must therefore be the one destined for our flight.

It now only remained to work on the superstition of Sorodaci so effectually as to overawe him, and prevent his betraying or marring our plot; accordingly, after he had eaten with me one evening, I assumed the air of one inspired, and bid him seat himself and listen to me. "You must know," said I, "that this morning early, the holy virgin appeared to me in a vision, and said to me, that as you were a fervent worshipper of her holy rosary, to reward your devotion, she would depute an angel in human form, who would descend through an aperture in the ceiling to you, and free you in the space of five or six days: this angel, she told me, would commence his work at the stroke of nineteen, and continue at it till half an hour before sun-set, that he might ascend to heaven again by daylight. Accompanied by this angel, you and I were to quit your prison; and if you swore to renounce the trade of a spy, and reformed, I was to take care of you for the future."

I observed with the most earnest attention the countenance of the fellow, who seemed petrified at my information. I then took my prayer-book, and after sprinkling the cell with holy water, pretended to pray, and repeatedly kissed the image of the virgin. My rogue remained silent for an hour, and then asked when the angel would descend, and whether we should hear him as he broke through the prison. "Certainly," said I, "he will come at the nineteenth hour; we shall hear him at work, and after four hours, which in my opinion are sufficient for an angel to perform his task, he will retire." "Probably," said he, "you have dreamt this." I denied it, and asked him whether he were determined to renounce the trade of a spy? Instead of answering directly, he asked me whether it were not time for him to renounce his profession some time hence. I gave him for consideration till the coming of the angel, but assured him that if by that time he had not taken the oath, he should not be rescued. I was astonished at the calmness of his mind; he seemed certain of the non-appearance of the celestial visitor, and pitied me: I was impatient for the clock to strike nineteen, and enjoyed the idea of the confusion and terror which I was certain this credulous man would manifest at the promised noise; my plan could not fail, unless Lorenzo had forgotten to give the book containing my instructions to Balbi.

At our meal at noon I drank nothing but water; Sorodaci drank all the wine, and ate a great quantity of garlic. As the clock struck nineteen, I threw myself on the floor, and cried out "the angel comes;" he imitated me, and we remained an hour silent. I read for three hours and a half, and he prayed to the rosary, every now and then falling asleep; he did not venture to speak aloud, and kept his eyes fixed on the ceiling at which Balbi was working, with the most comical expression; as it struck three-and-twenty, I bid him imitate me, as the angel was about to retire; we cast ourselves on the earth. Father Balbi ceased, and all was quiet: on the following morning fear, more than rational surprise, was legible on the countenance of my companion. In two hours I had informed Balbi of all that had passed, and told him when he had finished, he need only push in the ceiling of my cell, which he was to do on the night of the 31st of October, and at four we would escape together with his and my companion.

I kept Sorodaci in a continual excitement by my discourse, and never left him to go to rest, till he was nearly drunk and ready to fall asleep. Every thing succeeded to my wish; the 31st was come, and I endeavoured to persuade myself of the probability of our success.

But here I must pause, and endeavour to justify myself in the opinion of the reader, who may else doubt the sincerity of my religious feelings; since I could thus trifle with the mysteries of our religion, in feigning the vision of our Lady, and in playing on the weakness of my credulous companion at the time; and now, in venturing to record it: but I could not suppress this, if I intended to give a faithful account of my escape; and I conscientiously declare, that I feel no compunction at what I then did, though I do not pretend that it was a very honourable proceeding. I adopted it much against my will, and only because I had no better means to employ; but I confess that if it were to do again, and my freedom depended on it, I could not resist the temptation of acting in a similar manner. If nature prompted me to endeavour to escape, certainly religion did not forbid me: I had no time to lose; I had a traitor for a companion, whose very trade would induce him to betray me to Lorenzo; I must therefore either paralyze his mind by the agency of fear, or—murder him, as many others, who possessed less remorse, would have done in my place; I could easily have asserted that Sorodaci had died a natural death, and no enquiries would have been made. If any of my readers should decide this to have been the best reprehensible mode of acting, God enlighten them; their religion will never be mine; I did what seemed to me my duty, and eternal Providence did not frustrate my endeavours. Sorodaci's cowardice hindered him from sharing our flight, as will be seen, so I was freed from my oath of supporting him; but had it been otherwise, I will confess to my readers, that I would not have prejudiced myself; I will even own, that on the first appearance of danger, I would have freed myself from the wretch, if I must have tied him up to a tree; as I had sworn to him constant support, I knew his fidelity would last no longer than I could influence his fears, which would probably terminate at the appearance of the angel and monk. "Non morta fe, chi non la serba altrui." A man is more justified in sacrificing all to self-preservation, than kings are, who maintain their right to sacrifice all to the good of the state.

At length the seventeenth hour strikes, and the angel approaches. Sorodaci was about to prostrate himself, but I told him it was needless; in three minutes a piece of the plank fell at my foot, and Balbi precipitated himself into my arms. "Now your work is complete, and mine begins;" he gave over to me my stiletto: impatient to reconnoitre, I desired Balbi to remain with Sorodaci, whom I was unwilling to trust alone; I forced myself with difficulty through the opening into the cell of the count, whom I embraced. I found in him a man whose person did not seem adapted for exertions like those we had to make; and accordingly, when I told him my plan, he asserted he had no wings, which must be necessary to descend from the leaden roof, and declared he had not courage enough to accompany me, but he would remain behind to pray for us. I betook myself to the roof, to examine with my stiletto the timber and planking under the lead work, and found it break easily. In less than an hour I could effect a tolerable opening; I then returned to my cage, cut up clothes, napkins, and sheets, to make a rope of; I myself fastened the knots by nooses, for one bad one might have precipitated us headlong; I got a hundred feet of rope. In situations like mine a fortunate circumstance often decides all, and he alone deserves success who relies solely on his own exertions for attaining it.

I bound my clothes, my silk mantle, and some linen together, and we all betook ourselves to the count's cell; the latter wished Sorodaci joy of having been confined with me, and of now being able to escape with me. I laughed at laying aside the Tartuffe's mask I had carried for a week, in order to impose on my worthy companion; he now discovered that he had been cheated, but still could not comprehend how I had maintained an intercourse with the pretended angel, who came so punctually to our rescue. The count's assertion, that we exposed ourselves to imminent danger, made him anxious, and coward as he was, he determined not to hazard the perilous attempt. I exhorted the monk to make up his package, while I finished the opening in the roof; at the second hour of the night it was ready. I felt, indeed, that the plates of lead were riveted to, or at least bent over the marble gutter; but with Balbi's assistance, and with my bolt, I succeeded in loosening one of the plates sufficiently, so that with the help of one's shoulder it could be raised up. I saw with regret, as I looked out, the light of the new moon, and we must now wait till midnight, when she would set; for in such a night, when the serenity of the weather tempted all the world to walk in St. Mark's-place, we dared not venture to be clambering about the roof; at five the moon would set, and at half-past thirteen the sun would rise, so we had seven hours of perfect darkness.

I told Balbi we would pass the three hours in conversation with Count Asquino, and that the former should beg him to lend us forty zechini, which would be as necessary to our success as my stiletto had been. He performed my commission, and said, after some minutes, the count would speak with me alone: the poor old man represented to me that I needed no gold for my flight; that his family was numerous, and that if I should die he would lose the loan, together with other excuses to conceal avarice. My answer lasted half an hour; I alleged excellent reasons, but these never will prosper while the world stands; for what can philosophy avail against the passions? It occurred to me, "noienti baculus," but I was not cruel enough to put this proverb in practice, and concluded with the promise, that if he would escape with us I would bear him on my shoulders; weeping and sobbing, he asked if two zechini would be enough. I answered I must be contented with any thing, and he conjured me to promise to restore them to him, if, after wandering about some time on the roof, we should be obliged to return to our prisons. This I proposed, though surprised he should imagine I should ever think of returning; I knew very well that would never happen.

We now called our companions, and brought our packages to the opening. I divided my hundred fathoms of line into two parcels; we passed the remaining hours in discourse over our past sufferings. Balbi already began to show the selfish folly of his character, in accusing me repeatedly of not keeping my word with him, for that I had written in my letters to him that I was certain of success, which was by no means the case; and he scrupled not to declare, that if he had known as much as he did now, he never would have united with me in the attempt. The count said, with the caution of a man of seventy, that he thought I had much better remain where I was, for that I should certainly lose my life in attempting to descend from the roof. I gave no heed to his advice; but he still persisted in the hopes of rescuing his two zechini; he described the difficulties of climbing along the roof, and the impracticability of getting in at any of the windows, which were all guarded by iron bars, or of finding a place where we might fasten the rope to; and if even we succeeded in finding such a place, he conceived we should be unable to let ourselves down by the ropes, so that one of us must sacrifice himself by letting down the other two, and then return to his prison; that further, if either of us was capable of such generosity, it then remained to be considered on which side we could descend, without being seen; on the side next the church we should be inclosed in the court-yard, where there were sentinels; there only remained, therefore, the side of the canal, and there we could not have a boat ready for us. I listened to all this with a patience which was foreign to my nature. What provoked me the most were the impudent reproaches of the monk; but as I could not hope to succeed without the aid of one at least, I restrained myself, and contented myself with saying, I was certain of success, though I could not explain all the particulars of my plan.

I sent Sorodaci, who had been in silent bewilderment all this time, to see how near the moon was to her setting, he returned with the information, that in a quarter of an hour there would be no moon to be seen, but that a thick mist would make it dangerous to ascend the leaden roof. "As long as the mist is not oil, I am content," said I, and desired Sorodaci to put on his mantle, and take a part of the rope; on this he began to weep, and begged me not to require his death; he should but fall into the canal, and be perfectly useless to us; he therefore desired to be left behind; he would remain and pray the whole night to St. Francis for us: I had it in my power, he said, to kill him, but alive he would never go with us.

He little knew that I was glad to be quit of him, as I was sure he would be more burdensome than useful to us; I dismissed him, therefore, on condition he would pray to St. Francis, and that he would bring all my books, with a hundred dollars, to the count; he did so; the latter offered to restore them all on my return; I observed he would never see me again. "The wretch deserves not to share in such an undertaking as ours; does he, Balbi?" I wished by this speech to arouse a spark of feeling and honour in the other, and he was obliged to acquiesce in my assertion.

I now begged of the count, pen, ink, and paper, which he possessed, notwithstanding the prohibition to that effect, for Lorenzo would have sold St. Mark himself for a dollar. I wrote a letter, which I could not read over, as it was dark, and gave it to Sorodaci. It began with the following appropriate verse: "Non morar, sed vivam, et narrabo, opera Domini." Our lord inquisitors may employ every means to detain a prisoner in their dungeons; but if he be fortunate enough not to be pledged by his word, he is justified in taking all steps to effect his liberation; the former justify themselves by law, the latter by nature; they do not require his concurrence for his imprisonment; he does not require theirs to his freedom. I wrote as follows:

"Jacob Casanova, who writes this in the agony of his heart, knows that the misfortune may befall him of falling again into the hands of those from whom he is now endeavouring to escape; should this be the case, he supplicates the humanity of his high-minded judges not to make his condition more wretched, in punishing him for an attempt that reason and nature equally prompted him to; he begs that if he should be retaken, all his property be restored to him, and that he may be confined again in the cell from which he now breaks out. Should he, however, succeed in escaping, he gives all he left behind him to Francisco Sorodaci, whom the love of freedom did not inspire like himself, and who, therefore, remains behind, and whom Casanova begs would not attribute this present to him."

"Written an hour before midnight, without light, in the cell of Count Asquino, the 31st of October, 1756."

Castigana, castigavit me Deus, et morti non tradidit me.

I gave the letter to Sorodaci, with an injunction to deliver it into the secretary's own hands, who would certainly visit the prisons himself. The count thought the letter would not fail in its effect, and he promised, when I was brought back, to return me every thing. Sorodaci even said he hoped to see me again, and to give me back also what I had left him.

But it was time to depart, as the moon was no longer visible. I placed on Balbi's shoulder the bundle of cord, and on the other his packet, and loaded myself in the same manner; we then, dressed in our vest only, and our hats on our heads, looked through the opening I had made.

E quindi uscimmo a rimirar le stelle.—Dante.

I went first; notwithstanding the mist, every object was visible enough; kneeling and creeping, I thrust my weapon between the joints of the lead plates, holding with one hand by that, and with the other, by the plank on which the lead plate had laid, which I had removed, I raised myself on the roof; Balbi, in following me, grasped my hand behind, so I resembled a beast of burthen, which must draw as well as carry; in this manner I had to ascend a steep and slippery roof-side. When we were half way up this dangerous plane, Balbi desired me to stop a moment, for that one of his bundles had fallen off, and probably had only rolled down to the gutter; my first thought was to give him a push that would send him after it, but Heaven enabled me to contain myself; the punishment would have fallen on me as well as him; for without his help I could do nothing. I asked if the bundle was gone? and when I heard that it contained his black gown, two shirts, and a manuscript, I consoled him for its loss: he sighed, and followed me, still holding by my clothes.

After I had climbed over about sixteen lead plates, I reached the ridge of the roof; I set myself astride on it, and the monk imitated me; our backs were turned towards the island of S. Giorgio maggiore, and two hundred steps before us was the cupola of St. Marks, a part of the ducal palace, wherein the chapel of the doge is, more magnificent than that of any king. Here we took off our bundles; he placed his ropes between his legs; but on laying his hat upon them, it rolled down the roof, and fell into the canal; he looked on this as a bad omen, and complained he had now lost hat, shirts, and manuscript; but I reminded him, that it was fortunate that the hat had fallen to the right and not to the left, for otherwise it would have alarmed the sentinel in the arsenal.

After looking about me a little, I bid the monk remain quite still here till my return, and climbed along the roof, my dagger in my hand; I crept in this manner for an hour, trying to find a place to which I might fasten my rope to enable me to descend; but all the places I looked down into were enclosed ones, and there were insuperable difficulties in getting to the canonica on the other side of the church; yet every thing must be attempted, and I must hazard it without allowing myself to think too long on the danger; but about two thirds of the way down the side of the roof I observed a dormer window, which probably lit some passage leading to the dwelling-places not within the limits of the prisons, and I thought I should find some of the doors going out of it open at day-break. If any one should meet us, and take us for estate prisoners, he would find, I determined, some difficulty in detaining us. With this consideration, with one leg stretched out towards the window, I let myself gently slide down, till I reached the little roof of it, that ran parallel to the great one, and set myself upon it. I then leaned over, and by feeling, discovered it to be a window with small round panes of glass, cased in lead, behind a grating; to penetrate this, required a file, and I had only my stiletto. Bitterly disappointed, and in the greatest embarrassment, I seemed incapable of coming to a determination, when the clock of St. Mark's striking midnight, awakened my fainting resolution; I remembered that this sound announced the beginning of All Saints day. When misfortune drives a strong mind to devotion, there is always a little superstition mingled with it, that bell aroused me to action, and promised me victory, laying on my stomach and stretching over, I struck violently with my dagger against the grating in the hope of forcing it; in a quarter of an hour were four of the wooden squares broke, and my hand grasped the wood work; the panes of glass were speedily demolished, for I heeded not the cutting of my hand. I now returned up to the top of the roof, and crept back to my companion; I found him in a dreadful rage, cursing me for having left him two hours; he at last thought I must have fallen over, and was about to return to his prison. He asked me what were my intentions; "you will soon see," said I, and packing our bundles on our necks again, I bid him follow me. When we reached the roof of the window, I explained to him what I had done, and what I intended to do. I asked his advice as to the best mode of getting in at it: it would be easy for the first man, the second would hold the rope; but what would this last one do? in leaping down from the window to the floor he might break a leg, for we knew nothing of the space between. The monk instantly proposed I should let him down first, and afterwards think how I should get in myself; I was sufficiently master of myself to conceal my indignation at this proposal, and to proceed to execute his wish; I tied a rope round my companion, and sitting astride of the window-roof, let him down to the window, telling him to rest on his elbows on the roof, and to put his feet through the hole I had made. I then lay down again on the roof, and leaning forward, told him to be satisfied that I would hold the rope fast. Balbi came safely down upon the floor, untied himself, and I drew the rope back to me, but in doing this, I found that the space from the window to the floor was ten times my arm's length; it was impossible, therefore, to jump this. Balbi called to me to throw the rope to him; but I took care not to follow his absurd and selfish counsel. I now determined on returning to the great roof, and I discovered a cupola at a place where I had not been; it brought me to a stage laid with lead plates, and which had a trap-door, covered with two folding shutters. I found here a tub full of fresh lime, building tools, and a tolerably long ladder; the latter, of course, attracted my particular attention; I tied my rope round one of the rings, and climbing up the roof again, drew the ladder after me; this ladder I must contrive to put in at the window, and it was twelve times the length of my arm. Now I missed the help of the monk; I let the ladder down to the gutter, so that one end leaned against the window, the other stood in the gutter; I drew it up to me again as I leaned over, and endeavoured to get the end in at the window, but in vain; it always came over the roof, and the morning might come and find me here, and bring Lorenzo soon after it; I determined to slide down to the gutter in order to give the ladder the right direction. This gutter of marble yielded me a resting-place, while I lay at length on it; and I succeeded in putting the ladder about a foot into the window, which diminished its weight considerably, but it was necessary to push it in two feet more; I then should only have to climb back to the window-roof, and, by means of the line, draw it entirely in; to effect this, I was compelled to raise myself on my knees, and while I was doing so, they slipped off the gutter, and I lay with only my breast and elbows upon it. I exerted all my strength to draw my body up again, and to lay myself on the gutter: I had, fortunately, no trouble with the ladder; it was now three feet in the window, and did not move. As soon as I found I lay firm, I endeavoured to raise my right knee up to the level of the gutter; I had nearly succeeded, when the effort gave me a fit of the cramp, as paralyzing as it was painful. What a moment! I lay two minutes motionless; at length the pain subsided, and I succeeded in raising one knee after the other upon the marble again: I rested a few minutes, and then pushed the ladder still further into the window. Sufficiently experienced in the laws of equilibrium by this adventure, I returned to the window-roof, and drawing the ladder entirely in, my companion received the end of it, and secured it; I then threw in the rope and bundle, and soon rejoined him; after short congratulations, I felt about to examine the dark and narrow place we were in.

We came to a grated iron door, which opened on my raising the latch, and we entered a large hall; we felt round the walls, and met with a table, surrounded by arm-chairs. I at length found a window, opened the sash of it, and looked, by starlight, down a fearful depth; here was no descent by rope practicable. I returned to the place where we had left our things, and sat down in an arm-chair, and was seized with such an invincible desire to sleep, that if I had been told it was death, I should have welcomed it; the feeling was indescribable. At the third hour the noise of the monk awoke me; he said my sleeping at such a time and place was incomprehensible; but nature had overcome me; I, however, gained a little strength by the rest.

I said, as I arose, that this was no prison, and that there must be, therefore, somewhere an exit; I searched till I found the large iron door, and opposite to it was a smaller one, with a key-hole; I put my stiletto in it, and exclaimed, "Heaven grant it may not be a cupboard." After some efforts the lock yielded, and we entered a small room, in which was a table with a key upon it; I tried it; it opened, and I found myself in cupboards filled with papers; it was the archive-chamber. We ascended some steps, and passing through a glass-door, entered the chancery of the doge; I now knew where I was, and as in letting ourselves down we might get into a labyrinth of small courts, I seized an instrument with which the parchments are pierced to affix the seals; this tool I bid Balbi stick into the chink in the door, which I made with my bolt, and worked it about on all sides, not caring for the noise, till I had made a tolerable hole; but the projecting splinters threatened to tear our skin and clothes, and it was five feet from the floor to the opening, for I had chosen the place where the planks were the thinnest; I drew a chair to it, and the monk got on it; he stuck his arms and head through the opening, and I pushed the rest of him through into a chamber, the darkness of which did not alarm me; I knew where we were, and threw my bundle through to him, but left the rope behind. I had no one to aid me, on which account I placed a chair on the top of two others, and got through the aperture with my loins; I desired Balbi to pull me through with all his force, regardless of the pain the laceration of my flesh gave me. We hastened down two flights of steps, and arrived at the passage leading to the royal stairs, as they are called; but these, wide as a town-gate, were, as well as those beyond, shut with four wide doors; to force these would have required a petard, and here my dagger seemed to say, "hic fines posuit." I sat down by Balbi, calm and collected, and told him that my work was done, and that God and fortune would achieve the rest for us.

Abbia, chi regge il ciel, cura del resto
O la fortuna, se non tocca a lui.

"To-day," I continued, "is All Saints day, and tomorrow, All Souls, and it is not likely any should come here; if any one do come to open the doors, I will rescue myself, and you follow me; if none come, I will remain here and die of hunger, for I can do no more."

Balbi's rage and desperation knew no bounds; but I kept my temper, and began to dress myself completely. If Balbi looked like a peasant, his dress at least was not in shreds, and bloody, like mine; I drew on my stockings, and found on each foot large wounds, for which I was indebted to the gutter and lead plates; I tore my handkerchief, and fastened the bandages with thread I had about me; I put on my silk dress, which was ill assorted with the weather, arranged my hair, and put on a shirt with lace ruffles, and silk stockings, and threw my old clothes into a chair; and now looked like a rake, who is found after a ball in a suspicious place. I approached a window, and, as I learnt two years afterwards in Paris, some loiterer below who saw me, informed the keeper of the palace of it, who, fearing that he had locked some one in by mistake, came to release us; I heard the noise of steps coming up the stairs, and looking through a chink, saw only one man, with some keys in his hand. I commanded Balbi to observe the strictest silence, and hiding my stiletto under my clothes, placed myself close to the door, so that I needed only one step to reach the stairs. The door was opened, and the man was so astonished at my appearance, that I was able, silently and quickly, to pass by him, the monk following me; assuming then a sedate pace, I took the direction to the great staircase: Balbi wanted to go to the church to the right, for the sake of the sanctuary, forgetting that in Venice there was no sanctuary against state crimes and capital offences, but at last he followed me.

I did not expect security in Venice. I knew I could not be safe till I had passed the frontiers; I stood now before the royal door of the ducal palace; but without looking at any one, or being observed in return, I crossed the "Piazzetta," and reaching the canal, entered the first gondola I found there, and cried out, "another rower, I wish to go to Fusina." Another gondolier soon appeared, and I threw myself negligently on the contre-seat, while the monk sat on one side: the gondola put off.

The figure of the monk, without a hat, and wrapped in my cloak, might have caused me to be taken for an astrologer, or an adventurer. We no sooner passed the custom-house than my gondoliers began to exert their strength to cross the waves of the great canal, through which the way lay, as well to Fusina as to Mestre, whither in reality I meant to go. In the middle of the canal I put out my head, and asked the man, if in fourteen hours we should get to Mestre?

"You wished to go to Fusina, did you not?"

"No, blockhead, I said Mestre;" the other rower, however, maintained the contrary, and Balbi was even absurd enough to contradict me. I affected to laugh, and said I might have erred, but that my wish was to go to Mestre. The gondoliers acquiesced; they were ready to go to England, if I required it; and told me we should reach Mestre in three quarters of an hour.

I cast a look behind us, and saw no gondola in pursuit of us. I rejoiced in the fine day, which was as glorious as could be wished, shining with the first rays of an incomparable sun-rise. Reflecting on the dangers of the past night, on the place where I had spent the preceding day, and on all the fortunately concurring events, which had so favoured me, gratitude filled my soul, and I raised, in silence, my thanks for the mercy of God; overcome by the variety of emotions, I burst into tears, which relieved my heart from the oppression of a joy that seemed likely to burst it.

It is sufficient to add, that after many difficulties and narrow escapes, Casanova succeeded in eluding pursuit, and safely quitted the Venitian territory.

Arthur St. John,

PART I.

"Heus, Rogero! ser cavallor,
Eja! nunc canus!
Jam repetit domum,
Mauris et oscula
Sua videri r'petamus!"—Dulce Venum.

None but an English schoolboy can form an idea of the ecstatic feelings which attend "breaking-up." The opinion that our school-days are the happiest of our existence is true in nothing but this. The delight which we experience at going home is, perhaps, almost the keenest that we feel at any period of our lives: and, probably, it is so from the very fact that those days are so little happy at other times. Who is there among us whose heart does not beat at the remembrance of the almost delicious joy in which he used to be plunged during "the last week?" and, at last, when the very morning itself arrives, and he jumps into the chaise, hired weeks before, to ensure it—oh! it would be almost worth while (and it would be a heavy price) to put oneself to school again for a half-year, in order to taste the enjoyment of that hour!

With what joyful energy used a whole choir of young voices to shout out the beloved chorus of the home song, a verse from which I have selected as an epigraph to this chapter, Domum, domum, dulce, dulce domum! Yes, sweet and beloved, indeed, is home then! Time has not chilled us, the world has not corrupted us; as the young bird returns to its nest, so do we to our parents' arms and dwelling. And with what undoubting faith did we receive the tradition of how that song was written, and of its author's fate! The story ran, that a boy—a Wykehamist it was said—was, for his idleness and ill-conduct, left at school during the holidays; he pleaded hard to be forgiven, but his friends were inexorable. Accordingly, as soon as the last chaise-full of his companions had driven off, he retired to his solitary chamber, wrote the song, of which the above is part,* and died at the end of a few days, of a broken heart. It may seem childish to record such a legend at this time of day, but the feelings which are allied to it are too vivid not to sway the heart strongly even now.

It is certain, at least, that the two young gentlemen, whose return from school has suggested the foregoing reflections, would have thought them childish enough. They were Eton boys, near the top of the school, between seventeen and eighteen years old, and, of course, far too manly not to hold in scorn all the more juvenile associations from which such thoughts spring. Still, delighted they were. Youth, health, high spirits, ardent anticipations—what needed they more? Joyous, indeed, was their conversation, and short seemed the way, as they rattled along as rapidly as damns, promises, and double-pay could urge the post-boy.

"Get on, my lad, get on, we shall be late," exclaimed one of the travellers, letting down the front window of the chaise, "I want you," he added, turning to his companion, "to see the view from the top of the hill, and it will be dark if this fellow does not get on faster. See,

* It is in Latin rhyming verse, and consists of several stanzas.

yonder are the out-lying woods of Mabledon; but it is three quarters of a mile from there to the Park-gate."

They reached it at last: the porter's wife at the lodge beamed with smiles as she flung the gates wide, and exclaimed, "God bless you, my lord—you are welcome home," as the chaise whirled through. "Now, St. John," he exclaimed, "look out on this side; there is the river, and yonder is the obelisk; and you can just catch a glimpse of the clock-house over the stables, in the angle of the valley—the weathercock is glittering in the sun. This view from the London lodge we reckon our crack prospect, I can tell you."

And well they might: it was a view such as is to be found only in England; and there only in the seat of an ancient and wealthy family. The scene consisted of two boldly swelling hills, along one of which they were now passing, clothed with the most luxuriant woods, whose tufted tops were glowing under the splendour of a July sun-set. The trees, advancing more on some points than on others upon the brow of the hills, gave beautiful variety to the ground, by thus affording vistas into the thick of the woods, and by the picturesque effect of the dotted clumps and single trees, which formed their termination. Between these hills stretched a broad and beautiful valley, with a fine stream running throughout its whole length. At the farther extremity appeared a bridge, near the opposite side of which some of the chimneys of the house were visible. "It is beautiful, indeed," exclaimed St. John, "most beautiful—most magnificent!" and he continued to gaze with increasing admiration and delight, as Mabledon pointed out to him feature after feature of the prospect as they advanced.

At length, as the chaise proceeded along the brow of the hill, and, subsequently, began to wind down it, the house appeared in full view. It was of white stone, and of the Ionic order of architecture, simple, grand, and of vast extent, such evidently as could be occupied only by a man of princely fortune. St. John gazed in silence: the image of his own humble home rose upon his mind, and the contrast was too forcible to be pleasing.

"See," Lord Mabledon cried, "they have perceived our coming, and are on the steps to receive us—but where can my sister be, that she is not there?—she used always to be the first to welcome me. Ah! here she is, I declare," he exclaimed, as, at a turn in the road, they beheld a female figure, on a white pony, coming at three-parts speed to meet them. She approached;—nothing could have formed a more charming object for a painter than that on which St. John now looked. The pony, milk-white, and with its long, silken mane and tail floating on the wind, was, to ordinary horses, what an Italian greyhound is to the rest of his species. But St. John saw not the horse—the rider riveted his looks and thoughts. It was a girl about sixteen; tall, and slenderly formed, but already with that beautiful outline of form, which is always accompanied by grace, and which gives the promise of full development at maturity. Her hair brilliant and profuse, was blown by the wind in dishevelled luxuriance about her cheeks, glowing at once with the effects of exercise and of emotion. Her large full eyes flashed through their long lashes with the animation of joy; and as, stretching out her hands with delight towards her brother, a smile of affection irradiated her whole countenance, St. John thought he never had beheld a being so lovely. She was not encumbered by a habit: she seemed to have started upon horse-back to meet her brother: a velvet foraging cap was flung lightly upon her head, giving her streaming hair to view, and her ordinary gown betrayed a foot like Cinderella's in the fairy stirrup.

"Dear, dear George!" she exclaimed, as she rode up to the chaise; "welcome home a thousand times! how delighted I am! And you're looking so well! We did not expect you for this hour, or I intended to have met you at the gate!" Lord Mabledon greeted his sister with equal fondness; and it was only after a dialogue of some duration that he turned to his friend, saying, "But I forgot—Arthur, I must present you to my sister. Emily, this is my friend Mr. St. John; Mr. St. John," he added, with mock formality, "this is Lady Emily Lorraine." Lady Emily smiled, and bowed, and, looking at the disorder of her dress, blushed a little, saying, "I will canton on and put Titania up; you will find them all in the hall waiting for you;" and, giving the rein to her little mettlesome steed, off she sprang as rapidly as she had come.

A few minutes more, and they drove up to the great entrance. Lord and Lady Missenden were in the porch, and Mabledon was eagerly embraced by each. Their son was evidently an object of equal pride and affection. As soon as the first greetings were over, he hastened to present his friend, and as the friend of such a son was he received. Lord Missenden was a man somewhat under fifty; tall, handsome, and of peculiarly gentlemanlike aspect. His countenance was usually thought to wear an expression of coldness, but at this moment it was lighted up by all the warmest and strongest feelings of his nature. His countess was little turned of forty, with more than the remains of great beauty, and possessing those manners, the perfection of which is perhaps to be found in no other person than a woman of condition, who is no longer in her youth. Their polish, grace and fascination may exist at any age; but their full ease can scarcely be possessed until the consciousness which must ever attach to "a beauty" has in great measure passed away.

In a few moments Lady Emily again joined them, and they proceeded together to the drawing room. It was full of company, a large party being then at Mabledon; and to most of them Lord Missenden presented his son and his son's friend. To this last every thing was new and dazzling. The splendid room, opening en suite to the library and music room, crowded and glittering with all the varied and brilliant luxuries of modern furniture; the exotics which shed their perfume through the windows opening to the ground; the lovely home view which was seen through them, beautiful as that at the entrance of the park had been noble; the grand scale on which every thing around him seemed modelled; all served to strike St. John at once with admiration and even surprise. His home was widely different. A small parsonage, with a parlour on each side of a narrow hall—modestly furnished; such was the dwelling in which he had been born, and in which his holidays had hitherto been spent. His father, who was, as I have said, a clergyman with a moderate living, seeing the promise of strong talents in this his only child, had sent him early to Eton, with a view to the advantages of the "connections" that might be formed there, and with especial injunctions to the boy to neglect no opportunity of making them. The father had calculated correctly as to his son's talents; his advancement was rapid, and his distinction great; but he had utterly mistaken his fine independent spirit, when he had tried to instil into his young mind the mean maxims of a tuft-hunter. Arthur St. John was a noble, open, and generous boy, whose very last idea was the worldly advantage which such or such a liaison might prove to him eventually; and holidays after holidays, when his father asked him, in Eton phrase, "Who is your chief con now?"—he had the mortification to hear the plebeian names of Jackson, Thompson, or Jones, in answer. But, at length chance effected what would never have been accomplished by design. The circumstance of two or three boys leaving school at the same time, brought young St. John next to Lord Mabledon, the eldest son of the Earl of Missenden, a nobleman of immense wealth, and great political influence. The two boys became inseparable; in all schemes, whether of study or pleasure, they were united. Lord Mabledon, without having the striking talents of his friend, was sufficiently quick and clever to appreciate, and go along with him; and so total, at the same time, was the absence of all rivalry, that his gratification at the distinctions which St. John's talents gained him, was scarcely inferior to that of Arthur himself. Content, as the school-phrase goes, "to do his own," Lord Mabledon aimed at no more; and, consequently, his anxiety for his friend's success was unmingled with any feeling of personal emulation or jealousy.

The boys rose together; and their friendship continued unbroken. Each constantly spoke of the other at his home; and, at length, the proposal of Lord Mabledon to bring his friend home with him the next summer was readily acceded to by both fathers; by the one merely to gratify his beloved son,—by the other with the view to his son's advancement.

As Arthur stood, nearly unnoticed, in the magnificent drawing room at Mabledon, gazing upon the brilliant scene which still dazzled his eyes, even when his mind had recovered from that sensation—the contrast of the little parlour at his father's parsonage, with its plain paper, and mohair chairs, and old fashioned window seats, rose, with a somewhat painful vividness, before his fancy's eye. But his good feelings soon drove this idea from his mind: "Of all things in the world," he thought to himself, "the last allowable to me is to cherish feelings of envy towards Mabledon. Generous, open-hearted, noble fellow that he is, I can feel nothing towards him but friendship and esteem! He is the best friend I ever had in the world; and long, long may we remain so."

"There are music and cards, Mr. St. John," said Lady Missenden, coming up to him; "but I conclude you will be of the party in the music room. Miss Brabazon is a most celebrated singer; and I will venture to say you never heard a finer finger on the piano."

"I dare say not," thought St. John, as he followed his noble hostess to the music room.

There sat, at the instrument, a tall, bold looking girl of four or five and twenty, who, after vast tumbling over of music books, and shuffling of lights, and divers other of the minauderies usually let off by distinguished lady performers, at last fixed on a bravura from an opera then in vogue, and began to play the symphony in certainly a very masterly way. She then sang—correctly, brilliantly, powerfully—but the performance gave St. John no pleasure—it was all head-work, the feelings had no share in it.

"How divinely Miss Brabazon sings!" exclaimed aloud, at the end of the piece, a powdered, formal, old man, rising from a sofa on which he had been asleep during its course; "don't you think so, sir?" But without waiting for St. John's answer, he continued, "She was under Tremezani for two years, and he said he never had a pupil of such excellence. Lord Mabledon," he added, bustling up to him, "do persuade Lady Emily to sing one of her charming little French songs; pray do, Lady Emily, let me entreat you;" and, when he had fairly seated her at the piano, he went back to his sofa and his sleep.

Lady Emily sat down smiling and blushing, as young ladies still can do before they are out—and pulling off her gloves (manches a gigot were not then in fashion) displayed an arm which St. John thought the whitest and most finely turned he had ever beheld; and though his experience was only that of a stripling under eighteen, he was not far wrong in his judgment. Lady Emily burst at once into her song, which was one of those of delicate archness and malice, which no language but French can express, and to which the music (it is the point beyond which French music should never attempt to go) is at once so beautiful and appropriate. St. John almost started as she began: her voice was a round, rich, contr'alto—and, though he did not know it by its technical name, yet he felt that it was not the voice he had expected from one so young and apparently so delicate. But his delight equalled his surprise: she seemed to revel in the gay, yet wild, notes with which the burthen was brought round again at the conclusion of every verse—and, each time there was some new outbreak of beauty, some new combination of sweet sounds.

Oh! how delightful is it to gaze on an object such as this!—a young creature, beautiful as the day, beaming with youth and gushing spirits, and the consciousness of exciting and deserving admiration—her eye flashing—her voice quivering—as a smile, bright as the first rush of sun-light over the sea, seems almost struggling with the music for possession of the exquisite lips! Oh! at such a moment we forget that so bright a being can be born for aught save happiness, and love, and joy—still more, that the very excess of her fascination is but too probably in exact proportion with her future sorrows!

St. John thought not thus. He gazed, he listened—both yielded him delight unspeakable—but he was contented to feel it, he did not analyze it. At his age, indeed, we enjoy happiness; we do not pause to dissect and demonstrate it. When we do that, our hearts are already beyond the power of experiencing its full and unsophisticated joys. In the prodigality arising from plenty, in youth, we fill the cup of ecstasy to the brim, and empty it at a breath. Afterwards, it is scantily filled, and we pause to savour every drop.

"Again!—again!—pray, again!" exclaimed half a dozen voices at once. "Encore!—I beseech you, Lady Emily, encore!" said Mr. Evans, the powdered, formal gentleman, awaking from his sleep. St. John did not speak; but he fixed a look of mingled admiration and entreaty, which nothing but a warm and passionate heart could give to the face—and beneath which Lady Emily's eyes quailed, as she blushed deeply—and, after a pause to collect herself, began her song again.

It was long before Arthur St. John could close his eyes in sleep that night. The emotions of the day, so many and so various, had excited him far beyond the pitch to which rest will come. Above all, the strongest passion of human nature had that day dawned in one of the most passionate hearts which the hand of that nature had ever formed. Arthur St. John, for the first time, had felt love.

PART II.

Thus lived our youth, with conversation, books,
And Lady Emma's soul-subduing looks;
Lost in delight.—Crabbe.

Lady Emily had had a great curiosity to see Arthur St. John. Her brother had been in the habit of speaking of him constantly as his dearest friend; and she knew from the same source that his reputation for talents was pre-eminent among those whose occupation it was to judge of talents. The arrival of a person, whose coming had been prefaced by circumstances such as these, could not be an indifferent event to a young lady of sixteen, whose feelings and ideas had not as yet been fashion-bitten and made worldly by joining in that most heartless, selfish, cold, mercenary, intercourse, called, emphatically, society. If her passions were not as yet deep and powerful, her feelings, at least, were quick and sensitive. The romance natural to her age lay piled within her heart, ready to take fire at the first touch.

But St. John felt far more strongly still, and saw and guessed nothing of all this. Fielding has somewhere said, in substance, that it is seldom that a very young, and consequently inexperienced, man expects to meet with villany in the world; for how should he know of it, unless he be a villain himself, and thus be prompted by suggestions from within? And how, therefore, should St. John be able to guess the paler affection which existed in Lady Emily, while he burned with a passion fated to give its colour to his whole life?

A party in a country-house possesses at least one advantage in an incomparable degree, viz. the ease and rapidity with which we become acquainted with those with whom we sympathise. In London, three years will not make two persons of opposite sexes so well known to each other, as three weeks will do in the country. Three weeks!—why, in that space there may be condensed the whole history and fate of a human heart; opening, crisis, and catastrophe!

And so it was with poor Arthur. Lady Emily's attachment to her brother was great; and, while he was at home, she was at home, and constantly in his company. She rode with him in the morning; she got into the same little coterie at night; and in all this St. John mingled. He admired her exceeding beauty; he was fascinated by the grace, animation, and even archness of her manners: he was touched by the sentiment which was constantly upspringing in every word she spoke. Above all, he was dazzled and made drunk by her very manifest admiration of him. Nothing, indeed, adds more strongly to the fascination of a young and charming girl than the circumstance of those fascinations having the assistance of her evidently appreciating our sweet self, according to the modest estimate which we ourselves are apt to form of that person.

And thus did Lady Emily look on St. John. She hung upon all he said, and gazed upon his face as she spoke; she appealed constantly to his opinion; and exclaimed "Oh! how beautiful!" when he once repeated to her a couple of stanzas of his composition. She would sing his favourite airs; and showed deference to his taste and judgment in every thing. Was it possible to resist this? Wanderings in magnificent woods, in the most beautiful summer evenings that ever came out of the heavens, (at least, they seemed so,) with sunsets, and moons, and poetry, and fancy, and feeling, and the most accommodating tiers in the world, in the shape of a careless, boyish brother, who "thought no harm," and saw and heard nothing that was not on the surface, and thus gave the danger of a tête-à-tête, without its consciousness: in such circumstances as these, what could St. John do, but fall in love? He did;—and that with all the headlong powers of a passionate heart, and, alas, with all the fixed intensity of a firm one:—

"What say'st thou, wise one? 'That all-powerful Love Can Fortune's strong impediments remove;
Nor is it strange, that worth should wed to worth—
The pride of genius with the pride of birth.'"

I do not say that soaring visions like these were thus accurately defined in St. John's mind; but that certain vague images of an elegant and picturesque parsonage, with a honeysuckle growing into the windows, and a green lawn stretching down to a trout-stream, with a couple of children playing on it, and Lady Emily sitting under the trellis-work, smiling as she watched them—that some such picture as this did occasionally form itself in St. John's imagination is most certain. It was foolish, perhaps, but so it is to be in love at seventeen, and yet very sensible people are so every day.

Lady Emily's feelings, on the other hand, were far from being so definite as this. She was thrown into the intimate society of a most striking young man—her brother's chosen friend; she felt the brilliancy of his talents, and the general superiority of his manner; and, above all, she was touched and delighted with the manifest power which her attractions had over him, and which she continued to exert more and more, as she perceived their daily increasing effects. This was not coquetry, properly so called: it was not done for the purpose of display or of tyranny—but she felt it altogether to be delightful, and she indulged in it, without enquiring as to whether it was to lead, or what its effects might be upon either St. John or herself.

Thus days and weeks rolled on. The young men were not to return to Eton, but were to commence residence at Oxford at the end of the long vacation. Thus they were to pass the three months from Election to the beginning of Michaelmas Term, at Mabledon. The proceedings of the young people were little observed: they were thought almost children; and if Lady Missenden sometimes perceived symptoms of admiration for her daughter in Arthur St. John, it was merely with a smile, and without an idea of danger for either party.

But danger there was, and that deep and imminent. One evening, in the beginning of September, Lady Emily had strolled with her brother and St. John as far as the London lodge, of which I have already spoken. The air was of that rich, balmy temperature, which the close of day, in a fine autumn, so often possesses; and a glorious harvest moon shed her luxurious and luxuriant light upon the scene. When they reached the gate, Lord Mabledon recollected that he had some directions to give to one of the game-keepers, whose lodge was about a mile farther on, along the skirt of the park; and, thinking that it would be too far for his sister to walk, he desired St. John to take her home.

Alas! what a dangerous position is this! Two persons, young, beautiful, full of poetry and romance, and whom the constant intercourse of a considerable period had been drawing nearer and nearer to each other, were thus placed alone in a scene, to the loveliness of which nature and art had both contributed their utmost;—it was evening—there was a deep, soft stillness—they were beneath that light "Which ev'ry soft and solemn spirit worships, Which lovers love so well!"

—their arms were linked, and the quickened pulsations of the heart of one were felt against the bosom of the other—which thrilled at the touch. Ah!—one has known such moments—and years of pain were well repaid by one of them;—one has—but it is no use plunging into one's own reminiscences; my present business is with St. John and Lady Emily, whom we left walking home together from the park-gate.

They proceeded in silence down the hill: but the thoughts of both were busy. Their conversation had been more than commonly animated while Lord Mabledon had been with them, and the revulsion was consequently felt the more. It is probable that, at no moment of their intercourse, had Lady Emily felt more strongly or more tenderly towards St. John. The subject on which he had previously been speaking, though a general one, he had contrived to turn so as to give individual application to his feelings towards her:—he had spoken warmly and eloquently—and she was touched. He was now silent—but she was well aware of what nature that silence was.

At length he stopped suddenly. The place where he did so was in one of the most confined points of the prospect; it could scarcely be to gaze on that that he paused. "Lady Emily," said he, in a voice of which the calmness seemed the effect of preparation, "on this spot I saw you first: it was here that, with your heart beaming on your face with love for your brother, my eyes first beheld you. Gracious heaven! what a change has taken place in my existence since then!—I was then careless, free, light-hearted—now, my whole soul is engrossed by an overwhelming, a devouring passion. Lady Emily, I see by your manner that you do not misunderstand me—you know, you must have known for some time, that I adore you!"—and the violence of his emotion made him gasp for breath. Lady Emily trembled, but did not speak. St. John continued—"My love for you has been consuming my soul for weeks—it has reached that pitch that I could no longer conceal it, and live;—say, say that you do not feel anger towards me for speaking thus—say that you do not hate me."

"Hate you!—oh God!"—exclaimed Lady Emily—and, suddenly checking herself, she was again silent.

St. John hung on her words, and paused, expecting to hear her continue:—"Speak to me," at last he said—"will you not speak to me?"

"Mr. St. John," she answered faintly, "this must not be. You are my brother's friend—and my"—she paused for a word—"my—regard for you is great, but I must not hear this!"

"And why not?" interrupted St. John—"why not, unless you despise me?—why not hear me speak thus, unless I am hateful to you?—I know that I am poor—I know that your rank places you infinitely above me—I know the country clergyman's son has no right to look up to the earl's daughter—but I love you—I doat on you—I feel this, and it annihilates every other consideration. And, oh! if you have even the slightest atom of that regard for me, which I have sometimes dared to hope—(and the joy of the idea has driven me almost wild)—you surely must compassionate the state of feeling which has driven me to this disclosure."

"I cannot be insensible," said Lady Emily, "to the value of such feelings from one like you—I cannot but feel pride of the highest kind at having excited them—for I believe you. I am very young, Mr. St. John—and I know you too generous to deceive or trifle with me."

"By heaven!" exclaimed St. John—but I shall not detail the protestations of a lover in answer to a speech like this: he was any thing rather than a hackneyed one—and yet his expressions were, I will answer for it, exactly what a Richelieu or a Valmont would have used upon a similar occasion. Nature teaches: these artists of lovers only imitate what they recollect once to have felt.

Suffice it, that, before they reached home that night, Lady Emily and St. John had sworn to each other their unlimited and eternal love—and the first burning kiss of passion had been impressed upon her beautiful lips.

PART III.

Lila's a lady.—T. H. Bayley.

I shall not dwell on the period which passed between the scene I have just described, and that fixed for the young men to go to Oxford. The disclosure of their passion went no further than to each other. It has been said, and most truly, by a great master of human nature, that "Quand on est d'accord l'un et l'autre, on sait tromper tous les yeux; une passion naissante et combattue éclate; un amour satisfait sait se cacher." The word satisfait, as used here, carries with it, it is true, a far more extended meaning than can be applicable in the present case; but still it is applicable; for, in the innocence of their youth, their passion was satisfied by the very fact of its confessed existence, and by the almost unlimited intercourse which it was in their power to command. To Lord Missenden the idea of his daughter forming an attachment to a person in St. John's rank in life never occurred; nay, he had not ceased to consider her a child, and the subject was altogether foreign to his habits of thinking. Lady Missenden, besides, also continuing to regard her daughter almost as a child—a mistake into which handsome mothers will frequently fall—never dreamed of such a thing as a serious attachment springing up between a school-boy and a girl of sixteen. She might, perhaps, sometimes fancy there was a childish flirtation arising merely from the juxta-position of the parties—but this amused her, without exciting any stronger feeling.

Lord Mabledon, from his more constantly being in the company of his sister and his friend, was not quite so blind. He saw that they were becoming attached to each other; but, as his own feelings on such subjects were much more those of an Eton boy, than such as many lords of eighteen feel now-a-days, he never thought of its acquiring sufficient importance for him to interfere. He was exceedingly fond of both: he was delighted in their society, and he was glad to see they were fond of that of each other. The whole business had no graver character in his eyes.

At length Michaelmas term called St. John to Oxford, and the lovers parted. He left Mabledon with an additional pang to those naturally occasioned by his first separation from the first object of his love: for, in despite of all his entreaties, Lady Emily refused to write to him. By some strange contradiction of principle, though they had for above a month carried on the intercourse of a clandestine attachment, yet she could not be persuaded to consent to a clandestine correspondence. Whether it was the actual tangibility of communication by letter, or the extreme difficulty which would attend the establishment of such a correspondence, or both—certain it is, that St. John could obtain nothing more from Lady Emily than the permission of now and then adding a few words at the end of her brother's letters, and of having sometimes a message addressed to him in her own. How different this was from a direct correspondence, I leave it to those few people in the world to judge, who have ever written or received such letters themselves.

* Voltaire.

Two years passed away, and St. John and Lady Emily had not met in the interval. Lord Missenden had gone abroad with his family, which had occasioned this separation. But, in the midst of change of scene, and severe study, and active exertion, the image of Emily Lorraine was still constantly present to Arthur St. John. It was the spur which goaded him to struggle for distinction; it was the sweetest part of his triumph when he obtained it. His disposition was keen and warm, but it was also firm and intense; his passion had been formed under the operation of the former qualities, it was retained and cherished under that of the latter. He had set all his heart upon one cast; the hazard of that die involved the extremes of happiness or anguish.

Lord Mableton had left college and gone into the army, and was at this time abroad with his regiment; so that the interruption of St. John's intercourse with Lady Emily was total.

At length, Lord Missenden's family returned to England. It was the month of April, and they fixed themselves in their house in town, in order that Lady Emily might "come out." She did so: and was soon in the full whirl of that monstrous compound of selfishness, wickedness, frivolity, and folly—a London season.

It was in the middle of June that St. John was able to get away from college, and hastening to London, the first thing he did was to hurry to Grosvenor Square.

"Is Lord Missenden at home?" he said to the powdered, fat, grumpy personage, who emerged from his leathern tub, with all the brutality, at least, if possessing none of the other qualities, of Diogenes—

"No," said Cerberus.

"Is Lady Missenden?"

"No."

"Is Lady Emily?"—he was in the act, although not strictly according to etiquette, of asking, when he caught a glimpse of her bounding across the hall, and up the stairs. It was but a glimpse; but it sufficed to throw the blood into his face, and back again to his heart with a rapidity that took away his breath. He was going to enter, without waiting for an answer to his last question, when the porter again reverberated his emphatic "No!" and, sorely against his inclination, St. John was obliged to retire in despair.

Three days afterwards a card came, with due formality, from Lord and Lady Missenden, to "request the honour of Mr. Arthur St. John's company at dinner," that day three weeks. Not a word of old friendship or recollection; no three-cornered billet from Lady Missenden beginning, "Dear Arthur," as of yore: all was chilling, stately and exceedingly proper. Arthur could not endure the suspense: he twice, in the interval, called in Grosvenor Square, but he never could gain admittance. The torment he suffered during those three weeks, I would not, though I am a poor man, undergo for as many thousand pounds. Now, he doubted of the endurance of Lady Emily's attachment: "Surely, surely," said he, "she might, under such circumstances as these, have broken through her resolution not to write, and given me one line, if it were really only one, to say, that she was unchanged, that she loved me still. But she has been half over Europe, she has been 'La belle Anglaise' in half a dozen capitals: she has forgotten the poor, lonely student, who was far away, and who had nothing but his imperishable love to offer her." But then again the recollection of all that had passed during that dear summer at Mableton rose upon his mind, and he would exclaim, "No! it is impossible!—that creature can never be false!"

At length the day came. St. John found a large party assembled. Lord Missenden received him cordially, and Lady Missenden with the greatest and most friendly kindness. She enquired with interest about his progress at Oxford, and communicated her last news of Mableton, and gave him his last letter to read. St. John was touched and gratified at this, but his eyes were wandering in search of one, a single glance of whom was to decide his fate. But she was not present; and she entered only just before the servant who came to announce dinner. The crowd pressed forward, and they did not meet. As soon as they were seated at dinner, St. John found that Lady Emily was on the same side of the table as himself, so that it was impossible for him to see her without making a marked endeavour to do so, which even he felt was, at such a party, impossible. His worst forebodings came across him. Was this accident, or design? If the latter—but he could not endure the thought sufficiently to dwell on it. St. John was near the door; and, as the ladies passed out, Lady Emily approached him, and, holding out her hand, said, "How do you do, Mr. St. John?—I am happy to see you again." He fixed his eyes full upon her, but hers were cast to the ground, the blood had flushed her cheek—and her hand trembled in his; but it did not return his pressure, and it was gloved.

Oh! how beautiful she then looked!—her form was developed—her noble countenance matured—her beauty was dazzling! He had again seen her—he had again touched her—his brain almost reeled with the excitement of this consciousness. But still he played the self-tormentor, and racked his heart with all the various fancies which a lover's doubts suggest. He could not but feel that, at the moment, and under the circumstances in which she addressed him, she could not say more than she did;—but she might have looked at him—she might have shot the glance of an instant, to say, "I love you still."

St. John determined to have his mind set at rest at once, when they joined the ladies: but this was not so easy to do as to determine. When he entered the drawing room, Lady Emily was at the piano, surrounded by a bevy of young ladies, all eager to play or to sing, and all declining it. Lady Emily seemed to poor Arthur to make more of all this foppery d'usage, than was at all necessary; in a word, as young lady after young lady was asked, and pressed, and entreated, and persuaded to do that which she had a perfect mind to do from the first, St. John thought he should have been driven crazed. But, at last, by dint of watching his opportunity, he found it. Lady Emily went with one of her companions to look over a book of prints. The table on which it lay was a round one, and thus left some little space between its extremity and the wall. And to this Lady Emily was not close, so that, without any appearance of particularity, Arthur was able to come and place himself by her side. He began to converse with her about the prints, which were views of Italy, and of her travels there,—overflowing with impatience at being thus compelled to talk on indifferent subjects, to one with whom his soul burned to commune,—till, at last, the young lady, whom Arthur was inwardly cursing, as Mademoiselle de Trop, was suddenly called away by her mother. He seized the occasion at once: for before his companion had time to move, he said to her, in a voice which betokened what an effort had been necessary to force himself to calmness, "Emily!—and is all forgotten?"

She blushed a burning scarlet—she bit her lip, which quivered once or twice, as though she was about to speak; at last, she said, "Mr. St. John, this is very indiscreet, very wrong; I thought the time which had elapsed since we met had driven the remembrance of our childish days from your mind; I thought—"

"No, Emily, no; you could not think thus; you must have known, you know, that, young though we were, the passion we felt was not childish. You must know that upon that remembrance I lived—that there has not been a thought of my mind, nor a pulsation of my heart, that from the moment we parted, to this hour, has not been wholly and solely devoted to you. You know—"

"Stop, Mr. St. John," said Lady Emily, interrupting him, "this is language I must not hear; I had hoped, sir, that the follies of our childhood had been forgotten—follies which nothing but my extreme youth could excuse, and of which it is scarcely generous of you to remind me. As my brother's friend, Mr. St. John," she added, in a milder tone, "I must ever feel regard for you—but I must not be thus addressed again." And she walked away, leaving St. John far too much stunned by what he had heard to be able to strive to detain her.

And to what purpose should he? She had crushed his heart at one blow. From that moment St. John has been a miserable man.

It is scarcely necessary to trace the progression of Lady Emily's feelings. Absence, change of place, novelty of all kinds, flattery, and a fickle disposition, had, before her return to England, almost entirely erased St. John from her mind. And the few months she had passed in London had more than served to complete it. She had seen the importance of rank, wealth, and fashionable station; her feelings, which, as regarded St. John, had in truth been the offspring only of early romance, acquiring force and an object from juxtaposition—her feelings had now completely frozen down (for it is down) to her position in society—a mere young lady of rank. The real truth is, that she was never worthy of the affection of such a man as Arthur St. John: it was a mistake on his part from the first.

The suddenness of his dismissal was fully accounted for in a few weeks afterwards, when the Morning Post announced Lady Emily's marriage with a man whose only merits were being a peer, and possessed of five and twenty thousand a year.

The effect of the blow on such a mind as St. John's may be easily conceived. He went abroad for some time, then entered into orders, and is a most exemplary country clergyman: but he has never thoroughly recovered the effects of the events I have just narrated; for when I first knew him, which was upwards of twenty years afterwards, he was still, and I am convinced he ever will remain—a melancholy man.

My Sister Kate.

FROM THE DOMINIE'S LEGACY.

I travelled far to know her name,
Who had a lucky lot;
And I heard, and I saw,
And I envied her not,
So I'll remain at home content,
Until the day I see,
With a lowly peaceful life,
In my ain country.—Scrap Stanzas.

There is a low road, (but it is not much frequented, for it is terribly roundabout,) that passes at the foot of the range of hills that skirt the long and beautiful gut or Firth of the Clyde, in the west of Scotland: and as you go along this road, either up or down, the sea or firth is almost at your very side, the hills rising above you; and you are just opposite to the great black and blue mountains on the other side of the gut, that sweep in heavy masses, or jut out in bold capes, at the mouth of the deep lochs that run up from the Firth into the picturesque highlands of Argyshire.

You may think of the scene what you please, because steam boating has, of late years, profaned it somewhat into commonness, and defiled its pure air with filthy puffs of coal smoke; and because the Comet and all her unfortunate passengers were sunk to the bottom of this very part of the Firth; and because, a little time previous, a whole boatful of poor highland reaper girls were also run down in the night time, while they were asleep, and drowned near the Clough light-house hard by; but if you were to walk this road by the seaside any summer afternoon, going towards the bathing village of Gourock, you would say, as you looked across to the highlands, and up the Clyde, towards the rock of Dumbarton Castle, that there are few scenes more truly magnificent and interesting.

There is a little village exactly opposite to you, looking across the Firth, which is called Dunoon, and contains the burying place of the great House of Argyll; and which, surrounded by a patch of green cultivated land, sloping pleasantly from the sea, and cowering snugly by itself, with its picturesque cemetery, under the great blue hills frowning behind, looks, from across the Firth, absolutely like a tasteful little haunt of the capricious spirit of romance.

Well, between this road, on the lowland side of the Firth, and the water's edge, and before it winds off round by the romantic seat of Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, farther up, their stands, or stood, two or three small fishing cottages, which, from the hills nearly over them from which General Brisbane used to look after the stars, or from the sea as you sailed past, look just like white shells, of a large size, dropped fancifully down upon the green common between the hills and the road. In these cottages, it was observed, the fishermen had numerous families, who, while young, assisted them in their healthful employment; and that the girls, of which there was a number were so wild in their contented seclusion, that if any passenger on the road stopped to observe them, as they sat in groups on the green, mending their fathers' nets, they would take alarm, and rise and run off like fawns, and hide among the rocks by the sea, or trip back into the cottages. Now it happened, once on a time, that a great event took place to one of the cottager's daughters, which, for a long period, deranged and almost destroyed the happy equality in which they had hitherto lived; and becoming the theme of discourse and enquiry concerning things beyond the sphere of fisher people and all their neighbours, as far as Gourock, introduced among them no small degree of ambition and discontent.

There was one of the fishermen, a remarkably decent, well disposed highlandman, from the opposite shore of Argyshire, named Martin McLeod, and he had two daughters, the youngest of which, as was no uncommon case, turned out to be remarkably, and even delicately, beautiful.

But nobody ever saw or thought any thing about the beauty of Catharine McLeod, except it might be some of the growing young men in the neighbouring cottages, several of whom began, at times, to look at her with a sort of wonder, and seemed to feel a degree of awe in her company; while her family took an involuntary pride in her beyond all the others; and her eldest sister somehow imitated her in every thing, and continually quoted her talk, and trumpeted about among the neighbours what was said and done by "my sister Kate."

Things continued in this way as Kate grew to womanhood; and she was the liveliest little body about the place, and used to sing so divertingly at the house-end, as she busied herself about her father's fishing gear, and ran up and down "among the breakers on the brae," behind the cottages, or took her wanderings off all the way to the Clough light-house at the point; or she would skip on the yellow sands of the sea, beyond her father's boat, when the tide was low, as he used to say, just like a water-wagtail; so that she was allowed to be as merry as she was pretty, and put every one in a good humour that looked at her. I say things continued in this way until a gentleman, who, it turned out, was all the way from London, came to lodge in Greenock, or Gourcock, or Innerkip, or somewhere not far distant; and, being a gentleman, and, of course, at liberty to do every sort of out of the way thing that he pleased, he got a manner of coming down and wandering about among the cottages, and asking questions concerning whatever he chose of the fishermen; and then it was not long until he got his eyes upon Kate.

"The gentleman," as her sister used to tell afterwards, "was perfectly ill, and smitten at once about our Kate. He was not able," she said, "to take the least rest, but was down constantly about us for weeks: and then got to talking to and walking with Kate, she linking arm in his beneath the hill, just as it had been Sir Michael Stuart and my lady; and then such presents as he used to bring for her, bought in the grand shop of Baillie Macnicol, at Greenock; gowns, and shawls, and veils, and fine chip hats, never speaking of ribbons, and lace edging, and mob caps—perfect beautiful."

The whole of the other fishermen's daughters became mad with envy of poor Kate, and admiration of her new dress, which some said was mostly bought by her father, after all, who wanted to have his daughter made a lady of; and now nothing was heard in the hamlet but murmurings and discontented complaints; every girl looking at herself in the little cracked glass, that her father used to shave by, to see if she were pretty, and wishing and longing, not only for a lover of her own, but even for a gentleman. So as matters grew serious, and the gentleman was fairly in love, old Martin McLeod, who looked sharply after Kate, behaved to have sundry conversations with the gentleman about her: and masters being appointed to teach her various things, which the fisher folks never heard of, but which were to turn her into a lady, Kate and the gentleman after a time were actually married, in Greenock new church, and set off for London, or some other grand place, to live where the king and all the great people lived, and to drink wine, and wheel about in a carriage for ever more.

During all this time, there were various opinions among the fisher people, how that Kate never was particularly in love with the gentleman; and some even said that she was in love with somebody else, (for pretty maidens must always be in love,) or at least, that some of the youths of the neighbourhood were in love with her; but then the old folks said, that love was only for gentle people, who could afford to pay for it; and that when a gentleman was pleased to fall in love, no one had a right to say him nay, or pretend to set up against him. Some of the young women, to be sure, ventured to contest this doctrine, and cited various cases from the authority of printed ballads bought at the Greenock fair, at a halfpenny each; and also from the traditional literature of Argyleshire, which was couched in the melodious numbers of the Gaelic language; but, however this might be, the fame of Catherine McLeod's happy marriage, and great fortune, was noised abroad, exceedingly, among the fisher people throughout these coasts, as well as about Gourcock and all the parts adjacent.

As to the gentleman, it was found out that his name was Mr. Pountney, and that little Kate McLeod was now Mrs. Pountney, and a great London lady; but what quality of a gentleman Mr. Pountney really was, was a matter of much controversy and discussion. Some said that he was a great gentleman, and others thought that, from various symptoms, he was not a very great gentleman;—some went so far as to say he was a lord or a prince, while others maintained that he was only a simple esquire, although he might yet be turned into a belted knight, or baronet, like Sir Michael who lived in the neighbourhood, which the king could make him, any day he chose, by knocking him down with a sword; for it was part of the king's business to make knights and lords, and this was the way he did it. But as the fisher people, among whom Kate had been reared, did not understand what a knight meant, nor any thing of these high matters; and from the rising ambition of fisher girls, to get gentlemen as well as Kate, were much occupied in discussions about the quality of her and her husband, her elder sister, Flora, was constantly appealed to, and drawn out wherever she went, upon this interesting subject.

Nothing, therefore, could be talked of wherever Flora McLeod went, but about "my sister Kate," as she was quite in request every where, because she could talk of the romantic history and happy fortune of her lucky sister. Mrs. Pountney's house in London, therefore, Mrs. Pountney's grand husband, and Mrs. Pountney's coach, excited the admiration and the discontent of all the fishermen's daughters, for many miles round this romantic seacoast, and these quiet cottages under the hills, where the simple people lived upon their fish and did not know that they were happy. Many a long summer's day, as the girls sat working their nets on a knoll towards the sea, the sun that shone warm upon their indolent limbs on the grass, and the breeze that blew from the Firth, or swept round from the flowery woods of Ardgowan, seemed less grateful and delicious, from their discontented imaginings about the fortune of Mrs. Pountney; and many a sweet and wholesome supper of fresh boiled fish was made to lose its former relish, or was even embittered by obtrusive discourse about the fine wines and the gilded grandeur of "my sister Kate." Even the fisher lads in the neighbourhood, fine, fearless youths, found a total alteration in their sweethearts; their discourse was not relished, their persons were almost despised; and there was now no happiness found for a fisherman's daughter, but what was at least to approach to the state of grandeur and felicity so fortunately obtained by "my sister Kate."

The minds of Kate's family were so carried by her good fortune, that vague wishes and discontented repinings followed their constant meditations upon her lucky lot. Flora had found herself above marrying a fisherman; and a young fellow, called Bryce Cameron, who had long waited for her, and whose brother, Allan, was once a sweetheart of Kate herself, being long ago discarded; and she not perceiving any chances of a gentleman making his appearance to take Bryce's place, became melancholy and thoughtful: she began to fear that she was to have nobody, and her thoughts ran constantly after London and Mrs. Pountney. With these anxious wishes, vague hopes began to mix of some lucky turn to her own fortune, if she were only in the way of getting to be a lady; and at length she formed the high wish, and even the adventurous resolve, of going all the way to London, just to get one peep at her sister's happiness.

When this ambition seized Flora McLeod, she let the old people have no rest, nor did she spare any exertion to get the means of making her proposed pilgrimage to London. In the course of a fortnight from its first serious suggestion, she with a gold guinea in her pocket, and two one pound notes of the Greenock bank, besides other coins and valuables, and even a little old fashioned Highland brooch, with which the quondam lover of her sister, Allan Cameron, had the temerity to intrust her, to be specially returned into the hands of the great lady when she should see her, besides a hundred other charges and remembrances from the neighbours, she set off one dewy morning in summer, carrying her shoes and stockings in her hand, to make her way to London, to get a sight of every thing great, and particularly of her happy sister Kate.

Many a weary mile did Flora McLeod walk, and ride, and sail, through unknown places, and in what she called foreign parts; for strange things and people met her eye, and long dull regions of country passed her like a rapid vision, as she was wheeled towards the great capital and proper centre of England. After travelling to a distance that was to her perfectly amazing, she was set down in London, and enquired her way, in the best English she could command, into one of those long brick streets, of dark and dull gentility, to which she was directed; and after much trouble and some expense, at length found the door of her sister's house. She stood awhile considering, on the steps of the mansion, and felt a sort of fear of lifting the big iron knocker that seemed to grin down upon her; for she was not in the habit of knocking at great folk's doors, and almost trembled lest somebody from within would frown her into nothing, even by their high and lofty looks.

And yet she thought the house was not so dreadfully grand after all;—not at all such as she had imagined, for she had passed houses much bigger and grander than this great gentleman's; it was not even the largest in its own street, and looked dull and dingy, and shut up with blinds and rails, having a sort of melancholy appearance. At least it was not at all equal, she thought, to many of the white stone villas by the Firth of Clyde, that sat so proudly on the hill face, opposite the sea, near her father's cottage, with their doors wide open to receive the summer air or welcome the passing traveller, and their windows gleaming in the evening sun, before it dipped behind the big mountains of Argyleshire.

It was strange that reflections about home, and so enhancing of its value, should pass through her mind at the very door where lived her envied sister in London! but she must not linger, but see what was inside. She lifted up the iron knocker, and as it fell the very clang of it, and its echo inside, smote upon her heart with a sensation of strange apprehension. A powdered man opened it, and stared at her with an inquisitive impertinent look, then saucily asked what she wanted. Flora curtsied low to the servant from perfect terror, saying she wanted to see Mrs. Pountney.

"And what can you want with Mrs. Pountney, young woman, I should like to know?" said the fellow; for Flora neither looked like a milliner's woman, nor any other sort of useful person likely to be wanted by a lady.

Flora had laid various pretty plans in her own mind, about taking her sister by surprise, and seeing how she would look at her before she spoke, and so forth; at least she had resolved not to affront her, by making herself known as her sister before the servants; but the man looked at her with such suspicion, and spoke so insolent, that she absolutely began to fear, from the interrogations of this fellow, that she would be refused admittance to her own sister, and was forced to explain and reveal herself, before the outer door was fully opened to her. At length she was conducted, on tip toe, along a passage, and then up stairs, until she was placed in a little back dressing-room. The servant then went into the drawing-room, where sat two ladies at opposite sides of the apartment, there to announce Flora's message.

On a sofa, near the window, sat a neat youthful figure, elegantly formed, but petite, with a face that need not be described, further than that the features were small and pretty, and that, as a whole, it was rich in the nameless expression of simple beauty. Her dress could not have been plainer, to be of silk of the best sort; but the languid discontent, if not melancholy, with which the female, yet quite in youth, gazed towards the window, or bent over a little silk netting with which she carelessly employed herself, seemed to any observer strange and unnatural at her time of life. At a table near the fire was seated a woman, almost the perfect contrast to this interesting figure, in the person of Mr. Pountney's eldest sister, a hard-faced, business-like person, who, with pen and ink before her, seemed busy among a parcel of household accounts, and the characteristic accompaniment of a bunch of keys occasionally rattling at her elbow.

The servant approached, as if fearful of being noticed by "the old man," as he was accustomed to call Miss Pountney, and in a half whisper, intimated to the little figure that a female wanted to see her.

"Eh! what!—what is it you say, John?" cried the lady among the papers, noticing this manœuvre of the servant.

"Nothing, Madam; it is a person that wants my lady."

"Your lady, sirrah! it must be me!—Eh! what?"

"No madam; she wants to see Mrs. Pountney particularly."

"Ah, John," said the little lady on the sofa; "just refer her to Miss Pountney. There is nobody can wait me."

"Wants to see Mrs. Pountney particularly?" resumed the sister-in-law: "how dare you bring in such a message, sirrah? Mrs. Pountney particularly, indeed! who is she, sirrah! Who comes here with such a message while I am in the house?"

"You must be mistaken, John," said the little lady sighing, who was once the lively Kate McLeod of the fishing cottage in Scotland; "just let Miss Pountney speak to her. You need not come to me."

"No, madam," said the servant, addressing Miss Pountney, the natural pertness of his situation now returning to overcome his dread of the old one: "This young person wants to see my mistress directly, and I have put her into her dressing room: pray ma'am, go," he added, respectfully, to the listless Kate.

"Do you come here to give your orders, sirrah?" exclaimed Miss Pountney, rising like a fury, and kicking the foot-stool half way across the room, "and to put strange people of your own accord into any dressing-room in this house! and to talk of your mistress, and wanting to speak to her directly, and privately, while I am here! I wonder what sister Becky would say, or Mr. Pountney, if he were at home?"

The "ould one's" wrath being now aroused, she next diverged into a tirade of abuse of John, for various crimes and misdemeanours, with which her examination of the documents before her furnished matter of accusation against him, on household matters, and into which she contrived to include the trembling little victim on the sofa. While she was at the height of this, her sister Becky entered the room; and as usual, helped up the brawl, or rather added fuel to the angry storm with which she raged against the man; who listened with the true sneer of a lackey, made insolent by unlady-like abuse; and also against the unoffending and melancholy Kate, who bore it all with a look of hopeless resignation.

John, however, coxcomb as he sometimes was, had too much natural gallantry not to feel strongly on the part of his oppressed mistress; and too much common sense not to see the misery of a house divided against itself; besides he hated his two real mistresses as much as he loved the interesting stranger, who ought to have been such. Without taking notice, therefore, of all the accusations and abuse thrown upon him, he stepped up again to the little figure on the sofa, and begged of her to see the young person who waited for her.

"I'll have no whispering here!" exclaimed Miss Pountney, coming forward in wrath,—"what is the meaning of all this, Kate?—who is this person in your dressing room—I insist upon knowing; I shall let my brother know all about this secrecy!"

"Who is it, John? Do just bring her here, and put an end to this!" said Kate imploringly, to the man.

"Madam," said John at last to his trembling mistress,—"it is your sister!"

"Who, John?" cried Kate, starting to her feet, "my sister Flora, my own sister, from Clyde side! speak, John, are you sure?"

"Yes, Madam, your sister from Scotland."

"Oh, where is she, where is she? let me go."

"No no, you must be mistaken, John," said the lady with the keys, stepping forward to interrupt the anxious Kate; "John, this is all a mistake," she added, smoothly; "Mrs. Pountney has no sister! John you may leave the room:" and she gave a determined look to the other sister, who stood astonished.

The moment the servant left the room, Miss Pountney came forward, and stood in renewed rage over the fragile melancholy Kate, and burst out with "What is this, Kate? Is it really possible, after what you know of my mind, and all our minds, that you have dared to bring your poor relations into my brother's house? That it is not enough that we are to have the disgrace of your mean connections, but we are to have your sisters and brothers to no end coming into the very house, and sending up their legerly names and designations by the very servants! Kate, I must not permit this. I will not, I shall not:" and she stamped with rage.

"Oh, Miss Pountney," said Kate, with clasped hands, "Will you not let me go and see my sister? Will you just let me go and weep on the neck of my poor Flora? I will go to a private place, I will go to another house if you please; I will do any thing when I return to you, if I ever return, for I care not if I never come into this unhappy house more!" and, uttering this, almost with a shriek, she burst past the two women, and ran through the rooms to seek her sister.

Meantime Flora had sat so long waiting, without seeing her sister, that she began to feel intense anxiety; and, fancying her little Kate wished to forget her, because she was poor, and worked herself up into a resolution of assumed coldness, when she heard a hurried step, and the door was instantly opened. Kate paused for a moment after her entrance, and stood gazing upon the companion of her youth, with a look of such passionate joy, that Flora's intended coldness was entirely subdued; and the two sisters rushed into each other's arms in all the ecstasy of sisterly love.

"Oh, Flora, Flora! my dear happy Flora!" cried Kate, when she could get words, after the first burst of weeping; "have you really come all the way to London to see me? poor me!" and her tears and sobs were again like to choke her.

"Kato, my dear little Kate;" said Flora, "this is not the way I expected to find you. Do not greet so dreadfully; surely you are not happy, Kate!"

"But you are happy, Flora," said Kate, weeping; "and how is my good highland father, and mother, and my brother Daniel? Ah! I think, Flora, your clothes have the very smell of the sea-shore, and of the bark of the nets, and of the heather hills of Argyleshire. Alas! the happy days you remind me of, Flora."

"And so, Kate, you are not so very happy, after all," said Flora, looking incredulously in her face, "and you are so thin, and pale, and your eyes are so red: and yet you have such a grand house, Kate! Tell me if you are really not happy?"

"I have no house, Flora," said Kate, after a little, "nor, I may say, no husband. They are both completely ruled by his two vixen sisters, who kept house for him before he married me, and still have the entire ascendancy over him. My husband, too, is not naturally good tempered: yet he once loved me, and I might enjoy some little happiness in this new life, if he had the feeling or the spirit to treat me as his wife, and free himself and the house from the dominion of his sisters, especially the eldest. But I believe he is rather disappointed in his ambitious career, and in the hopes he entertained of matches for his sisters, and is somewhat sour and unhappy; and I have to bear it all, for he is afraid of these women; and I, the youngest in the family, and the only one who has a chance of being good tempered, am, on account of my low origin, forced to bear the spleen of all in this unhappy house."

"But, Kate, surely your husband would not behave so bad as to cast up to you that your father was a fisherman, when he took you from the bonnie himself, and when he thought himself once so happy to get you?"

"Alas! he does indeed!—too often—too often; when he is crossed abroad, and when his sisters set him on; and that is very mean of him; and it so humbles me, Flora, when I am sitting at his table, that I cannot lift my head; and I am so sad, and so heart-broken among them all!"

"Bless me! and can people be really so miserable," said Flora, simply, "who have plenty of money, and silk dresses to wear every day they rise?"

"It is little you know, my happy Flora, of artificial life here in London," said Kate, mournfully. "As for dress, I cannot even order one but as my sister-in-law chooses; and as for happiness, I have left it behind me on the beautiful banks of the Clyde. O that I were there again!"

"Poor little Kate!" said Flora, wistfully looking again in her sister's face; "and is that the end of all your grand marriage, that has set a' the lasses crazy, from the Fairly Roads to Gourrock Point. I think I'll gang back and marry Bryce Cameron after a'."

"Is Allan Cameron married yet?" said Kate, sadly. "When did you see blithe and bonnie Allan Cameron?—Alas! the day!"

"He gave me this brooch to return to you, Kate," said Flora, taking the brooch out of her bosom. "I wish he had na' gien it to me for you, for you're vex'd enough already."

"Ah! well you may say I am vex'd enough," said she, weeping and contemplating the brooch. "Tell Allan Cameron, that I am sensible I did not use him well—that my vain heart was lifted up; but I have suffered for it—many a sad and sleepless night I have lain in my bed, and thought of the delightful days I spent near my father's happy cottage in Scotland, and about you, and about Allan. Alas! just tell him not to think more of me; for I am a sad and sorry married woman, out of my sphere, and afraid to speak to my own people, panting my heart out and dying by inches, like the pretty silver fish that floundered on the hard stones after my father had taken them out of their own clear water."

"God help you, Kate!" said Flora, rising; "you will break my heart with grief about you. Let me out of this miserable house! Let me leave you and all your grandeur, since I cannot help you; and I will pray for you, my poor Kate, every night at my bed-side, when I get back to the bonny shore of Argyleshire."

Sad was the parting of the two weeping sisters, and many a kiss of fraternal affection embittered, yet sweetened, the hour; and anxious was Flora McLeod to turn her back upon the great city of London, and to journey northwards to her own home in Scotland.

It was a little before sun-down, on a Saturday evening, shortly after this, that a buzz of steam, let off at the Mid Quay of Greenock, indicated that a steam-boat had come in; and it proved to be from the fair sea-port of Liverpool, having on board Flora McLeod, just down from London

The boat, as it passed, had been watched by the cottagers where she lived up the Firth; and several of them, their day's work being over, set out towards the clough to see if there was any chance of meeting Flora.

Many were the congratulations, and more the enquiries, when they met Flora, lumbering homewards with her bundle and her umbrella, weary, and looking anxiously out for her own sweet cottage by Clyde side. "Ah, Flora! is this you?" cried the whole at once; "and are you really here again—and how is your sister, and all the other great people in London? and, indeed, it is very good of you not to look the least proud, after coming from such a grand place!"

With such congratulations was Flora welcomed again among the light-hearted fisher people in the west of Scotland. But it was observed, that her tone was now quite altered, and her own humble contentment had completely returned. In short, to bring our story to a close, she was shortly after married to Bryce Cameron, and various other marriages soon followed; for she gave such an account of what she had seen with her eyes, that a complete revolution took place in the sentiments of the whole young people of the neighbourhood.

It was observed, in the hamlet, that the unhappy Mrs. Pountney was never named, after this, by any but with a melancholy shake of the head; the ambition of the girls to get gentlemen seemed quite extinguished; and Flora, in time, began to nurse children of her own in humble and pious contentment.

She received many letters after this from London, over which she often wept to herself, while she prayed in private that poor Mrs. Pountney might yet experience happier days; but she was never heard to utter one vaunting word more concerning "my sister Kate."

THE END.

FROM A RECENT LONDON JOURNAL.

HANNAH MORE.

This celebrated writer, one of the first and foremost in an age adorned by so much of female genius, died lately at Clifton, in her eighty-eighth year. From the humble station of the daughter of a village schoolmaster, near Bristol, she raised herself, by her talents and virtues, to high literary distinction and universal respect. Having early in life attracted friends, she was, principally through the kindness of Dr. Stenhouse of Bristol, enabled to set up a school in conjunction with her sisters, which soon obtained great reputation. An acquaintance with Garrick led her to write for the stage, and her pieces were very successful; but, on taking a religious turn, she abandoned this pursuit, and expressed an opinion that the drama and its performances were not in unison with true piety and Christianity. Having realised a competency, she retired to Mendip, and earnestly devoted herself to the propagation of moral and religious principles, not only among the colliers and lower orders in that neighbourhood, but throughout the country, by her tracts and other publications. Caleb's Search of a Wife, published in 1809, was a novel of much originality, and led to a multitude of imitations: it ran through ten editions in twelve months. Mrs. More had the honour of being consulted on the education of the Princess Charlotte; and on that occasion printed (1805) Hints towards forming the Character of a Young Princess, in 2 vols. 8vo. Her works, but by no means including the whole, have appeared in eight volumes, and display a mind of extraordinary fertility and power.

Mrs. More enjoyed the happiness of an intimacy with Dr. Johnson, Reynolds, Bishop Porteus, Beattie, and many other of the most celebrated persons of that day; and in later times it may be truly said, that, either personally or through confidential correspondence, she was, even in retirement, almost equally well acquainted with the most distinguished men of the present time. To the very end of her life (broken as it was by pain and suffering,) her manners were amiable, instructive, affectionate, and endearing—without austerity or pretension to superior godliness: for she was good in every sense of the word—benevolent, just, and pious; strict in the discharge of her own duties, and liberal in her construction of the conduct of others. Her biography is, we observe, already announced. Her example cannot be too soon set in its proper light before the world.

* The following are among the works of Mrs. More, but little known in the United States:

The Inflexible Captive, a tragedy. Ode to Dragon, Mr. Garrick's house-dog, originally published in quarto. Percy, a tragedy. Fatal Falsehood, a tragedy. Florio, a tale; and the Bas Blue, two poems.

THE Way to be Happy.

FROM THE LONDON METROPOLITAN.

Cut your coat according to your cloth, is an old maxim and a wise one: and if people will only square their ideas according to their circumstances, how much happier might we all be! If we only would come down a peg or two in our notions, in accordance with our waning fortunes, happiness would be always within our reach. It is not what we have, or what we have not, which adds or subtracts from our felicity. It is the longing for more than we have, the envying of those who possess that more, and the wish to appear in the world of more consequence than we really are, which destroy our peace of mind, and eventually lead to ruin.

I never witnessed a man submitting to circumstances with good humour and good sense, so remarkably as in my friend Alexander Willemott. When I first met him, since our school days, it was at the close of the war: he had been a large contractor with government for army clothing and accoutrements, and was said to have realised an immense fortune, although his accounts were not yet settled. Indeed, it was said that they were so vast that it would employ the time of six clerks, for two years, to examine them, previous to the balance sheet being struck. As I observed, he had been at school with me, and, on my return from the East Indies, I called upon him to renew our old acquaintance, and congratulate him upon his success.

"My dear Reynolds, I am delighted to see you. You must come down to Belem Castle; Mrs. Willemott will receive you with pleasure, I'm sure. You shall see my two girls."

I consented. The chaise stopped at a splendid mansion, and I was ushered in by a crowd of liveried servants. Every thing was on the most sumptuous and magnificent scale. Having paid my respects to the lady of the house, I retired to dress, as dinner was nearly ready, it being then half-past seven o'clock. It was eight before we sat down. To an observation that I made, expressing a hope that I had not occasioned the dinner to be put off, Willemott replied, "On the contrary, my dear Reynolds, we never sit down until about this hour. How people can dine at four or five o'clock, I cannot conceive. I could not touch a mouthful."

The dinner was excellent, and I paid it the encomiums which were its due.

"Do not be afraid, my dear fellow—my cook is an artiste extraordinaire—a regular Cordon Bleu. You may eat any thing without fear of indigestion. How people can live upon the English cookery of the present day, I cannot conceive. I seldom dine out, for fear of being poisoned. Depend upon it, a good cook lengthens your days, and no price is too great to insure one."

When the ladies retired, being alone, we entered into friendly conversation, I expressed my admiration of his daughters, who certainly were very handsome and elegant girls.

"Very true; they are more than passable," replied he. "We have had many offers, but not such as come up to my expectations. Baronets are cheap now-a-days, and Irish lords are nothings; I hope to settle them comfortably. We shall see. Try this claret; you will find it excellent, not a headache of it. How people can drink port, I cannot imagine."

The next morning he proposed that I should rattle round the park with him. I acceded, and we set off in a handsome open carriage, with four greys, ridden by postilions at a rapid pace. As we were whirling along, he observed, "In town we must, of course, drive but a pair, but in the country I never go out without four horses. There is a spring in four horses which is delightful; it makes your spirits elastic, and you feel that the poor animals are not at hard labour. Rather than not drive four, I would prefer to stay at home."

Our ride was very pleasant, and, in such amusements passed away one of the most pleasant weeks that I ever remembered. Willemott was not the least altered—he was as friendly, as sincere, as open hearted, as when a boy at school. I left him, pleased with his prosperity, and acknowledging that he was well deserving of it, although his ideas had assumed such a scale of magnificence.

I went to India when my leave expired, and was absent about four years. On my return, I enquired after my friend Willemott, and was told that his circumstances and expectations had been greatly altered. From many causes, such as a change in the government, a demand for economy, and the wording of his contracts having been differently rendered from what Willemott had supposed their meaning to be, large items had been struck out of his balance sheet, and, instead of being a millionaire, he was now a gentleman with a handsome property. Belem Castle had been sold, and he now lived at Richmond, as hospitable as ever, and was considered a great addition to the neighbourhood. I took the earliest opportunity of going down to see him.

"O, my dear Reynolds, this is really kind of you to come without invitation. Your room is ready, and bed well aired, for it was slept in three nights ago. Come—Mrs. Willemott will be delighted to see you."

I found the girls still unmarried, but they were yet young. The whole family appeared as contented, and happy, and as friendly, as before. We sat down to dinner at six o'clock; the footman and the coachman attended. The dinner was good, but not by the artiste extraordinaire. I praised every thing.

"Yes," replied he, "she is a very good cook; she unites the solidity of the English with the delicacy of the French fare; and, altogether, I think it a decided improvement. Jane is quite a treasure." After dinner, he observed, "Of course you know I have sold Belem Castle, and reduced my establishment. Government have not treated me fairly, but I am at the mercy of commissioners, and a body of men will do that, which, as individuals, they would be ashamed of. The fact is, the odium is borne by no one in particular, and it is only the sense of shame which keeps us honest, I'm afraid. However, here you see me, with a comfortable fortune, and always happy to see my friends, especially my old schoolfellow. Will you take port or claret; the port is very fine, and so is the claret. By the by, do you know—I'll let you into a family secret; Louisa is to be married to a Colonel Willer—an excellent match. It has made us all happy."

The next day we drove out, not in an open carriage as before, but in a chariot, and with a pair of horses.

"These are handsome horses," observed I.

"Yes," replied he, "I am fond of good horses; and, as I only keep a pair, I have the best. There is a certain degree of pretension in four horses I do not much like: it appears as if you wished to overtop your neighbours."

I spent a few very pleasant days, and then quitted his hospitable roof. A severe cold, caught that winter, induced me to take the advice of the physicians, and proceed to the south of France, where I remained two years. On my return, I was informed that Willemott had speculated, and had been unlucky on the Stock Exchange; that he had left Richmond, and was now living at Clapham. The next day I met him near the Exchange.

"Reynolds, I am happy to see you. Thompson told me that you had come back. If not better engaged, come down to see me; I will drive you down at four o'clock, if that will suit."

It suited me very well, and, at four o'clock I met him, according to appointment, at a livery stables over the Iron Bridge. His vehicle was ordered out; it was a phaeton, drawn by two long-tailed ponies—altogether a very neat concern. We set off at a rapid pace.

"They step out well, don't they? We shall be down in plenty of time to put on a pair of shoes by five o'clock, which is our dinner-time. Late dinners don't agree with me—they produce indigestion. Of course, you know that Louisa has a little boy."

I did not; but congratulated him.

"Yes; and has now gone out to India with her husband. Mary is also engaged to be married—a very good match—a Mr. Rivers, in the law. He has been called to the bar this year, and promises well. They will be a little pinched at first, but we must see what we can do for them."

We stopped at a neat row of houses, I forget the name, and, as we drove up, the servant, the only manservant, came out, and took the ponies round to the stable, while the maid received my luggage, and one or two paper bags, containing a few extras for the occasion. I was met with the same warmth as usual by Mrs. Willemott. The house was small, but very neat; the remnants of former grandeur appeared here and there, in one or two little articles, favourites of the lady. We sat down at five o'clock to a plain dinner, and were attended by the footman, who had rubbed down the ponies and pulled on his livery.

"A good plain cook is the best thing, after all," observed Willemott. "Your fine cooks won't condescend to roast and boil. Will you take some of this sirloin? the under-cut is excellent. My dear, give Mr. Reynolds some Yorkshire pudding."

When we were left alone after dinner, Willemott told me, very unconcernedly, of his losses.

"It was my own fault," said he; "I wished to make up a little sum for the girls, and risking what they would have had, I left them almost penniless. However, we can always command a bottle of port and a beef-steak, and what more in this world can you have? Will you take port or white? I have no claret to offer you."

We finished our port, but I could perceive no difference in Willemott. He was just as happy and as cheerful as ever. He drove me to town the next day. During our drive, he observed, "I like ponies, they are so little trouble; and I prefer them to driving one horse in this vehicle, as I can put my wife and daughter into it. It's selfish to keep a carriage for yourself alone; and one horse in a four-wheeled double chaise appears like an imposition upon the poor animal."

I went to Scotland, and remained about a year. On my return, I found that my friend Willemott had again shifted his quarters. He was at Brighton; and having nothing better to do, I put myself in the "Times," and arrived at the Bedford hotel. It was not until after some enquiry, that I could find out his address. At last I obtained it, in a respectable but not fashionable part of this overgrown town. Willemott received me just as before.

"I have no spare bed to offer you, but you must breakfast and dine with us every day. Our house is small, but it's very comfortable, and Brighton is a very convenient place. You know Mary is married. A good place in the courts was for sale, and my wife and I agreed to purchase it for Rivers. It has reduced us a little, but they are very comfortable. I have retired from business altogether; in fact, as my daughters are both married, and we have enough to live upon, what can we wish for more? Brighton is very gay and always healthy, and, as for carriage and horses, they are of no use here—there are flies at every corner of the streets."

I accepted his invitation to dinner. A parlour-maid waited, but every thing, although very plain, was clean and comfortable.

"I have still a bottle of wine for a friend, Reynolds," said Willemott, after dinner, "but, for my part, I prefer whiskey-toddy. It agrees with me better. Here's to the health of my two girls, God bless them, and success to them in life!"

"My dear Willemott," said I, "I take the liberty of an old friend, but I am astonished at your philosophy, that I cannot help it. When I call to mind Belem Castle, your large establishment, your luxuries, your French cook, and your stud of cattle, I wonder at your contented state of mind under such a change of circumstances."

"I almost wonder myself, my dear fellow," replied he. "I never could have believed, at that time, that I could live happily under such a change of circumstances; but the fact is, that, although I have been a contractor, I have a good conscience; then, my wife is an excellent woman, and provided she sees me and her daughters happy, thinks nothing about herself; and, further, I have made it a rule, as I have been going down hill, to find reasons why I should be thankful, and not discontented. Depend upon it, Reynolds, it is not a loss of fortune which will affect your happiness, as long as you have peace and love at home."

I took my leave of Willemott and his wife, with respect as well as regard; convinced that there was no pretended indifference to worldly advantages, that it was not, that the grapes were sour, but that he had learned the whole art of happiness, by being contented with what he had, and by "cutting his coat according to his cloth."
